Halirrhŏthĭus (Ἁλιῤῥόθιος), son of Poseidon and Euryte, attempted to violate Alcippe, daughter of Ares and Agraulos, but was slain by Ares. Ares was brought to trial by Poseidon for this murder, on the hill at Athens, which was hence called Areopagus, or the Hill of Ares.

Haliūsa (Ἁλιοῦσα? Karavi), an island in the Argolic gulf.

Halizōnes (Ἁλίζωνες, and -οι), a people of Bithynia, with a capital city Alybe (Ἀλύβη), mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans.

Halmydessus. [SALMYDESSUS.]

Halmўris (Ἁλμυρὶς, sc. λίμην), a bay of the sea in Moesia formed by the S. mouth of the Danube, with a town of the same name upon it.

Halŏnēsus (Ἁλόνησος, Ἁλόννησος: Ἁλονήσιος, Ἁλονησίτης: Khiliodromia), an island of the Aegean sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and E. of Sciathos and Peparethos, with a town of the same name upon it. The possession of this island occasioned great disputes between Philip and the Athenians: there is a speech on this subject among the extant orations of Demosthenes, but it was probably written by Hegesippus.

Halŏsydnē (Ἁλοσύδνη), "the Sea-born," a surname of Amphitrite and Thetys.

Haluntĭum. [ALUNTIUM.]

Halus. [ALUS.]

Halўcus (Ἅλυκος: Platani), a river in the S. of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Heraclea Minoa.

Hălys (Ἅλυς: Kizil-Irmak, i. e. the Red River), the greatest river of Asia Minor, rises in that part of the Anti-Taurus range called Paryadres, on the borders of Armenia Minor and Pontus, and after flowing W. by S. through Cappadocia, turns to the N. and flows through Galatia to the borders of Paphlagonia, where it takes a N. E. direction, dividing Paphlagonia from Pontus, and at last falls into the Euxine (Black Sea) between Sinope and Amisus. In early times it was a most important boundary, ethnographical as well as political. It divided the Indo-European races which peopled the W. part of Asia Minor from the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) races of the rest of S. W. Asia; and it separated the Lydian empire from the Medo-Persian, until, by marching over it to meet Cyrus, Croesus began the contest which at once ended in the overthrow of the former and the extension of the latter to the Aegean Sea.

Hamadrўădes. [NYMPHAE.]

Hamaxĭtus (Ἁμαξιτός), a small town on the coast of the Troad, near the promontory Lectum; said to have been the first settlement of the Teucrian immigrants from Crete. The surrounding district was called Ἁμαξιτία. Lysimachus removed the inhabitants to Alexandria Troas.

Hamaxŏbĭi (Ἁμαξόβιοι), a people in European Sarmatia, in the neighbourhood of the Palus Maeotis, were a nomad race, as their name signifies.

Hămilcar (Ἀμίλκας). The 2 last syllables of this name are the same as Melcarth, the tutelary deity of the Tyrians, called by the Greeks Hercules, and the name probably signifies "the gift of Melcarth." 1. Son of Hanno, or Mago, commander of the great Carthaginian expedition to Sicily, B. C. 480, which was defeated and almost destroyed by Gelon at Himera. [GELON.] Hamilcar fell in the battle.—2. Surnamed Rhodanus, was sent by the Carthaginians to Alexander after the fall of Tyre, B. C. 332. On his return home he was put to death by the Carthaginians for having betrayed their interests.—3. Carthaginian governor in Sicily at the time that Agathocles was rising into power. At first he supported the party at Syracuse, which had driven Agathocles into exile, but he afterwards espoused the cause of Agathocles, who was thus enabled to make himself master of Syracuse, 317.—4. Son of Gisco, succeeded the preceding as Carthaginian commander in Sicily, 311. He carried on war against Agathocles, whom he defeated with great slaughter, and then obtained possession of the greater part of Sicily; but he was taken prisoner while besieging Syracuse, and was put to death by Agathocles.—5. A Carthaginian general in the 1st Punic war, must be carefully distinguished from the great Hamilcar Barca [No. 6.]. In the 3d year of the war (262) he succeeded Hanno in the command in Sicily, and carried on the operations by land with success. He made himself master of Enna and Camarina, and fortified Drepanum. In 257

he commanded the Carthaginian fleet on the N. coast of Sicily, and fought a naval action with the Roman consul C. Atilius Regulus. In the following year (256), he and Hanno commanded the great Carthaginian fleet, which was defeated by the 2 consuls M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulso, off Ecnomus, on the S. coast of Sicily. He was afterwards one of the commanders of the land forces in Africa opposed to Regulus. — 6. Surnamed Barca, an epithet supposed to be related to the Hebrew Barak, and to signify "lightning." It was merely a personal appellation, and is not to be regarded as a family name, though from the great distinction that he obtained, we often find the name of Barcine applied either to his family or his party in the state. He was appointed to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily, in the 18th year of the 1st Punic War, 247. At this time the Romans were masters of the whole of Sicily, with the exception of Drepanum and Lilybaeum, both of which were blockaded by them on the land side. Hamilcar established himself with his whole army on a mountain named Herctè (Monte Pellegrino), in the midst of the enemy's country, and in the immediate neighbourhood of Panormus, one of their most important cities. Here he succeeded in maintaining his ground, to the astonishment alike of friends and foes, for nearly 3 years. In 244 he abruptly quitted Herctè, and took up a still stronger position on Mt. Eryx, after seizing the town of that name. Here he also maintained himself in spite of all the efforts of the Romans to dislodge him. After the great naval defeat of the Carthaginians by Lutatius Catulus (241), Hamilcar, who was still at Eryx, was entrusted by the Carthaginian government with the conclusion of the peace with the Romans. — On his return home, he had to carry on war in Africa with the Carthaginian mercenaries, whom he succeeded in subduing after an arduous struggle of 3 years (240—238). Hamilcar now formed the project of establishing in Spain a new empire, which should not only be a source of strength and wealth to Carthage, but should be the point from whence he might at a subsequent period renew hostilities against Rome. He crossed over into Spain soon after the termination of the war with the mercenaries; but we know nothing of his operations in the country, save that he obtained possession of a considerable portion of Spain, partly by force of arms, and partly by negotiation. After remaining in Spain nearly 9 years, he fell in battle (229) against the Vettones. He was succeeded in the command by his son-in-law Hasdrubal. He left 3 sons, the celebrated Hannibal, Hasdrubal, and Mago. — 7. Son of Gisco, Carthaginian governor of Melite (Malta), which surrendered to the Romans, 218. — 8. Son of Bomilcar, one of the generals in Spain, 215, with Hasdrubal and Mago, the 2 sons of Barca. The 3 generals were defeated by the 2 Scipios, while besieging Illiturgi. — 9. A Carthaginian, who excited a general revolt of the Gauls in Upper Italy, about 200, and took the Roman colony of Placentia. On the defeat of the Gauls by the consul Cethegus in 197, he was taken prisoner.

Hannĭbal (Ἀννίβας). The name signifies "the grace or favour of Baal;" the final syllable bal, of such common occurrence in Punic names, always having reference to this tutelary deity of the Phoenicians. — 1. Son of Gisco, and grandson of Hamilcar [No. 1]. In 409 he was sent to Sicily, at the head of a Carthaginian army to assist the Segestans against the Selinuntines. He took Selinus, and subsequently Himera also. In 406 he again commanded a Carthaginian army in Sicily along with Himilco, but died of a pestilence while besieging Agrigentum. — 2. Son of Gisco, was the Carthaginian commander at Agrigentum, when it was besieged by the Romans, 262. After standing a siege of 7 months, he broke through the enemy's lines, leaving the town to its fate. After this he carried on the contest by sea, and for the next year or two ravaged the coast of Italy; but in 260 he was defeated by the consul Duilius. In 259 he was sent to the defence of Sardinia. Here he was again unfortunate, and was seized by his own mutinous troops, and put to death. — 3. Son of Hamilcar (perhaps Hamilcar, No. 5), succeeded in carrying succours of men and provisions to Lilybaeum, when it was besieged by the Romans, 250. — 4. A general in the war of the Carthaginians against the mercenaries (240—238), was taken prisoner by the insurgents, and crucified. — 5. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and one of the most illustrious generals of antiquity, was born B. C. 247. He was only 9 years old when his father took him with him into Spain, and it was on this occasion that Hamilcar made him swear upon the altar eternal hostility to Rome. Child as he then was, Hannibal never forgot his vow, and his whole life was one continual struggle against the power and domination of Rome. He was early trained in arms under the eye of his father, and was present with him in the battle in which Hamilcar perished (229). Though only 18 years old at this time, he had already displayed so much courage and capacity for war, that he was entrusted by Hasdrubal (the son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar) with the chief command of most of the military enterprises planned by that general. He secured to himself the devoted attachment of the army under his command; and, accordingly, on the assassination of Hasdrubal (221), the soldiers unanimously proclaimed their youthful leader commander-in-chief, which the government at Carthage forthwith ratified. Hannibal was at this time in the 26th year of his age. There can be no doubt that he already looked forward to the invasion and conquest of Italy as the goal of his ambition; but it was necessary for him first to complete the work which had been so ably begun by his 2 predecessors, and to establish the Carthaginian power as firmly as possible in Spain. In 2 campaigns he subdued all the country S. of the Iberus, with the exception of the wealthy town of Saguntum. In the spring of 219 he proceeded to lay siege to Saguntum, which he took after a desperate resistance, which lasted nearly 8 months. Saguntum lay S. of the Iberus, and was therefore not included under the protection of the treaty which had been made between Hasdrubal and the Romans; but as it had concluded an alliance with the Romans, the latter regarded its attack as a violation of the treaty between the 2 nations. On the fall of Saguntum, the Romans demanded the surrender of Hannibal; and when this demand was refused, war was declared, and thus began the long and arduous struggle called the 2nd Punic War. In the spring of 218 Hannibal quitted his winter-quarters at New Carthage and commenced his march for Italy. He crossed the Pyrenees, and marched along the S. coast of Gaul. The Romans sent the consul P. Scipio to oppose him in Gaul; but when Scipio arrived in Gaul, he found that Hannibal had already reached the Rhone, and that it was impossible to overtake him. After Hannibal had crossed the Rhone, he continued his march up the left bank of the river as far as its confluence with the Isère. Here he struck away to the right and commenced his passage across the Alps. He probably crossed the Alps by the pass of the Little St. Bernard, called in antiquity the Graian Alps. His army suffered much from the attacks of the Gaulish mountaineers, and from the natural difficulties of the road, which were enhanced by the lateness of the season (the beginning of October, at which time the snows have already commenced in the high Alps). So heavy were his losses, that when he at length emerged from the valley of Aosta into the plains of the Po, he had with him no more than 20,000 foot and 6000 horse. During Hannibal's march over the Alps, P. Scipio had sent on his own army into Spain, under the command of his brother Cneius, and had himself returned to Italy. He forthwith hastened into Cisalpine Gaul, took the command of the praetor's army, which he found there, and led it against Hannibal. In the first action, which took place near the Ticinus, the cavalry and light-armed troops of the two armies were alone engaged; the Romans were completely routed, and Scipio himself severely wounded. Scipio then crossed the Po and withdrew to the hills on the left bank of the Trebia, where he was soon after joined by the other consul, Ti. Sempronius Longus. Here a second and more decisive battle was fought. The Romans were completely defeated, with heavy loss, and the remains of their army took refuge within the walls of Placentia. This battle was fought towards the end of 218. Hannibal was now joined by all the Gaulish tribes, and he was able to take up his winter-quarters in security. Early in 217 he descended by the valley of the Macra into the marshes on the banks of the Arno. In struggling through these marshes great numbers of his horses and beasts of burthen perished, and he himself lost the sight of one eye by a violent attack of ophthalmia. The consul Flaminius hastened to meet him, and a battle was fought on the lake Trasimenus, in which the Roman army was destroyed; thousands fell by the sword, among whom was the consul himself; thousands more perished in the lake, and no less than 15,000 prisoners fell into the hands of Hannibal. Hannibal now marched through the Apennines into Picenum, and thence into Apulia, where he spent a great part of the summer. The Romans had collected a fresh army, and placed it under the command of the dictator Fabius Maximus, who had prudently avoided a general action, and only attempted to harass and annoy the Carthaginian army. Meanwhile the Romans had made great preparations for the campaign of the following year (216). The 2 new consuls, L. Aemilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, marched into Apulia, at the head of an army of little less than 90,000 men. To this mighty host Hannibal gave battle in the plains on the right bank of the Aufidus, just below the town of Cannae. The Roman army was again annihilated: between 40 and 50 thousand men are said to have fallen in the field, among whom was the consul Aemilius Paulus, both the consuls of the preceding year, above 80 senators, and a multitude of the wealthy knights who composed the Roman cavalry. The other consul, Varro, escaped with a few horsemen to Venusia, and a small band of resolute men forced their way from the Roman camp to Canusium; all the rest were killed, dispersed, or taken prisoners. This victory was followed by the revolt from Rome of most of the nations in the S. of Italy. Hannibal established his army in winter-quarters in Capua, which had espoused his side. Capua was celebrated for its wealth and luxury, and the enervating effect which these produced upon the army of Hannibal became a favourite theme of rhetorical exaggeration in later ages. The futility of such declamations is sufficiently shown by the simple fact that the superiority of that army in the field remained as decided as ever. Still it may be truly said that the winter spent at Capua, 216—215, was in great measure the turning point of Hannibal's fortune, and from this time the war assumed an altered character. The experiment of what he could effect with his single army had now been fully tried, and, notwithstanding all his victories, it had decidedly failed; for Rome was still unsubdued, and still provided with the means of maintaining a protracted contest. From this time the Romans in great measure changed their plan of operations, and, instead of opposing to Hannibal one great army in the field, they hemmed in his movements on all sides, and kept up an army in every province of Italy, to thwart the operations of his lieutenants, and check the rising disposition to revolt. It is impossible here to follow the complicated movements of the subsequent campaigns, during which Hannibal himself frequently traversed Italy in all directions. In 215 Hannibal entered into negotiations with Philip, king of Macedonia, and Hieronymus of Syracuse, and thus sowed the seeds of 2 fresh wars. From 214 to 212 the Romans were busily engaged with the siege of Syracuse, which was at length taken by Marcellus in the latter of these years. In 212 Hannibal obtained possession of Tarentum; but in the following year he lost the important city of Capua, which was recovered by the Romans after a long siege. In 209 the Romans also recovered Tarentum. Hannibal's forces gradually became more and more weakened; and his only object now was to maintain his ground in the S. until his brother Hasdrubal should appear in the N. of Italy, an event to which he had long looked forward with anxious expectation. In 207 Hasdrubal at length crossed the Alps, and descended into Italy; but he was defeated and slain on the Metaurus. [HASDRUBAL, No. 3.] The defeat and death of Hasdrubal was decisive of the fate of the war in Italy. From this time Hannibal abandoned all thoughts of offensive operations, and collected together his forces within the peninsula of Bruttium. In the fastnesses of that wild and mountainous region he maintained his ground for nearly 4 years (207—203). He crossed over to Africa towards the end of 203 in order to oppose P. Scipio. In the following year (202) the decisive battle was fought near Zama. Hannibal was completely defeated with great loss. All hopes of resistance were now at an end, and he was one of the first to urge the necessity of an immediate peace. The treaty between Rome and Carthage was not finally concluded until the next year (201). By this treaty Hannibal saw the object of his whole life frustrated, and Carthage effectually humbled before her imperious rival. But his enmity to Rome was unabated; and though now more than 45 years old, he set himself to work to prepare the means for renewing the contest at no distant period. He introduced the most beneficial reforms into the state, and restored the ruined finances; but having provoked the enmity of a powerful party at Carthage, they denounced him to the Romans as urging on Antiochus III. king of Syria, to take up arms against Rome. Hannibal was obliged to flee from Carthage, and took refuge at the court of Antiochus, who was at this time (193) on the eve of war with Rome. Hannibal in vain urged the necessity of carrying the war at once into Italy, instead of awaiting the Romans in Greece. On the defeat of Antiochus (190), the surrender of Hannibal was one of the conditions of the peace granted to the king. Hannibal, however, foresaw his danger, and took refuge at the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia. Here he found for some years a secure asylum; but the Romans could not be at ease so long as he lived; and T. Quintius Flamininus was at length despatched to the court of Prusias to demand the surrender of the fugitive. The Bithynian king was unable to resist; and Hannibal, perceiving that flight was impossible, took poison, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, about the year 183. Of Hannibal's abilities as a general it is unnecessary to speak: all the great masters of the art of war, from Scipio to the emperor Napoleon, have concurred in their homage to his genius. But in comparing Hannibal with any other of the great leaders of antiquity, we must ever bear in mind the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed. Feebly and grudgingly supported by the government at home, he stood alone, at the head of an army composed of mercenaries of many nations. Yet not only did he retain the attachment of these men, unshaken by any change of fortune, for a period of more than 15 years, but he trained up army after army; and long after the veterans that had followed him over the Alps had dwindled to an inconsiderable remnant, his new levies were still as invincible as their predecessors.

Hanniballiānus. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife Theodora, and half-brother of Constantine the Great. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine. — 2. Son of the elder, brother of the younger Delmatius, was also put to death on the death of Constantine.

Hanno (Ἄννων), one of the most common names at Carthage. Only the most important persons of the name can be mentioned. — 1. One of the Carthaginian generals who fought against Agathocles in Africa, B. C. 310. — 2. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Messana, at the beginning of the 1st Punic war, 264. In consequence of his surrendering the citadel of this city to the Romans, he was crucified on his return home. — 3. Son of Mannibal, was sent to Sicily by the Carthaginians with a large force immediately after the capture of Messana, 364, where he carried on the war against the Roman consul Ap. Claudius. In 262 he again commanded in Sicily, but failed in relieving Agrigentum, where Hannibal was kept besieged by the Romans. [Hannibal, No. 2.] In 256 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet, along with Hamilcar, at the great battle of Ecnomus. — 4. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet, which was defeated by Lutatius Catulus off the Aegates, 241. On his return home, he was crucified. — 5. Surnamed the Great, apparently for his successes in Africa. We do not, however, know against what nations of Africa his arms were directed, nor what was the occasion of the war. He was one of the commanders in the war against the mercenaries in Africa after the end of the 1st Punic war (240—238). From this time forward he appears to have taken no active part in any of the foreign wars or enterprises of Carthage. But his influence in her councils at home was great; he was the leader of the aristocratic party, and, as such, the chief adversary of Hamilcar Barca and his family. On all occasions, from the landing of Barca in Spain till the return of Hannibal from Italy, a period of above 35 years, Hanno is represented as thwarting the measures of that able and powerful family, and taking the lead in opposition to the war with Rome, the great object to which all their efforts were directed. He survived the battle of Zama, 202. — 6. A Carthaginian officer left in Spain by Hannibal when that general crossed the Pyrenees, 218. He was shortly afterwards defeated by Cn. Scipio, and taken prisoner. — 7. Son of Bomilcar, one of the most distinguished of Hannibal's officers. He commanded the right wing at the battle of Cannae (216), and is frequently mentioned during the succeeding years of the war. In 203 he took the command of the Carthaginian forces in Africa, which he held till the arrival of Hannibal. — 8. A Carthaginian general, who carried on the war in Sicily after the fall of Syracuse, 211. He left Sicily in the following year, when Agrigentum was betrayed to the Romans. — 9. The last commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Capua, when it was besieged by the Romans (212—211). — 10. A Carthaginian navigator, under whose name we possess a Periplus (περίπλους), which was originally written in the Punic language, and afterwards translated into Greek. The author had held the office of suffetes, or supreme magistrate at Carthage, and he is said by Pliny to have undertaken the voyage when Carthage was in a most flourishing condition. Hence it has been conjectured that he was the same as the Hanno, the father or son of Hamilcar, who was killed at Himera, B. C. 480; but this is quite uncertain. In the Periplus itself Hanno says that he was sent out by his countrymen to undertake a voyage beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and to found Libyphoenician towns, and that he sailed with a body of colonists to the number of 30,000. On his return from his voyage, he dedicated an account of it, inscribed on a tablet, in the temple of Cronos. It is therefore presumed that our periplus is a Greek version of the contents of that Punic tablet. Edited by Falconer, Lond. 1797, with an English translation.

Harma (τὸ Ἅρμα: Ἁρματεύς). 1. A small place in Boeotia near Tanagra, said to have been so called from the harma or chariot of Adrastus, which broke down here, or from the chariot of Amphiaraus, who was here swallowed up by the earth along with his chariot. — 2. A small place in Attica, near Phyle.

Harmătūs (Ἁρματοῦς), a city and promontory on the coast of Aeolis in Asia Minor, on the N. side of the Sinus Elaïticus.

Harmŏdĭus and Aristogīton (Ἁρμόδιος, Ἀριστογείτων), Athenians, of the blood of the Gephyraei, were the murderers of Hipparchus, brother of the tyrant Hippias, in B. C. 514. Aristogiton was strongly attached to the young and beautiful Harmodius, who returned his affection with equal warmth. Hipparchus endeavoured to withdraw the youth's love to himself, and, failing in this, resolved to avenge the slight by putting upon him a public insult. Accordingly, he took care that the sister of Harmodius should be summoned to bear one of the sacred baskets in some religious procession, and when she presented herself for the purpose, he caused her to be dismissed and declared unworthy of the honour. This fresh insult determined the 2 friends to slay both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias as well. They communicated their plot to a few friends; and selected for their enterprise the day of the festival of the great Panathenaea, the only day on which they could appear in arms without exciting suspicion. When the appointed time arrived, the 2 chief conspirators observed one of their accomplices in conversation with Hippias. Believing, therefore, that they were betrayed, they slew Hipparchus. Harmodius was immediately cut down by the guards. Aristogiton at first escaped, but was afterwards taken, and was put to the torture; but he died without revealing any of the names of the conspirators. Four years after this Hippias was expelled, and thenceforth Harmodius and Aristogiton obtained among the Athenians of all succeeding generations the character of patriots, deliverers, and martyrs, — names often abused indeed, but seldom more grossly than in the present case. Their deed of murderous vengeance formed a favourite subject of drinking songs. To be born of their blood was esteemed among the highest of honours, and their descendants enjoyed an immunity from public burdens. Their statues, made of bronze by Antenor, were set up in the Agora. When Xerxes took the city, he carried these statues away, and new ones, the work of CRITIAS, were erected in 477. The original statues were afterwards sent back to Athens by Alexander the Great.

Harmŏnĭa (Ἁρμονία), daughter of Ares and Aphrodite, or, according to others, of Zeus and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, in Samothrace. When Athena assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, Zeus gave him Harmonia for his wife, and all the gods of Olympus were present at the marriage. On the wedding-day Cadmus received a present of a necklace, which afterwards became fatal to all who possessed it. Harmonia accompanied Cadmus when he was obliged to quit Thebes, and shared his fate. [CADMUS.] Polynices, who inherited the fatal necklace, gave it to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband, Amphiaraus, to undertake the expedition against Thebes. Through Alcmaeon, the son of Eriphyle, the necklace came into the hands of Arsinoë, next into those of the sons of Phegeus, Pronous and Agenor, and lastly into those of the sons of Alcmaeon, Amphoterus and Acarnan, who dedicated it in the temple of Athena Pronoea at Delphi.

Harpăgĭa, or -ĭum (Ἁρπαγεῖα, or -άγιον), a small town in Mysia, between Cyzicus and Priapus, the scene of the rape of Ganymedes, according to some legends.

Harpăgus (Ἅρπαγος). 1. A noble Median, whose preservation of the infant Cyrus, with the events consequent upon it, are related under CYRUS. He became one of the generals of Cyrus, and conquered the Greek cities of Asia Minor. — 2. A Persian general, under Darius I., took Histiaeus prisoner.

Harpălus (Ἅρπαλος). 1. A Macedonian of noble birth, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia, as superintendent of the treasury. After the conquest of Darius, he was left by Alexander in charge of the royal treasury, and with the administration of the wealthy satrapy of Babylon. Here, during Alexander's absence in India, he gave himself up to the most extravagant luxury and profusion, and squandered the treasures entrusted to him. When he heard that Alexander, contrary to his expectations, was returning from India, he fled from Babylon with about 5000 talents and a body of 6000 mercenaries, and crossed over to Greece, B. C. 324. He took refuge at Athens, where he employed his treasures to gain over the orators, and induce the people to support him against Alexander and his vicegerent, Antipater. Among those whom he thus corrupted are said to have been Demades, Charicles, the son-in-law of Phocion, and even Demosthenes himself. [DEMOSTHENES.] But he failed in his general object, for Antipater, having demanded his surrender from the Athenians, it was resolved to place him in confinement until the Macedonians should send for him. He succeeded in making his escape from prison, and fled to Crete, where he was assassinated soon after his arrival, by Thimbron, one of his own officers. — 2. A Greek astronomer, introduced some improvements into the cycle of CLEOSTRATUS. Harpalus lived before METON.

Harpălycē (Ἁρπαλύκη). 1. Daughter of Harpalycus, king in Thrace. As she lost her mother in infancy, she was brought up by her father with the milk of cows and mares, and was trained in all manly exercises. After the death of her father, she lived in the forests as a robber, being so swift in running that horses were unable to overtake her. At length she was caught in a snare by shepherds, who killed her. — 2. Daughter of Clymenus and Epicaste, was seduced by her own father. To revenge herself she slew her younger brother, and served him up as food before her father. The gods changed her into a bird.

Harpăsa (Ἅρπασα: Arepas), a city of Caria, on the river HARPASUS.

Harpăsus (Ἅρπασος). 1. (Arpa-Su), a river of Caria, flowing N. into the Maeander, into which it falls opposite to Nysa. — 2. (Harpa-Su), a river of Armenia Major, flowing S. into the Araxes. Xenophon, who crossed it with the 10,000 Greeks, states its width as 4 plethra (about 400 feet).

Harpīna or Harpinna (Ἅρπινα, Ἅρπιννα), a town in Elis Pisatis, near Olympia, said to have been called after a daughter of Asopus.

Harpocrătĭon, Valĕrius, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria, of uncertain date, the author of an extant dictionary to the works of the 10 Attic orators, entitled Περὶ τῶν λέξεων τῶν δέκα ῥητόρων, or Λεξικὸν τῶν δέκα ῥητόρων. It contains not only explanations of legal and political terms, but also accounts of persons and things mentioned in the Attic orators, and is a work of great value. The best editions are the one published at Leipzig, 1824, and the one by Bekker, Berlin, 1833.

Harpyiae (Ἅρπυιαι), the Harpies, that is, the Robbers or Spoilers, are in Homer nothing but personified storm winds, who are said to carry off any one who had suddenly disappeared from the earth. Thus they carried off the daughters of king Pandareus, and gave them as servants to the Erinnyes. — Hesiod describes them as daughters of Thaumas by the Oceanid Electra, fair-locked and winged maidens, who surpassed winds and birds in the rapidity of their flight. But even in Aeschylus they appear as ugly creatures with wings; and later writers represent them as most disgusting monsters, being birds with the heads of maidens, with long claws and with faces pale with hunger. They were sent by the Gods to torment the blind Phineus, and whenever a meal was placed before him, they darted down from the air and carried it off; later writers add, that they either devoured the food themselves, or rendered it unfit to be eaten. Phineus was delivered from them by Zetes and Calais, sons of Boreas, and 2 of the Argonauts. [See p. 76, a.] Hesiod mentions 2 Harpies, Ocypete and Aëllo: later writers 3; but their names are not the same in all accounts. Besides the 2 already mentioned, we find Aëllopos, Nicothoë, Ocythoë, Ocypode, Celaeno, Acholoë. Virgil places them in the islands called Strophades, in the Ionian sea (Aen. iii. 210), where they took up their abode after they had been driven away from Phineus.— In the famous Harpy monument recently brought from Lycia to this country, the Harpies are represented in the act of carrying off the daughters of Pandareus.

Harūdes, a people in the army of Ariovistus (B. C. 58), supposed to be the same as the Charūdes mentioned by Ptolemy, and placed by him in the Chersonesus Cimbrica.

Hasdrŭbal (Ἀσδρούβας), a Carthaginian name, probably signifies one whose help is Baal. 1. Son of Hanno, a Carthaginian general in the 1st Punic war. He was one of the 2 generals defeated by Regulus B. C. 256. In 254 he was sent into Sicily, with a large army, and remained in the island 4 years. In 250, he was totally defeated by Metellus, and was put to death on his return to Carthage. — 2. A Carthaginian, son-in-law of Hamilcar Barca, on whose death in 229, he succeeded to the command in Spain. He ably carried out the plans of his father-in-law for extending the Carthaginian dominions in Spain, and entrusted the conduct of most of his military enterprises to the young Hannibal. He founded New Carthage, and concluded with the Romans the celebrated treaty which fixed the Iberus as the boundary between the Carthaginian and Roman dominions. He was assassinated by a slave, whose master he had put to death (221), and was succeeded in the command by HANNIBAL. — 3. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and brother of Hannibal. When Hannibal set out for Italy (218), Hasdrubal was left in the command in Spain, and there fought for some years against the 2 Scipios. In 207 he crossed the Alps and marched into Italy, in order to assist Hannibal; but he was defeated on the Metaurus, by the consuls C. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator, his army was destroyed, and he himself fell in the battle. His head was cut off and thrown into Hannibal's camp. — 4. One of Hannibal's chief officers, commanded the left wing of the Carthaginian army at the battle of Cannae (216). — 5. Surnamed the Bald (Calvus), commander of the Carthaginian expedition to Sardinia in the 2nd Punic war, 215. He was defeated by the Roman praetor, T. Manlius, taken prisoner, and carried to Rome. — 6. Son of Gisco, one of the Carthaginian generals in Spain during the 2nd Punic war. He fought in Spain from 214 to 206. After he and Mago had been defeated by Scipio in the latter of these years, he crossed over to Africa, where he succeeded in obtaining the alliance of Syphax by giving him his daughter Sophonisba in marriage. In conjunction with Syphax, Hasdrubal carried on war against Masinissa, but he was defeated by Scipio, who landed in Africa in 204. He was condemned to death for his ill success by the Carthaginian government, but he still continued in arms against the Romans. On the arrival of Hannibal from Italy his sentence was reversed; but the popular feeling against him had not subsided, and in order to escape death from his enemies, he put an end to his life by poison. — 7. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet in Africa in 203, must be distinguished from the preceding. — 8. Surnamed the Kid (Haedus), one of the leaders of the party at Carthage favourable to peace towards the end of the 2nd Punic war. — 9. General of the Carthaginians in the 3rd Punic war. When the city was taken, he surrendered to Scipio, who spared his life. After adorning Scipio's triumph, he spent the rest of his life in Italy.

Haterĭus, Q., a senator and rhetorician in the age of Augustus and Tiberius, died A. D. 26, in the 89th year of his age.

Hēbē (Ἥβη), called Juventas by the Romans, the goddess of youth, was a daughter of Zeus and Hera. She waited upon the gods, and filled their cups with nectar, before Ganymedes obtained this office; and she is further represented as assisting her mother Hera in putting the horses to her chariot, and in bathing and dressing her brother Ares. She married Hercules after he was received among the gods, and bore to him 2 sons, Alexiares and Anticetus. Later traditions represent her as a divinity who had it in her power to make aged persons young again. At Rome there were several temples of Juventas. She is even said to have had a chapel on the Capitol before the temple of Jupiter was built there.

Hebromăgus. [EBUROMAGUS.]

Hebron (Ἐβρών, Χεβρών· Ἐβρώνιος: El-Khulil), a city in the S. of Judaea, as old as the times of the patriarchs, and the first capital of the kingdom of David, who reigned there 7½ years, as king of Judah only.

Hebrus (Ἕβρος: Maritza), the principal river in Thrace, rises in the mountains of Scomius and Rhodope, flows first S.E. and then S.W., becomes navigable for smaller vessels at Philippopolis, and for larger ones at Hadrianopolis, and falls into the Aegean sea near Aenos, after forming by another branch an estuary called Stentoris Lacus. — The Hebrus was celebrated in Greek legends. On its banks Orpheus was torn to pieces by the Thracian women; and it is frequently mentioned in connexion with the worship of Dionysus.

Hĕcaergē (Ἑκαέργη). 1. Daughter of Boreas, and one of the Hyperborean maidens, who were believed to have introduced the worship of Artemis in Delos. — 2. A surname of Artemis, signifying the goddess who hits at a distance.

Hĕcālē (Ἑκάλη), a poor old woman, who hospitably received Theseus, when he had gone out for the purpose of killing the Marathonian bull. She vowed to offer to Zeus a sacrifice for the safe return of the hero; but as she died before his return, Theseus ordained that the inhabitants of the Attic tetrapolis should offer a sacrifice to her and Zeus Hecalus, or Hecaleius.

Hecataeus (Ἑκαταῖος). 1. Of Miletus, one of the earliest and most distinguished Greek historians and geographers. He was the son of Hegesander, and belonged to a very ancient and illustrious family. We have only a few particulars of his life. In B. C. 500 he endeavoured to dissuade his countrymen from revolting from the Persians; and when this advice was disregarded, he gave them some sensible counsel respecting the conduct of the war, which was also neglected. Previous to this, Hecataeus had visited Egypt and many other countries. He survived the Persian wars, and appears to have died about 476. He wrote 2 works: — 1. Περίοδος γῆς, or Περιήγησις, divided into 2 parts, one of which contained a description of Europe, and the other of Asia, Egypt, and Libya. Both parts were subdivided into smaller sections, which are sometimes quoted under their respective names, such as Hellespontus, &c. — 2. Γενεαλογίαι or Ἱστορίαι, in 4 books, contained an account of the poetical fables and traditions of the Greeks. His work on geography was the more important, as it embodied the results of his numerous travels. He also corrected and improved the map of the earth drawn up by ANAXIMANDER. Herodotus knew the works of Hecataeus well, and frequently controverts his opinions. Hecataeus wrote in the Ionic dialect in a pure and simple style. The fragments of his works are collected by Klausen, Hecataei Milesii Fragmenta, Berlin, 1831, and by C. and Th. Müller, Frag. Hist. Graec. Paris, 1841. — 2. Of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great and Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, appears to have accompanied the former on his Asiatic expedition. He was a pupil of the Sceptic Pyrrho, and is himself called a philosopher, critic, and grammarian. In the reign of the first Ptolemy he travelled up the Nile as far as Thebes. He was the author of several works, of which the most important were: — 1. A History of Egypt. — 2. A work on the Hyperboreans. — 3. A History of the Jews, frequently referred to by Josephus and other ancient writers. This work was declared spurious by Origen: modern critics are divided in their opinions.

Hĕcătē (Ἑκάτη) a mysterious divinity, commonly represented as a daughter of Persaeus or Perses and Asteria, and hence called Perseis. She is also described as a daughter of Zeus and Demeter, or of Zeus and Pheraea or Hera, or of Leto or Tartarus. Homer does not mention her. According to the most genuine traditions, she appears to have been an ancient Thracian divinity, and a Titan, who ruled in heaven, on the earth, and in the sea, bestowing on mortals wealth, victory, wisdom, good luck to sailors and hunters, and prosperity to youth and to the flocks of cattle. She was the only one among the Titans who retained this power under the rule of Zeus, and she was honoured by all the immortal gods. The extensive power possessed by Hecate was probably the reason that she was subsequently identified with several other divinities, and at length became a mystic goddess, to whom mysteries were celebrated in Samothrace and in Aegina. In the Homeric hymn to Demeter, she is represented as taking an active part in the search after Proserpina, and when the latter was found as remaining with her as her attendant and companion. [See p. 212, a.] She thus became a deity of the lower world, and is described in this capacity as a mighty and formidable divinity. In consequence of her being identified with other divinities, she is said to have been Selene or Luna in heaven, Artemis or Diana in earth, and Persephone or Proserpina in the lower world. Being thus as it were a 3-fold goddess, she is described with 3 bodies or 3 heads, the one of a horse, the 2nd of a dog, and the 3rd of a lion. Hence her epithets Tergeminus, Triformis, Triceps, &c. From her being an infernal divinity, she came to be regarded as a spectral being, who sent at night all kinds of demons and terrible phantoms from the lower world, who taught sorcery and witchcraft, and dwelt at places where 2 roads crossed, on tombs, and near the blood of murdered persons. She herself wandered about with the souls of the dead, and her approach was announced by the whining and howling of dogs. — At Athens there were very many small statues or symbolical representations of Hecate (ἑκάταια), placed before or in houses, and on spots where 2 roads crossed: it would seem that people consulted such Hecataea as oracles. At the close of every month dishes with food were set out for her and other averters of evil at the points where 2 roads crossed; and this food was consumed by poor people. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of dogs, honey, and black female lambs.

Hecatomnus (Ἑκατόμνως), king or dynast of Caria, in the reign of Artaxerxes III. He left 3 sons, Maussolus, Idrieus, and Pixodarus, all of whom, in their turn, succeeded him in the sovereignty; and 2 daughters, Artemisia and Ada.

Hecatompȳlos (Ἑκατόμπυλος, i.e. having 100 gates). 1. An epithet of Thebes in Egypt [THEBAE]. — 2. A city in the middle of Parthia, 1260 stadia or 133 Roman miles from the Caspiae Pylae; enlarged by Seleucus; and afterwards used by the Parthian kings as a royal residence.

Hĕcăton (Ἑκάτων), a Stoic philosopher, a native of Rhodes, studied under Panaetius, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost.

Hecatonnēsi (Ἑκατόννησοι: Mosko-nisi), a group of small islands, between Lesbos and the coast of Aeolis, on the S. side of the mouth of the Gulf of Adramyttium. The name, 100 islands, was indefinite; the real number was reckoned by some at 20, by others at 40. Strabo derives the name, not from ἑκατόν, 100, but from Ἕκατος, a surname of Apollo.

Hector (Ἕκτωρ), the chief hero of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks, was the eldest son of Priam and Hecuba, the husband of Andromache, and father of Scamandrius. He fought with the bravest of the Greeks, and at length slew Patroclus, the friend of Achilles. The death of his friend roused Achilles to the fight. The other Trojans fled before him into the city. Hector alone remained without the walls, though his parents implored him to return; but when he saw Achilles, his heart failed him, and he took to flight. Thrice did he race round the city, pursued by the swift-footed Achilles, and then fell pierced by Achilles' spear. Achilles tied Hector's body to his chariot, and thus dragged him into the camp of the Greeks; but later traditions relate that he first dragged the body thrice around the walls of Ilium. At the command of Zeus, Achilles surrendered the body to the prayers of Priam, who buried it at Troy with great pomp. Hector is one of the noblest conceptions of the poet of the Iliad. He is the great bulwark of Troy, and even Achilles trembles when he approaches him. He has a presentiment of the fall of his country, but he perseveres in his heroic resistance, preferring death to slavery and disgrace. Besides these virtues of a warrior, he is distinguished also by those of a man: his heart is open to the gentle feelings of a son, a husband, and a father.

Hecŭba (Ἑκάβη), daughter of Dymas in Phrygia, or of Cisseus, king of Thrace. She was the wife of Priam, king of Troy, to whom she bore Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Cassandra, and many other children. On the capture of Troy, she was carried away as a slave by the Greeks. According to the tragedy of Euripides, which bears her name, she was carried by the Greeks to Chersonesus, and there saw her daughter Polyxena sacrificed. On the same day the waves of the sea washed on the coast the body of her last son Polydorus, who had been murdered by Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whose care he had been entrusted by Priam. Hecuba thereupon killed the children of Polymestor, and tore out the eyes of their father. Agamemnon pardoned her the crime, and Polymestor prophesied that she should be metamorphosed into a she-dog, and should leap into the sea at a place called Cynossema. It was added that the inhabitants of Thrace endeavoured to stone her, but that she was metamorphosed into a dog, and in this form howled through the country for a long time. — According to other accounts she was given as a slave to Ulysses, and in despair leaped into the Hellespont; or being anxious to die, she uttered such invectives against the Greeks, that the warriors put her to death, and called the place where she was buried Cynossema, with reference to her impudent invectives.

Hēdȳlus (Ἥδυλος), son of Melicertus, was a native of Samos or of Athens, and an epigrammatic poet. 11 of his epigrams are in the Greek Anthology. He was a contemporary and rival of Callimachus, and lived therefore about the middle of the 3rd century B. C.

Hēdȳlĭus Mons (Ἡδύλειον), a range of mountains in Boeotia, W. of the Cephissus.

Hēgēmon (Ἡγήμων), of Thasos, a poet of the old comedy at Athens, but more celebrated for his parodies, of which kind of poetry he was the inventor. He was nicknamed Φακῆ, on account of his fondness for that kind of pulse. He lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war; and his parody of the Gigantomachia was the piece to which the Athenians were listening, when the news was brought to them in the theatre of the destruction of the expedition to Sicily.

Hēgĕmŏnē (Ἡγεμόνη), the leader or ruler, is the name of one of the Athenian Charites or Graces. Hegemone was also a surname of Artemis at Sparta, and in Arcadia.

Hēgēsĭānax (Ἡγησιάναξ), an historian of Alexandria, is said to have been the real author of the work called Troica, which went under the name of Cephalon, or Cephalion. He appears to be the same as the Hegesianax, who was sent by Antiochus the Great as one of his envoys to the Romans in B. C. 196 and 193.

Hēgēsĭas (Ἡγησίας). 1. Of Magnesia, a rhetorician and historian, lived about B. C. 290, and wrote the history of Alexander the Great. He was regarded by some as the founder of that degenerate style of composition which bore the name of the Asiatic. His own style was destitute of all vigour and dignity, and was marked chiefly by childish conceits and minute prettinesses. — 2. Of Salamis, supposed by some to have been the author of the Cyprian poem, which, on better authority, is ascribed to Stasinus. — 3. A Cyrenaic philosopher, who lived at Alexandria in the time of the Ptolemies, perhaps about B. C. 260. He wrote a work containing such gloomy descriptions of human misery, that it drove many persons to commit suicide; hence he was surnamed Peisithanatos (Πεισιθάνατος). He was, in consequence, forbidden to teach by Ptolemy.

Hēgēsĭas (Ἡγησίας) and Hēgĭas (Ἡγίας), 2 Greek statuaries, whom many scholars identify with one another. They lived at the period immediately preceding that of Phidias. The chief work of Hegesias was the statues of Castor and Pollux, which are supposed to be the same as those which now stand on the stairs leading to the Capitol.

Hēgēsīnus (Ἡγησίνους), of Pergamum, the successor of Evander and the immediate predecessor of Carneades in the chair of the Academy, flourished about B. C. 185.

Hēgēsippus (Ἡγήσιππος). 1. An Athenian orator, and a contemporary of Demosthenes, to whose political party he belonged. The grammarians ascribe to him the oration on Halonesus, which has come down to us under the name of Demosthenes. — 2. A poet of the New Comedy, flourished about B. C. 300. — 3. A Greek historian of Mecyberna, wrote an account of the peninsula of Pallene.

Hēgēsĭpȳla (Ἡγησιπύλη), daughter of Olorus, king of Thrace, and wife of Miltiades.

Hēgĭas. [HEGESIAS.]

Hĕlĕna (Ἑλένη), daughter of Zeus and Leda, and sister of Castor and Pollux (the Dioscuri). She was of surpassing beauty. In her youth she was carried off by Theseus and Pirithous to Attica. When Theseus was absent in Hades, Castor and Pollux undertook an expedition to Attica, to liberate their sister. Athens was taken, Helen delivered, and Aethra, the mother of Theseus, made prisoner, and carried as a slave of Helen, to Sparta. According to some accounts she bore to Theseus a daughter Iphigenia. On her return home, she was sought in marriage by the noblest chiefs from all parts of Greece. She chose Menelaus for her husband, and became by him the mother of Hermione. She was subsequently seduced and carried off by Paris to Troy. [For details, see PARIS and MENELAUS.] The Greek chiefs who had been her suitors, resolved to revenge her abduction, and accordingly sailed against Troy. Hence arose the celebrated Trojan war, which lasted 10 years. During the course of the war she is represented as showing great sympathy with the Greeks. After the death of Paris towards the end of the war, she married his brother Deiphobus. On the capture of Troy, which she is said to have favoured, she betrayed Deiphobus to the Greeks, and became reconciled to Menelaus, whom she accompanied to Sparta. Here she lived with him for some years in peace and happiness; and here, according to Homer, Telemachus found her solemnising the marriage of her daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus. The accounts of Helen's death differ. According to the prophecy of Proteus in the Odyssey, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium. Others relate that she and Menelaus were buried at Therapne in Laconia, where their tomb was seen by Pausanias. Others again relate, that after the death of Menelaus she was driven out of Peloponnesus by the sons of the latter and fled to Rhodes, where she was tied to a tree and strangled by Polyxo: the Rhodians expiated the crime by dedicating a temple to her under the name of Helena Dendritis. According to another tradition she married Achilles in the island of Leuce, and bore him a son Euphorion. — The Egyptian priests told Herodotus that Helen never went to Troy, but that when Paris reached Egypt with Helen on his way to Troy, she was detained by Proteus, king of Egypt; and that she was restored to Menelaus when he visited Egypt in search of her after the Trojan war, finding that she had never been at Troy.

Hĕlĕna, Flāvia Jūlia. 1. The mother of Constantine the Great. When her husband Constantius was raised to the dignity of Caesar by Diocletian, A. D. 292, he was compelled to repudiate his wife, to make way for Theodora, the step-child of Maximianus Herculius. Subsequently, when her son succeeded to the purple, Helena was treated with marked distinction and received the title of Augusta. She died about 328. She was a Christian, and is said to have discovered at Jerusalem the sepulchre of our Lord, together with the wood of the true cross. — 2. Daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married her cousin Julian the Apostate, 355, and died 360.

Hĕlĕna (Ἑλένη). 1. (Makronisi), a small and rocky island, between the S. of Attica and Ceos, formerly called Cranaë. — 2. The later name of Illiberris in Gaul.

Hĕlĕnus (Ἕλενος). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, was celebrated for his prophetic powers, and also fought against the Greeks in the Trojan war. In Homer we have no further particulars about Helenus; but in later traditions he is said to have deserted his countrymen and joined the Greeks. There are likewise various accounts respecting his desertion of the Trojans. According to some he did it of his own accord; according to others, he was ensnared by Ulysses, who was anxious to obtain his prophecy respecting the fall of Troy. Others, again, relate that, on the death of Paris, Helenus and Deiphobus contended for the possession of Helena, and that Helenus being conquered, fled to Mt. Ida, where he was taken prisoner by the Greeks. After the fall of Troy, he fell to the share of Pyrrhus. He foretold Pyrrhus the sufferings which awaited the Greeks who returned home by sea, and prevailed upon him to return by land to Epirus. After the death of Pyrrhus he received a portion of the country, and married Andromache, by whom he became the father of Cestrinus. When Aeneas in his wanderings arrived in Epirus, he was hospitably received by Helenus, who also foretold him the future events of his life. — 2. Son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by Lanassa, daughter of Agathocles. He accompanied his father to Italy B. C. 280, and was with him when Pyrrhus perished at Argos, 272. He then fell into the hands of Antigonus Gonatas, who however sent him back in safety to Epirus.

Hēlĭădae and Hēlĭădes (Ἡλιάδαι and Ἡλιάδες), the sons and daughters of Helios (the Sun). The name Heliades is given especially to Phaëthusa, Lampetie and Phoebe, the daughters of Helios and the nymph Clymene, and the sisters of Phaëton. They bewailed the death of their brother Phaëton so bitterly on the banks of the Eridanus, that the gods in compassion changed them into poplar-trees and their tears into amber. [See Eridanus.]

Hĕlĭce (Ἑλίκη), daughter of Lycaon, was beloved by Zeus, but Hera, out of jealousy, metamorphosed her into a she-bear, whereupon Zeus placed her among the stars, under the name of the Great Bear.

Hĕlĭcē (Ἑλίκη: Ἑλικώνιος, Ἑλικεύς). 1. The ancient capital of Achaia, said to have been founded by Ion, possessed a celebrated temple of Poseidon, which was regarded as the great sanctuary of the Achaean race. Helice was swallowed up by an earthquake together with Bura, B. C. 373. The earth sunk deep into the ground, and the place on which the cities stood was ever afterwards covered by the sea. — 2. An ancient town in Thessaly, which disappeared in early times.

Hĕlĭcon (Ἑλικών), son of Acesas, a celebrated artist. [Acesas.]

Hĕlĭcon (Ἑλικών: Helicon, Palaeo-Buni, Turk. Zagora), a celebrated range of mountains in Boeotia, between the lake Copais and the Corinthian gulf, was covered with snow the greater part of the year, and possessed many romantic ravines and lovely vallies. Helicon was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, the latter of whom are hence called Ἑλικώνιαι παρθένοι and Ἑλικωνιάδες νυμφαί by the Greek poets, and Heliconiades and Heliconides by the Roman poets. Here sprung the celebrated fountains of the Muses, Aganippe and Hippocrene. At the fountain of Hippocrene was a grove sacred to the Muses, which was adorned with some of the finest works of art. On the slopes and in the valleys of the mountains grew many medicinal plants, which may have given occasion to the worship of Apollo, as the healing god.

Hēlĭŏdōrus (Ἡλιόδωρος). 1. An Athenian, surnamed Periegetes (Περιηγητής), probably lived about B. C. 164, and wrote a description of the works of art in the Acropolis at Athens. This work was one of the authorities for Pliny's account of the Greek artists. — 2. A rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, whom Horace mentions as the companion of his journey to Brundisium (Sat. i. 5. 2, 3.) — 3. A Stoic philosopher at Rome, who became a delator in the reign of Nero. (Juv. Sat. i. 33.) — 4. A rhetorician, and private secretary to the emperor Hadrian. — 5. Of Emesa in Syria, lived about the end of the 4th century of our era, and was bishop of Tricca in Thessaly. Before he was made bishop, he wrote a romance in 10 books, entitled Aethiopica, because the scene of the beginning and the end of the story is laid in Aethiopia. This work has come down to us, and is far superior to the other Greek romances. It relates the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea. Though deficient in those characteristics of modern fiction which appeal to the universal sympathies of our nature, the romance of Heliodorus is interesting on account of the rapid succession of strange and not altogether improbable adventures, the many and various characters introduced, and the beautiful scenes described. The language is simple and elegant. The best editions are by Mitscherlich in his Scriptores Graeci Erotici, Argentorat. 1798, and by Coraës, Paris, 1804. — 6. Of Larissa, the author of a short work on optics, still extant, chiefly taken from Euclid's Optics: edited by Matani, Pistor. 1758.

Heliogabălus. [Elagabalus.]

Hēlĭŏpŏlis (Ἡλίου πόλις or Ἡλιούπολις, i. e. the City of the Sun). 1. (Heb. Baalath: Baalbek, Ru.), a celebrated city of Syria, a chief seat of the worship of Baal, one of whose symbols was the Sun, and whom the Greeks identified with Apollo, as well as with Zeus: hence the Greek name of the city. With the worship of Baal, here as elsewhere, was associated that of Astarte, whom the Greeks identified with Aphrodite. It was situated in the middle of Coele-Syria, at the W. foot of Anti-Libanus, on a rising ground at the N. E. extremity of a large plain which reaches almost to the sea, and which is well watered by the river Leontes (Nahr-el-Kasimiyeh), near whose sources Heliopolis was built: the sources of the Orontes also are not far N. of the city. The situation of Heliopolis necessarily made it a place of great commercial importance, as it was on the direct road from Egypt and the Red Sea and also from Tyre to Syria, Asia Minor, and Europe; and hence, probably, the wealth of the city, to which its ruins still bear witness. We know, however, very little of its history. It was made a Roman colony by the name of Colonia Julia Augusta Felix Heliopolitana, and colonised by veterans of the 5th and 8th legions, under Augustus. Antoninus Pius built the great temple of Jupiter (i. e. Baal), of which the ruins still exist; and there are medals which shew, in addition to other testimony, that it was favoured by several of the later emperors. All the existing ruins are of the Roman period, and most of them probably of later date than the great temple just mentioned; but it is impossible to determine their exact times. They consist of a large quadrangular court in front of the great temple, another hexagonal court outside of this, and, in front of all, a portico, or propylaea, approached by a flight of steps. Attached to one corner of the quadrangular court is a smaller, but more perfect, temple; and, at some distance from all these buildings, there is a circular edifice, of a unique and very interesting architectural form. There is also a single Doric column on a rising ground, and traces of the city walls. — 2. (O. T. On, or Bethshemesh: Matarieh, Ru. N.E. of Cairo), a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Heliopolites, stood on the E. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, a little below the apex of the Delta, and near the canal of Trajan, and was, in the earliest period of which we have any record, a chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the Sun. Here also was established the worship of Mnevis, a sacred bull similar to Apis. The priests of Heliopolis were renowned for their learning. It suffered much during the invasion of Cambyses; and by the time of Strabo it was entirely ruined.

Hēlĭos (Ἥλιος or Ἠέλιος), called Sol by the Romans, the god of the sun. He was the son of Hyperion and Thea, and a brother of Selene and Eos. From his father, he is frequently called Hyperiŏnĭdes, or Hyperīon, the latter of which is an abridged form of the patronymic, Hyperionion. In the Homeric hymn on Helios, he is called a son of Hyperion and Euryphaëssa. Homer describes Helios as giving light both to gods and men: he rises in the E. from Oceanus, traverses the heaven, and descends in the evening into the darkness of the W. and Oceanus. Later poets have marvellously embellished this simple notion. They tell of a most magnificent palace of Helios in the E., containing a throne occupied by the god, and surrounded by personifications of the different divisions of time. They also assign him a second palace in the W., and describe his horses as feeding upon herbs growing in the islands of the Blessed. The manner in which Helios during the night passes from the western into the eastern ocean is not mentioned either by Homer or Hesiod, but later poets make him sail in a golden boat, the work of Hephaestus, round one-half of the earth, and thus arrive in the E. at the point from which he has to rise again. Others represent him as making his nightly voyage while slumbering in a golden bed. The horses and chariot with which Helios traverses the heavens are not mentioned in the Iliad and Odyssey, but first occur in the Homeric hymn on Helios, and both are described minutely by later poets.—Helios is described as the god who sees and hears every thing, and was thus able to reveal to Hephaestus the faithlessness of Aphrodite, and to Demeter the abduction of her daughter. At a later time Helios became identified with Apollo, though the 2 gods were originally quite distinct; but the identification was never carried out completely, for no Greek poet ever made Apollo ride in the chariot of Helios through the heavens, and among the Romans we find this idea only after the time of Virgil. The representations of Apollo with rays around his head, to characterise him as identical with the sun, belong to the time of the Roman empire. — The island of Thrinacia (Sicily) was sacred to Helios, and there he had flocks of sheep and oxen, which were tended by his daughters Phaetusa and Lampetia. Later traditions ascribe to him flocks also in the island of Erythīa; and it may be remarked in general, that sacred flocks, especially of oxen, occur in most places where the worship of Helios was established.—His descendants are very numerous; and the surnames and epithets given him by the poets are mostly descriptive of his character as the sun. Temples of Helios (ἡλιεῖα) existed in Greece at a very early time; and in later times we find his worship established in various places, and especially in the island of Rhodes, where the famous colossus was a representation of the god. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of white rams, boars, bulls, goats, lambs, especially white horses, and honey. Among the animals sacred to him, the cock is especially mentioned. The Roman poets, when speaking of the god of the sun (Sol), usually adopt the notions of the Greeks. The worship of Sol was introduced at Rome, especially after the Romans had become acquainted with the East, though traces of the worship of the sun and moon occur at an early period.

Helissōn (Ἑλισσών or Ἑλισσοῦς), a small town in Arcadia, on a river of the same name, which falls into the Alphēus.

Hellānīcus (Ἑλλάνικος). 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the most eminent of the Greek logographers, or early Greek historians, was in all probability born about B. C. 496, and died 411. We have no particulars of his life, but we may presume that he visited many of the countries, of whose history he gave an account. He wrote a great number of genealogical, chronological and historical works, which are cited under the titles of Troica, Aeolica, Persica, &c. One of his most popular works was entitled Ἱέρειαι τῆς Ἥρας: it contained a chronological list of the priestesses of Hera at Argos, compiled from the records preserved in the temple of the goddess of this place. This work was one of the earliest attempts to regulate chronology, and was made use of by Thucydides, Timaeus and others. The fragments of Hellanicus are collected by Sturz, Hellanici Lesbii Fragmenta, Lips. 1826; and by C. and Th. Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec. Paris, 1841. — 2. A Greek grammarian, a disciple of Agathocles, and apparently a contemporary of Aristarchus, wrote on the Homeric poems.

Hellas, Hellēnes. [GRAECIA.]

Hellē (Ἕλλη), daughter of Athamas and Ne-

phĕle, and sister of Phrixus. When Phrixus was to be sacrificed [PHRIXUS], Nephele rescued her 2 children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes; but, between Sigeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea, which was thence called the sea of Helle (Hellespontus). Her tomb was shown near Pactya, on the Hellespont.

Hellēn (Ἕλλην), son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, or of Zeus and Dorippe, husband of Orseis, and father of Aeolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. He was king of Phthia in Thessaly, and was succeeded by his son Aeolus. He is the mythical ancestor of all the Hellenes; from his 2 sons Aeolus and Dorus were descended the Aeolians and Dorians; and from his 2 grandsons Achaeus and Ion, the sons of Xuthus, the Achaeans and Ionians.

Hellespontus (Ἑλλήσποντος: Straits of the Dardanelles, or of Gallipoli, Turk. StambulDenghiz), the long narrow strait connecting the Propontis (Sea of Marmara) with the Aegean Sea, and through which the waters of the Black Sea discharge themselves into the Mediterranean in a constant current. The length of the strait is about 50 miles, and the width varies from 6 miles at the upper end to 2 at the lower, and in some places it is only 1 mile wide, or even less. The narrowest part is between the ancient cities of SESTUS and ABYDUS, where Xerxes made his bridge of boats, [XERXES] and where the legend related that Leander swam across to visit Hero. [LEANDER.] The name of the Hellespont (i. e. the Sea of Helle) was derived from the story of Helle's being drowned in it [HELLE]. The Hellespont was the boundary of Europe and Asia, dividing the Thracian Chersonese in the former from the Troad and the territories of Abydus and Lampsacus in the latter. The district just mentioned, on the S. side of the Hellespont, was also called Ἑλλήσποντος, its inhabitants Ἑλλησπόντιοι, and the cities on its coast Ἑλλησπόντιαι πόλεις. — 2. Under the Roman empire, Hellespontus was the name of a proconsular province, composed of the Troad and the N. part of Mysia, and having Cyzicus for its capital.

Hellŏmenum (Ἑλλόμενον), a seaport town of the Acarnanians on the island Leucas.

Hellŏpĭa. [ELLOPIA.]

Helōrus or Helōrum (ἡ Ἕλωρος: Ἑλωρίτης), a town on the E. coast of Sicily, S. of Syracuse, at the mouth of the river Helorus. There was a road from Helorus to Syracuse (ὁδὸς Ἑλωρίνη, Thuc. vi. 70, vii. 80).

Hĕlos (τὸ Ἕλος: Ἑλεῖος, Ἑλεάτης). 1. A town in Laconia, on the coast, in a marshy situation, whence its name (ἕλος=marsh). The town was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It was commonly said that the Spartan slaves, called Helotes (Εἵλωτες), were originally the Achaean inhabitants of this town, who were reduced by the Dorian conquerors to slavery; but this account of the origin of the Helotes seems to have been merely an invention, in consequence of the similarity of their name to that of the town of Helos. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Helotes.) — 2. A town or district of Elis on the Alpheus.

Helvecŏnae, a people in Germany, between the Viadus and the Vistula, S. of the Rugii, and N. of the Burgundiones, reckoned by Tacitus among the Ligii.

Helvētĭi, a brave and powerful Celtic people, who dwelt between M. Jurassus (Jura), the Lacus Lemannus (Lake of Geneva), the Rhone, and the Rhine as far as the Lacus Brigantinus (Lake of Constance). They were thus bounded by the Sequani on the W., by the Nantuates and Lepontii in Cisalpine Gaul on the S., by the Rhaeti on the E., and by the German nations on the N. beyond the Rhine. Their country, called Ager Helvetiorum (but never Helvetia), thus corresponded to the W. part of Switzerland. Their chief town was AVENTICUM. They were divided into 4 pagi or cantons, of which the Pagus Tigurīnus was the most celebrated. We only know the name of one of the 3 others, namely the Vicus Verbigenus, or, more correctly, Urbigenus. — The Helvetii are first mentioned in the war with the Cimbri. In B. C. 107 the Tigurini defeated and killed the Roman consul L. Cassius Longinus, on the lake of Geneva, while another division of the Helvetii accompanied the Cimbri and Teutones in their invasion of Gaul. Subsequently the Helvetii invaded Italy along with the Cimbri; and they returned home in safety, after the defeat of the Cimbri by Marius and Catulus in 101. About 40 years afterwards, they resolved, upon the advice of Orgetorix, one of their chiefs, to migrate from their country with their wives and children, and seek a new home in the more fertile plains of Gaul. In 58 they endeavoured to carry their plan into execution, but they were defeated by Caesar, and driven back into their own territories. The Romans now planted colonies and built fortresses in their country (Noviodunum, Vindonissa, Aventicum), and the Helvetii gradually adopted the customs and language of their conquerors. They were severely punished by the generals of Vitellius (A. D. 70), whom they refused to recognise as emperor; and after that time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people. — The Helvetii were included in Gallia Lugdunensis, according to Strabo, but in Gallia Belgica, according to Pliny: most modern writers adopt Pliny's statement. When Gaul was subdivided into a greater number of provinces under the later emperors, the country of the Helvetii formed, with that of the Sequani and the Rauraci, the province of Maxima Sequanorum.

Helvĭa, mother of the philosopher SENECA.

Helvĭdĭus Priscus. [PRISCUS.]

Helvĭi, a people in Gaul, between the Rhone and Mt. Cebenna, which separated them from the Arverni, were for a long time subject to Massilia, but afterwards belonged to the province of Gallia Narbonensis. Their country produced good wine.

Hĕnĕti (Ἐνετοί), an ancient people in Paphlagonia, dwelling on the river Parthenius, fought on the side of Priam against the Greeks, but had disappeared before the historical times. They were regarded by many ancient writers as the ancestors of the Veneti in Italy. [VENETI.]

Hĕnĭŏchi (Ἡνίοχοι), a people in Colchis, N. of the Phasis, notorious as pirates.

Hephaestĭa (Ἡφαιστία). 1. (Ἡφαιστιεύς), a town in the N.W. of the island of Lemnos. — 2.

(Ἡφαιστίδης -τείδης), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

Hephaestĭādes Insŭlae. [AEOLIAE.]

Hephaestīon (Ἡφαιστίων). 1. Son of Amyntor, a Macedonian of Pella, celebrated as the friend of Alexander the Great, with whom he had been brought up. Alexander called Hephaestion his own private friend, but Craterus the friend of the king. Hephaestion accompanied Alexander to Asia, and was employed by the king in many important commands. He died at Ecbatana, after an illness of only 7 days, B. C. 325. Alexander's grief for his loss was passionate and violent. A general mourning was ordered throughout the empire, and a funeral pile and monument erected to him at Babylon, at a cost of 10,000 talents. — 2. A Greek grammarian, who instructed the emperor Verus in Greek, and accordingly lived about A. D. 150. He was perhaps the author of a Manual on Metres (Ἐγχειρίδιον περὶ μέτρων), which has come down to us under the name of Hephaestion. This work is a tolerably complete manual of Greek metres, and forms the basis of all our knowledge on that subject. Edited by Gaisford, Oxon. 1810.

Hēphaestus (Ἥφαιστος), called Vulcānus by the Romans, the god of fire. He was, according to Homer, the son of Zeus and Hera. Later traditions state that he had no father, and that Hera gave birth to him independent of Zeus, as she was jealous of Zeus having given birth to Athena independent of her. He was born lame and weak, and was in consequence so much disliked by his mother, that she threw him down from Olympus. The marine divinities, Thetis and Eurynome, received him, and he dwelt with them for 9 years in a grotto, beneath Oceanus, making for them a variety of ornaments. He afterwards returned to Olympus, though we are not told through what means, and he appears in Homer as the great artist of the gods of Olympus. Although he had been cruelly treated by his mother, he always showed her respect and kindness; and on one occasion took her part, when she was quarrelling with Zeus, which so much enraged the father of the gods, that he seized Hephaestus by the leg, and hurled him down from heaven. Hephaestus was a whole day falling, but in the evening he alighted in the island of Lemnos, where he was kindly received by the Sintians. Later writers describe his lameness as the consequence of this fall, while Homer makes him lame from his birth. He again returned to Olympus, and subsequently acted the part of mediator between his parents. On that occasion he offered a cup of nectar to his mother and the other gods, who burst out into immoderate laughter on seeing him busily hobbling from one god to another. — Hephaestus appears to have been originally the god of fire simply; but as fire is indispensable in working metals, he was afterwards regarded as an artist. His palace in Olympus was imperishable and shining like stars. It contained his workshop, with the anvil and 20 bellows, which worked spontaneously at his bidding. It was there that he made all his beautiful and marvellous works, both for gods and men. The ancient poets abound in descriptions of exquisite workmanship which had been manufactured by the god. All the palaces in Olympus were his workmanship. He made the armour of Achilles; the fatal necklace of Harmonia; the fire-breathing bulls of Aeëtes, king of Colchis, &c. In later accounts, the Cyclops are his workmen and servants, and his workshop is no longer in Olympus, but in some volcanic island. In the Iliad the wife of Hephaestus is Charis: in Hesiod Aglaia, the youngest of the Charites; but in the Odyssey, as well as in later accounts, Aphrodite appears as his wife. Aphrodite proved faithless to her husband, and was in love with Ares; but Helios disclosed their amours to Hephaestus, who caught the guilty pair in an invisible net, and exposed them to the laughter of the assembled gods. — The favourite abode of Hephaestus on earth was the island of Lemnos; but other volcanic islands also, such as Lipara, Hiera, Imbros, and Sicily, are called his abodes or workshops. — Hephaestus, like Athena, gave skill to mortal artists, and, conjointly with her, he was believed to have taught men the arts which embellish and adorn life. Hence at Athens they had temples and festivals in common. The epithets and surnames, by which Hephaestus is designated by the poets, generally allude to his skill in the plastic arts or to his lameness. The Greeks frequently placed small dwarf-like statues of the god near the hearth. During the best period of Grecian art, he was represented as a vigorous man with a beard, and is characterised by his hammer or some other instrument, his oval cap, and the chiton, which leaves the right shoulder and arm uncovered. — The Roman Vulcanus was an old Italian divinity. [VULCANUS.]

Heptănōmis. [AEGYPTUS.]

Hēra (Ἥρα or Ἥρη), called Juno by the Romans. The Greek Hera, that is, Mistress, was a daughter of Cronos and Rhea, and sister and wife of Zeus. Some call her the eldest daughter of Cronos, but others give this title to Hestia. According to Homer she was brought up by Oceanus and Tethys, and afterwards became the wife of Zeus, without the knowledge of her parents. This simple account is variously modified in other traditions. Being a daughter of Cronos, she, like his other children, was swallowed by her father, but afterwards released; and, according to an Arcadian tradition, she was brought up by Temenus, the son of Pelasgus. The Argives, on the other hand, related that she had been brought up by Euboea, Prosymna, and Acraea, the 3 daughters of the river Asterion. Several parts of Greece claimed the honour of being her birthplace, and more especially Argos and Samos, which were the principal seats of her worship. Her marriage with Zeus offered ample scope for poetical invention, and several places in Greece also claimed the honour of having been the scene of the marriage, such as Euboea, Samos, Cnossus in Crete, and Mount Thornax, in the S. of Argolis. Her marriage, called the Sacred Marriage (ἱερὸς γάμος), was represented in many places where she was worshipped. At her nuptials all the gods honoured her with presents, and Ge presented to her a tree with golden apples, which was watched by the Hesperides, at the foot of the Hyperborean Atlas. — In the Iliad Hera is treated by the Olympian gods with the same reverence as her husband. Zeus himself listens to her counsels, and communicates his secrets to her. She is, notwithstanding, far inferior to him in power, and must obey him unconditionally. She is not, like Zeus, the queen of gods and men, but simply the wife of the supreme god. The idea of her being the queen of heaven, with regal wealth and power, is of much later date. Her character, as described by Homer, is not of a very amiable kind; and her jealousy, obstinacy, and quarrelsome disposition, sometimes make her husband tremble. Hence arise frequent disputes between Hera and Zeus; and on one occasion Hera, in conjunction with Poseidon and Athena, contemplated putting Zeus into chains. Zeus, in such cases, not only threatens, but beats her. Once he even hung her up in the clouds, with her hands chained, and with two anvils suspended from her feet; and on another occasion, when Hephaestus attempted to help her, Zeus hurled him down from Olympus. — By Zeus she was the mother of Ares, Hebe, and Hephaestus.— Hera was, properly speaking, the only really married goddess among the Olmpians, for the marriage of Aphrodite with Hephaestus can scarcely be taken into consideration. Hence, she is the goddess of marriage and of the birth of children. Several epithets and surnames, such as Εἰλείθυια, Γαμηλία, Ζυγία, Τελεία, &c., contain allusions to this character of the goddess, and the Ilithyiae are described as her daughters. — She is represented in the Iliad riding in a chariot drawn by 2 horses, in the harnessing and unharnessing of which she is assisted by Hebe and the Horae. Owing to the judgment of Paris [PARIS], she was hostile to the Trojans, and in the Trojan war she accordingly sided with the Greeks. She persecuted all the children of Zeus by mortal mothers, and hence appears as the enemy of Dionysus, Hercules, and others. In the Argonautic expedition she assisted Jason. It is impossible here to enumerate all the events of mythical story in which Hera acts a part; and the reader must refer to the particular deities or heroes with whose story she is connected. — Hera was worshipped in many parts of Greece, but more especially at Argos, in the neighbourhood of which she had a splendid temple, on the road to Mycenae. Her great festival at Argos is described in the Dict. of Ant. art. Heraea. She also had a splendid temple in Samos. — The ancients gave several interpretations respecting the real significance of Hera; but we must in all probability regard her as the great goddess of nature, who was worshipped every where from the earliest times. The worship of the Roman Juno is spoken of in a separate article. [JUNO.] Hera was usually represented as a majestic woman of mature age, with a beautiful forehead, large and widely opened eyes, and with a grave expression commanding reverence. Her hair was adorned with a crown or a diadem. A veil frequently hangs down the back of her head, to characterise her as the bride of Zeus, and the diadem, veil, sceptre, and peacock, are her ordinary attributes.

Hērāclēa (Ἡράκλεια: Ἡρακλεώτης: Heracleōtes). I. In Europe. 1. H., in Lucania, on the river Siris, founded by the Tarentines. During the independency of the Greek states in the S. of Italy, congresses were held in this town under the presidency of the Tarentines. It sunk into insignificance under the Romans. — 2. In Acarnania on the Ambracian gulf. — 3. In Pisatis Elis, in ruins in the time of Strabo. — 4. The later name of Perinthus in Thrace. [PERINTHUS.] — 5. H. Caccabaria Porbaria, in Gallia Narbonensis on the coast, a sea-port of the Massilians. — 6. H. Lyncestis (Λύγκηστις), also called Pelagonia (Bitoglia or Bitolia), in Macedonia, on the Via Egnatia, W. of the Erigon, the capital of one of the 4 districts into which Macedonia was divided by the Romans. — 7. H. Minōa (Μινώα: nr. Torre di Capo Bianco Ru.), on the S. coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the river Halycus, between Agrigentum and Selinus. According to tradition it was founded by Minos, when he pursued Daedalus to Sicily, and it may have been an ancient colony of the Cretans. We know, however, that it was afterwards colonised by the inhabitants of Selinus, and that its original name was Minoa, which it continued to bear till about B. C. 500, when the town was taken by the Lacedaemonians under Euryleon, who changed its name into that of Heraclea; but it continued to bear its ancient appellation as a surname to distinguish it from other places of the same name. It fell at an early period into the hands of the Carthaginians, and remained in their power till the conquest of Sicily by the Romans, who planted a colony there. — 8. H. Sintĭca (Σιντική), in Macedonia, a town of the Sinti, on the left bank of the Strymon, founded by Amyntas, brother of Philip. — 9. H. Trachīnĭae, in Thessaly. See TRACHIS. — II. In Asia. 1. H. Pontĭca (Ἡ. ἡ Ποντική, or Πόντου, or ἐν Πόντῳ: Harakli or Eregli), a city on the S. shore of the Pontus Euxinus, on the coast of Bithynia, in the territory of the Mariandyni, was situated 20 stadia N. of the river Lycus, upon a little river called Acheron or Soonautes, and near the base of a peninsula called Acherusia, and had a fine harbour. It was founded about B. C. 550, by colonists from Megara and from Tanagra in Boeotia (not, as Strabo says, from Miletus). After various political struggles, it settled down under a monarchical form of government. It reached the height of its prosperity in the reign of Darius Codomannus, when it had an extensive commerce, and a territory reaching from the Parthenius to the Sangarius. It began to decline in consequence of the rise of the kingdom of Bithynia and the foundation of Nicomedia, and the invasion of Asia Minor by the Gauls; and its ruin was completed in the Mithridatic war, when the city was taken and plundered, and partly destroyed, by the Romans under Cotta. It was the native city of HERACLIDES PONTICUS, and perhaps of the painter ZEUXIS. — 2. H. ad Latmum (Ἡ. Λάτμου, or ἡ ὑπο Λάτμῳ: Ru. near the Lake of Baffi), a town of Ionia, S.E. of Miletus, at the foot of Mt. Latmus and upon the Sinus Latmicus; formerly called Latmus. Near it was a cave, with the tomb of Endymion. — There was another city of the same name in Caria, one in Lydia, 2 in Syria, one in Media, and one in India, none of which require special notice here.

Hēracleopŏlis (Ἡρακλεούπολις). 1. Parva (ἡ μικρά), also called Sethron, a city of Lower Egypt, in the Nomos Sethroites, 22 Roman miles W. of Pelusium. — 2. Magna (ἡ μεγάλη, also ἡ ἄνω), the capital of the fertile Nomos Heracleopolites or Heracleotes, in the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt; a chief seat of the worship of the ichneumon.

Hēraclēum (Ἡράκλειον), the name of several promontories and towns, of which none require special notice except: 1. A town in Macedonia at the mouth of the Apilas, near the frontiers of Thessaly. — 2. The harbour of Cnossus in Crete. — 3. A town on the coast of the Delta of Egypt, a little W. of Canopus; from which the Canopic mouth of the Nile was often called also the Heracleotic mouth. — 4. A place near Gindarus in the Syrian province of Cyrrhestice, where Ventidius, the legate of M. Antony, gained his great victory over the Parthians under Pacorus, in B. C. 38.

Hēraclĭānus (Ἡρακλειανός), one of the officers of Honorius, put Stilicho to death (A. D. 408), and received, as the reward of that service, the government of Africa. He rendered good service to Honorius during the invasion of Italy by Alaric, and the usurpation of Attalus. In 413 he revolted against Honorius, and invaded Italy; but his enterprize failed, and on his return to Africa he was put to death at Carthage.

Hēraclīdae (Ἡρακλεῖδαι), the descendants of Hercules, who, in conjunction with the Dorians, conquered Peloponnesus. It had been the will of Zeus, so ran the legend, that Hercules should rule over the country of the Perseids, at Mycenae and Tiryns. But through Hera's cunning, Eurystheus had been put into the place of Hercules, who had become the servant of the former. After the death of Hercules, his claims devolved upon his sons and descendants. At the time of his death, Hyllus, the eldest of his 4 sons by Deianīra, was residing with his brothers at the court of Ceyx at Trachis. As Eurystheus demanded their surrender, and Ceyx was unable to protect them, they fled to various parts of Greece, until they were received as suppliants at Athens, at the altar of Eleos (Mercy). According to the Heraclidae of Euripides, the sons of Hercules were first staying at Argos, thence went to Trachis in Thessaly, and at length came to Athens. Demophon, the son of Theseus, received them, and they settled in the Attic tetrapolis. Eurystheus, to whom the Athenians refused to surrender the fugitives, now marched against the Athenians with a large army, but was defeated by the Athenians under Iolaus, Theseus, and Hyllus, and was slain with his sons. The battle itself was celebrated in Attic story as the battle of the Scironian rock, on the coast of the Saronic gulf, though Pindar places it in the neighbourhood of Thebes. After the battle, the Heraclidae entered Peloponnesus, and maintained themselves there for one year. This was their 1st invasion of Peloponnesus. But a plague, which spread over the whole peninsula, compelled them to return to Attica, where, for a time, they again settled in the Attic tetrapolis. From thence they proceeded to Aegimius, king of the Dorians, whom Hercules had assisted in his war against the Lapithae, and who had promised to preserve a 3rd of his territory for the children of Hercules. [AEGIMIUS.] The Heraclidae were hospitably received by Aegimius, and Hyllus was adopted by the latter. After remaining in Doris 3 years, Hyllus, with a band of Dorians, undertook an expedition against Atreus, who had married a daughter of Eurystheus, and had become king of Mycenae and Tiryns. Hyllus marched across the Corinthian isthmus, and first met Echemus of Tegea, who fought for the Pelopidae, the principal opponents of the Heraclidae. Hyllus fell in single combat with Echemus, and, according to an agreement which had been made before the battle, the Heraclidae were not to make any further attempt upon Peloponnesus for the next 50 years. Thus ended their 2nd invasion. They now retired to Tricorythus, where they were allowed by the Athenians to take up their abode. During the period which followed (10 years after the death of Hyllus), the Trojan war took place; and 30 years after the Trojan war Cleodaeus, son of Hyllus, again invaded Peloponnesus, which was the 3rd invasion. About 20 years later Aristomachus, the son of Cleodaeus, undertook the 4th expedition; but both heroes fell. Not quite 30 years after Aristomachus (that is, about 80 years after the destruction of Troy), the Heraclidae prepared for their 5th and final attack. Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, the sons of Aristomachus, upon the advice of an oracle, built a fleet on the Corinthian gulf; but this fleet was destroyed, because Hippotes, one of the Heraclidae, had killed Carnus, an Acarnanian soothsayer; and Aristodemus was killed by a flash of lightning. An oracle now ordered them to take a 3-eyed man for their commander. He was found in the person of Oxylus, the son of Andraemon, an Aetolian, but descended from a family in Elis. The expedition now successfully sailed from Naupactus towards Rhium in Peloponnesus. Oxylus, keeping the invaders away from Elis, led them through Arcadia. The Heraclidae and Dorians conquered Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, who ruled over Argos, Mycenae, and Sparta. After this they became masters of the greater part of Peloponnesus, and then distributed by lot the newly acquired possessions. Temenus obtained Argos; Procles and Eurystheus, the twin sons of Aristodemus, Lacedaemon; and Cresphontes, Messenia. — Such are the traditions about the Heraclidae and their conquest of Peloponnesus. They are not purely mythical, but contain a genuine historical substance, notwithstanding the various contradictions in the accounts. They represent the conquest of the Achaean population by Dorian invaders, who henceforward appear as the ruling race in the Peloponnesus. The conquered Achaeans became partly the slaves and partly the subjects of the Dorians. (See Dict. of Ant. art. Perioeci.)

Hēraclīdes (Ἡρακλείδης). 1. A Syracusan, son of Lysimachus, one of the generals when Syracuse was attacked by the Athenians, B. C. 415. — 2. A Syracusan, who held the chief command of the mercenary forces under the younger Dionysius. Being suspected by Dionysius, he fled from Syracuse, and afterwards took part with Dion in expelling Dionysius from Syracuse. After the expulsion of the tyrant, a powerful party at Syracuse looked up to Heraclides as their leader, in consequence of which Dion caused him to be assassinated, 354. — 3. Son of Agathocles, accompanied his father to Africa, where he was put to death by the soldiers, when they were deserted by Agathocles, 307. — 4. Of Tarentum, one of the chief counsellors of Philip V. king of Macedonia. — 5. Of Byzantium, sent as ambassador by Antiochus the Great to the 2 Scipios, 190. — 6. One of the 3 ambassadors sent by Antiochus Epiphanes to the Romans, 169. Heraclides was banished by Demetrius Soter, the successor of Antiochus (162), and in revenge gave his support to the imposture of Alexander Balas. — 7. Surnamed Ponticus, because he was born at Heraclēa in Pontus. He was a person of considerable wealth, and migrated to Athens, where he became a pupil of Plato. He paid attention also to the Pythagorean system, and afterwards attended the instructions of Speusippus, and finally of Aristotle. He wrote a great number of works upon philosophy, mathematics, music, history, politics, grammar, and poetry; but almost all these works are lost. There has come down to us a small work, under the name of Heraclides, entitled περὶ Πολιτειῶν, of which the best editions are by Köler, Halle, 1804, and by Coraes, in his edition of Aelian, Paris, 1805. Another extant work, Ἀλληγορίαι Ὁμηρικαί, which also bears the name of Heraclides, was certainly not written by him. Diogenes Laërtius, in his life of Heraclides, says that "Heraclides made tragedies, and put the name of Thespis to them." This sentence has given occasion to a learned disquisition by Bentley (Phalaris, p. 239), to prove that the fragments attributed to Thespis are really cited from these counterfeit tragedies of Heraclides. Some childish stories are told about Heraclides keeping a pet serpent, and ordering one of his friends to conceal his body after his death, and place the serpent on the bed, that it might be supposed that he had been taken to the company of the gods. It is also said that he killed a man who had usurped the tyranny in Heraclea, and there are other traditions about him scarcely worth relating. — 8. An historian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (222—205), and wrote several works, quoted by the grammarians. — 9. A physician of Tarentum, lived in the 3rd or 2nd century B.C., and wrote some works on Materia Medica, and a commentary on all the works in the Hippocratic Collection. — 10. A physician of Erythrae in Ionia, was a pupil of Chrysermus, and a contemporary of Strabo in the 1st century B.C.

Hĕraclītus (Ἡράκλειτος.) 1. Of Ephesus, a philosopher generally considered as belonging to the Ionian school, though he differed from their principles in many respects. In his youth he travelled extensively, and after his return to Ephesus the chief magistracy was offered him, which, however, he transferred to his brother. He appears afterwards to have become a complete recluse, rejecting even the kindnesses offered by Darius, and at last retreating to the mountains, where he lived on pot-herbs; but, after some time, he was compelled by the sickness consequent on such meagre diet to return to Ephesus, where he died. He died at the age of 60, and flourished about B.C. 513. — Heraclitus wrote a work On Nature (περὶ φύσεως), which contained his philosophical views. From the obscurity of his style, he gained the title of the Obscure (σκοτεινός). He considered fire to be the primary form of all matter; but by fire he meant only to describe a clear light fluid, "self-kindled and self-extinguished," and therefore not differing materially from the air of Anaximenes. — 2. An Academic philosopher of Tyre, a friend of Antiochus, and a pupil of Clitomachus and Philo. — 3. The reputed author of a work, Περὶ Ἀπίστων, published by Westermann, in his Mythographi, Brunsvig. 1843.

Hēraea (Ἡραία: Ἡραιεύς: nr. St. Joannes, Ru.), a town in Arcadia, on the right bank of the Alphēus, near the borders of Elis. Its territory was called Heraeātis (Ἡραιᾶτις).

Herbīta (Ἔρβιτα: Ἐρβιταῖος, Herbitensis), a town in Sicily, N. of Agyrium, in the mountains, was a powerful place in early times under the tyrant Archonides, but afterwards declined in importance.

Hercŭlānēum, a town in Samnium, conquered by the consul Carvilius, B.C. 293 (Liv. x. 45), must not be confounded with the more celebrated town of this name mentioned below.

Herculanēum, Herculanīum, Herculānum, Herculense Oppidum, Herculēa Urbs (Ἡράκλειον), an ancient city in Campania, near the coast, between Neapolis and Pompeii, was originally founded by the Oscans, was next in the possession of the Tyrrhenians, and subsequently was chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who appear to have settled in the place from other cities of Magna Graecia, and to have given it its name. It was taken by the Romans in the Social war (B.C. 89, 88), and was colonised by them. In A.D. 63 a great part of it was destroyed by an earthquake; and in 79 it was overwhelmed, along with Pompeii and Stabiae, by the great eruption of Mt. Vesuvius. It was buried under showers of ashes and streams of lava, from 70 to 100 feet under the present surface of the ground. On its site stand the modern Portici and part of the village of Resina: the Italian name of Ercolano does not indicate any modern place, but only the part of Herculaneum that has been disinterred. The ancient city was accidentally discovered by the sinking of a well in 1720, since which time the excavations have been carried on at different periods; and many works of art have been discovered, which are deposited in the Royal Museum at Portici. It has been found necessary to fill up again the excavations which were made, in order to render Portici and Resina secure, and therefore very little of the ancient city is to be seen. The buildings that have been discovered are a theatre capable of accommodating about 10,000 spectators, the remains of 2 temples, a large building, commonly designated as a forum civile, 228 feet long and 132 broad, and some private houses, the walls of which were adorned with paintings, many of which, when discovered, were in a state of admirable preservation. There have been also found at Herculaneum many MSS., written on rolls of papyrus; but the difficulty of unrolling and deciphering them was very great; and the few which have been deciphered are of little value, consisting of a treatise of Philodemus on music, and fragments of unimportant works on philosophy.

Hercŭles (Ἡρακλῆς), the most celebrated of all the heroes of antiquity. His exploits were celebrated not only in all the countries round the Mediterranean, but even in the most distant lands of the ancient world. I. Greek Legends. The Greek traditions about Hercules appear in their national purity down to the time of Herodotus. But the poets of the time of Herodotus and of the subsequent periods introduced considerable alterations, which were probably derived from the East or Egypt, for every nation possesses some traditions respecting heroes of superhuman strength and power. Now while in the earliest Greek legends Hercules is a purely human hero, a conqueror of men and cities, he afterwards appears as the subduer of monstrous animals, and is connected in a variety of ways with astronomical phaenomena. According to Homer, Hercules was the son of Zeus by Alcmene of Thebes in Boeotia. His stepfather was Amphitryon. Amphitryon was the son of Alcaeus, the son of Perseus; and Alcmene was a grand-daughter of Perseus. Hence Hercules belonged to the family of Perseus. Zeus visited Alcmene in the form of Amphitryon, while the latter was absent warring against the Taphians; and he, pretending to be her husband, became by her the father of Hercules. [For details, see ALCMENE, AMPHITRYON.] On the day on which Hercules was to be born, Zeus boasted of his becoming the father of a hero who was to rule over the race of Perseus. Hera prevailed upon him to swear that the descendant of Perseus born that day should be the ruler. Thereupon she hastened to Argos, and there caused the wife of Sthenelus to give birth to Eurystheus; whereas, by keeping away the Ilithyiae, she delayed the birth of Hercules, and thus robbed him of the empire which Zeus had destined for him. Zeus was enraged at the imposition practised upon him, but could not violate his oath. Alcmene brought into the world 2 boys, Hercules, the son of Zeus, and Iphicles, the son of Amphitryon, who was one night younger than Hercules. Nearly all the stories about the childhood and youth of Hercules, down to the time when he entered the service of Eurystheus, seem to be inventions of a later age. At least in Homer and Hesiod we are only told that he grew strong in body and mind, that confiding in his own powers he defied even the immortal gods, and wounded Hera and Ares, and that under the protection of Zeus and Athena he escaped the dangers which Hera prepared for him. To these simple accounts, various particulars are added in later writers. As he lay in his cradle, Hera sent 2 serpents to destroy him, but the infant hero strangled them with his own hands. As he grew up, he was instructed by Amphitryon in driving a chariot, by Autolycus in wrestling, by Eurytus in archery, by Castor in fighting with heavy armour, and by Linus in singing and playing the lyre. Linus was killed by his pupil with the lyre, because he had censured him; and Amphitryon, to prevent similar occurrences, sent him to feed his cattle. In this manner he spent his life till his 18th year. His first great adventure happened while he was still watching the oxen of his father. A huge lion, which haunted Mt. Cithaeron, made great havoc among the flocks of Amphitryon and Thespius (or Thestius), king of Thespiae. Hercules promised to deliver the country of the monster; and Thespius, who had 50 daughters, rewarded Hercules by making him his guest so long as the chase lasted, and by giving up his daughters to him, each for one night. Hercules slew the lion, and henceforth wore its skin as his ordinary garment, and its mouth and head as his helmet. Others related that the lion's skin of Hercules was taken from the Nemean lion. On his return to Thebes, he met the envoys of king Erginus of Orchomenos, who were going to fetch the annual tribute of 100 oxen, which they had compelled the Thebans to pay. Hercules cut off the noses and ears of the envoys, and thus sent them back to Erginus. The latter thereupon marched against Thebes; but Hercules defeated and killed Erginus, and compelled the Orchomenians to pay double the tribute which they had formerly received from the Thebans. In this battle against Erginus Hercules lost his father Amphitryon, though the tragedians make him survive the campaign. Creon rewarded Hercules with the hand of his daughter, Megara, by whom he became the father of several children. The gods, on the other hand, made him presents of arms: Hermes gave him a sword, Apollo a bow and arrows, Hephaestus a golden coat of mail, and Athena a peplus. He cut for himself a club in the neighbourhood of Nemea, while, according to others, the club was of brass, and the gift of Hephaestus. Soon afterwards Hercules was driven mad by Hera, and in this state he killed his own children by Megara and 2 of Iphicles. In his grief he sentenced himself to exile, and went to Thespius, who purified him. Other traditions place this madness at a later time, and relate the circumstances differently. He then consulted the oracle of Delphi as to where he should settle. The Pythia first called him by the name of Hercules — for hitherto his name had been Alcides or Alcaeus, — and ordered him to live at Tiryns, and to serve Eurystheus for the space of 12 years, after which he should become immortal. Hercules accordingly went to Tiryns, and did as he was bid by Eurystheus. — The accounts of the 12 labours which Hercules performed at the bidding of Eurystheus, are found only in the later writers. The only one of the 12 labours mentioned by Homer is his descent into the lower world to carry off Cerberus. We also find in Homer the fight of Hercules with a sea-monster; his expedition to Troy, to fetch the horses which Laomedon had refused him; and his war against the Pylians, when he destroyed the whole family of their king Neleus, with the exception of Nestor. Hesiod mentions several of the feats of Hercules distinctly, but knows nothing of their number 12. The selection of these 12 from the great number of feats ascribed to Hercules is probably the work of the Alexandrines. They are usually arranged in the following order. 1. The fight with the Nemean lion. The valley of Nemea, between Cleonae and Phlius, was inhabited by a monstrous lion, the offspring of Typhon and Echidna. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring him the skin of this monster. After using in vain his club and arrows against the lion, he strangled the animal with his own hands. He returned carrying the dead lion on his shoulders; but Eurystheus was so frightened at the gigantic strength of the hero, that he ordered him in future to deliver the account of his exploits outside the town. — 2. Fight against the Lernean hydra. This monster, like the lion, was the offspring of Typhon and Echidna, and was brought up by Hera. It ravaged the country of Lernae near Argos, and dwelt in a swamp near the well of Amymone. It had 9 heads, of which the middle one was immortal. Hercules struck off its heads with his club; but in the place of the head he cut off, 2 new ones grew forth each time. A gigantic crab also came to the assistance of the hydra, and wounded Hercules. However, with the assistance of his faithful servant Iolaus, he burned away the heads of the hydra, and buried the ninth or immortal one under a huge rock. Having thus conquered the monster, he poisoned his arrows with its bile, whence the wounds inflicted by them became incurable. Eurystheus declared the victory unlawful, as Hercules had won it with the aid of Iolaus. — 3. Capture of the Arcadian stag. This animal had golden antlers and brazen feet. It had been dedicated to Artemis by the nymph Taygete, because the goddess had saved her from the pursuit of Zeus. Hercules was ordered to bring the animal alive to Mycenae. He pursued it in vain for a whole year: at length he wounded it with an arrow, caught it, and carried it away on his shoulders. While in Arcadia, he was met by Artemis, who was angry with him for having outraged the animal sacred to her; but he succeeded in soothing her anger, and carried his prey to Mycenae. According to some statements, he killed the stag. — 4. Destruction of the Erymanthian boar. This animal, which Hercules was ordered to bring alive to Eurystheus, had descended from mount Erymanthus into Psophis. Hercules chased him through the deep snow, and having thus worn him out, he caught him in a net, and carried him to Mycenae. Other traditions place the hunt of the Erymanthian boar in Thessaly, and some even in Phrygia. It must be observed that this and the subsequent labours of Hercules are connected with certain subordinate labours, called Parerga (Πάρεργα). The first of these parerga is the fight of Hercules with the Centaurs. In his pursuit of the boar he came to the centaur Pholus, who had received from Dionysus a cask of excellent wine. Hercules opened it, contrary to the wish of his host, and the delicious fragrance attracted the other centaurs, who besieged the grotto of Pholus. Hercules drove them away; they fled to the house of Chiron; and Hercules, eager in his pursuit, wounded Chiron, his old friend, with one of his poisoned arrows; in consequence of which Chiron died. [CHIRON.] Pholus likewise was wounded by one of the arrows, which by accident fell on his foot and killed him. This fight with the centaurs gave rise to the establishment of mysteries, by which Demeter intended to purify the hero from the blood he had shed against his own will. — 5. Cleansing of the stables of Augeas. Eurystheus imposed upon Hercules the task of cleansing in one day the stalls of Augeas, king of Elis. Augeas had a herd of 3000 oxen, whose stalls had not been cleansed for 30 years. Hercules, without mentioning the command of Eurystheus, went to Augeas, and offered to cleanse his stalls in one day, if he would give him the 10th part of his cattle. Augeas agreed to the terms; and Hercules after taking Phyleus, the son of Augeas, as his witness, led the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through the stalls, which were thus cleansed in a single day. But Augeas, who learned that Hercules had undertaken the work by the command of Eurystheus, refused to give him the reward. His son Phyleus then bore witness against his father, who exiled him from Elis. Eurystheus however declared the exploit null and void, because Hercules had stipulated with Augeas for a reward for performing it. At a later time Hercules invaded Elis, and killed Augeas and his sons. After this he is said to have founded the Olympic games. — 6. Destruction of the Stymphalian birds. These voracious birds had been brought up by Ares. They had brazen claws, wings, and beaks, used their feathers as arrows, and ate human flesh. They dwelt on a lake near Stymphalus in Arcadia, from which Hercules was ordered by Eurystheus to expel them. When Hercules undertook the task, Athena provided him with a brazen rattle, by the noise of which he startled the birds; and, as they attempted to fly away, he killed them with his arrows. According to some accounts, he only drove the birds away; and they appeared again in the island of Aretias, where they were found by the Argonauts. — 7. Capture of the Cretan bull. According to some this bull was the one which had carried Europa across the sea. According to others, the bull had been sent out of the sea by Poseidon, that Minos might offer it in sacrifice. But Minos was so charmed with the beauty of the animal, that he kept it, and sacrificed another in its stead. Poseidon punished Minos, by driving the bull mad, and causing it to commit great havoc in the island. Hercules was ordered by Eurystheus to catch the bull, and Minos willingly allowed him to do so. Hercules accomplished the task, and brought the bull home on his shoulders; but he then set the animal free again. The bull now roamed through Greece, and at last came to Marathon, where we meet it again in the stories of Theseus. — 8. Capture of the mares of the Thracian Diomedes. This Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace, fed his horses with human flesh. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring these animals to Mycenae. With a few companions, he seized the animals, and conducted them to the sea coast. But here he was overtaken by the Bistones. During the fight he entrusted the mares to his friend Abderus, who was devoured by them. Hercules defeated the Bistones, killed Diomedes whose body he threw before the mares, built the town of Abdera in honour of his unfortunate friend, and then returned to Mycenae, with the mares which had become tame after eating the flesh of their master. The mares were afterwards set free, and destroyed on Mt. Olympus by wild beasts. — 9. Seizure of the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons possessed a girdle, which she had received from Ares. Admete, the daughter of Eurystheus, wished to obtain this girdle; and Hercules was therefore sent to fetch it. He was accompanied by a number of volunteers, and after various adventures in Europe and Asia, he at length reached the country of the Amazons. Hippolyte at first received him kindly, and promised him her girdle; but Hera having excited the Amazons against him, a contest ensued, in which Hercules killed their queen. He then took her girdle, and carried it with him. In this expedition Hercules killed the 2 sons of Boreas, Calais and Zetes; and he also begot 3 sons by Echidna, in the country of the Hyperboreans. On his way home he landed in Troas, where he rescued Hesione from the monster sent against her by Poseidon; in return for which service her father Laomedon promised him the horses he had received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. But, as Laomedon did not keep his word, Hercules on leaving threatened to make war against Troy. He landed in Thrace, where he slew Sarpedon, and at length returned through Macedonia to Peloponnesus. — 10. Capture of the oxen of Geryones in Erythia. Geryones, the monster with 3 bodies, lived in the fabulous island of Erythīa (the reddish), so called because it lay under the rays of the setting sun in the W. This island was originally placed off the coast of Epirus, but was afterwards identified either with Gades or the Balearic islands, and was at all times believed to be in the distant W. The oxen of Geryones were guarded by the giant Eurytion and the two-headed dog Orthrus; and Hercules was commanded by Eurystheus to fetch them. After traversing various countries, he reached at length the frontiers of Libya and Europe, where he erected 2 pillars (Calpe and Abyla) on the 2 sides of the straits of Gibraltar, which were hence called the pillars of Hercules. Being annoyed by the heat of the sun, Hercules shot at Helios, who so much admired his boldness, that he presented him with a golden cup or boat, in which he sailed to Erythia. He there slew Eurytion and his dog, as well as Geryones, and sailed with his booty to Tartessus, where he returned the golden cup (boat) to Helios. On his way home he passed through Gaul, Italy, Illyricum and Thrace, and met with numerous adventures, which are variously embellished by the poets. Many attempts were made to deprive him of the oxen, but he at length brought them in safety to Eurystheus, who sacrificed them to Hera. These 10 labours were performed by Hercules in the space of 8 years and 1 month; but as Eurystheus declared 2 of them to have been performed unlawfully, he commanded him to accomplish 2 more. — 11. Fetching the golden apples of the Hesperides. This was particularly difficult, since Hercules did not know where to find them. They were the apples which Hera had received at her wedding from Ge, and which she had entrusted to the keeping of the Hesperides and the dragon Ladon, on Mt. Atlas, in the country of the Hyperboreans. [For details see HESPERIDES.] After various adventures in Europe, Asia and Africa, Hercules at length arrived at Mt. Atlas. On the advice of Prometheus, he sent Atlas to fetch the apples, and in the meantime bore the weight of heaven for him. Atlas returned with the apples, but refused to take the burden of heaven on his shoulders again. Hercules, however, contrived by a stratagem to get the apples, and hastened away. On his return Eurystheus made him a present of the apples; but Hercules dedicated them to Athena, who restored them to their former place. Some traditions add that Hercules killed the dragon Ladon. — 12. Bringing Cerberus from the lower world. This was the most difficult of the 12 labours of Hercules. He descended into Hades, near Taenarum in Laconia, accompanied by Hermes and Athena. He delivered Theseus and Ascalaphus from their torments. He obtained permission from Pluto to carry Cerberus to the upper world, provided he could accomplish it without force of arms. Hercules succeeded in seizing the monster and carrying it to the upper world; and after he had shown it to Eurystheus, he carried it back again to the lower world. Some traditions connect the descent of Hercules into the lower world with a contest with Hades, as we see even in the Iliad (v. 397), and more particularly in the Alcestis of Euripides (24, 846). — Besides these 12 labours, Hercules performed several other feats without being commanded by Eurystheus. These feats were called Parerga by the ancients. Several of them were interwoven with the 12 labours and have been already described: those which had no connection with the 12 labours are spoken of below. After Hercules had performed the 12 labours, he was released from the servitude of Eurystheus, and returned to Thebes. He there gave Megara in marriage to Iolaus; and he wished to gain in marriage for himself Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Oechalia. Eurytus promised his daughter to the man who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Hercules defeated them; but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give Iole to him, because he had murdered his own children. Soon afterwards the oxen of Eurytus were carried off, and it was suspected that Hercules was the offender. Iphitus again defended Hercules, and requested his assistance in searching after the oxen. Hercules agreed; but when the 2 had arrived at Tiryns, Hercules, in a fit of madness, threw his friend down from the wall, and killed him. Deiphobus of Amyclae purified Hercules from this murder, but he was, nevertheless, attacked by a severe illness. Hercules then repaired to Delphi to obtain a remedy, but the Pythia refused to answer his questions. A struggle ensued between Hercules and Apollo, and the combatants were not separated till Zeus sent a flash of lightning between them. The oracle now declared that he would be restored to health, if he would serve 3 years for wages, and surrender his earnings to Eurytus, as an atonement for the murder of Iphitus. Thereupon he became a servant to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and widow of Tmolus. Later writers describe Hercules as living effeminately during his residence with Omphale: he span wool, it is said, and sometimes put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. According to other accounts he nevertheless performed several great feats during this time. He undertook an expedition to Colchis, which brought him into connection with the Argonauts; he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and met Theseus on his landing from Troezene on the Corinthian isthmus. An expedition to India, which was mentioned in some traditions, may likewise be inserted in this place. —When the time of his servitude had expired, he sailed against Troy, took the city, and killed Laomedon, its king. On his return from Troy, a storm drove him on the island of Cos, where he was attacked by the Meropes; but he defeated them and killed their king, Eurypylus. It was about this time that the gods sent for him in order to fight against the Gigants. [GIGANTES]. — Soon after his return to Argos, he marched against Augeas, as has been related above. He then proceeded against Pylos, which he took, and killed Periclymenus, a son of Neleus. He next advanced against Lacedaemon, to punish the sons of Hippocoon, for having assisted Neleus and slain Oeonus, the son of Licymnius. He took Lacedaemon, and assigned the government of it to Tyndareus. On his return to Tegea, he became, by Auge, the father of Telephus [AUGE]; and he then proceeded to Calydon, where he obtained Deïanīra, the daughter of Oeneus, for his wife, after fighting with Achelous for her. [DEIANIRA; ACHELOUS.] After Hercules had been married to Deianira nearly 3 years, he accidentally killed at a banquet in the house of Oeneus, the boy Eunomus. In accordance with the law Hercules went into exile, taking with him his wife Deianira. On their road they came to the river Evenus, across which the centaur Nessus carried travellers for a small sum of money. Hercules himself forded the river, but gave Deianira to Nessus to carry across. Nessus attempted to outrage her: Hercules heard her screaming, and shot an arrow into the heart of Nessus. The dying centaur called out to Deianira to take his blood with her, as it was a sure means of preserving the love of her husband. He then conquered the Dryopes, and assisted Aegimius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapithae. [AEGIMIUS.] After this he took up his abode at Trachis, whence he marched against Eurytus of Oechalia. He took Oechalia, killed Eurytus and his sons, and carried off his daughter Iole as a prisoner. On his return home he landed at Cenaeum, a promontory of Euboea, erected an altar to Zeus, and sent his companion, Lichas, to Trachis, in order to fetch him a white garment, which he intended to use during the sacrifice. Deianira, afraid lest Iole should supplant her in the affections of her husband, steeped the white garment he had demanded in the blood of Nessus. This blood had been poisoned by the arrow with which Hercules had shot Nessus; and accordingly as soon as the garment become warm on the body of Hercules, the poison penetrated into all his limbs, and caused him the most excruciating agony. He seized Lichas by his feet, and threw him into the sea. He wrenched off the garment, but it stuck to his flesh, and with it he tore away whole pieces from his body. In this state he was conveyed to Trachis. Deianira, on seeing what she had unwittingly done, hung herself. Hercules commanded Hyllus, his eldest son, by Deianira, to marry Iole as soon as he should arrive at the age of manhood. He then ascended Mt. Oeta, raised a pile of wood, on which he placed himself, and ordered it to be set on fire. No one ventured to obey him, until at length Poeas the shepherd, who passed by, was prevailed upon to comply with the desire of the suffering hero. When the pile was burning, a cloud came down from heaven, and amid peals of thunder carried him to Olympus, where he was honoured with immortality, became reconciled to Hera, and married her daughter Hebe, by whom he became the father of Alexiares and Anicetus. Immediately after his apotheosis, his friends offered sacrifices to him as a hero; and he was in course of time worshipped throughout all Greece both as a god and as a hero. His worship however prevailed more extensively among the Dorians than among any other of the Greek races. The sacrifices offered to him consisted principally of bulls, boars, rams and lambs.—The works of art in which Hercules was represented were extremely numerous, and of the greatest variety, for he was represented at all the various stages of his life, from the cradle to his death. But whether he appears as a child, a youth, a struggling hero, or as the immortal inhabitant of Olympus, his character is always one of heroic strength and energy. Specimens of every kind are still extant. The finest representation of the hero that has come down to us is the so-called Farnese Hercules, which was executed by Glycon. The hero is resting, leaning on his right arm, and his head reclining on his left hand: the whole figure is a most exquisite combination of peculiar softness with the greatest strength. — II. Roman Traditions. The worship of Hercules at Rome and in Italy is connected by Roman writers, with the hero's expedition to fetch the oxen of Geryones. They stated that Hercules on his return visited Italy, where he abolished human sacrifices among the Sabines, established the worship of fire, and slew Cacus, a robber, who had stolen his oxen. [CACUS.] The aborigines, and especially Evander, honoured Hercules with divine worship; and Hercules in return taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped, and entrusted the care of his worship to 2 distinguished families, the Potitii and Pinarii. [PINARIA GENS.] The Fabia gens traced its origin to Hercules; and Fauna and Acca Laurentia are called mistresses of Hercules. In this manner the Romans connected their earliest legends with Hercules. It should be observed that in the Italian traditions the hero bore the name of Recaranus, and this Recaranus was afterwards identified with the Greek Hercules. He had 2 temples at Rome. One was a small round temple of Hercules Victor, or Hercules Triumphalis, between the river and the Circus Maximus; in front of which was the ara maxima, on which, after a triumph, the tenth of the booty was deposited for distribution among the citizens. The 2nd temple stood near the porta trigemina, and contained a bronze statue and the altar on which Hercules himself was believed to have once offered a sacrifice. Here the city praetor offered every year a young cow, which was consumed by the people within the sanctuary. At Rome Hercules was connected with the Muses, whence he is called Musagetes, and was represented with a lyre, of which there is no trace in Greece. —III. Traditions of other nations. The ancients themselves expressly mention several heroes of the name of Hercules, who occur among the principal nations of the ancient world. 1. The Egyptian Hercules, whose Egyptian name was Som, or Dsom, or Chon, or, according to Pausanias, Maceris, was a son of Amon or Nilus. He was placed by the Egyptians in the 2nd of the series of the evolutions of their gods. — 2. The Cretan Hercules, one of the Idaean Dactyls, was believed to have founded the temple of Zeus at Olympia, but to have come originally from Egypt. He was worshipped with funeral sacrifices, and was regarded as a magician, like other ancient daemones of Crete. — 3. The Indian Hercules, was called by the unintelligible name Dorsanes (Δορσάνης). The later Greeks believed that he was their own hero, who had visited India; and they related that in India he became the father of many sons and daughters by Pandaea, and the ancestral hero of the Indian kings. — 4. The Phoenician Hercules, whom the Egyptians considered to be more ancient than their own, was worshipped in all the Phoenician colonies, such as Carthage and Gades, down to the time of Constantine, and it is said that children were sacrificed to him. — 5. The Celtic and Germanic Hercules is said to have founded Alesia and Nemausus, and to have become the father of the Celtic race. We become acquainted with him in the accounts of the expedition of the Greek Hercules against Geryones. We must either suppose that the Greek Hercules was identified with native heroes of those northern countries, or that the notions about Hercules had been introduced there from the E.

Hercŭles (Ἡρακλῆς), a son of Alexander the Great by Barsine, the widow of the Rhodian Memnon. In B.C. 310 he was brought forward by Polysperchon as a pretender to the Macedonian throne; but he was murdered by Polysperchon himself in the following year, when the latter became reconciled to Cassander.

Hercŭlis Columnae. [ABYLA; CALPE.]

Hercŭlis Monoeci Portus. [MONOECUS.]

Hercŭlis Portus. [COSA.]

Hercŭlis Promontōrĭum (C. Spartivento), the most S.ly point of Italy in Bruttium.

Hercŭlis Silva, a forest in Germany, sacred to Hercules, E. of the Visurgis.

Hercȳnĭa Silva, Hercynĭus Saltus, Hercynĭum Jugum, an extensive range of mountains in Germany, covered with forests, is described by Caesar (B. G. vi. 24) as 9 days' journey in breadth, and more than 60 days' journey in length, extending E. from the territories of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, parallel to the Danube, to the frontiers of the Dacians. Under this general name Caesar appears to have included all the mountains and forests in the S. and centre of Germany, the Black Forest, Odenwald, Thüringerwald, the Harz, the Erzgebirge, the Riesengebirge, &c. As the Romans became better acquainted with Germany, the name was confined to narrower limits. Pliny and Tacitus use it to indicate the range of mountains between the Thüringerwald and the Carpathian mountains The name is still preserved in the modern Harz and Erz.

Herdōnĭa (Herdoniensis: Ordona), a town in Apulia, was destroyed by Hannibal, who removed its inhabitants to Thurii and Metapontum; it was rebuilt by the Romans, but remained a place of no importance.

Herdōnĭus. 1. Turnus, of Aricia in Latium, endeavoured to rouse the Latins against Tarquinius Superbus, and was in consequence falsely accused by Tarquinius, and put to death. — 2. Appĭus, a Sabine chieftain, who, in B.C. 460, with a band of outlaws and slaves, made himself master of the capitol. On the 4th day from his entry the capitol was re-taken, and Herdonius and nearly all his followers were slain.

Herennĭa Gens, originally Samnite, and by the Samnite invasion established in Campania, became at a later period a plebeian house at Rome. The Herennii were a family of rank in Italy, and are frequently mentioned in the time of the Samnite and Punic wars. They were the hereditary patrons of the Marii.

Herennĭus 1. Modestīnus. [MODESTINUS.] — 2. Pontĭus. [PONTIUS.] — 3. Senecĭo. [SENECIO.]

Hērillus (Ἥριλλος), of Carthage, a Stoic philosopher, was the disciple of Zeno of Cittium. He did not, however, confine himself to the opinions of his master, but held some doctrines directly opposed to them. He held that the chief good consisted in knowledge (ἐπιστήμη). This notion is often attacked by Cicero.

Hermaeum, or, in Latin, Mercurii Promontorium (Ἑρμαία ἄκρα). 1. (Cape Bon, Arab. Ras Addar), the headland which forms the E. extremity of the Sinus Carthaginiensis, and the extreme N.E. point of the Carthaginian territory (aft. the province of Africa) opposite to Lilybaeum, the space between the 2 being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa. — 2. (Ras el Ashan), a promontory on the coast of the Greater Syrtis, 50 stadia W. of Leptis. — There were other promontories of the name on the coast of Africa.

Hermăgŏras (Ἑρμαγόρας). 1. Of Temnos, a distinguished Greek rhetorician of the time of Cicero. He belonged to the Rhodian school of oratory, but is known chiefly as a teacher of rhetoric. He devoted particular attention to what is called the invention, and made a peculiar division of the parts of an oration, which differed from that adopted by other rhetoricians. — 2. Surnamed Carion, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Augustus. He was a disciple of Theodorus of Gadara.

Hermaphrŏdītus (Ἑρμαφρόδιτος), son of Hermes and Aphrodite, and consequently great-grandson of Atlas, whence he is called Atlantiades or Atlantius. (Ov. Met. iv. 368). He had inherited the beauty of both his parents, and was brought up by the nymphs of Mount Ida. In his 15th year he went to Caria. In the neighbourhood of Halicarnassus he laid down by the fountain of Salmacis. The nymph of the fountain fell in love with him, and tried in vain to win his affections. Once when he was bathing in the fountain, she embraced him, and prayed to the gods that she might be united with him for ever. The gods granted the request, and the bodies of the youth and the nymph became united together, but retained the characteristics of each sex. Hermaphroditus, on becoming aware of the change, prayed that in future every one who bathed in the well might be metamorphosed in the same manner.

Hermarchus (Ἕρμαρχος), of Mytilene, a rhetorician, became afterwards a disciple of Epicurus, who left to him his garden, and appointed him his successor in his school, about B.C. 270. He wrote several works, all of which are lost.

Hermas (Ἑρμᾶς), a disciple of the Apostle Paul, and one of the apostolic fathers. He is supposed to be the same person as the Hermas who is mentioned in St. Paul's epistle to the Romans (xvi. 14). He wrote in Greek a work entitled The Shepherd of Hermas, of which a Latin translation is still extant. Its object is to instruct persons in the duties of the Christian life. Edited by Cotelier in his Patres Apostol. Paris, 1672.

Hermes (Ἑρμῆς, Ἑρμείας, Dor. Ἑρμᾶς), called Mercŭrĭus by the Romans. The Greek Hermes was a son of Zeus and Maia, the daughter of Atlas, and born in a cave of Mt. Cyllene in Arcadia, whence he is called Atlantiades or Cyllenius. A few hours after his birth, he escaped from his cradle, went to Pieria, and carried off some of the oxen of Apollo. In the Iliad and Odyssey this tradition is not mentioned, though Hermes is characterised as a cunning thief. That he might not be discovered by the traces of his footsteps, he put on sandals, and drove the oxen to Pylos, where he killed 2, and concealed the rest in a cave. The skins of the slaughtered animals were nailed to a rock; and part of their flesh was cooked and eaten, and the rest burnt. Thereupon he returned to Cyllene, where he found a tortoise at the entrance of his native cave. He took the animal's shell, drew strings across it, and thus invented the lyre, on which he immediately played. Apollo, by his prophetic power, had meantime discovered the thief, and went to Cyllene to charge Hermes with the crime before his mother Maia. She showed to the god the child in its cradle; but Apollo carried the boy before Zeus, and demanded back his oxen. Zeus commanded him to comply with the demand of Apollo, but Hermes denied that he had stolen the cattle. As, however, he saw that his assertions were not believed, he conducted Apollo to Pylos, and restored to him his oxen; but when Apollo heard the sounds of the lyre, he was so charmed that he allowed Hermes to keep the animals. Hermes now invented the syrinx, and after disclosing his inventions to Apollo, the 2 gods concluded an intimate friendship with each other. Apollo presented his young friend with his own golden shepherd's staff, and taught him the art of prophesying by means of dice. Zeus made him his own herald, and likewise the herald of the gods of the lower world. — The principal feature in the traditions about Hermes consists in his being the herald of the gods, and in this capacity he appears even in the Homeric poems. His original character of an ancient Pelasgian, or Arcadian divinity of nature, gradually disappeared in the legends. As the herald of the gods, he is the god of eloquence, for the heralds are the public speakers in the assemblies and on other occasions. The gods especially employed him as messenger, when eloquence was required to attain the desired object. Hence the tongues of sacrificial animals were offered to him. As heralds and messengers are usually men of prudence and circumspection, Hermes was also the god of prudence and skill in all the relations of social intercourse. These qualities were combined with similar ones, such as cunning, both in words and actions, and even fraud, perjury, and the inclination to steal; but acts of this kind were committed by Hermes always with a certain skill, dexterity, and even gracefulness. — Being endowed with this shrewdness and sagacity, he was regarded as the author of a variety of inventions, and, besides the lyre and syrinx, he is said to have invented the alphabet, numbers, astronomy, music, the art of fighting, gymnastics, the cultivation of the olive tree, measures, weights, and many other things. The powers which he possessed himself he conferred upon those mortals and heroes who enjoyed his favour; and all who possessed them were under his especial protection, or are called his sons. He was employed by the gods, and more especially by Zeus, on a variety of occasions which are recorded in ancient story. Thus he led Priam to Achilles to fetch the body of Hector; tied Ixion to the wheel; conducted Hera, Aphrodite, and Athena to Paris; fastened Prometheus to Mt. Caucasus; rescued Dionysus after his birth from the flames, or received him from the hands of Zeus to carry him to Athamas; sold Hercules to Omphale; and was ordered by Zeus to carry off Io, who was metamorphosed into a cow, and guarded by Argus, whom he slew. [ARGUS.] From this murder he is very commonly called Ἀργειφόντης. — In the Trojan war Hermes was on the side of the Greeks. His ministry to Zeus was not confined to the offices of herald and messenger, but he was also his charioteer and cupbearer. As dreams are sent by Zeus, Hermes conducts them to man, and hence he is also described as the god who had it in his power to send refreshing sleep, or take it away. Another important function of Hermes was to conduct the shades of the dead from the upper into the lower world, whence he is called ψυχοπομπός, νεκροπομπός, ψυχαγωγός, &c. — The idea of his being the herald and messenger of the gods, of his travelling from place to place and concluding treaties, necessarily implied the notion that he was the promoter of social intercourse and of commerce among men. In this capacity he was regarded as the maintainer of peace, and as the god of roads, who protected travellers, and punished those who refused to assist travellers who had mistaken their way. Hence the Athenian generals, on setting out on an expedition, offered sacrifices to Hermes, surnamed Hegemonius, or Agetor; and numerous statues of the god were erected on roads, at doors and gates, from which circumstance he derived a variety of surnames and epithets. As the god of commerce he was called διέμπορος, ἐμπολαῖος, παλιγκάπηλος, κερδέμπορος, ἀγοραῖος, &c. As commerce is the source of wealth, he was also the god of gain and riches, especially of sudden and unexpected riches, such as are acquired by commerce. As the giver of wealth and good luck (πλουτοδότης), he also presided over the game of dice. — Hermes was believed to be the inventor of sacrifices. Hence he not only acts the part of a herald at sacrifices, but is also the protector of sacrificial animals, and was believed in particular to increase the fertility of sheep. For this reason he was especially worshipped by shepherds, and is mentioned in connection with Pan and the Nymphs. This feature in the character of Hermes is a remnant of the ancient Arcadian religion, in which he was the fertilising god of the earth, who conferred his blessings on man. — Hermes was likewise the patron of all the gymnastic games of the Greeks. This idea seems to be of late origin, for in Homer no trace of it is found. Athens appears to have been the first place in which he was worshipped in this capacity. At a later time almost all gymnasia were under his protection; and the Greek artists derived their ideal of the god from the gymnasium, and represented him as a youth whose limbs were beautifully and harmoniously developed by gymnastic exercises. — The most ancient seat of the worship of Hermes is Arcadia, the land of his birth, where Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus, is said to have built to him the first temple. From thence his worship was carried to Athens, and ultimately spread through all Greece. The festivals celebrated in his honour were called Hermaea. (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) His temples and statues (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Hermae) were extremely numerous in Greece. Among the things sacred to him were the palm tree, the tortoise, the number 4, and several kinds of fish; and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of incense, honey, cakes, pigs, and especially lambs and young goats. — The principal attributes of Hermes are: 1. A travelling hat with a broad brim, which in later times was adorned with 2 small wings. 2. The staff (ῥάϐδος or σκῆπτρον), which he bore as a herald, and had received from Apollo. In late works of art the white ribbons which surrounded the herald's staff were changed into 2 serpents. 3. The sandals (πέδιλα). They were beautiful and golden, and carried the god across land and sea with the rapidity of wind; at the ankles of the god they were provided with wings, whence he is called πτηνοπέδιλος, or alipes. —The Roman MERCURIUS is spoken of separately.

Hermes Trismegistus (Ἑρμῆς Τρισμέγιστος), the reputed author of a variety of works, some of which are still extant. The Greek god Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Thot, or Theut, as early as the time of Plato. The New Platonists regarded the Egyptian Hermes as the source of all knowledge and thought, or the λόγος embodied, and hence called him Trismegistus. A vast number of works on philosophy and religion, written by the New Platonists, were ascribed to this Hermes; from whom it was pretended that Pythagoras and Plato had derived all their knowledge. Most of these works were probably written in the 4th century of our era. The most important of them is entitled Poemander (from ποιμήν, a shepherd, pastor), apparently in imitation of the Pastor of Hermas. [HERMAS.] This work is in the form of a dialogue. It treats of nature, the creation of the world, the deity, his nature and attributes, the human soul, knowledge, &c.

Hermēsiănax (Ἑρμησιάναξ), of Colophon, a distinguished elegiac poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great. His chief work was an elegiac poem, in 3 books, addressed to his mistress, Leontium, whose name formed the title of the poem. His fragments are edited by Rigler and Axt, Colon. 1828, and by Bailey, Lond. 1839.

Hermīas or Hermĭas (Ἑρμείας or Ἑρμίας). 1. Tyrant of Atarneus and Assos in Mysia, celebrated as the friend and patron of Aristotle. Aristotle remained with Hermias 3 years, from B. C. 347 to 344, in the latter of which years Hermias was seized by Mentor, the Greek general of the Persian king, and sent as a captive to the Persian court, where he was put to death. Aristotle married Pythias, the adopted daughter of Hermias, and celebrated the praises of his benefactor in an ode addressed to Virtue, which is still extant. — 2. A Christian writer, who lived about A. D. 180, was the author of an extant work, entitled Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω φιλοσόφων, in which the Greek philosophers are held up to ridicule. Edited with Tatianus by Worth, Oxon. 1700.

Hermĭnia Gens, a very ancient patrician house at Rome, which appears in the first Etruscan war with the republic, B. C. 506, and vanishes from history in 448. T. Herminius was one of the 3 heroes who kept the Sublician bridge along with Horatius Cocles against the whole force of Porsena.

Hermĭnius Mons (Sierra de la Estrella), the chief mountain in Lusitania, S. of the Durius, from 7000 to 8000 feet high, called in the middle ages Hermeno or Armiña.

Hermĭŏnē (Ἑρμιόνη), the beautiful daughter of Menelaus and Helena. She had been promised in marriage to Orestes before the Trojan war; but Menelaus after his return home married her to Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus). Thereupon Orestes claimed Hermione for himself; but Neoptolemus haughtily refused to give her up. Orestes, in revenge, incited the Delphians against him, and Neoptolemus was slain. Hermione afterwards married Orestes, whom she had always loved, and bore him a son Tisamenus. The history of Hermione is related with various modifications. According to some Menelaus betrothed her at Troy to Neoptolemus; but in the meantime her grandfather, Tyndareus, promised her to Orestes, and actually gave her in marriage to him. Neoptolemus, on his return, took possession of her by force, but was slain soon after either at Delphi or in his own home at Phthia.

Hermĭŏnē (Ἑρμιόνη: Ἑρμιονεύς: Kastri), a town of Argolis, but originally independent of Argos, was situated on a promontory on the E. coast, and on a bay of the sea, which derived its name from the town (Hermionicus Sinus). Its territory was called Hermĭŏnis. It was originally inhabited by the Dryopes; and, in consequence of its isolated position, it became a flourishing city at an early period. It contained several temples, and among them a celebrated one of Demeter Chthonia. At a later time it joined the Achaean League.

Hermĭŏnes. [GERMANIA.]

Hermippus (Ἕρμιππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the old comedy, vehemently attacked Pericles and Aspasia. — 2. Of Smyrna, a distinguished philosopher, was a disciple of Callimachus of Alexandria, and flourished about B. C. 200. He wrote a great biographical work (Βίοι), which is frequently referred to by later writers. — 3. Of Berytus, a grammarian, who flourished under Trajan and Hadrian.

Hermĭsĭum, a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, on the Cimmerian Bosporus.

Hermocrătes (Ἑρμοκράτης), a Syracusan of rank, and an able statesman and orator, was chosen one of the Syracusan generals, B. C. 414, in order to oppose the Athenians. He afterwards served under Gylippus, when the latter took the command of the Syracusan forces; and after the destruction of the Athenian armament he attempted to save the lives of Nicias and Demosthenes. He then employed all his influence to induce his countrymen to support with vigour the Lacedaemonians in the war in Greece itself. He was with two colleagues appointed to the command of a small fleet, which the Syracusans sent to the assistance of the Lacedaemonians. But during his absence from home, he was banished by the Syracusans (410). Having obtained support from the Persian satrap Pharnabazus, he returned to Sicily, and endeavoured to effect his restoration to his native city by force of arms, but was slain in an attack which he made upon Syracuse in 407.

Hermŏdōrus (Ἑρμόδωρος). 1. Of Ephesus, a person of distinction, was expelled by his fellow-citizens, and is said to have gone to Rome, and to have explained to the decemvirs the Greek laws, and thus assisted them in drawing up the laws of the 12 Tables, B. C. 451. — 2. A disciple of Plato, is said to have circulated the works of Plato, and to have sold them in Sicily. He wrote a work on Plato. — 3. Of Salamis, the architect of the temple of Mars in the Flaminian Circus.

Hermŏgĕnes (Ἑρμογένης). 1. A son of Hipponicus, and a brother of the wealthy Callias, is introduced by Plato as one of the speakers in his "Cratylus," where he maintains that all the words of a language were formed by an agreement of men among themselves. — 2. A celebrated Greek rhetorician, was a native of Tarsus, and lived in the reign of M. Aurelius, A. D. 161—180. At the age of 15 his eloquence excited the admiration of M. Aurelius. He was shortly afterwards appointed public teacher of rhetoric, and at the age of 17 he began his career as a writer; but unfortunately when he was 25, his mental powers gave way, and he never recovered their full use, although he lived to an advanced age. After his death his heart is said to have been found covered with hair. His works 5 in number, which are still extant, form together a complete system of rhetoric, and were for a long time used in all the rhetorical schools as manuals. They are: 1. Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ περὶ τῶν στάσεων. 2. Περὶ εὑρέσεως (De Inventione). 3. Περὶ ἰδεῶν (De Formis Oratoriis). 4. Περὶ μεθόδου δεινότητος (De apto et solerti genere dicendi Methodus). 5. Προγυμνάσματα, An abridgment of the latter work was made by Aphthonius, in consequence of which the original fell into oblivion. The works of Hermogenes are printed in Walz's Rhetor. Graec. — 3. An architect of Alabanda, in Caria who invented what was called the pseudodipterus, that is, a form of a temple, with apparently two rows of columns. His great object as an architect was to increase the taste for the Ionic form of temples, in preference to Doric temples.

Hermŏgĕnes, M. Tigellĭus, a notorious detractor of Horace, who calls him (Sat. i. 3. 129) however optimus cantor et modulator. He was opposed to Satires altogether, was a man without talent, but yet had a foolish fancy for trying his hand at literature. It is conjectured that, under the fictitious name of Pantolabus (Sat. i. 8. 11, ii. 1. 21.), Horace alludes to Hermogenes, for the prosody of the 2 names is the same, so that one may be substituted for the other.

Hermogeniānus, the latest Roman jurist from whom there is an extract in the Digest, lived in the time of Constantine the Great. It is probable that he was the compiler of the Codex Hermogenianus, but so many persons of the same name lived nearly at the same time, that this cannot be affirmed with certainty.

Hermŏlāus (Ἑρμόλαος), a Macedonian youth, and a page of Alexander the Great. During a hunting party in Bactria, B.C. 327, he slew a wild boar, without waiting to allow Alexander the first blow, whereupon the king ordered him to be flogged. Incensed at this indignity, Hermolaus formed a conspiracy against the king's life; but the plot was discovered, and Hermolaus and his accomplices were stoned to death by the Macedonians.

Hermonassa. 1. A town of the Sindi at the entrance of the Cimmerian Bosporus, founded by the Mytilenaeans, called after Hermonassa, the wife of the founder, who died during its foundation, and left to her the sovereignty. — 2. A town on the coast of Pontus, near Trapezus.

Hermonthis (Ἕρμωνθις: Erment, Ru.), the chief city of the Nomos Hermonthites, in Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, a little above Thebes.

Hermŏpŏlis (Ἑρμόπολις, Ἕρμου πόλις). 1. Parva (ἡ μικρά: Damanhour), a city of Lower Egypt, the capital of the Nomos of Alexandria, stood upon the canal which connected the Canopic branch of the Nile with the Lake Mareotis. — 2. Magna (ἡ μεγάλη: nr. Eshmounein, Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Hermopolites, in the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, and one of the oldest cities in the land, stood on the W. bank of the Nile, a little below the confines of Upper Egypt. At the boundary line itself was a military station, or custom house, called Ἑρμοπολιτικὴ φυλακή, for collecting a toll on goods entering the Heptanomis. Hermopolis was a chief seat of the worship of Anubis (Cynocephalus); and it was the sacred burial-place of the Ibis.

Hermŏtīmus (Ἑρμότιμος). 1. A mathematician of Colophon, was one of the immediate predecessors of Euclid, and the discoverer of several geometrical propositions. — 2. Of Clazomenae, an early Greek philosopher of uncertain date, belonged to the Ionic school. Some traditions represent him as a mysterious person, gifted with supernatural power, by which his soul, apart from the body, wandered from place to place, bringing tidings of distant events in incredibly short spaces of time. At length his enemies burned his body, in the absence of the soul, which put an end to his wanderings.

Hermundūri, one of the most powerful nations of Germany, belonged to the Suevic race, dwelt between the Main and the Danube, and were bounded by the Sudeti mountains in the N., the Agri Decumates of the Romans in the W. and S., the Narisci on the E., the Cherusci on the N.E., and the Catti on the N.W. They were for a long time the allies of the Romans; but along with the other German tribes they assisted the Marcomanni in the great war against the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius. After this time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people, but are included under the general name of Suevi.

Hermus (τὸ Ἕρμος: Ἕρμειος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis, on the road from Athens to Eleusis.

Hermus (Ἕρμος; Ghiediz-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises in Mt. Dindymene (Morad-Dagh) in Phrygia; flows through Lydia, watering the plain N. of Sardis, which was hence called Ἕρμου πεδίον; passes by Magnesia and Temnus; and falls into the Gulf of Smyrna, between Smyrna and Phocaea. It formed the boundary between Aeolia and Ionia. Its chief tributaries were the Hyllus, Cogamus, Pactolus, and Phrygnus.

Hernĭci, a people in Latium, belonged to the Sabine race, and are said to have derived their name from the Marsic (Sabine) word herna, "rock." According to this etymology their name would signify "mountaineers." They inhabited the mountains of the Apennines between the lake Fucinus and the river Trerus, and were bounded on the N. by the Marsi and Aequi, and on the S. by the Volsci. Their chief town was Anagnia. They were a brave and warlike people, and long offered a formidable resistance to the Romans. The Romans formed a league with them on equal terms in the 3rd consulship of Sp. Cassius, B.C. 486. They were finally subdued by the Romans, 306.

Hērō. [Leander.]

Hērō (Ἥρων). 1. The Elder, a celebrated mathematician, was a native of Alexandria, and lived in the reigns of the Ptolemies Philadelphus and Evergetes (B.C. 285—222.) He is celebrated on account of his mechanical inventions, of which one of the best known is the common pneumatic experiment, called Hero's fountain, in which a jet of water is maintained by condensed air. We also find in his works a description of a steam engine, and of a double forcing pump used for a fire-engine. The following works of Hero are extant, though not in a perfect form: — 1. Χειροβαλλίστρας κατασκευὴ καὶ συμμετρία, de Constructione et Mensura Manubalistae. 2. Βελοποιϊκά, on the manufacture of darts. 3. Πνευματικά, or Spiritalia, the most celebrated of his works. 4. Περὶ αὐτοματοποιητικῶν, de Automatorum Fabrica Libri duo. All these works are published in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693. — 2. The Younger, a mathematician, is supposed to have lived under Heraclius (A.D. 610—641). The principal extant works assigned to him are: — 1. De Machinis bellicis. 2. Geodaesia, on practical geometry. 3. De Obsidione repellenda. Published in the Mathematici Veteres.

Hērōdes I. (Ἡρώδης), commonly called Herod. 1. Surnamed the Great, king of the Jews, was the second son of Antipater, and consequently of Idumaean origin. [Antipater, No. 3.] When his father was appointed by Caesar procurator of Judaea, in B.C. 47, Herod, though only 25 years of age, obtained the government of Galilee. In 46 he obtained the government of Coele-Syria. After the death of Caesar (44), Herod first supported Cassius; but upon the arrival of Antony in Syria, in 41, he exerted himself to secure his favour, and completely succeeded in his object. In 40 he went to Rome, and obtained from Antony and Octavian a decree of the senate, constituting him king of Judaea. He supported Antony in the civil war against Octavian; but after the battle of Actium (31) he was pardoned by Octavian and confirmed in his kingdom. During the remainder of his reign he cultivated with assiduity the friendship of Augustus and his counsellor Agrippa, and enjoyed the highest favour both of the one and the other. He possessed a jealous temper and ungovernable passions. He put to death his beautiful wife Mariamne, whom he suspected without cause of adultery, and with whom he was violently in love; and at a later period he also put to death his two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus. His government, though cruel and tyrannical, was vigorous; and he was both feared and respected by his subjects and the surrounding nations. He especially loved to display his power and magnificence by costly and splendid public works. He commenced rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem; he rebuilt the city of Samaria, and bestowed on it the name of Sebaste; while he converted a small town on the sea-coast into a magnificent city, to which he gave the name of Caesarea. He adorned these new cities with temples, theatres, gymnasia, and other buildings in the Greek style; and he even ventured to erect a theatre at Jerusalem itself, and an amphitheatre without the walls, in which he exhibited combats of wild beasts and gladiators. In the last year of his reign Jesus Christ was born; and it must have been on his deathbed that he ordered that massacre of the children at Bethlehem which is recorded by the Evangelist. (Matth. ii. 16.) He died in the 37th year of his reign, and the 70th of his age, B.C. 4.* — 2. Herodes Antipas, son of Herod the Great, by Malthace, a Samaritan, obtained the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peraea, on his father's death, while the kingdom of Judaea devolved on his elder brother Archelaus. He married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Herod Philip, she having, in defiance of the Jewish law, divorced her first husband. He had been previously married to a daughter of the Arabian prince Aretas, who quitted him in disgust at this new alliance. Aretas thereupon invaded the dominions of Antipas, and defeated the army which was opposed to him. In A.D. 38, after the death of Tiberius, Antipas went to Rome to solicit from Caligula the title of king, which had just been bestowed upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa; but through the intrigues of Agrippa, who was high in the favour of the Roman emperor, Antipas was deprived of his dominions, and sent into exile at Lyons (39); he was subsequently removed to Spain, where he died. It was Herod Antipas who imprisoned and put to death John the Baptist, who had reproached him with his unlawful connexion with Herodias. It was before him also that Christ was sent by Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem, as belonging to his jurisdiction, on account of his supposed Galilean origin. — 3. Herodes Agrippa. [AGRIPPA.] — 4. Brother of Herod Agrippa I., obtained the kingdom of Chalcis from Claudius at the request of Agrippa, 41. After the death of Agrippa (44), Claudius bestowed upon him the superintendence of the temple at Jerusalem, together with the right of appointing the high priests. He died in 48, when his kingdom was bestowed by Claudius upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa II. — 5. Herodes Atticus, the rhetorician. [ATTICUS.]

Hērōdĭānus (Ἡρωδιανός). 1. An historian, who wrote in Greek a history of the Roman empire in 8 books, from the death of M. Aurelius to the commencement of the reign of Gordianus III. (A.D. 180—238). He himself informs us that the events of this period had occurred in his own lifetime; but beyond this we know nothing respecting his life. He appears to have had Thucydides before him as a model, both for style and for the general composition of his work, like him, introducing here and there speeches wholly or in part imaginary. In spite of occasional inaccuracies in chronology and geography, his narrative is in the main truthful and impartial. Edited by Irmisch, Lips. 1789—1805, 5 vols., and by Bekker, Berlin, 1826. — 2. Aelĭus Herodĭānus, one of the most celebrated grammarians of antiquity, was the son of Apollonius Dyscolus [APOLLONIUS, No. 4], and was born at Alexandria. From that place he removed to Rome, where he gained the favour of the emperor M. Aurelius, to whom he dedicated his work on prosody. This work seems to have embraced not merely prosody, but most of those subjects now included in the etymological portion of grammar. The estimation in which he was held by subsequent grammarians was very great. Priscian styles him maximus auctor artis grammaticae. He was a very voluminous writer; but none of his works have come down to us complete, though several extracts from them are preserved by later grammarians.

Hērōdĭcus (Ἡρόδικος). 1. Of Babylon, a grammarian, was one of the immediate successors of Crates of Mallus, and an opponent of the followers of Aristarchus, against whom he wrote an epigram, which is still extant and included in the Greek Anthology. — 2. A celebrated physician of Selymbria in Thrace, lived in the 5th century B.C., and was one of the tutors of Hippocrates.

Hērōdōrus (Ἡρόδωρος), of Heraclea, in Pontus, a contemporary of Hecataeus and Pherecydes, about B.C. 510, wrote a work on Hercules and his exploits.

Hērōdŏtus (Ἡρόδοτος). 1. A Greek historian, and the father of history, was born at Halicarnassus, a Doric colony in Caria, B.C. 484. He belonged to a noble family at Halicarnassus. He was the son of Lyxes and Dryo; and the epic poet Panyasis was one of his relations. Herodotus left his native city at an early age, in order to escape from the oppressive government of Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, who put to death Panyasis. He probably settled at Samos for some time, and there became acquainted with the Ionic dialect; but he spent many years in his extensive travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, of which we shall speak presently. At a later time he returned to Halicarnassus, and took a prominent part in expelling Lygdamis from his native city. In the contentions which followed the expulsion of the tyrant, Herodotus was exposed to the hostile attacks of one of the political parties, whereupon he again left Halicarnassus, and settled at Thurii, in Italy, where he died. Whether he accompanied the first colonists to Thurii in 443, or followed them a few years afterwards, is a disputed point, and cannot be determined with certainty; though it appears probable from a passage in his work that he was at Athens at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war (431). It is also disputed where Herodotus wrote his history. Lucian relates that Herodotus read his work to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, which was received with such universal applause, that the 9 books of the work were in consequence honoured with the names of the 9 muses. The same writer adds that the young Thucydides was present at this recitation and was moved to tears. But this celebrated story, which rests upon the authority of Lucian alone, must be rejected for many reasons. Nor is there sufficient evidence in favour of the tradition that Herodotus read his work at the Panathenaea at Athens in 446 or 445, and received from the Athenians a reward of 10 talents. It is far more probable that he wrote his work at Thurii, when he was advanced in years; and it appears that he was engaged upon it, at least in the way of revision, when he was 77 years of age, since he mentions the revolt of the Medes against Darius Nothus, and the death of Amyrtaeus, events which belong to the years 409 and 408. Though the work of Herodotus was probably not written till he was advanced in years, yet he was collecting materials for it during a great part of his life. It was apparently with this view that he undertook his extensive travels through Greece and foreign countries; and his work contains on almost every page the results of his personal observations and inquiries. There was scarcely a town of any importance in Greece Proper and on the coasts of Asia Minor with which he was not perfectly familiar; and at many places in Greece, such as Samos, Athens, Corinth, and Thebes, he seems to have staid some time. The sites of the great battles between the Greeks and barbarians, as Marathon, Thermopylae, Salamis, and Plataeae, were well known to him; and on Xerxes' line of march from the Hellespont to Athens, there was probably not a place which he had not seen with his own eyes. He also visited most of the Greek islands, not only in the Aegean, but even in the W. of Greece, such as Zacynthus. In the N. of Europe he visited Thrace and the Scythian tribes on the Black Sea. In Asia he travelled through Asia Minor and Syria, and visited the cities of Babylon, Ecbatana, and Susa. He spent some time in Egypt, and travelled as far S. as Elephantine. He saw with his own eyes all the wonders of Egypt, and the accuracy of his observations and descriptions still excites the astonishment of travellers in that country. From Egypt he appears to have made excursions to the E. into Arabia, and to the W. into Libya, at least as far as Cyrene, which was well known to him. — The object of his work is to give an account of the struggles between the Greeks and Persians. He traces the enmity between Europe and Asia to the mythical times. He passes rapidly over the mythical ages to come to Croesus, king of Lydia, who was known to have committed acts of hostility against the Greeks. This induces him to give a full history of Croesus and of the kingdom of Lydia. The conquest of Lydia by the Persians under Cyrus then leads him to relate the rise of the Persian monarchy, and the subjugation of Asia Minor and Babylon. The nations which are mentioned in the course of this narrative are again discussed more or less minutely. The history of Cambyses and his expedition into Egypt induce him to enter into the details of Egyptian history. The expedition of Darius against the Scythians causes him to speak of Scythia and the N. of Europe. In the meantime the revolt of the Ionians breaks out, which eventually brings the contest between Persia and Greece to an end. An account of this insurrection is followed by the history of the invasion of Greece by the Persians; and the history of the Persian war now runs in a regular channel until the taking of Sestos by the Greeks, B.C. 478, with which event his work concludes. It will be seen from the preceding sketch that the history is full of digressions and episodes; but those do not impair the unity of the work, for one thread, as it were, runs through the whole, and the episodes are only like branches of the same tree. The structure of the work thus bears a strong resemblance to a grand epic poem. The whole work is pervaded by a deep religious sentiment. Herodotus shows the most profound reverence for everything which he conceives as divine, and rarely ventures to express an opinion on what he considers a sacred or religious mystery. — In order to form a fair judgment of the historical value of the work of Herodotus, we must distinguish between those parts in which he speaks from his own observations and those in which he merely repeats what he was told by priests and others. In the latter case he was undoubtedly often deceived; but whenever he speaks from his own observations, he is a real model of truthfulness and accuracy; and the more the countries which he describes have been explored by modern travellers, the more firmly has his authority been established. Many things which used to be laughed at as impossible or paradoxical are found now to be strictly in accordance with truth.—The dialect in which he wrote is the Ionic, intermixed with epic or poetical expressions, and sometimes even with Attic and Doric forms. The excellencies of his style consist in its antique and epic colouring, its transparent clearness, and the lively flow of the narrative. But notwithstanding all the merits of Herodotus, there were certain writers in antiquity who attacked him, both in regard to the form and the substance of his work; and there is still extant a work ascribed to Plutarch, entitled "On the Malignity of Herodotus," full of the most futile accusations of every kind. The best editions of Herodotus are by Schweighäuser, Argentor. 1806, often reprinted; by Gaisford, Oxon. 1824; and by Bähr, Lips. 1830. — 2. A Greek physician, who practised at Rome with great reputation, about A.D. 100. He wrote some medical works, which are several times quoted by Galen. — 3. Also a Greek physician, a native either of Tarsus or Philadelphia, taught Sextus Empiricus.

Herŏŏpŏlis or Hero (Ἡρώων πόλις, Ἡρῶ: O.T. Raamses or Rameses?: Ru. nr. Abou-Keshid?), the capital of the Nomos Heroöpolites or Arsinoïtes in Lower Egypt, stood on the border of the Desert E. of the Delta, upon the canal connecting the Nile with the W. head of the Red Sea, which was called from it Sinus Heroöpoliticus (κόλπος Ἡρώων, Ἡρωοπολίτης or -ιτικός). The country about it is supposed to be the Goshen of Scripture.

Hērŏphĭlus (Ἡρόφιλος), one of the most celebrated physicians of antiquity, was born at Chalcedon in Bithynia, was a pupil of Praxagoras, and lived at Alexandria, under the first Ptolemy, who reigned B.C. 323—285. Here he soon acquired a great reputation, and was one of the founders of the medical school in that city. He seems to have given his chief attention to anatomy and physiology, which he studied not merely from the dissection of animals, but also from that of human bodies. He is even said to have carried his ardour in his anatomical pursuits so far as to have dissected criminals alive. He was the author of several medical and anatomical works, of which nothing but the titles and a few fragments remain. These have been collected and published by Marx, De Herophili Vita, &c. Gotting. 1840.

Hērostrătus (Ἡρόστρατος), an Ephesian, set fire to the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, on the same night that Alexander the Great was born, B.C. 356. He was put to the torture, and confessed that he had fired the temple to immortalise himself. The Ephesians passed a decree condemning his name to oblivion; but it has been, as might have been expected, handed down by history.

Hersē (Ἕρση), daughter of Cecrops and sister of Agraulos, was beloved by Hermes, by whom she became the mother of Cephalus. Respecting her story, see AGRAULOS. At Athens sacrifices were offered to her, and the maidens who carried the vessels containing the libation (ἕρση) were called ἐῤῥηφόροι.

Hersĭlĭa, the wife of Romulus, was the only married woman carried off by the Romans in the rape of the Sabine maidens. As Romulus after death became Quirinus, so Hersilia his wife became a goddess, Hora or Horta. Some writers, however, made Hersilia the wife of Hostus, grandfather of Tullus Hostilius.

Hertha (containing probably the same elements as the words earth, erde), the goddess of the earth, among the ancient Germans.

Hĕrŭli or Eruli, a powerful German race, are said to have come originally from Scandinavia, but they appear on the shores of the Black Sea in the reign of Gallienus (A. D. 262), when in conjunction with the Goths, they invaded the Roman empire. They were conquered by the Ostrogoths, and afterwards formed part of the great army of Attila, with which he invaded Gaul and Italy. After the death of Attila (453) a portion of the Heruli united with other German tribes; and under the command of Odoacer, who is said to have been an Herulian, they destroyed the Western Empire, 476. Meantime the remainder of the nation formed a powerful kingdom on the banks of the Theiss and the Danube, which was eventually destroyed by the Langobardi or Lombards. Some of the Heruli were allowed by Anastasius to settle in Pannonia, and they served with great distinction in the armies of Justinian.

Hēsĭŏdus (Ἡσίοδος), one of the earliest Greek poets, of whose personal history we possess little authentic information. He is frequently mentioned along with Homer; as Homer represents the Ionic school of poetry in Asia Minor, so Hesiod represents the Boeotian school of poetry, which spread over Phocis and Euboea. The only points of resemblance between the 2 schools consist in their versification and dialect. In other respects they entirely differ. The Homeric school takes for its subjects the restless activity of the heroic age, while the Hesiodic turns its attention to the quiet pursuits of ordinary life, to the origin of the world, the gods and heroes. Hesiod lived about a century later than Homer, and is placed about B. C. 735. We learn from his own poem on Works and Days, that he was born in the village of Ascra in Boeotia, whither his father had emigrated from the Aeolian Cyme in Asia Minor. After the death of his father, he was involved in a dispute with his brother Perses about his small patrimony, which was decided in favour of his brother. He then emigrated to Orchomenos, where he spent the remainder of his life. This is all that can be said with certainty about the life of Hesiod. Many of the stories related about him refer to his school of poetry, and not to the poet personally. In this light we may regard the tradition, that Hesiod had a poetical contest with Homer, which is said to have taken place at Chalcis during the funeral solemnities of king Amphidamas, or, according to others, at Aulis or Delos. The story of this contest gave rise to a composition still extant under the title of Ἀγὼν Ὁμήρου καὶ Ἡσιόδου, the work of a grammarian who lived towards the end of the first century of our era, in which the 2 poets are represented as engaged in the contest, and answering one another. The following works were attributed to Hesiod in antiquity: — 1. Ἔργα or Ἔργα καὶ ἡμέραι, Opera et Dies, Works and Days. It is written in the most homely style, with scarcely any poetical imagery or ornament, and must be looked upon as the most ancient specimen of didactic poetry. It contains ethical, political, and economical precepts, the last of which constitute the greater part of the work, consisting of rules about choosing a wife, the education of children, agriculture, commerce, and navigation. It would further seem that 3 distinct poems have been inserted in it; viz. 1. The fable of Prometheus and Pandora (47—105); 2. On the ages of the world, which are designated by the names of metals (109—201); and, 3. A descriptisn of winter (504—558). 2. Θεογονία, a Theogony, was not considered by Hesiod's countrymen to be a genuine production of the poet. This work gives an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods, explaining the whole order of nature in a series of genealogies, for every part of physical as well as moral nature there appears personified in the character of a distinct being. The whole concludes with an account of some of the most illustrious heroes. 3. Ἠοῖαι or ἠοῖαι μεγάλαι, also called κατάλογοι γυναικῶν, Catalogue of Women. This work is lost. It contained accounts of the women who had been beloved by the gods, and had thus become the mothers of the heroes in the various parts of Greece, from whom the ruling families derived their origin. 4. Ἀσπὶς Ἡρακλέους, Shield of Hercules, which is extant, probably formed part of the work last mentioned. It contains a description of the shield of Hercules, and is an imitation of the Homeric description of the shield of Achilles. The best edition of Hesiod is by Göttling, Gotha and Erfurt, 1843, 2d ed.

Hēsĭŏnē (Ἡσιόνη), daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, was chained by her father to a rock, in order to be devoured by a sea-monster, that he might thus appease the anger of Apollo and Poseidon. Hercules promised to save her, if Laomedon would give him the horses which he had received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. Hercules killed the monster, but Laomedon refused to keep his promise. Thereupon Hercules took Troy, killed Laomedon, and gave Hesione to his friend and companion Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Teucer. Her brother Priam sent Antenor to claim her back, and the refusal on the part of the Greeks is mentioned as one of the causes of the Trojan war.

Hespĕrĭa (Ἑσπερία), the Western land (from ἕσπερος, vesper), the name given by the Greek poets to Italy, because it lay W. of Greece. In imitation of them, the Roman poets gave the name of Hesperia to Spain, which they sometimes called ultima Hesperia (Hor. Carm. i. 36. 4) to distinguish it from Italy, which they occasionally called Hesperia Magna (Virg. Aen. i. 569).

Hespĕrĭdes (Ἑσπερίδες), the celebrated guardians of the golden apples which Ge (Earth) gave to Hera at her marriage with Zeus. Their parentage is differently related. They are called the daughters either of Night or Erebus, or of Phorcys and Ceto, or of Atlas and Hesperis (whence their names Atlantides or Hesperides), or of Hesperus, or of Zeus and Themis. Some traditions mentioned 3 Hesperides, viz. Aegle, Arethusa, and Hesperia; others 4, Aegle, Crytheia, Hestia, and Arethusa; and others again 7. The poets describe them as possessing the power of sweet song. In the earliest legends, these nymphs are described as living on the river Oceanus, in the extreme W.; but the later attempts to fix the geographical position of their gardens led poets and geographers to different parts of Libya, as the neighbourhood of Cyrene, Mount Atlas, or the islands on the W. coast of Libya, or even to the N. extremity of the earth, beyond the wind Boreas, among the Hyperboreans. They were assisted in watching the golden apples by the dragon Ladon. It was one of the labours of Hercules to obtain possession of these apples. (See p. 310, a.)

Hesperĭdum Insŭlae. [Hesperium.]

Hespĕris. [Berenice, No. 4, p. 120.]

Hespĕrium (Ἑσπέριον, Ἑσπέρου κέρας: C. Verde or C. Roxo), a headland on the W. coast of Africa, was one of the furthest points to which the knowledge of the ancients extended along that coast. Near it was a bay called Sinus Hesperius; and a day's journey from it a group of islands called Hesperidum Insulae, wrongly identified by some with the Fortunatae Insulae; they are either the Cape de Verde islands, or, more probably, the Bissagos, at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

Hespĕrus (Ἕσπερος), the evening star, is called by Hesiod a son of Astraeus and Eos. He was also regarded as the same as the morning star, whence both Homer and Hesiod call him the bringer of light (ἑωσφόρος). A later account makes him a son of Atlas, who was fond of astronomy, and who disappeared, after ascending Mount Atlas to observe the stars. He was worshipped with divine honours, and was regarded as the fairest star in the heavens. The Romans designated him by the names Lucifer and Hesperus, to characterise him as the morning or evening star.

Hestĭa (Ἑστία, Ion. Ἱστίη), called Vesta by the Romans, the goddess of the hearth, or rather of the fire burning on the hearth, was one of the 12 great divinities of the Greeks. She was a daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and, according to common tradition, was the first-born of Rhea, and consequently the first of the children swallowed by Cronus. She was a maiden divinity, and when Apollo and Poseidon sued for her hand, she swore by the head of Zeus to remain a virgin for ever. As the hearth was looked upon as the centre of domestic life, so Hestia was the goddess of domestic life and the giver of all domestic happiness: as such she was believed to dwell in the inner part of every house, and to have invented the art of building houses. In this respect she often appears together with Hermes, who was likewise a deus penetralis. Being the goddess of the sacred fire of the altar, Hestia had a share in the sacrifices offered to all the gods. Hence, when sacrifices were offered, she was invoked first, and the first part of the sacrifice was presented to her. Solemn oaths were sworn by the goddess of the hearth; and the hearth itself was the sacred asylum where suppliants implored the protection of the inhabitants of the house. A town or city is only an extended family, and therefore had likewise its sacred hearth. This public hearth usually existed in the prytaneum of a town, where the goddess had her especial sanctuary (θάλαμος), under the name of Prytanītis (Πρυτανῖτις), with a statue and the sacred hearth. There, as at a private hearth, Hestia protected the suppliants. When a colony was sent out, the emigrants took the fire which was to burn on the hearth of their new home from that of the mother town. If ever the fire of her hearth became extinct, it was not allowed to be lighted again with ordinary fire, but either by fire produced by friction, or by burning glasses drawing fire from the sun. The mystical speculations of later times took their origin from the simple ideas of the ancients, and assumed a sacred hearth not only in the centre of the earth, but even in that of the universe, and confounded Hestia in various ways with other divinities, such as Cybele, Gaea, Demeter, Persephone, and Artemis. There were but few special temples of Hestia in Greece, since every prytaneum was in reality a sanctuary of the goddess, and since a portion of the sacrifices, to whatever divinity they were offered, belonged to her. The worship of the Roman Vesta is spoken of under Vesta.

Hestiaeōtis (Ἑστιαιῶτις) 1. The N.W. part of Thessaly [Thessalia.] — 2. Or Histiaea, a district in Euboea. [Euboea.]

Hesychĭus (Ἡσύχιος). 1. An Alexandrine grammarian, under whose name a large Greek dictionary has come down to us. Respecting his personal history nothing is known, but he probably lived about A.D. 380. The work is based, as the writer himself tells us, upon the lexicon of Diogenianus. Hesychius was probably a pagan: the Christian glosses and the references to Christian writers in the work are interpolations by a later hand. The work is one of great importance, not only on account of its explaining the words of the Greek language, but also from its containing much literary and archaeological information, derived from earlier grammarians and commentators, whose works are lost. The arrangement of the work however is very defective. The best edition is by Alberti, completed after Alberti's death by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1746—1766, 2 vols. fol. — 2. Of Miletus, surnamed Illustris, from some office which he held, lived about A.D. 540, and wrote: 1. An Onomasticon, or account of illustrious men, published by Orelli, Lips. 1820. 2. A Chronicon or synoptical view of universal history, in 6 parts, from the reign of Belus, the reputed founder of the Assyrian empire, to the death of the Byzantine emperor, Anastasius I., A.D. 518. The work itself is lost, but an account of it is preserved by Photius.

Hetricŭlum, a town of the Bruttii.

Hibernĭa, also called Ierne, Iverna or Juverna (Ἰέρνη, Ἱερνὶς νῆσος, Ἰουερνία), the island of Ireland, appears to have derived its name from the inhabitants of its S. coast, called Juverni (Ἰούερνοι) by Ptolemy, but its original name was probably Bergion or Vergion. It is mentioned by Caesar, and is frequently spoken of by subsequent writers; but the Romans never made any attempt to conquer the island, though they obtained some knowledge of it from the commercial intercourse which was carried on between it and Britain. We have no account of the island except from Ptolemy, who must have derived his information from the statements of the British merchants, who visited its coasts. Ptolemy gives rather a long list of its promontories, rivers, tribes and towns.

Hicesia. [Aeoliae Insulae.]

Hicetas (Ἱκέτας or Ἱκέτης). 1. A Syracusan, contemporary with the younger Dionysius and Timoleon. He was at first a friend of Dion, after whose death (B.C. 353) his wife Arete, and his sister Aristomache placed themselves under the care of Hicetas; but he was persuaded notwithstanding to consent to their destruction. A few years later he became tyrant of Leontini. He carried on war against the younger Dionysius, whom he defeated, and had made himself master of the whole city, except the island citadel, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, 344. Hicetas then opposed Timoleon and called in the aid of the Carthaginians, but he was defeated and put to death by Timoleon, 339 or 338.—2. Tyrant of Syracuse, during the interval between the reign of Agathocles and that of Pyrrhus. He defeated Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, and was himself defeated by the Carthaginians. After a reign of 9 years (288—279), he was expelled from Syracuse.—3. Of Syracuse, one of the earlier Pythagoreans.

Hiempsal. 1. Son of Micipsa, king of Numidia, and grandson of Masinissa, was murdered by Jugurtha, soon after the death of Micipsa, B.C. 118.—2. King of Numidia, grandson or great-grandson of Masinissa, and father of Juba, appears to have received the sovereignty of part of Numidia after the Jugurthine war. He was expelled from his kingdom by Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the leader of the Marian party in Africa, but was restored by Pompey in 81. Hiempsal wrote some works in the Punic language, which are cited by Sallust (Jug. 17).

Hiĕra. 1. [Aeoliae.].—2. [Aegates.]

Hiĕrăpŏlis (Ἱεράπολις). 1. A city of Great Phrygia, near the Maeander, celebrated for its hot springs and its temple of Cybele. Like the neighbouring cities of Colossae and Laodicea, it was an early seat of Christianity, and it is mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 13).—2. Formerly Bambȳce (Βαμβύκη: Bambuch, or Membij), a city in the N.E. of Syria, one of the chief seats of the worship of Astarte.

Hiĕrocles (Ἱεροκλῆς). 1. A Greek rhetorician of Alabanda in Caria, lived about B.C. 100, and was distinguished, like his brother Menecles, by the Asiatic style of oratory.—2. Governor of Bithynia, and afterwards of Alexandria, is said to have been one of the chief instigators of the persecution of the Christians under Diocletian. He wrote a work against the Christians, entitled Λόγοι φιλαλήθεις πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς, of which we may form an idea from the account of Lactantius and the refutation which Eusebius wrote against it. We see from these writers that Hierocles attacked the character of Jesus Christ and his apostles, and put him on an equality with Apollonius of Tyana.—3. A New Platonist, who lived at Alexandria about the middle of the 5th century. He wrote: 1. A commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras, in which he endeavours to give an intelligible account of the philosophy of Pythagoras. Published by Needham, Cambridge, 1709; and by Warren, London, 1742. 2. A work on Providence, Fate, and the reconciliation of man's free will with the divine government of the world, in 7 books. The work is lost, but some extracts from it preserved in Photius. 3. An ethical work on justice, on reverence towards the gods, parents, relations, &c., which bore the title Τὰ φιλοσοφούμενα. This work is also lost, but there are several extracts from it in Stobaeus. The extant work, entitled Ἀστεῖα, a collection of ludicrous tales, is erroneously ascribed to Hierocles, the New Platonist. The work is of no merit.—4. A Greek grammarian, the author of an extant work, entitled Συνέκδημος, that is, The Travelling Companion, intended as a handbook for travellers through the provinces of the Eastern empire. It was perhaps written at the beginning of the 6th century of our era. It contains a list of 64 eparchiae or provinces of the Eastern empire, and of 935 different towns, with brief descriptions. Published by Wesseling, in Veterum Romanorum Itineraria, Amsterdam, 1735.

Hiĕron (Ἱέρων). 1. Tyrant of Syracuse (B.C. 478—467), was son of Dinomenes and brother of Gelon, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty. In the early part of his reign he became involved in a war with Theron of Agrigentum, who had espoused the cause of his brother Polyzelus, with whom he had quarrelled. But Hieron afterwards concluded a peace with Theron, and became reconciled to his brother Polyzelus. After the death of Theron, in 472, he carried on war against his son Thrasydaeus, whom he defeated in a great battle, and expelled from Agrigentum. But by far the most important event of his reign was the great victory which he obtained over the Etruscan fleet near Cumae (474), and which appears to have effectually broken the naval power of that nation. Hieron died at Catana in the 12th year of his reign, 467. His government was much more despotic than that of his brother Gelon. He maintained a large guard of mercenary troops, and employed numerous spies and informers. He was however a liberal and enlightened patron of men of letters; and his court became the resort of the most distinguished poets and philosophers of the day. Aeschylus, Pindar, and Bacchylides took up their abode with him, and we find him associating in friendly intercourse with Xenophanes, Epicharmus, and Simonides. His intimacy with the latter was particularly celebrated, and has been made the subject by Xenophon of an imaginary dialogue, entitled the Hieron. His love of magnificence was especially displayed in the great contests of the Grecian games, and his victories at Olympia and Delphi have been immortalised by Pindar.—2. King of Syracuse (B.C. 270—216), was the son of Hierocles, a noble Syracusan, descended from the great Gelon, but his mother was a female servant. When Pyrrhus left Sicily (275), Hieron, who had distinguished himself in the wars of that monarch, was declared general by the Syracusan army. He strengthened his power by marrying the daughter of Leptines, at that time the most influential citizen at Syracuse; and after his defeat of the Mamertines, he was saluted by his fellow-citizens with the title of king, 270. It was the great object of Hieron to expel the Mamertines from Sicily; and accordingly when the Romans, in 264, interposed in favour of that people, Hieron concluded an alliance with the Carthaginians, and, in conjunction with them, carried on war against the Romans. But having been defeated by the Romans, he concluded a peace with them in the following year (263), in virtue of which he retained possession of the whole S. E. of Sicily, and the E. side of the island as far as Tauromenium. From this time till his death, a period of little less than half a century, Hieron continued the stedfast friend and ally of the Romans, a policy of which his subjects as well as himself reaped the benefits, in the enjoyment of a state of uninterrupted tranquillity and prosperity. Even the heavy losses which the Romans sustained in the first 3 years of the 2nd Punic war did not shake his fidelity; and after their great defeats, he sent them large supplies of corn and auxiliary troops. He died in 216 at the age of 92. His government was mild and equitable: though he did not refuse the title of king, he avoided all external display of the insignia of royalty, and appeared in public in the garb of a private citizen. The care he bestowed upon the financial department of his administration is attested by the laws regulating the tithes of corn and other agricultural produce, which, under the name of Leges Hieronicae, were retained by the Romans when they reduced Sicily to a province. He adorned the city of Syracuse with many public works. His power and magnificence were celebrated by Theocritus in his 16th Idyll. Hieron had only one son, Gelon, who died shortly before his father. He was succeeded by his grandson, Hieronymus.

Hiĕrōnymus (Ἱερώνυμος). 1. Of Cardia, probably accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia, and after the death of that monarch (B.C. 323) served under his countryman Eumenes. In the last battle between Eumenes and Antigonus (316) Hieronymus fell into the hands of Antigonus, who treated him with kindness, and to whose service he henceforth attached himself. After the death of Antigonus (301), Hieronymus continued to follow the fortunes of his son Demetrius, and was appointed by the latter governor of Boeotia, after his first conquest of Thebes, 292. He continued unshaken in his attachment to Demetrius and to his son, Antigonus Gonatus, after him. It appears that he survived Pyrrhus, and died at the advanced age of 104. Hieronymus wrote a history of the events from the death of Alexander to that of Pyrrhus, if not later. This work has not come down to us, but it is frequently cited by later writers as one of the chief authorities for the history of Alexander's successors. We are told that Hieronymus displayed partiality to Antigonus and Demetrius, and in consequence treated Pyrrhus and Lysimachus with great injustice. — 2. King of Syracuse, succeeded his grandfather, Hieron II., B.C. 216, at 15 years of age. He was persuaded by the Carthaginian party to renounce the alliance with the Romans, which his grandfather had maintained for so many years. He was assassinated after a short reign of only 13 months. — 3. Of Rhodes, commonly called a peripatetic, though Cicero questions his right to the title, was a disciple of Aristotle, and appears to have lived down to the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He held the highest good to consist in freedom from pain and trouble, and denied that pleasure was to be sought for its own sake. — 4. Commonly known as Saint Jerome, one of the most celebrated of the Christian fathers, was born at Stridon, a town upon the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia, about A.D. 340. His father sent him to Rome for the prosecution of his studies, where he devoted himself with great ardour and success to the Greek and Latin languages, to rhetoric, and to the different branches of philosophy, enjoying the instructions of the most distinguished preceptors of that era, among whom was Aelius Donatus. [DONATUS.] After completing his studies he went to Gaul, where he remained some time, and subsequently travelled through various countries in the E. At Antioch he was attacked by a dangerous malady, and on his recovery he resolved to withdraw from the world. In 374 he retired to the desert of Chalcis, lying between Antioch and the Euphrates, where he passed 4 years, adhering strictly to the most rigid observances of monkish ascetism, but at the same time pursuing the study of Hebrew. In 379 he was ordained a presbyter at Antioch by Paulinus. Soon after he went to Constantinople, where he lived for 3 years, enjoying the instructions and friendship of Gregory of Nazianzus. In 382 he accompanied Paulinus to Rome, where he formed a close friendship with the Pope Damasus. He remained at Rome 3 years, and there laboured in proclaiming the glory and merit of a contemplative life and monastic discipline. He had many enthusiastic disciples among the Roman ladies, but the influence which he exercised over them excited the hatred of their relations, and exposed him to attacks against his character. Accordingly he left Rome in 385, having lost his patron Damasus in the preceding year; and accompanied by the rich widow Paula, her daughter Eustochium, and a number of devout maidens, he made a tour of the Holy Land, and finally settled at Bethlehem, where Paula erected 4 monasteries, 3 for nuns and 1 for monks. Here he passed the remainder of his life. He died A.D. 420. — Jerome wrote a great number of works, most of which have come down to us. Of these the most celebrated are his Commentaries on the various books of the Scriptures. He also translated into Latin the Old and New Testaments: his translation is in substance the Latin version of the Scriptures, known by the name of the Vulgate. The translation of the Old Testament was made by Jerome directly from the Hebrew; but the translation of the New Testament was formed by him out of the old translations carefully corrected from the original Greek. Jerome likewise translated from the Greek the Chronicle of Eusebius, which he enlarged, chiefly in the department of Roman history, and brought down to A.D. 378. Jerome was the most learned of the Latin fathers. His profound knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, his familiarity with ancient history and philosophy, and his personal acquaintance with the manners and scenery of the East, enabled him to throw much light upon the Scriptures. In his controversial works he is vehement and dogmatical. His language is exceedingly pure, bearing ample testimony to the diligence with which he must have studied the choicest models. The best editions of the works of Jerome are the Benedictine, Par. 5 vols. fol. 1693—1706, and that by Vallarsi, Veron. 11 vols. fol. 1734—1742; reprinted Venet. 11 vols. 4to. 1766.

Hilărius. 1. A Christian writer, was born of pagan parents at Poitiers. He afterwards became a Christian, and was elected bishop of his native place, A.D. 350. From this time he devoted all his energies to check the progress of Arianism, which was making rapid strides in Gaul. He became so troublesome to the Arians, that they induced the emperor Constantius in 356 to banish him to Phrygia. He was allowed to return to Gaul about 361, and died in his diocese in 368. Several of his works have come down to us. They consist chiefly of polemical treatises against the Arians and addresses to the emperor Constantius. The best edition of his works is by Coustant, Paris, 1693, forming one of the Benedictine series, and reprinted by Scipio Maffei, Veron.. 1730. — 2. Bishop of Arles, succeeded his master Honoratus in that diocese, A.D. 429, and died in 449. He wrote the life of Honoratus and a few other works.

Himĕra (Ἱμέρα) 1. (Fiume Salso), one of the principal rivers in the S. of Sicily, at one time the boundary between the territories of the Carthaginians and Syracusans, receives near Enna the water of a salt spring, and hence has salt water as far as its mouth. — 2. A smaller river in the N. of Sicily, flows into the sea between the towns of Himera and Thermae. — 3. (Ἱμεραῖος), a celebrated Greek city on the N. coast of Sicily, W. of the mouth of the river Himera [No. 2.], was founded by the Chalcidians of Zancle, B. C. 648, and afterwards received Dorian settlers, so that the inhabitants spoke a mixed dialect, partly Ionic (Chalcidian) and partly Doric. About 560 Himera, being threatened by its powerful neighbours, placed itself under the protection of Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in whose power it appears to have remained till his death. At a later time (500) we find Himera governed by a tyrant Terillus, who was expelled by Theron of Agrigentum. Terillus thereupon applied for assistance to the Carthaginians, who, anxious to extend their influence in Sicily, sent a powerful army into Sicily under the command of Hamilcar. The Carthaginians were defeated with great slaughter at Himera by the united forces of Theron and Gelon of Syracuse on the same day as the battle of Salamis was fought (480). Himera was now governed by Thrasydaeus, the son of Theron, in the name of his father; but the inhabitants having attempted to revolt, Theron put to death or drove into exile a considerable part of the population, and repeopled the city with settlers from all quarters, but especially of Dorian origin. After the death of Theron (472), Himera recovered its independence, and for the next 60 years was one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily. It assisted Syracuse against the Athenians in 415. In 409 it was taken by Hannibal, the son of Gisgo, who, to revenge the great defeat which the Carthaginians had suffered before this town, levelled it to the ground and destroyed almost all the inhabitants. Himera was never rebuilt; but on the opposite bank of the river Himera, the Carthaginians founded a new town, which, from a warm medicinal spring in its neighbourhood, was called Thermae (Θέρμαι: Θερμίτης, Thermitanus: Termini.) Here the remains of the unfortunate inhabitants of Himera were allowed to settle. The Romans, who highly prized the warm springs of Thermae, permitted the town to retain its own constitution; and Augustus made it a colony.—The poet Stesichorus was born at the ancient Himera, and the tyrant Agathocles at Thermae.

Himĕrĭus (Ἱμέριος), a celebrated Greek sophist, was born at Prusa in Bithynia, and studied at Athens. He was subsequently appointed professor of rhetoric at Athens, where he gave instruction to Julian, afterwards emperor, and the celebrated Christian writers, Basil and Gregory Nazianzen. In 362 the emperor Julian invited him to his court at Antioch, and made him his secretary. He returned to Athens in 368, and there passed the remainder of his life. Himerius was a pagan; but he does not manifest in his writings any animosity against the Christians. There were extant in the time of Photius 71 orations by Himerius; but of these only 24 have come down to us complete. Edited by Wernsdorf, Göttingen, 1790.

Himilco (Ἰμίλκων). 1. A Carthaginian, who conducted a voyage of discovery from Gades towards the N., along the W. shores of Europe, at the same time that Hanno undertook his voyage to the S. along the coast of Africa. [HANNO, No. 10.] Himilco represented that his further progress was prevented by the stagnant nature of the sea, loaded with sea weed, and by the absence of wind. His voyage is said to have lasted 4 months, but it is impossible to judge how far it was extended. Perhaps it was intentionally wrapt in obscurity by the commercial jealousy of the Carthaginians. — 2. Son of Hanno, commanded, together with Hannibal, son of Gisco [HANNIBAL, No. 1.], a Carthaginian army in Sicily, and laid siege to Agrigentum, B. C. 406. Hannibal died before Agrigentum of a pestilence, which broke out in the camp; and Himilco, now left sole general, succeeded in taking the place, after a siege of nearly 8 months. At a later period he carried on war against Dionysius of Syracuse. In 395 he defeated Dionysius, and laid siege to Syracuse; but, while pressing the siege of the city, a pestilence carried off a great number of his men. In this weakened condition, Himilco was attacked and defeated by Dionysius, and was obliged to purchase his safety by an ignominious capitulation. Such was his grief and disappointment at this termination to the campaign, that, on his return to Carthage, he put an end to his life by voluntary abstinence. — 3. The Carthaginian commander at Lilybaeum, which he defended with skill and bravery, when it was attacked by the Romans, 250. — 4. Commander of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily during a part of the 2nd Punic war, 214—212. — 5. Surnamed PHAMAEAS, commander of the Carthaginian cavalry in the 3rd Punic war. He deserted to the Romans, by whom he was liberally rewarded.

Hippăna (τὰ Ἵππανα), a town in the N. of Sicily near Panormus.

Hipparchĭa (Ἱππαρχία), wife of Crates the Cynic. [For details, see CRATES, No. 3.]

Hipparchus (Ἵππαρχος). 1. Son of Pisistratus. [PISISTRATIDAE.] — 2. A celebrated Greek astronomer, was a native of Nicaea in Bithynia, and flourished B. C. 160—145. He resided both at Rhodes and Alexandria. He was the true father of astronomy, which he raised to that rank among the applications of arithmetic and geometry which it has always since preserved. He was the first who gave and demonstrated the means of solving all triangles, rectilinear and spherical. He constructed a table of chords, of which he made the same sort of use as we make of our sines. He made more observations than his predecessors, and understood them better. He invented the planisphere, or the mode of representing the starry heavens upon a plane, and of producing the solutions of problems of spherical astronomy. He is also the father of true geography, by his happy idea of marking the position of spots on the earth, as was done with the stars, by circles drawn from the pole perpendicularly to the equator; that is, by latitudes and longitudes. His method of eclipses was the only one by which differences of meridians could be determined. The catalogue which Hipparchus constructed of the stars is preserved in the Almagest of Ptolemy. Hipparchus wrote numerous works, which are all lost with the exception of his commentary on the phenomena of Aratus.

Hipparīnus (Ἱππαρῖνος). 1. A Syracusan, father of Dion and Aristomache, supported the elder Dionysius, who married his daughter Aristomache. — 2. Son of Dion, and grandson of the preceding, threw himself from the roof of a house, and was killed on the spot, when his father attempted, by restraint, to cure him of the dissolute habits which he had acquired while under the power of Dionysius. — 3. Son of the elder Dionysius by Aristomache, daughter of No. 1, succeeded Callippus in the tyranny of Syracuse, B.C. 352. He was assassinated, after reigning only 2 years.

Hippăris (Ἵππαρις: Camarina), a river in the S. of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Camarina.

Hippăsus (Ἵππασος), of Metapontum or Croton, in Italy, one of the elder Pythagoreans, held the element of fire to be the cause of all things. In consequence of his making known the sphere, consisting of 12 pentagons, which was regarded by the Pythagoreans as a secret, he is said to have perished in the sea as an impious man.

Hippĭa and Hippĭus (Ἱππία and Ἵππιος, or Ἵππειος), in Latin Equester and Equestris, surnames of several divinities, as of Hera and Athena, of Poseidon and of Ares; and at Rome also of Fortuna and Venus.

Hippĭas (Ἱππίας). 1. Son of Pisistratus. [Pisistratidae.] — 2. The Sophist, was a native of Elis, and the contemporary of Socrates. His fellow-citizens availed themselves of his abilities in political matters, and sent him on a diplomatic mission to Sparta. But he was in every respect like the other sophists of the time. He travelled through Greece for the purpose of acquiring wealth and celebrity, by teaching and public speaking. His character as a sophist, his vanity, and his boastful arrogance, are well described in the 2 dialogues of Plato, Hippias major and Hippias minor. Though his knowledge was superficial, yet it appears that he had paid attention not only to rhetorical, philosophical, and political studies, but also to poetry, music, mathematics, painting and sculpture; and he must even have acquired some practical skill in the mechanical arts, as he used to boast of wearing on his body nothing that he had not made with his own hands, such as his seal-ring, his cloak, and shoes. He possessed great facility in extempore speaking; and once his vanity led him to declare that he would travel to Olympia, and there deliver before the assembled Greeks an oration on any subject that might be proposed to him.

Hippo (Ἱππών), in Africa. 1. H. Regĭus (Ἱ. βασιλικός: nr. Bonah, Ru.), a city on the coast of Numidia, W. of the mouth of the Rubricatus; once a royal residence, and afterwards celebrated as the bishopric of St. Augustine. — 2. H. Diarrhytus or Zaritus (Ἱ. διάῤῥυτος: Bizerta), a city on the N. coast of the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), W. of Utica, at the mouth of the Sinus Hipponensis. — 3. A town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, S. of Toletum.

Hippocentauri. [Centauri.]

Hippŏcŏon (Ἱπποκόων), son of Oebalus and Batea. After his father's death, he expelled his brother Tyndareus, in order to secure the kingdom to himself; but Hercules led Tyndareus back, and slew Hippocoon and his sons. Ovid (Met. viii. 314) mentions the sons of Hippocoon among the Calydonian hunters.

Hippocrătes (Ἱπποκράτης). 1. Father of Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens. — 2. An Athenian, son of Megacles, was brother of Clisthenes, the legislator, and grandfather, through his daughter Agariste, of the illustrious Pericles. — 3. An Athenian, son of Xanthippus and brother of Pericles. He had 3 sons who, as well as their father, are alluded to by Aristophanes, as men of a mean capacity, and devoid of education. — 4. An Athenian, son of Ariphron, commanded the Athenians, B.C. 424, when he was defeated and slain by the Boeotians at the battle of Delium. — 5. A Lacedaemonian, served under Mindarus on the Asiatic coast in 410, and after the defeat of Mindarus at Cyzicus, became commander of the fleet. — 6. A Sicilian, succeeded his brother Cleander, as tyrant of Gela, 498. His reign was prosperous; and he extended his power over several other cities of Sicily. He died in 491, while besieging Hybla. — 7. A Sicilian, brother of Epicydes. — 8. The most celebrated physician of antiquity. He was born in the island of Cos about B.C. 460. He belonged to the family of the Asclepiadae, and was the son of Heraclides, who was also a physician. His mother's name was Phaenarete, who was said to be descended from Hercules. He was instructed in medical science by his father and by Herodicus, and he is said to have been also a pupil of Gorgias of Leontini. He wrote, taught, and practised his profession at home; travelled in different parts of the continent of Greece; and died at Larissa in Thessaly, about 357, at the age of 104. He had 2 sons, Thessalus and Dracon, and a son-in-law, Polybus, all of whom followed the same profession, and who are supposed to have been the authors of some of the works in the Hippocratic collection. These are the only certain facts which we know respecting the life of Hippocrates; but to these later writers have added a large collection of stories, many of which are clearly fabulous. Thus he is said to have stopped the plague at Athens by burning fires throughout the city, by suspending chaplets of flowers, and by the use of an antidote. It is also related that Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, invited Hippocrates to come to his assistance during a time of pestilence, but that Hippocrates refused his request, on the ground of his being the enemy of his country. — The writings which have come down to us under the name of Hippocrates were composed by several different persons, and are of very different merit. They are more than 60 in number, but of these only a few are certainly genuine. They are: — 1. Προγνωστικόν, Praenotiones or Prognosticon. 2. Ἀφορισμοί, Aphorismi. 3. Ἐπιδημίων Βιβλία, De Morbis Popularibus (or Epidemiorum). 4. Περὶ Διαίτης Ὀξέων, De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis, or De Diaeta Acutorum. 5. Περὶ Ἀέρων, Ὑδάτων, Τόπων, De Aëre, Aquis, et Locis. 6. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Κεφαλῇ Τρωμάτων, De Capitis Vulneribus. Some of the other works were perhaps written by Hippocrates; but the great majority of them were composed by his disciples and followers, many of whom bore the name of Hippocrates. The ancient physicians wrote numerous commentaries on the works in the Hippocratic collection. Of these the most valuable are the commentaries of Galen. — Hippocrates divided the causes of disease into 2 principal classes; the one comprehending the influence of seasons, climates, water, situation, &c., and the other the influence of food, exercise, &c. He considered that while heat and cold, moisture and dryness, succeeded one another throughout the year, the human body underwent certain analogous changes, which influenced the diseases of the period. He supposed that the 4 fluids or humours of the body (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile) were the primary seat of disease; that health was the result of the due combination (or crasis) of these, and that, when this crasis was disturbed, disease was the consequence; that, in the course of a disorder that was proceeding favourably, these humours underwent a certain change in quality (or coction), which was the sign of returning health, as preparing the way for the expulsion of the morbid matter, or crisis; and that these crises had a tendency to occur at certain stated periods, which were hence called "critical days." — Hippocrates was evidently a person who not only had had great experience, but who also knew how to turn it to the best account; and the number of moral reflections and apophthegms that we meet with in his writings, some of which (as, for example, "Life is short, and Art is long") have acquired a sort of proverbial notoriety, show him to have been a profound thinker. His works are written in the Ionic dialect, and the style is so concise as to be sometimes extremely obscure. — The best edition of his works is by Littré, Paris, 1839, seq., with a French translation.

Hippocrēnē (Ἱπποκρήνη), the "Fountain of the Horse," called by Persius Fons Caballinus, was a fountain in Mt. Helicon in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses, said to have been produced by the horse Pegasus striking the ground with his feet.

Hippŏdămīa (Ἱπποδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Oenomaus, king of Pisa in Elis. For details see OENOMAUS and PELOPS. — 2. Wife of Pirithous, at whose nuptials took place the celebrated battle between the Centaurs and Lapithae. For details see PIRITHOUS. — 3. See BRISEIS.

Hippŏdămus (Ἱππόδαμος), a distinguished Greek architect, a native of Miletus, and the son of Euryphon or Eurycoön. His fame rests on his construction, not of single buildings, but of whole cities. His first great work was the town of Piraeus, which he built under the auspices of Pericles. When the Athenians founded their colony of Thurii (B. C. 443), Hippodamus went out with the colonists, and was the architect of the new city. Hence he is often called a Thurian. He afterwards built Rhodes (408—407).

Hippŏlŏchus (Ἱππόλοχος), son of Bellerophontes and Philonoë or Anticlea, and father of Glaucus, the Lycian prince.

Hippolȳtē (Ἱππολύτη). 1. Daughter of Ares and Otrera, was queen of the Amazons, and sister of Antiope and Melanippe. She wore a girdle given to her by her father; and when Hercules came to fetch this girdle, she was slain by Hercules. [See p. 309, b.] According to another tradition, Hippolyte, with an army of Amazons, marched into Attica, to take vengeance on Theseus for having carried off Antiope; but being conquered by Theseus, she fled to Megara, where she died of grief, and was buried. In some accounts Hippolyte, and not Antiope, is said to have been married to Theseus. — 2. Or Astydamia, wife of Acastus, fell in love with Peleus. See ACASTUS.

Hippŏlȳtus (Ἱππόλυτος). 1. Son of Theseus by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, or her sister Antiope. Theseus afterwards married Phaedra, who fell in love with Hippolytus; but as her offers were rejected by her step-son, she accused him to his father of having attempted her dishonour. Theseus thereupon cursed his son, and requested his father (Aegeus or Poseidon) to destroy him. Accordingly, as Hippolytus was riding in his chariot along the sea-coast, Poseidon sent forth a bull from the water. The horses were frightened, upset the chariot, and dragged Hippolytus along the ground till he was dead. Theseus afterwards learned the innocence of his son, and Phaedra, in despair, made away with herself. Artemis induced Aesculapius to restore Hippolytus to life again; and, according to Italian traditions, Artemis (Diana) placed him, under the name of Virbius, under the protection of the nymph Egeria, in the grove of Aricia, in Latium, where he was honoured with divine worship. Horace, following the more ancient tradition, says that Diana could not restore Hippolytus to life (Carm. iv. 7. 25). — 2. An early ecclesiastical writer of considerable eminence, but whose real history is very uncertain. He appears to have lived early in the 3rd century; and is said to have suffered martyrdom under Alexander Severus, being drowned in a ditch or pit full of water. Others suppose that he perished in the Decian persecution. He is said to have been a disciple of Irenaeus and a teacher of Origen. — His works, which are written in Greek, are edited by Fabricius, Hamb. 1716—1718, 2 vols. fol.

Hippŏmĕdon (Ἱππομέδων), son of Aristomachus, or, according to Sophocles, of Talaus, was one of the Seven against Thebes, where he was slain during the siege by Hyperbius or Ismarus.

Hippŏmĕnes (Ἱππομένης). 1. Son of Megareus, and great-grandson of Poseidon, conquered Atalanta in the foot-race. For details see ATALANTA, No. 2. — 2. A descendant of Codrus, the 4th and last of the decennial archons. Incensed at the barbarous punishment which he inflicted on his daughter, the Attic nobles deposed him.

Hippon (Ἵππων), of Rhegium, a philosopher of uncertain date, belonging to the Ionian school. He was accused of Atheism, and so got the surname of the Melian, as agreeing in sentiment with Diagoras. He held water and fire to be the principles of all things, the latter springing from the former, and developing itself by generating the universe.

Hippōnax (Ἱππῶναξ). Of Ephesus, son of Pytheus and Protis, was, after Archilochus and Simonides, the 3rd of the Iambic poets of Greece. He flourished B. C. 546—520. He was distinguished for his love of liberty, and having been expelled from his native city by the tyrants, he took up his abode at Clazomenae, for which reason he is sometimes called a Clazomenian. In person, Hipponax was little, thin, and ugly, but very strong. The 2 brothers Bupalus and Athenis, who were sculptors of Chios, made statues of Hipponax, in which they caricatured his natural ugliness; and he in return directed all the power of his satirical poetry against them, and especially against Bupalus. (Hor. Epod. vi. 14.) Later writers add that the sculptors hanged themselves in despair. Hipponax was celebrated in antiquity for the severity of his satires. He severely chastised the effeminate luxury of his Ionian brethren; he did not spare his own parents; and he ventured even to ridicule the gods. — In his satires he introduced a spondee or a trochee in the last foot, instead of an iambus. This change made the verse irregular in its rhythm, and gave it a sort of halting movement, whence it was called the Choliambus (χωλιαμβός, lame iambic), or Iambus Scazon (σκάζων, limping). He also wrote a parody on the Iliad. He may be said to occupy a middle place between Archilochus and Aristophanes. He is as bitter, but not so earnest, as the former, while in lightness and jocoseness he more resembles the latter. The fragments of Hipponax are edited by Welcker, Gotting. 1817, 8vo, and by Bergk, in the Poetae Lyrici Graeci.

Hipponīum. [VIBO.]

Hippŏnŏus. [BELLEROPHON.]

Hippŏtădes (Ἱπποτάδης), son of Hippotes, that is, Aeolus. [AEOLUS, No. 2.] Hence the Aeoliae Insulae are called Hippotadae regnum. (Ov. Met. xiv. 86.)

Hippŏtes (Ἱππότης). 1. Father of Aeolus. [AEOLUS, No. 2.] — 2. Son of Phylas by a daughter of Iolaus, great-grandson of Hercules, and father of Aletes. When the Heraclidae invaded Peloponnesus, Hippotes killed the seer Carnus. The army in consequence began to suffer very severely, and Hippotes by the command of an oracle was banished for 10 years.

Hippŏthŏon (Ἱπποθόων), an Attic hero, son of Poseidon and ALOPE, the daughter of Cercyon. He had a heroum at Athens ; and one of the Attic phylae, or tribes, was called after him Hippothoontis.

Hippŏthŏus (Ἱππόθοος). 1. Son of Cercyon, and father of Aepytus, succeeded Agapenor as king in Arcadia. — 2. Son of Lethus, grandson of Teutamus, and brother of Pylaeus, led a band of Pelasgians from Larissa to the assistance of the Trojans. He was slain by the Telamonian Ajax.

Hirpīni, a Samnite people, whose name is said to come from the Sabine word hirpus, " a wolf," dwelt in the S. of Samnium between Apulia, Lucania and Campania. Their chief town was AECULANUM.

A. Hirtĭus, belonged to a plebeian family, which came probably from Ferentinum in the territory of the Hernici. He was the personal and political friend of Caesar the dictator. In B. C. 58 he was Caesar's legatus in Gaul, and during the Civil War his name constantly appears in Cicero's correspondence. He was one of the 10 praetors nominated by Caesar for 46, and during Caesar's absence in Africa he lived principally at his Tusculan estate, which was contiguous to Cicero's villa. Though politically opposed, they were on friendly terms, and Cicero gave Hirtius lessons in oratory. In 44 Hirtius received Belgic Gaul for his province, but he governed it by deputy, and attended Caesar at Rome, who nominated him and Vibius Pansa, consuls for 43. After Caesar's assassination (44) Hirtius first joined Antony, but being disgusted by the despotic arrogance of the latter, he retired to Puteoli, where he renewed his intercourse with Cicero. Later in the year he resided at his Tusculan villa, where he was attacked by a dangerous illness, from which he never perfectly recovered. On the 1st of January, 43, Hirtius and Pansa entered on their consulship, according to Caesar's arrangement. The 2 consuls were sent along with Octavian, against Antony, who was besieging Dec. Brutus at Mutina. Pansa was defeated by Antony, and died of a wound which he had received in the battle. Hirtius retrieved this disaster by defeating Antony, but he also fell on the 27th of April, in leading an assault on the besieger's camp. Octavian sent the bodies of the slain consuls to Rome, where they were reeeived with extraordinary honours, and publicly buried in the Field of Mars. To Octavian their removal from the scene was so timely, that he was accused by many of murdering them. Hirtius divides with Oppius the claim to the authorship of the 8th book of the Gallic war, as well as that of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish. It is not impossible that he wrote the 3 first, but he certainly did not write the Spanish war.

Hirtuleius, a distinguished general of Sertorius in Spain. In B. C. 78 he was routed and slain near Italica in Baetica by Metellus.

Hispălis, more rarely Hispal (Seville), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, founded by the Phoenicians, was situated on the left bank of the Baetis, and was in reality a seaport, for, although 500 stadia from the sea, the river is navigable for the largest vessels up to the town. Under the Romans Hispalis was the 3rd town in the province, Corduba and Gades being the 2 first. It was patronised by Caesar, because Corduba had espoused the side of Pompey. He made it a Roman colony, under the name of Julia Romula or Romulensis, and a conventus juridicus or town of assize. Under the Goths and Vandals Hispalis was the chief town in the S. of Spain, and under the Arabs was the capital of a separate kingdom.

Hispānĭa or Ibērĭa (Ἱσπανία, Ἰβηρία: Hispānus, Ibērus: Spain), a peninsula in the S.W. of Europe, is connected with the land only on the N.E., where the Pyrenees form its boundary, and is surrounded on all other sides by the sea, on the E. and S. by the Mediterranean, on the W. by the Atlantic, and on the N. by the Cantabrian sea. The Greeks and Romans had no accurate knowledge of the country till the time of the Roman invasion in the 2nd Punic war. It was first mentioned by Hecataeus (about B. C. 500) under the name of Iberia ; but this name originally indicated only the E. coast : the W. coast beyond the pillars of Hercules was called Tartessis (Ταρτησσίς) ; and the interior of the country Celtica (ἡ Κελτική). At a later time the Greeks applied the name of Iberia, which is usually derived from the river Iberus, to the whole country. The name Hispania, by which the Romans call the country, first occurs at the time of the Roman invasion. It is usually derived from the Punic word Span, " a rabbit," on account of the great number of rabbits which the Carthaginians found in the Peninsula ; but others suppose the name to be of native origin, and to be the same as the Basque Ezpaña, an edge or border. The poets also called it Hesperia, or, to distinguish it from Italy, Hesperia Ultima. Spain is a very mountainous country. The principal mountains are, in the N.E. the Pyrenees [PYRENAEUS M.], and in the centre of the country the IDUBEDA, which runs parallel with the Pyrenees from the land of the Cantabri to the Mediterranean, and the OROSPEDA or ORTOSPEDA, which begins in the centre of the Idubeda, runs S.W. throughout Spain, and terminates at Calpe. The rivers of Spain are numerous. The 6 most important are the IBERUS (Ebro), BAETIS (Guadalquiver), and ANAS (Guadiana), in the E. and S. ; and the TAGUS, DURIUS (Douro), and MINIUS (Minho), in the W. Spain was considered by the ancients very fertile, but more especially the S. part of the country, Baetica and Lusitania, which were also praised for their splendid climate. The central and N. parts of the country were less productive, and the climate in these districts was very cold in winter. In the S. there were numerous flocks of excellent sheep, the wool of which was very celebrated in foreign countries. The Spanish horses and asses were also much valued in antiquity; and on the coast there was abundance of fish. The country produced a great quantity of corn, oil, wine, flax, figs, and other fruits. But the principal riches of the country consisted in its mineral productions, of which the greatest quantity was found in Turdetania. Gold was found in abundance in various parts of the country; and there were many silver mines, of which the most celebrated were near Carthago Nova, Ilipa, Sisapon, and Castulo. The precious stones, copper, lead, tin, and other metals, were also found in more or less abundance. — The most ancient inhabitants of Spain were the Iberi, who, as a separate people, must be distinguished from the Iberi, a collective name of all the inhabitants of Spain. The Iberi dwelt on both sides of the Pyrenees, and were found in the S. of Gaul, as far as the Rhone. Celts afterwards crossed the Pyrenees, and became mingled with the Iberi, whence arose the mixed race of the Celtiberi, who dwelt chiefly in the high table land in the centre of the country. [Celtiberi.] But besides this mixed race of the Celtiberi, there were also several tribes, both of Iberians and Celts, who were never united with one another. The unmixed Iberians, from whom the modern Basques are descended, dwelt chiefly in the Pyrenees and on the coasts, and their most distinguished tribes were the Astures, Cantabri, Vaccaei, &c. The unmixed Celts dwelt chiefly on the river Anas, and in the N.W. corner of the country or Gallaecia. Besides these inhabitants, there were Phoenician and Carthaginian settlements on the coasts, of which the most important were Gades and Carthago Novo; there were likewise Greek colonies, such as Emporiae and Saguntum; and lastly the conquest of the country by the Romans introduced many Romans among the inhabitants, whose customs, civilisation, and language, gradually spread over the whole peninsula, and effaced the national characteristics of the ancient population. The spread of the Latin language in Spain seems to have been facilitated by the schools, established by Sertorius, in which both the language and literature of Greece and Rome were taught. Under the empire some of the most distinguished Latin writers were natives of Spain, such as the 2 Senecas, Lucan, Martial, Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Pomponius Mela, Prudentius, and others. The ancient inhabitants of Spain were a proud, brave, and warlike race; easily excited and ready to take offence; inveterate robbers; moderate in the use of food and wine; fond of song and of the dance; lovers of their liberty, and ready at all times to sacrifice their lives rather than submit to a foreign master. The Cantabri and the inhabitants of the mountains in the N. were the fiercest and most uncivilised of all the tribes; the Vaccaei and the Turdetani were the most civilised; and the latter people were not only acquainted with the alphabet, but possessed a literature which contained records of their history, poems, and collections of laws composed in verse. — The history of Spain begins with the invasion of the country by the Carthaginians, B.C. 238; for up to that time hardly any thing was known of Spain except the existence of 2 powerful commercial states in the W., Tartessus and Gades. After the 1st Punic war Hamilcar, the son of Hannibal, formed the plan of conquering Spain, in order to obtain for the Carthaginians possessions which might indemnify them for the loss of Sicily and Sardinia. Under his command (238—229), and that of his son-in-law and successor, Hasdrubal (228—221), the Carthaginians conquered the greater part of the S.E. of the peninsula as far as the Iberus; and Hasdrubal founded the important city of Carthago Nova. These successes of the Carthaginians excited the jealousy of the Romans; and a treaty was made between the 2 nations about 228, by which the Carthaginians bound themselves not to cross the Iberus. The town of Saguntum, although on the W. side of the river, was under the protection of the Romans; and the capture of this town by Hannibal in 219, was the immediate cause of the 2nd Punic war. In the course of this war the Romans drove the Carthaginians out of the peninsula, and became masters of their possessions in the S. of the country. But many tribes in the centre of the country, which had been only nominally subject to Carthage, still retained their virtual independence; and the tribes in the N. and N.W. of the country had been hitherto quite unknown both to the Carthaginians and Romans. There now arose a long and bloody struggle between the Romans and the various tribes in Spain, and it was nearly 2 centuries before the Romans succeeded in subduing entirely the whole of the peninsula. The Celtiberians were conquered by the elder Cato (195), and Tib. Gracchus, the father of the 2 tribunes (179). The Lusitanians, who long resisted the Romans under their brave leader Viriathus, were obliged to submit, about the year 137, to D. Brutus, who penetrated as far as Gallaecia; but it was not till Numantia was taken by Scipio Africanus the younger, in 133, that the Romans obtained the undisputed sovereignty over the various tribes in the centre of the country, and of the Lusitanians to the S. of the Tagus. Julius Caesar, after his praetorship, subdued the Lusitanians N. of the Tagus (60). The Cantabri, Astures, and other tribes in the mountains of the N., were finally subjugated by Augustus and his generals. The whole peninsula was now subject to the Romans; and Augustus founded in it several colonies, and caused excellent roads to be made throughout the country. The Romans had, as early as the end of the 2nd Punic war, divided Spain into 2 provinces, separated from one another by the Iberus, and called Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior, the former being to the E., and the latter to the W. of the river. In consequence of there being 2 provinces, we frequently find the country called Hispaniae. The provinces were governed by 2 proconsuls or 2 propraetors, the latter of whom also frequently bore the title of proconsuls. Augustus made a new division of the country, and formed 3 provinces Tarraconensis, Baetica, and Lusitania. The province Tarraconensis, which derived its name from Tarraco, the capital of the province, was by far the largest of the 3, and comprehended the whole of the N., W., and centre of the peninsula. The province Baetica, which derived its name from the river Baetis, was separated from Lusitania on the N. and W. by the river Anas, and from Tarraco-nensis on the E. by a line drawn from the river Anas to the promontory Charidemus in the Mediterranean. The province Lusitania, which corresponded very nearly in extent to the modern Portugal, was separated from Tarraconensis on the N. by the river Durius, from Baetica on the E. by the Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the E. by a line drawn from the Durius to the Anas, between the territories of the Vettones and Carpetani. Augustus made Baetica a senatorial province, but reserved the government of the 2 others for the Caesar; so that the former was governed by a proconsul appointed by the senate, and the latter by imperial legati. In Baetica, Corbuda or Hispalis was the seat of government; in Tarraconensis Tarraco; and in Lusitania Augusta Emerita. On the reorganisation of the empire by Constantine, Spain, together with Gaul and Britain, was under the general administration of the Praefectus Praetorio Galliae, one of whose 3 vicarii had the government of Spain, and usually resided at Hispalis. At the same time the country was divided into 7 provinces: Baetica, Lusitania, Gallaecia, Tarraconensis, Carthaginiensis, Baleares, and Mauritania Tinigitana in Africa (which was then reckoned part of Spain). The capitals of these 7 provinces were respectively Hispalis, Augusta Emerita, Bracara, Caesaraugusta, Carthago Nova, Palma, and Tingis. In A. D. 409 the Vandals and Suevi, together with other barbarians, invaded Spain, and obtained possession of the greater part of the country. In 414 the Visigoths, as allies of the Roman empire, attacked the Vandals, and in the course of 4 years (414—418) compelled a great part of the peninsula to submit again to the Romans. In 429 the Vandals left Spain, and crossed over into Africa under their king Genseric; after which time the Suevi established a powerful kingdom in the S. of the peninsula. Soon afterwards the Visigoths again invaded Spain, and after many years' struggle, succeeded in conquering the whole peninsula, which they kept for themselves, and continued the masters of the country for 2 centuries, till they were in their turn conquered by the Arabs, A. D. 712.

Hispellum (Hispellas, -ātis: Hispellensis: Spello), a town in Umbria, and a Roman colony, with the name of Colonia Julia Hispellum.

Histiaea. [HESTIAEOTIS.]

Histiaeus (Ἱστιαῖος), tyrant of Miletus, was left with the other Ionians to guard the bridge of boats over the Danube, when Darius invaded Scythia (B. C. 513). He opposed the proposal of Miltiades, the Athenian, to destroy the bridge, and leave the Persians to their fate, and was in consequence rewarded by Darius with the rule of Mytilene, and with a district in Thrace, where he built a town called Myrcinus, apparently with a view of establishing an independent kingdom. This excited the suspicions of Darius, who invited Histiaeus to Susa, where he treated him kindly, but prohibited him from returning. Tired of the restraint in which he was kept, he induced his kinsman Aristagoras to persuade the Ionians to revolt, hoping that a revolution in Ionia might lead to his release. His design succeeded. Darius allowed Histiaeus to depart (496) on his engaging to reduce Ionia. The revolt however was nearly put down when Histiaeus reached the coast. Here Histiaeus threw off the mask, and after raising a small fleet carried on war against the Persians for 2 years, and obtained possession of Chios. In 494 he made a descent upon the Ionian coast, but was defeated and taken prisoner by Harpagus. Artaphernes, the satrap of Ionia, caused him to be put to death by impalement, and sent his head to the king.

Histōnĭum (Histoniensis: Vasto d'Ammone), a town of the Frentani on the coast, and subsequently a Roman colony.

Homerītae (Ὁμηρῖται), a people of Arabia Felix, who migrated from the interior to the S. part of the W. coast, and established themselves in the territory of the Sabaei (in El. Yemen), where they founded a kingdom, which lasted more than 5 centuries.

Hŏmērus (Ὅμηρος). 1. The great epic poet of Greece. His poems formed the basis of Greek literature. Every Greek who had received a liberal education was perfectly well acquainted with them from his childhood, and had learnt them by heart at school; but nobody could state any thing certain about their author. His date and birthplace were equally matters of dispute. Seven cities claimed Homer as their countryman (Smyrna, Rhodus, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athenae); but the claims of Smyrna and Chios are the most plausible, and between these 2 we have to decide. It is supposed by the best modern writers that Homer was an Ionian, who settled at Smyrna, at the time when the Achaeans and Aeolians formed the chief part of the population. We can thus explain how Homer became so well acquainted with the traditions of the Trojan war, which had been waged by Achaeans and Aeolians, but in which the Ionians had not taken part. We know that the Ionians were subsequently driven out of Smyrna; and it is further supposed either that Homer himself fled to Chios, or his descendants or disciples settled there, and formed the famous family of Homerids. According to this account the time of Homer would be a few generations after the Ionian migration. But with the exception of the simple fact of his being an Asiatic Greek, all other particulars respecting his life are purely fabulous. The common tradition related that he was the son of Maeon (hence called Maeonides vates), and that in his old age he was blind and poor. Homer was universally regarded by the ancients as the author of the 2 great poems of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Other poems were also attributed to Homer, the genuineness of which was disputed by some; but the Iliad and Odyssey were ascribed to him by the concurrent voice of antiquity. Such continued to be the prevalent belief in modern times, till 1795, when F. A. Wolf wrote his famous Prolegomena, in which he endeavoured to show that the Iliad and Odyssey were not two complete poems, but small, separate, independent epic songs, celebrating single exploits of the heroes, and that these lays were for the first time written down and united, as the Iliad and Odyssey, by Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens. This opinion gave rise to a long and animated controversy respecting the origin of the Homeric poems, which is not yet settled, and which probably never will be. The following, however, may be regarded as the most probable conclusion. An abundance of heroic lays preserved the tales of the Trojan war. Europe must necessarily have been the country where these songs originated, both because the victorious heroes dwelt in Europe, and because so many traces in the poems still point to these regions

These heroic lays were brought to Asia Minor by the Greek colonies, which left the mother-country about 3 ages after the Trojan war. These unconnected songs were, for the first time, united by a great genius, called Homer, and he was the one individual who conceived in his mind the lofty idea of that poetical unity which we must acknowledge and admire in the Iliad and Odyssey. But as writing was not known, or at least little practised, in the age in which Homer lived, it naturally followed that in such long works many interpolations were introduced, and that they gradually became more and more dismembered, and thus returned into their original state of separate independent songs. They were preserved by the rhapsodists, who were minstrels, and who sung lays at the banquets of the great and at public festivals. A class of rhapsodists at Chios, the Homerids, who called themselves the descendants of the poet, made it their especial business to sing the lays of the Iliad and Odyssey, and to transmit them to their disciples by oral teaching, and not by writing. These rhapsodists preserved the knowledge of the unity of the Homeric poems; and this knowledge was never entirely lost, although the public recitation of the poems became more and more fragmentary, and the time at festivals and musical contests formerly occupied by epic rhapsodists exclusively, was encroached upon by the rising lyrical performances. Solon directed the attention of his countrymen towards the unity of the Homeric poems; but the unanimous voice of antiquity ascribed to Pisistratus the merit of having collected the disjointed poems of Homer, and of having first committed them to writing. From the time of Pisistratus, the Greeks had a written Homer, a regular text, which was the source and foundation of all subsequent editions. — We have already stated that the ancients attributed many other poems to Homer besides the Iliad and the Odyssey; but the claims of none of these to this honour can stand investigation. The hymns, which still bear the name of Homer, probably owe their origin to the rhapsodists. They exhibit such a diversity of language and poetical tone, that in all probability they contain fragments from every century from the time of Homer to the Persian war. The Batrachomyomachia, the Battle of the Frogs and Mice, an extant poem, and the Margites, a poem which is lost, and which ridiculed a man who was said to know many things and who knew all badly, were both frequently ascribed by the ancients to Homer, but were clearly of later origin. — The Odyssey was evidently composed after the Iliad; and many writers maintain that they are the works of 2 different authors. But it has been observed in reply that there is not a greater difference in the 2 poems than we often find in the productions of the same man in the prime of life and in old age; and the chief cause of difference in the 2 poems is owing to the difference of the subject. — We must add a few words on the literary history of the Iliad and Odyssey. From the time of Pisistratus to the establishment of the Alexandrine school, we read of 2 new editions (διορθώσεις) of the text, one made by the poet Antimachus, and the other by Aristotle, which Alexander the Great used to carry about with him in a splendid case (νάρθηξ) on all his expeditions. But it was not till the foundation of the Alexandrine school, that the Greeks possessed a really critical edition of Homer. Zenodotus was the first who directed his attention to the study and criticism of Homer. He was followed by Aristophanes and Aristarchus; and the edition of Homer by the latter has been the basis of the text to the present day. Aristarchus was the prince of grammarians, and did more for the text and interpretation of Homer than any other critic in modern times. He was opposed to Crates of Mallus, the founder of the Pergamene school of grammar. [ARISTARCHUS; CRATES.] In the time of Augustus the great compiler, Didymus, wrote comprehensive commentaries on Homer, copying mostly the works of preceding Alexandrine grammarians, which had swollen to an enormous extent. Under Tiberius, Apollonius Sophista lived, whose lexicon Homericum is very valuable (ed. Bekker, 1833). The most valuable scholia on the Iliad are those which were published by Villoison from a MS. of the 10th century in the library of St. Mark at Venice, 1788, fol. These scholia were reprinted with additions, edited by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1825, 2 vols. 4to. The most valuable scholia to the Odyssey are those published by Buttmann, Berl. 1821. The extensive commentary of Eustathius contains much valuable information from sources which are now lost. [EUSTATHIUS, No. 3.] The best critical editions of Homer are by Wolf, Lips. 1804, seq.; by Bothe, Lips. 1832, seq.; and by Bekker, Berlin, 1843. There is a very good edition of the Iliad by Spitzner, Gotha, 1832, seq.; and a valuable commentary on the Odyssey by Nitzsch, Hannov. 1825, seq.—2. A grammarian and tragic poet of Byzantium, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus (about B. C. 280), was the son of the grammarian Andromachus and the poetess Myro. He was one of the 7 poets who formed the tragic Pleiad.

Hŏmŏlē (Ὁμόλη). 1. A lofty mountain in Thessaly, near Tempe, with a sanctuary of Pan.—2. Or Hŏmŏlĭum (Ὁμόλιον: Ὁμολιεύς: Lamina), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly, at the foot of Mt. Ossa, near the Peneus.

Hŏnor or Hŏnos, the personification of honour at Rome. Marcellus had vowed a temple, which was to belong to Honor and Virtus in common; but as the pontiffs refused to consecrate one temple to 2 divinities, he built 2 temples, one of Honor and the other of Virtus, close together. C. Marius also built a temple to Honor, after his victory over the Cimbri and Teutones. There was also an altar of Honor outside the Colline gate, which was more ancient than either of the temples. Honor is represented on coins as a male figure in armour, and standing on a globe, or with the cornucopia in his left and a spear in his right hand.

Hŏnōrĭa. [GRATA.]

Hŏnōrĭus, Flāvĭus, Roman emperor of the West, A. D. 395—423, was the 2nd son of Theodosius the Great, and was born 384. On the death of Theodosius, in 395, Honorius succeeded peaceably to the sovereignty of the West, which he had received from his father in the preceding year; while his elder brother Arcadius obtained possession of the East. During the minority of Honorius, the government was entirely in the hands of the able and energetic Stilicho, whose daughter Maria the young emperor married. Stilicho for a time defended Italy against the attacks of the Visigoths under Alaric (402, 403), and the ravages of other barbarians under Radagaisus; but after Honorius had put to death Stilicho, on a charge of treason (408), Alaric again invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410). Honorius meantime lived an inglorious life at Ravenna, where he continued to reside till his death, in 423.

Hōrae (Ὧραι), originally the goddesses of the order of nature and of the seasons, but in later times the goddesses of order in general and of justice. In Homer, who neither mentions their parents nor their number, they are the Olympian divinities of the weather and the ministers of Zeus. In this capacity they guard the doors of Olympus, and promote the fertility of the earth, by the various kinds of weather which they give to mortals. As the weather, generally speaking, is regulated according to the seasons, they are further described as the goddesses of the seasons. The course of the seasons is symbolically described as the dance of the Horae. At Athens 2 Horae, Thallo (the Hora of spring) and Carpo (the Hora of autumn), were worshipped from very early times. The Hora of spring accompanied Persephone every year on her ascent from the lower world; and the expression of "The chamber of the Horae opens" is equivalent to "The spring is coming." The attributes of spring — flowers, fragrance, and graceful freshness — are accordingly transferred to the Horae. Thus they adorned Aphrodite as she rose from the sea, and made a garland of flowers for Pandora. Hence they bear a resemblance to and are mentioned along with the Charites, and both are frequently confounded or identified. As they were conceived to promote the prosperity of every thing that grows, they appear also as the protectresses of youth and newly-born gods. Even in early times ethical notions were attached to the Horae; and the influence which these goddesses originally exercised on nature was subsequently transferred to human life in particular. Hesiod describes them as giving to a state good laws, justice, and peace; he calls them the daughters of Zeus and Themis, and gives them the significant names of Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. The number of the Horae is different in the different writers, though the most ancient number seems to have been 2, as at Athens; but afterwards their common number was 3, like that of the Moerae and Charites. In works of art the Horae were represented as blooming maidens, carrying the different products of the seasons.

Horapollo (Ὡραπόλλων), the name prefixed to an extant work on hieroglyphics, which purports to be a Greek translation, made by one Philippus from the Egyptian. The writer was a native of Egypt, and probably lived about the beginning of the 5th century. The best edition is by Leemans, Amsterdam, 1835.

Hōrātĭa Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome. 3 brothers of this race fought with the Curiatii, 3 brothers from Alba, to determine whether Rome or Alba was to exercise the supremacy. The battle was long undecided. 2 of the Horatii fell; but the 3 Curiatii, though alive, were severely wounded. Seeing this, the surviving Horatius, who was still unhurt, pretended to fly, and vanquished his wounded opponents, by encountering them severally. He returned in triumph, bearing his threefold spoils. As he approached the Capene gate his sister Horatia met him, and recognised on his shoulders the mantle of one of the Curiatii, her betrothed lover. Her importunate grief drew on her the wrath of Horatius, who stabbed her, exclaiming "so perish every Roman woman who bewails a foe." For this murder he was adjudged by the duumviri to be scourged with covered head, and hanged on the accursed tree. Horatius appealed to his peers, the burghers or populus; and his father pronounced him guiltless, or he would have punished him by the paternal power. The populus acquitted Horatius, but prescribed a form of punishment. With veiled head, led by his father, Horatius passed under a yoke or gibbet — tigillum sororium, "sister's gibbet."

Horātĭus Cocles. [Cocles.]

Q. Horātĭus Flaccus, the poet, was born December 8th, B.C. 65, at Venusia in Apulia. His father was a libertinus or freedman. He had received his manumission before the birth of the poet, who was of ingenuous birth, but who did not altogether escape the taunt, which adhered to persons even of remote servile origin. His father's occupation was that of collector (coactor), either of the indirect taxes farmed by the publicans, or at sales by auction. With the profits of his office he had purchased a small farm in the neighbourhood of Venusia, where the poet was born. The father, either in his parental fondness for his only son, or discerning some hopeful promise in the boy, determined to devote his whole time and fortune to the education of the future poet. Though by no means rich, he declined to send the young Horace to the common school, kept in Venusia by one Flavius, to which the children of the rural aristocracy resorted. Probably about his 12th year, his father carried him to Rome, to receive the usual education of a knight's or senator's son. He frequented the best schools in the capital. One of these was kept by Orbilius, a retired military man, whose flogging propensities have been immortalised by his pupil. (Epist. ii. 1. 71.) The names of his other teachers are not recorded by the poet. He was instructed in the Greek and Latin languages: the poets were the usual school books, Homer in the Greek, and the old tragic writer, Livius Andronicus, in the Latin. In his 18th year Horace proceeded to Athens, in order to continue his studies at that seat of learning. He seems chiefly to have attached himself to the opinions which he heard in the Academus, though later in life he inclined to those of Epicurus. When Brutus came to Athens after the death of Caesar, Horace joined his army, and received at once the rank of a military tribune, and the command of a legion. He was present at the battle of Philippi, and shared in the flight of the republican army. In one of his poems he playfully alludes to his flight, and throwing away his shield. (Carm. ii. 7. 9.) He now resolved to devote himself to more peaceful pursuits, and having obtained his pardon, he ventured at once to return to Rome. He had lost all his hopes in life; his paternal estate had been swept away in the general forfeiture; but he was enabled, however, to obtain sufficient money to purchase a clerkship in the quaestor's office; and on the profits of that place he managed to live with the utmost frugality. Meantime some of his poems attracted the notice of Varius and Virgil, who introduced him to Maecenas (B.C. 39). Horace soon became the friend of Maecenas, and this friendship quickly ripened into intimacy. In a year or two after the commencement of their friendship (37), Horace accompanied his patron on that journey to Brundusium, so agreeably described in the 5th Satire of the 1st book. About the year 34 Maecenas bestowed upon the poet a Sabine farm, sufficient to maintain him in ease, comfort, and even in content (satis beatus unicis Sabinis), during the rest of his life. The situation of this Sabine farm was in the valley of Ustica, within view of the mountain Lucretilis, and near the Digentia, about 15 miles from Tibur (Tivoli). A site exactly answering to the villa of Horace, and on which were found ruins of buildings, has been discovered in modern times. Besides this estate, his admiration of the beautiful scenery in the neighbourhood of Tibur inclined him either to hire or to purchase a small cottage in that romantic town; and all the later years of his life were passed between these two country residences and Rome. He continued to live on the most intimate terms with Maecenas; and this intimate friendship naturally introduced Horace to the notice of the other great men of his period, and at length to Augustus himself, who bestowed upon the poet substantial marks of his favour. Horace died on November 17th, B.C. 8, aged nearly 57. His death was so sudden, that he had not time to make his will; but he left the administration of his affairs to Augustus, whom he instituted as his heir. He was buried on the slope of the Esquiline Hill, close to his friend and patron Maecenas, who had died before him in the same year. — Horace has described his own person. He was of short stature, with dark eyes and dark hair, but early tinged with grey. In his youth he was tolerably robust, but suffered from a complaint in his eyes. In more advanced life he grew fat, and Augustus jested about his protuberant belly. His health was not always good, and he seems to have inclined to be a valetudinarian. When young he was irascible in temper, but easily placable. In dress he was rather careless. His habits, even after he became richer, were generally frugal and abstemious; though on occasions, both in youth and maturer age, he seems to have indulged in conviviality. He liked choice wine, and in the society of friends scrupled not to enjoy the luxuries of his time. He was never married. — The philosophy of Horace was that of a man of the world. He playfully alludes to his Epicureanism, but it was practical rather than speculative Epicureanism. His mind, indeed, was not in the least speculative. Common life wisdom was his study, and to this he brought a quickness of observation and a sterling common sense, which have made his works the delight of practical men. — The Odes of Horace want the higher inspirations of lyric verse. His amatory verses are exquisitely graceful, but they have no strong ardour, no deep tenderness, nor even much of light and joyous gaiety. But as works of refined art, of the most skilful felicities of language and of measure, of translucent expression, and of agreeable images, embodied in words which imprint themselves indelibly on the memory, they are unrivalled. According to Quintilian, Horace was almost the only Roman lyric poet worth reading. — In the Satires of Horace there is none of the lofty moral indignation, the fierce vehemence of invective, which characterised the later satirists. It is the folly rather than the wickedness of vice, which he touches with such playful skill. Nothing can surpass the keenness of his observation, or his ease of expression: it is the finest comedy of manners, in a descriptive instead of a dramatic form. — In the Epodes there is bitterness provoked, it should seem, by some personal hatred, or sense of injury, and the ambition of imitating Archilochus; but in these he seems to have exhausted all the malignity and violence of his temper. — But the Epistles are the most perfect of the Horatian poetry, the poetry of manners and society, the beauty of which consists in a kind of ideality of common sense and practical wisdom. The Epistles of Horace are with the Poem of Lucretius, the Georgics of Virgil, and perhaps the Satires of Juvenal, the most perfect and most original form of Roman verse. The title of the Art of Poetry for the Epistle to the Pisos is as old as Quintilian, but it is now agreed that it was not intended for a complete theory of the poetic art. It is conjectured with great probability that it was intended to dissuade one of the younger Pisos from devoting himself to poetry, for which he had little genius, or at least to suggest the difficulties of attaining to perfection.—The chronology of the Horatian poems is of great importance, as illustrating the life, the times, and the writings of the poet. There has been great dispute upon this subject, but the following view appears the most probable. The 1st book of Satires, which was the first publication, appeared about B.C. 35, in the 30th year of Horace. — The 2nd book of Satires was published about 33, in the 32nd year of Horace.—The Epodes appeared about 31, in the 34th year of Horace. — The 3 first books of the Odes were published about 24 or 23 in the 41st or 42nd year of Horace. — The 1st book of the Epistles was published about 20 or 19 in the 45th or 46th year of Horace. — The Carmen Seculare appeared in 17 in the 48th year of Horace. — The 4th book of the Odes was published in 14 or 13 in his 51st or 52nd year. — The dates of the 2nd book of Epistles, and of the Ars Poetica, are admitted to be uncertain, though both appeared before the poet's death, B.C. 8. One of the best editions of Horace is by Orelli, Turici, 1843.

Hordeōnĭus Flaccus. [Flaccus.]

Hormisdas. [Sassanidae.]

Horta or Hortānum (Hortanus: Orte), a town in Etruria, at the junction of the Nar and the Tiber, so called from the Etruscan goddess Horta, whose temple at Rome always remained open.

Hortensĭus. 1. Q., the orator, was born in B.C. 114, eight years before Cicero. At the early age of 19 he spoke with great applause in the forum, and at once rose to eminence as an advocate. He served two campaigns in the Social war (90, 89). In the civil wars he joined Sulla, and was afterwards a constant supporter of the aristocratical party. His chief professional labours were in defending men of this party, when accused of maladministration and extortion in their provinces, or of bribery and the like in canvassing for public honours. He had no rival in the forum, till he encountered Cicero, and he long exercised an undisputed sway over the courts of justice. In 81 he was quaestor; in 75 aedile; in 72 praetor; and in 69 consul with Q. Caecilius Metellus. — It was in the year before his consulship that the prosecution of Verres commenced. Hortensius was the advocate of Verres, and attempted to put off the trial till the next year, when he would be able to exercise all the consular authority in favour of his client. But Cicero, who accused Verres, baffled all the schemes of Hortensius; and the issue of this contest was to dethrone Hortensius from the seat which had been already tottering, and to establish his rival, the despised provincial of Arpinum, as the first orator and advocate of the Roman forum. After his consulship, Hortensius took a leading part in supporting the optimates against the rising power of Pompey. He opposed the Gabinian law, which invested Pompey with absolute power on the Mediterranean, in order to put down the pirates of Cilicia (67); and the Manilian, by which the conduct of the war against Mithridates was transferred from Lucullus to Pompey (66). Cicero in his consulship (63) deserted the popular party, with whom he had hitherto acted, and became one of the supporters of the optimates. Thus Hortensius no longer appears as his rival. We first find them pleading together for C. Rabirius, for L. Muraena, and for P. Sulla. After the coalition of Pompey with Caesar and Crassus in 60, Hortensius drew back from public life, and confined himself to his advocate's duties. He died in 50. The eloquence of Hortensius was of the florid or (as it was termed) "Asiatic" style, fitter for hearing than for reading. His voice was soft and musical, his memory so ready and retentive, that he is said to have been able to come out of a sale-room and repeat the auction-list backwards. His action was very elaborate, so that sneerers called him Dionysia — the name of a well-known dancer of the day; and the pains he bestowed in arranging the folds of his toga have been recorded by ancient writers. But in all this there must have been a real grace and dignity, for we read that Aesopus and Roscius, the tragedians, used to follow him into the forum to take a lesson in their own art. He possessed immense wealth, and was keenly alive to all the enjoyments which wealth can give. He had several villas, the most splendid of which was the one near Laurentum. Here he laid up such a stock of wine, that he left 10,000 casks of Chian to his heir. Here he had a park full of all sorts of animals; and it was customary, during his sumptuous dinners, for a slave, dressed like Orpheus, to issue from the woods with these creatures following the sound of his cithara. At his villa at Bauli he had immense fish-ponds, into which the sea came: the fish were so tame that they would feed from his hand; and he was so fond of them, that he is said to have wept for the death of a favourite muraena. He was also very curious in trees: he is said to have fed them with wine, and we read that he once begged Cicero to change places in speaking, that he might perform this office for a favourite plane-tree at the proper time. It is a characteristic trait, that he came forward from his retirement (55) to oppose the sumptuary law of Pompey and Crassus, and spoke so eloquently and wittily as to procure its rejection. He was the first person at Rome who brought peacocks to table. — 2. Q., surnamed Hortalus, son of the preceding, by Lutatia, the daughter of Catulus. In youth he lived a low and profligate life, and appears to have been at last cast off by his father. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined Caesar, and fought on his side in Italy and Greece. In 44 he held the province of Macedonia, and Brutus was to succeed him. After Caesar's assassination, M. Antony gave the province to his brother Caius. Brutus, however, had already taken possession, with the assistance of Hortensius. When the proscription took place, Hortensius was in the list; and in revenge he ordered C. Antonius, who had been taken prisoner, to be put to death. After the battle of Philippi, he was executed on the grave of his victim.

Hōrus (Ὧρος), the Egyptian god of the sun, whose worship was also established in Greece, and afterwards at Rome. He was compared with the Greek Apollo, and identified with Harpocrates, the last-born and weakly son of Osiris. Both were represented as youths, and with the same attributes and symbols. He was believed to have been born with his finger on his mouth, as indicative of secrecy and mystery. In the earlier period of his worship at Rome he seems to have been particularly regarded as the god of quiet life and silence.

Hostīlia (Ostiglia), a small town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the Po, and on the road from Mutina to Verona; the birthplace of Cornelius Nepos.

Hostīlius Mancīnus. [MANCINUS.]

Hostīlius Tullus. [TULLUS HOSTILIUS.]

Hostĭus, the author of a poem on the Istrian war (B.C. 178), which is quoted by the grammarians. He was probably a contemporary of Julius Caesar.

Hunneric, king of the Vandals in Africa, A.D. 477—484, was the son of Genseric, whom he succeeded. His reign was chiefly marked by his savage persecution of the Catholics.

Hunni (Οὖννοι), an Asiatic race, who dwelt for some centuries in the plains of Tartary, and were formidable to the Chinese empire, long before they were known to the Romans. It was to repel the inroads of the Huns that the Chinese built their celebrated wall, 1500 miles in length. A portion of the nation afterwards migrated W., conquered the Alani, a warlike race between the Volga and the Tanais, and then crossed into Europe about A.D. 375. The appearance of these new barbarians excited the greatest terror, both among the Romans and Germans. They are described by the Greek and Roman historians as hideous and repulsive beings, resembling apes, with broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes deeply buried in their head; while their manners and habits were savage to the last degree. They destroyed the powerful monarchy of the Ostrogoths, who were obliged to retire before them, and were allowed by Valens to settle in Thrace, A.D. 376. The Huns now frequently ravaged the Roman dominions. They were joined by many other barbarian nations, and under their king Attila (A.D. 434—453), they devastated the fairest portions of the empire, both in the E. and the W. [ATTILA.] On the death of Attila, the various nations which composed his army, dispersed, and his sons were unable to resist the arms of the Ostrogoths. In a few years after the death of Attila, the empire of the Huns was completely destroyed. The remains of the nation became incorporated with other barbarians, and never appear again as a separate people.

Hўăcinthus (Ὑάκινθος). 1. Son of the Spartan king Amyclas and Diomede, or of Pierus and Clio, or of Oebalus or Eurotas. He was a youth of extraordinary beauty, and was beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the love of Apollo; and as he was once playing at quoit with the god, Zephyrus, out of jealousy, drove the quoit of Apollo with such violence against the head of the youth, that he fell down dead. From the blood of Hya-cinthus there sprang the flower of the same name (hyacinth), on the leaves of which appeared the exclamation of woe AI, AI, or the letter Υ, being the initial of Ὑάκινθος. According to other traditions, the hyacinth sprang from the blood of Ajax. Hyacinthus was worshipped at Amyclae as a hero, and a great festival, Hyacinthia, was celebrated in his honour. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v.) — 2. A Lacedaemonian, who is said to have gone to Athens, and to have sacrificed his daughters for the purpose of delivering the city from a famine and plague, under which it was suffering during the war with Minos. His daughters were known in the Attic legends by the name of the Hyacinthides, which they derived from their father. Some traditions make them the daughters of Erechtheus, and relate that they received their name from the village of Hyacinthus, where they were sacrificed at the time when Athens was attacked by the Eleusinians and Thracians, or Thebans.

Hўădes (Ὑάδες), that is, the Rainy, the name of nymphs, whose parentage, number and names are described in various ways by the ancients. Their parents were Atlas and Aethra, or Atlas and Pleione, or Hyas and Boeotia: others call their father Oceanus, Melisseus, Cadmilus, or Erechtheus. Their number differs in various legends; but their most common number is 7, as they appear in the constellation which bears their name, viz., Ambrosia, Eudora, Pedile, Coronis, Polyxo, Phyto, and Thyene or Dione. They were entrusted by Zeus with the care of his infant son Dionysus, and were afterwards placed by Zeus among the stars. The story which made them the daughters of Atlas relates that their number was 12 or 15, and that at first 5 of them were placed among the stars as Hyades, and the 7 (or 10) others afterwards under the name of Pleiades, to reward them for the sisterly love they had evinced after the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed in Libya by a wild beast. Their name, Hyades, is derived by the ancients from their father, Hyas, or from Hyes, a mystic surname of Dionysus; or according to others, from their position in the heavens, where they formed a figure resembling the Greek letter Υ. The Romans, who derived it from ὗς, a pig, translated the name by Suculae. The most natural derivation is from ὕειν, to rain, as the constellation of the Hyades, when rising simultaneously with the sun, announced rainy weather. Hence Horace speaks of the tristes Hyades (Carm. i. 3. 14).

Hyampēa. [Parnassus.]

Hyampŏlis (Ὑάμπολις: Ὑαμπολίτης), a town in Phocis, E. of the Cephissus, near Cleonae, was founded by the Hyantes, when they were driven out of Boeotia by the Cadmeans; was destroyed by Xerxes; afterwards rebuilt; and again destroyed by Philip and the Amphictyons. — Cleonae, from its vicinity to Hyampolis, is called by Xenophon (Hell. vi. 4. § 2) Ὑαμπολιτῶν τὸ προάστειον. — Strabo speaks of 2 towns of the name of Hyampolis in Phocis; but it is doubtful whether his statement is correct.

Hyantes (Ὕαντες), the ancient inhabitants of Boeotia, from which country they were expelled by the Cadmeans. Part of the Hyantes emigrated to Phocis [Hyampolis], and part to Aetolia. The poets use the adjective Hyantius as equivalent to Boeotian.

Hўas (Ὕας), the name of the father and the brother of the Hyades. The father was married to Boeotia, and was looked upon as the ancestor of the ancient Hyantes. His son, the brother of the Hyades, was killed in Libya by a serpent, a boar, or a lion.

Hybla (Ὕβλη: Ὑβλαῖος, Hyblensis), 3 towns in Sicily. 1. Major (ἡ μείζων or μεγάλη), on the S. slope of Mt. Aetna and on the river Symaethus, was originally a town of the Siculi. — 2. Minor (ἡ μικρά), afterwards called Megara. [Megara.] — 3. Heraea, in the S. of the island, on the road from Syracuse to Agrigentum. — It is doubtful from which of these 3 places the Hyblaean honey came, so frequently mentioned by the poets.

Hybrĕas (Ὑβρέας), of Mylasa in Caria, a celebrated orator, contemporary with the triumvir Antonius.

Hyccăra (τὰ Ὕκκαρα: Ὑκκαρεύς: Muro di Carini), a town of the Sicani on the N. coast of Sicily, W. of Panormus, said to have derived its name from the sea fish ὕκκαι. It was taken by the Athenians, and plundered, and its inhabitants sold as slaves, B. C. 415. Among the captives was the beautiful Timandra, the mistress of Alcibiades and the mother of Lais.

Hydarnes (Ὑδάρνης), one of the 7 Persians who conspired against the Magi in B. C. 521.

Hўdaspes (Ὑδάσπης: Jelum), the N.most of the 5 great tributaries of the Indus, which, with the Indus itself, water the great plain of N. India, which is bounded on the N. by the Himalaya range, and which is now called the Punjab, i. e. 5 rivers. The Hydaspes falls into the Acesines (Chenab), which also receives, from the S., first the Hydraotes (Ravee), and then the Hyphasis (Beeas, and lower down, Gharra), which has previously received, on the S. side, the Hesidrus or Zaradrus (Sutlej or Hesudru); and the Acesines itself falls into the Indus. These 5 rivers all rise on the S.W. side of the Emodi M. (Himalaya), except the Sutlej, which, like the Indus, rises on the N. E. side of the range. They became known to the Greeks by Alexander's campaign in India: his great victory over Porus (B. C. 327) was gained on the left side of the Hydaspes, near, or perhaps upon, the scene of the recent battle of Chillianwallah; and the Hyphasis formed the limit of his progress. The epithet "fabulosus," which Horace applies to the Hydaspes (Carm. i. 22. 7) refers to the marvellous stories current among the Romans, who knew next to nothing about India; and the "Medus Hydaspes" of Virgil (Georg. iv. 211) is merely an example of the vagueness with which the Roman writers, especially the poets, refer to the countries beyond the E. limit of the empire.

Hydraŏtes (Ὑδραώτης, Strab. Ὑάρωτις: Ravee), a river of India, falling into the Acesines. [Hydaspes.]

Hўdrĕa (Ὑδρέα: Ὑδρεάτης: Hydra), a small island in the gulf of Hermione off Argolis, of no importance in antiquity, but the inhabitants of which in modern times played a distinguished part in the war of Greek independence, and are some of the best sailors in Greece.

Hydruntum or Hydrūs (Ὑδροῦς: Hydruntīnus: Otranto), one of the most ancient towns of Calabria, situated on the S.E. coast, with a good harbour, and near a mountain Hydrus, was in later times a municipium. Persons frequently crossed over to Epirus from this port.

Hyettus (Ὑηττός: Ὑήττιος), a small town in Boeotia on the lake Copais, and near the frontiers of Locris.

Hygīēa (Ὑγίεια), also called Hygēa or Hygia, the goddess of health, and a daughter of Aesculapius; though some traditions make her the wife of the latter. She was usually worshipped in the temples of Aesculapius, as at Argos, where the 2 divinities had a celebrated sanctuary, at Athens, at Corinth, &c. At Rome there was a statue of her in the temple of Concordia. In works of art she is represented as a virgin dressed in a long robe, and feeding a serpent from a cup. — Although she was originally the goddess of physical health, she is sometimes conceived as the giver or protectress of mental health, that is, she appears as ὑγίεια φρενῶν (Aeschyl. Eum. 522), and was thus identified with Athena, surnamed Hygiea.

Hygīnus. 1. C. Jūlius, a Roman grammarian, was a native of Spain, and lived at Rome in the time of Augustus, whose freedman he was. He wrote several works, all of which have perished. — 2. Hygīnus Gromātĭcus, so called from gruma, an instrument used by the Agrimensores. He lived in the time of Trajan, and wrote works on land surveying and castrametation, of which considerable fragments are extant. — 3. Hygīnus, the author of 2 extant works; 1. Fabularum Liber, a series of short mythological legends, with an introductory genealogy of divinities. Although the larger portion of these narratives has been copied from obvious sources, they occasionally present the tales under new forms or with new circumstances. 2. Poeticon Astronomicon Libri IV. We know nothing of the author of these 2 works. He is sometimes identified with C. Julius Hyginus, the freedman of Augustus, but he must have lived at a much later period. Both works are included in the Mythographi Latini of Muncker, Amst. 1681, and of Van Staveren, Lug. Bat. 1742.

Hylaea (Ὑλαίη, Herod.), a district in Scythia, covered with wood, is the peninsula adjacent to Taurica on the N.W., between the rivers Borysthenes and Hypacyris.

Hȳlaeus (Ὑλαῖος), that is, the Woodman, the name of an Arcadian centaur, who was slain by Atalante, when he pursued her. According to some legends, Hylaeus fell in the fight against the Lapithae, and others again said that he was one of the centaurs slain by Hercules.

Hȳlas (Ὕλας), son of Theodamas, king of the Dryopes, by the nymph Menodice; or, according to others, son of Hercules, Euphemus, or Ceyx. He was beloved by Hercules, whom he accompanied in the expedition of the Argonauts. On the coast of Mysia, Hylas went on shore to draw water from a fountain; but his beauty excited the love of the Naiads, who drew him down into the water, and he was never seen again. Hercules endeavoured in vain to find him; and when he shouted out to the youth, the voice of Hylas was heard from the bottom of the well only like a faint echo, whence some say that he was actually metamorphosed into an echo. While Hercules was engaged in seeking his favourite, the Argonauts sailed away, leaving him and his companion, Polyphemus, behind.

Hȳlē (Ὕλη, also Ὗλαι), a small town in Boeotia, situated on the Hylĭce, which was called after this town, and into which the river Ismenus flows.

Hylĭas, a river in Bruttium, separating the territories of Sybaris and Croton.

Hylĭcē (ἡ Ὑλικὴ λίμνη), a lake in Boeotia, S. of the lake Copais. See Hyle.

Hylĭcus (Ὕλικος, Ὕλλικος), a small river in Argolis, near Troezen.

Hyllus (Ὕλλος), son of Hercules by Deianīra. For details see Heraclidae.

Hyllus (Ὕλλος: Demirji), a river of Lydia, falling into the Hermus on its N. side.

Hȳmēn or Hȳmĕnaeus (Ὑμήν or Ὑμέναιος), the god of marriage, was conceived as a handsome youth, and invoked in the hymeneal or bridal song. The names originally designated the bridal song itself, which was subsequently personified. He is described as the son of Apollo and a Muse, either Calliope, Urania, or Terpsichore. Others describe him only as the favourite of Apollo or Thamyris, and call him a son of Magnes and Calliope, or of Dionysus and Aphrodite. The ancient traditions, instead of regarding the god as a personification of the hymeneal song, speak of him as originally a mortal, respecting whom various legends were related. The Attic legends described him as a youth of such delicate beauty, that he might be taken for a girl. He fell in love with a maiden, who refused to listen to him; but in the disguise of a girl he followed her to Eleusis to the festival of Demeter. The maidens, together with Hymenaeus, were carried off by robbers into a distant and desolate country. On their landing, the robbers laid down to sleep, and were killed by Hymenaeus, who now returned to Athens, requesting the citizens to give him his beloved in marriage, if he restored to them the maidens who had been carried off by the robbers. His request was granted, and his marriage was extremely happy. For this reason he was invoked in the hymeneal songs. According to others he was a youth, who was killed by the fall of his house on his wedding-day, whence he was afterwards invoked in bridal songs, in order to be propitiated. Some related that at the wedding of Dionysus and Ariadne he sang the bridal hymn, but lost his voice. He is represented in works of art as a youth, but taller and with a more serious expression than Eros, and carrying in his hand a bridal torch.

Hȳmettus (Ὑμηττός), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble (Hymettiae trabes, Hor. Carm. ii. 18. 3), and more especially for its honey. It is about 3 miles S. of Athens, and forms the commencement of the range of mountains which runs S. through Attica. It is now called Telovuni, and by the Franks Monte Matto: the part of the mountain near the promontory Zoster, which was called in ancient times Anhydrus (ὁ Ἄνυδρος, sc. Ὑμηττός), or the Dry Hymettus, is now called Mavrovuni.

Hypacȳris, Hypacăris, or Pacăris (Kanilshak), a river in European Sarmatia, which flows through the country of the nomad Scythians, and falls into the Sinus Carcinites in the Euxine sea.

Hypaea. [Stoechades.]

Hypaepa (Ὕπαιπα: Tapaya), a city of Lydia, on the S. slope of Mt. Tmolus, near the N. bank of the Caïster.

Hypāna (Ὑπάνη: τὰ Ὕπανα: Ὑπανεύς), a town in Triphylian Elis, belonging to the Pentapolis.

Hypănis (Bog), a river in European Sarmatia, rises, according to Herodotus, in a lake, flows parallel to the Borysthenes, has at first sweet, then bitter water, and falls into the Euxine sea W. of the Borysthenes.

Hypăta (τὰ Ὕπατα, ἡ Ὑπάτη: Ὑπαταῖος, Ὑπατεύς: Neopatra, Turk. Batrajik), a town of the Aenianes in Thessaly, S. of the Spercheus, belonged in later times to the Aetolian league. The inhabitants of this town were notorious for witchcraft.

Hypatĭa (Ὑπατία), daughter of Theon, by whom she was instructed in philosophy and mathematics. She soon made such immense progress in these branches of knowledge, that she is said to have presided over the Neoplatonic school of Plotinus at Alexandria, where she expounded the principles of his system to a numerous auditory. She appears to have been most graceful, modest, and beautiful, but nevertheless to have been a victim to slander and falsehood. She was accused of too much familiarity with Orestes, prefect of Alexandria, and the charge spread among the clergy, who took up the notion that she interrupted the friendship of Orestes with their archbishop, Cyril. In consequence of this, a number of them seized her in the street, and dragged her into one of the churches, where they tore her to pieces, A. D. 415.

Hypatŏdōrus (Ὑπατόδωρος), a statuary of Thebes, flourished B. C. 372.

Hyperbŏlus (Ὑπέρβολος), an Athenian demagogue in the Peloponnesian war, was of servile origin, and was frequently satirized by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. In order to get rid either of Nicias or Alcibiades, Hyperbolus called for the exercise of the ostracism. But the parties endangered combined to defeat him, and the vote of exile fell on Hyperbolus himself: an application of that dignified punishment by which it was thought to have been so debased that the use of it was never recurred to. Some years afterwards he was murdered by the oligarchs at Samos, B. C. 411.

Hyperbŏrĕi or -ĕi (Ὑπερβόρεοι, Ὑπερβόρειοι), a fabulous people, the earliest mention of whom seems to have been in the sacred legends connected with the worship of Apollo, both at Delos and at Delphi. In the earliest Greek conception of the Hyperboreans, as embodied by the poets, they were a blessed people, living beyond the N. wind (ὑπερβόρεοι, fr. ὑπὲρ and Βορέας), and therefore not exposed to its cold blasts, in a land of perpetual sunshine, which produced abundant fruits, on which the people lived, abstaining from animal food. In innocence and peace, free from disease and toil and care, ignorant of violence and war, they spent a long and happy life, in the due and cheerful observance of the worship of Apollo, who visited their country soon after his birth, and spent a whole year among them, dancing and singing, before he returned to Delphi. The poets related further how the sun only rose once a year and set once a year, upon the Hyperboreans, whose year was thus divided, at the equinoxes, into a 6 months' day and a 6 months' night, and they were therefore said to sow in the morning, to reap at noon, to gather their fruits in the evening, and to store them up at night: how, too, their natural life lasted 1000 years, but if any of them was satiated with its unbroken enjoyment, he threw himself, crowned and anointed, from a sacred rock into the sea. The Delian legends told of offerings sent to Apollo by the Hyperboreans, first by the hands of virgins named Arge and Opis (or Hecaërge), and then by Laodice and Hyperoche, escorted by 5 men called Perpherees; and lastly, as their messengers did not return, they sent the offerings packed in wheat-straw, and the sacred package was forwarded from people to people till it reached Delos. If these legends are based on any geographical relations at all, the most probable explanation is that which regards them as pointing to regions N. of Greece (the N. part of Thessaly especially) as the chief original seat of the worship of Apollo. Naturally enough, as the geographical knowledge of the Greeks extended, they moved back the Hyperboreans further and further into the unknown parts of the earth; and, of those who sought to fix their precise locality, some placed them in the extreme W. of Europe, near the Pyrenaean mountains and the supposed sources of the Ister, and thus they came to be identified with the Celtae; while others placed them in the extreme N. of Europe, on the shores of the Hyperboreus Oceanus, beyond the fabulous Grypes and Arimaspi, who themselves lived beyond the Scythians. The latter opinion at length prevailed; and then, the religious aspect of the fable being gradually lost sight of, the term Hyperborean came to mean only most northerly, as when Virgil and Horace speak of the "Hyperboreae orae" and "Hyperborei campi." The fable of the Hyperboreans may probably be regarded as one of the forms in which the tradition of an original period of innocence, happiness, and immortality, existed among the nations of the ancient world.

Hyperbŏrĕi Montes was originally the mythical name of an imaginary range of mountains in the N. of the earth [HYPERBOREI], and was afterwards applied by the geographers to various chains, as, for example, the Caucasus, the Rhipaei Montes, and others.

Hyperīdes (Ὑπερείδης or Ὑπερίδης), one of the 10 Attic orators, was the son of Glaucippus, and belonged to the Attic demus of Collytus. He was a pupil of Plato in philosophy, and of Demosthenes in oratory. He was a friend of Demosthenes, and with him and Lycurgus was at the head of the anti-Macedonian party. He is first mentioned about B. C. 358, when he and his son equipped 2 triremes at their own expense in order to serve against Euboea, and from this time to his death he continued a stedfast friend to the patriotic cause. After the death of Alexander (323) Hyperides took an active part in organising that confederacy of the Greeks against Antipater, which produced the Lamian war. Upon the defeat of the confederates at the battle of Crannon in the following year (322), Hyperides fled to Aegina, where he was slain by the emissaries of Antipater. The number of orations attributed to Hyperides was 77; but none of them have come down to us. His oratory was graceful and powerful, holding a middle place between that of Lysias and Demosthenes.

Hypĕrīon (Ὑπερίων), a Titan, son of Uranus and Ge, and married to his sister Thia, or Euryphaessa, by whom he became the father of Helios, Selene, and Eos. Homer uses the name as a patronymic of Helios, so that it is equivalent to Hyperionion or Hyperionides; and Homer's example is imitated also by other poets. [HELIOS.]

Hypermnestra (Ὑπερμνήστρα). 1. Daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, wife of Oicles, and mother of Amphiaraus. — 2. One of the daughters of Danaus, and wife of Lynceus. [DANAUS; LYNCEUS.]

Hyphăsis or Hypăsis or Hypănis (Ὕφασις, Ὕπασις, Ὕπανις: Beeas, and Gharra), a river of India. [HYDASPES.]

Hypius (Ὕπιος), a river and mountain in Bithynia.

Hypsas (Ὕψας), 2 rivers on the S. coast of Sicily, one between Selinus and Thermae Selinuntiae (now Belici) and the other near Agrigentum (now Fiume drago).

Hypseus (Ὑψεύς), son of Penēus and Creusa, was king of the Lapithae, and father of Cyrene.

Hypsicles (Ὑψικλῆς), of Alexandria, a Greek mathematician, who is usually said to have lived about A. D. 160, but who ought not to be placed earlier than A. D. 550. The only work of his extant, is entitled Περὶ τῆς τῶν ζωδίων ἀναφορᾶς, published with the Optics of Heliodorus at Paris, 1567. He is supposed however to have added the 14th and 15th books to the Elements of Euclid.

Hypsĭpўlē (Ὑψιπύλη), daughter of Thoas, king of Lemnos. When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island, because they had taken some female Thracian slaves to their beds, Hypsipyle saved her father. [THOAS.] She then became queen of Lemnos; and when the Argonauts landed there shortly afterwards, she bore twin sons to Jason, Euneus and Nebrophonus, also called Deiphilus or Thoas. The Lemnian women subsequently discovered that Thoas was alive, whereupon they compelled Hypsipyle to quit the island. On her flight she was taken prisoner by pirates and sold to the Nemean king Lycurgus, who entrusted to her care his son Archemorus or Opheltes. [ARCHEMORUS.]

Hypsūs (Ὑψοῦς, -οῦντος), a town in Arcadia, on a mountain of the same name.

Hyrcānĭa (Ὑρκανία: Ὑρκάνιος, Hyrcānus: Mazanderan), a province of the ancient Persian Empire, on the S. and S.E. shores of the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea, and separated by mountains on the W., S., and E., from Media, Parthia, and Margiana. Its valleys were very fertile; and it flourished most under the Parthians, whose kings often resided in it during the summer.

Hyrcānum or -ium Mare. [CASPIUM MARE.]

Hyrcānus (Ὑρκανός). 1. Joannes, prince and high-priest of the Jews, was the son and successor of Simon Maccabaeus, the restorer of the independence of Judaea. He succeeded to his father's power B. C. 135. He was at first engaged in war with Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who invaded Judaea, and laid siege to Jerusalem. In 133 he concluded a peace with Antiochus, on the condition of paying an annual tribute. Owing to the civil wars in Syria between the several claimants to the throne, the power of Hyrcanus steadily increased; and at length he took Samaria, and razed it to the ground (109), notwithstanding the army which Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus had sent to the assistance of the city. Hyrcanus died in 106. Although he did not assume the title of king, he may be regarded as the founder of the monarchy of Judaea, which continued in his family till the accession of Herod. — 2. High-priest and king of the Jews, was the eldest son of Alexander Jannaeus, and his wife, Alexandra. On the death of Alexander (78) the royal authority devolved upon Alexandra, who appointed Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood. Alexandra reigned 9 years; and upon her death in 69, Hyrcanus succeeded to the sovereignty, but was quickly attacked by his younger brother Aristobulus, who possessed more energy and ambition than Hyrcanus. In the following year (68) Hyrcanus was driven from the throne, and took refuge with Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea. That monarch assembled an army, with which he invaded Judaea in order to restore Hyrcanus. He defeated Aristobulus, and blockaded him in the temple of Jerusalem. Aristobulus, however, gained over by bribes and promises Pompey's lieutenant, M. Scaurus, who had arrived at Damascus, and who now ordered Aretas and Hyrcanus to withdraw from Judaea (64). The next year Pompey himself arrived in Syria: he reversed the decision of Scaurus, carried away Aristobulus as a prisoner to Rome, and reinstated Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, with the authority, though not the name, of royalty. Hyrcanus, however, did not long enjoy his newly recovered sovereignty in quiet. Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and subsequently Aristobulus himself, escaped from Rome, and excited dangerous revolts, which were only quelled by the assistance of the Romans. The real government was now in the able hands of Antipater, the father of Herod, who rendered such important services to Caesar during the Alexandrian war (47), that Caesar made him procurator of Judaea, leaving to Hyrcanus the title of high-priest. Although Antipater was poisoned by the contrivance of Hyrcanus (43), the latter was a man of such feeble character, that he allowed Herod to take vengeance on the murderer of his father, and to succeed to his father's power and influence. The Parthians, on their invasion of Syria, carried away Hyrcanus as prisoner (40). He was treated with much liberality by the Parthian king, and allowed to live in perfect freedom at Babylon. Here he remained for some years; but having at length received an invitation from Herod, who had meanwhile established himself on the throne of Judaea, he returned to Jerusalem, with the consent of the Parthian king. He was treated with respect by Herod till the battle of Actium; when Herod, fearing lest Augustus might place Hyrcanus on the throne, accused him of a treasonable correspondence with the king of Arabia, and on this pretext put him to death (30).

Hўrĭa (Ὑρία: Ὑριεύς, Ὑριάτης). 1. A town in Boeotia near Tanagra, was in the earliest times a place of importance, but afterwards sunk into insignificance. — 2. A town in Apulia. [URIA.]

Hўrĭeus (Ὑριεύς), son of Poseidon and Alcyone, king of Hyria in Boeotia, husband of Clonia, and father of Nycteus, Lycus, and Orion. Respecting his treasures see AGAMEDES.

Hyrmīna (Ὑρμίνη), a town in Elis, mentioned by Homer, but of which all trace had disappeared in the time of Strabo. Near it was the promontory Hyrmina or Hormina (C. Chiarenza).

Hyrmīnē (Ὑρμίνη), daughter of Neleus, or Nycteus, wife of Phorbas, and mother of Actor.

Hyrtăcus (Ὕρτακος), a Trojan, to whom Priam gave his first wife Arisba, when he married Hecuba. Homer makes him the father of Asius, hence called Hyrtacides. — In Virgil Nisus and Hippocoon are also represented as sons of Hyrtacus.

Hysĭae (Ὑσιαί). 1. (Ὑσιάτης), a town in Argolis, S. of Argos, destroyed by the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war. — 2. (Ὑσιεύς), a town in Boeotia, E. of Plataeae, called by Herodotus (v. 74) a demus of Attica, but probably belonging to Plataeae.

Hystaspes (Ὑστάσπης; in Persian, Goshtasp, Gustasp, Histasp, or Wistasp). 1. Son of Arsames, and father of Darius I., was a member of the Persian royal house of the Achaemenidae. He was satrap of Persis under Cambyses, and probably under Cyrus also. — 2. Son of Darius I. and Atossa, commanded the Bactrians and Sacae in the army of his brother Xerxes.

I.

Iacchus (Ἴακχος), the solemn name of Bacchus in the Eleusinian mysteries, whose name was derived from the boisterous song, called Iacchus. In these mysteries Iacchus was regarded as the son of Zeus and Demeter, and was distinguished from the Theban Bacchus (Dionysus), the son of Zeus and Semele. In some traditions Iacchus is even called a son of Bacchus, but in others the 2 are identified. On the 6th day of the Eleusinian festival (the 20th of Boëdromion) the statue of Iacchus was carried from the temple of Demeter across the Thriasian plain to Eleusis, accompanied by a numerous and riotous procession of the initiated, who sang the Iacchus, carried mystic baskets, and danced to the sound of cymbals and trumpets.

Iādĕra or Iader (Iadertīnus: Old Zara), a town on the coast of Illyricum, with a good harbour, and a Roman colony under the name of "Colonia Claudia Augusta Felix."

Ialĕmus (Ἰάλεμος), a similar personification to that of Linus, and hence called a son of Apollo and Calliope, and the inventor of the song Ialemus, which was a kind of dirge, and is only mentioned as sung on most melancholy occasions.

Ialmĕnus (Ἰάλμενος), son of Ares and Astyoche, and brother of Ascalaphus, was a native of the Boeotian Orchomenos. He was one of the Argonauts and a suitor of Helena. After the destruction of Troy, he wandered about with the Orchomenians, and founded colonies in Colchis.

Iālỹsus (Ἰάλυσος), one of the 3 very ancient Dorian cities in the island of Rhodes, and one of the 6 original members of the Dorian Hexapolis [Doris], stood on the N.W. coast of the island, about 60 stadia S.W. of Rhodes. It is said to have derived its name from the mythical Ialysus, son of Cercaphus, and grandson of Helios.

Iambĕ (Ἰάμβη), a Thracian woman, daughter of Pan and Echo, and a slave of Metanīra. When Demeter, in search of her daughter, arrived in Attica, and visited the house of Metanira, Iambe cheered the mournful goddess by her jokes.

Iamblĭchus (Ἰάμβλιχος). 1. A Syrian who lived in the time of the emperor Trajan, wrote a romance in the Greek language, entitled Babylonica. The work itself is lost, but an epitome of it is preserved by Photius. — 2. A celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher, was born at Chalcis in Coele-Syria. He resided in Syria during the greater part of his life, and died in the reign of Constantine the Great, probably before A. D. 333. He was inferior in judgment and learning to the earlier Neo-Platonists, Plotinus and Porphyry; and he introduced into his system many of the superstitions and mysteries of the E., by means of which he endeavoured to check the progress of Christianity. The extant works of Iamblichus are: I. Περὶ Πυθαγόρου αἱρέσεως, on the philosophy of Pythagoras. It was intended as a preparation for the study of Plato, and consisted originally of 10 books, of which 5 only are extant. 1. The 1st book contains an account of the life of Pythagoras, and though compiled without care, it is yet of value, as the other works, from which it is taken, are lost. Edited by Kuster, Amsterd. 1707; and by Kiessling, Lips. 1815. 2. Προτρεπτικοὶ λόγοι εἰς φιλοσοφίαν, forms a sort of introduction to the study of Plato. Edited by Kiessling, Lips. 1813, 8vo. 3. Περὶ κοινῆς μαθηματικῆς ἐπιστήμης, contains many fragments of the works of early Pythagoreans. Edited by Fries, Copenhagen, 1790. 4. Περὶ τῆς Νικομάχου ἀριθμητικῆς εἰσαγωγῆς. Edited by Tennulius, Deventer and Arnheim, 1668. 5. Τὰ θεολογούμενα τῆς ἀριθμητικῆς. Edited by Ast, Lips. 1817. — II. Περὶ μυστηρίων, written to prove the divine origin of the Egyptian and Chaldaean theology. Edited by Gale, Oxon. 1678. Iamblichus wrote other works which are lost. — 3. A later Neo-Platonic philosopher of Apamea, a contemporary of the emperor Julian and of Libanius.

Iamĭdae. [Iamus.]

Iamnīa (Ἰάμνεια; Ἰαμνία: Ἰαμνείτης: O. T. Jabneel, Jabneh: Ibneh or Gabneh), a considerable city of Palestine, between Diospolis and Azotus, near the coast, with a good harbour, was taken by King Uzziah from the Philistines. Pompey united it to the province of Syria. After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Sanhedrim, and of a celebrated school of Jewish learning.

Iamus (Ἴαμος), son of Apollo and Evadne, received the art of prophecy from his father, and was regarded as the ancestor of the famous family of seers, the Iamidae at Olympia.

Ianīra (Ἰάνειρα), one of the Nereids.

Ianthĕ (Ἰάνθη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and one of the playmates of Persephone. — 2. Daughter of Telestes of Crete, beloved by Iphis.

Iăpĕtus (Ἰαπετός), one of the Titans, son of Uranus and Ge, married Asia or Clymene, the daughter of his brother Oceanus, and became by her the father of Atlas, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menoetius. He was imprisoned with Cronus in Tartarus. Being the father of Prometheus, he was regarded by the Greeks as the ancestor of the human race. His descendants, Prometheus, Atlas, and others, are often designated by the patronymics Iapetidae (es), Iapetionidae (es), and the feminine Iapetionis.

Iāpỹdes (Ἰάπυδες or Ἰάποδες), a warlike and barbarous people in the N. of Illyricum, between the rivers Arsia and Tedanius, were a mixed race, partly Illyrian and partly Celtic, who tattooed their bodies. They were subdued by Augustus. Their country was called Iapydĭa.

Iāpỹgĭa (Ἰαπυγία: Ἰάπυγες), the name given by the Greeks to the S. of Apulia, from Tarentum and Brundusium to the Prom. Iapygĭum (C. Leuca); though it is sometimes applied to the whole of Apulia. [Apulia.] The name is derived from the mythical Iapyx.

Iāpyx (Ἰάπυξ). 1. Son of Lycaon and brother of Daunius and Peucetius, who went as leaders of a colony to Italy. According to others, he was a Cretan, and a brother af Icadius, or a son of Daedalus and a Cretan woman, from whom the Cretans who migrated to Italy derived the name of Iapyges. — 2. The W.N.W. wind, blowing off the coast of Iapygia (Apulia), in the S. of Italy, and consequently favourable to persons crossing over to Greece. It was the same as the ἀργέστης of the Greeks.

Iarbas or Hiarbas, king of the Gaetulians, and son of Jupiter Ammon by a Libyan nymph, sued in vain for the hand of Dido in marriage. For details see Dido.

Iardānes (Ἰαρδάνης), a king of Lydia, and father of Omphale, who is hence called Iardanis.

Iardānes or Iardānus (Ἰαρδάνης, Ἰάρδανος). 1. (Jardan), a river in Elis. — 2. A river in the N. of Crete, which flowed near the town Cydonia.

Iăsĭon or Iăsĭus (Ἰασίων, Ἰάσιος), son of Zeus and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, or son of Corythus and Electra. At the wedding of his sister Harmonia, Demeter fell in love with him, and in a thrice-ploughed field (τρίπολος) she became by him the mother of Pluton or Plutus in Crete; Zeus in consequence killed Iasion with a flash of lightning. Others represent him as living to an advanced age as the husband of Demeter. In some traditions Iasion and his brother Dardanus are said to have carried the palladium to Samothrace, and there to have been instructed in the mysteries of Demeter by Zeus. Others relate that Iasion, being inspired by Demeter and Cora (Proserpina), travelled about in Sicily and many other countries, and everywhere taught the people the mysteries of Demeter.

Iăsis, i.e. Atalante, the daughter of Iasius.

Iāso (Ἰασώ), i.e. Recovery, a daughter of Aesculapius, or Amphiaraus, and sister of Hygiea, was worshipped as the goddess of recovery.

Iassĭus or Iassĭcus Sinus (Ἰασικὸς κόλπος: Gulf of Mandeliyeh), a large gulf on the W. coast of Caria, between the peninsulae of Miletus and Myndus; named after the city of Iassus, and called Bargylieticus Sinus (Βαργυλιητικὸς κόλπος) from another city which stood upon it, namely, Bargylia.

Iassus or Iāsus (Ἴασσος, Ἴασος: Ἰασεύς: Asyn-Kalessi, Ru.), a city of Caria, on the Iassius Sinus, founded by Argives and further colonised by Milesians.

Iasus (Ἴασος). 1. An Arcadian, son of Lycurgus and Cleophile or Eurynome, brother of Ancaeus, husband of Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, and father of Atalante. He is likewise called Iasius and Iasion. — 2. Father of Amphion, and king of the Minyans.

Iāzўges (Ἰάζυγες), a powerful Sarmatian people, who originally dwelt on the coast of the Pontus Euxinus and the Palus Maeotis, but in the reign of Claudius settled near the Quadi in Dacia, in the country bounded by the Danube, the Theiss, and the Sarmatian mountains. They are generally called Sarmatae Iazyges or simply Sarmatae, but Ptolemy gives them the name of Iazyges Metanastae, on account of their migration. The Iazyges were in close alliance with the Quadi, along with whom they frequently attacked the Roman dominions, especially Moesia and Pannonia. In the 5th century they were conquered by the Goths.

Ibērĭa (Ἰβηρία: S. part of Georgia), a country of Asia, in the centre of the isthmus between the Black and Caspian Seas, was bounded on the N. by the Caucasus, on the W. by Colchis, on the E. by Albania, and on the S. by Armenia. It was surrounded on every side by mountains, through which there were only 4 passes. Sheltered by these mountains and watered by the Cyrus (Kour) and its upper tributaries, it was famed for a fertility of which its modern name (from Γεώργος) remains a witness. Its inhabitants, Ibēres (Ἴβηρες) or Ibēri, were, and are still, among the most perfect specimens of the Caucasian race. The ancients believed them to be of the same family as the Assyrians and Medes, whom they were thought to resemble in their customs. They were more civilised than their neighbours in Colchis and Albania, and were divided into 4 castes: 1. the nobles, from whom 2 kings were chosen; 2. the priests, who were also the magistrates; 3. the soldiers and husbandmen; 4. the slaves, who performed all public and mechanical work. The chief employment of the Iberians was agriculture. The Romans first became acquainted with the country through the expedition of Pompey, in B.C. 65; and under Trajan it was subjected to Rome. In the 5th century it was conquered by the Persian king, Sapor.—No connection can be traced between the Iberians of Asia and those of Spain.

Ibērus (Ἴβηρος or Ἴβηρ: Ebro), the principal river in the N.E. of Spain, rises among the mountains of the Cantabri near Juliobriga, flows S.E. through a great plain between the Pyrenees and the M. Idubeda, and falls into the Mediterranean, near Dertosa, after forming a Delta.

Ibўcus (Ἴβυκος), a Greek lyric poet, was a native of Rhegium, and spent the best part of his life at Samos, at the court of Polycrates, about B.C. 540. It is related that travelling through a desert place near Corinth, he was murdered by robbers, but before he died he called upon a flock of cranes that happened to fly over him to avenge his death. Soon afterwards, when the people of Corinth were assembled in the theatre, the cranes appeared; and one of the murderers, who happened to be present, cried out involuntarily, "Behold the avengers of Ibycus:" and thus were the authors of the crime detected. The phrase αἱ Ἰβύκου γέρανοι passed into a proverb. The poetry of Ibycus was chiefly erotic, and partook largely of the impetuosity of his character. In his dialect there was a mixture of the Doric and Aeolic. In antiquity there were 7 books of his lyric poems, of which only a few fragments now remain.

Icărĭa or Icărĭus (Ἰκαρία, Ἰκάριος: Ἰκαριεύς), a mountain and a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aegeis, where Dionysus is said to have taught Icarius the cultivation of the vine.

Icărĭus (Ἰκάριος), also called Icărus or Icărĭon. 1. An Athenian, who lived in the reign of Pandion, and hospitably received Dionysus on his arrival in Attica. The god in return taught him the cultivation of the vine. Icarius made a present of some wine to peasants, who became intoxicated by it, and thinking that they were poisoned by Icarius, slew him, and threw his body into a well, or buried it under a tree. His daughter Erigone, after a long search, found his grave, to which she was conducted by his faithful dog Maera. From grief she hung herself on the tree under which he was buried. Zeus or Dionysus placed her and Icarius among the stars, making Erigone the Virgin, Icarius Boötes or Arcturus, and Maera Procyon or the little dog. Hence the latter is called Icarius canis. The god then punished the ungrateful Athenians with madness, in which condition the Athenian maidens hung themselves as Erigone had done. The Athenians propitiated Icarius and Erigone by the institution of the festival of the Aeora. (See Dict. of Antiq. s. v.) — 2. A Lacedaemonian, son of Perieres and Gorgophŏne, and brother of Tyndareus. Others called him grandson of Perieres, and son of Oebalus. When Icarius and Tyndareus were expelled from Lacedaemon by their half-brother Hippocoon, Icarius went to Acarnania, and there became the father of Penelope, and of several other children. He afterwards returned to Lacedaemon. Since there were many suitors for the hand of Penelope, he promised to give her to the hero who should conquer in a foot-race. Ulysses won the prize, and was betrothed to Penelope. Icarius tried to persuade his daughter to remain with him, and not accompany Ulysses to Ithaca. Ulysses allowed her to do as she pleased, whereupon she covered her face with her veil to hide her blushes, and thus intimated that she would follow her husband. Icarius then desisted from further entreaties, and erected a statue of Modesty on the spot.

Icărus (Ἴκαρος), son of Daedalus. [Daedalus.]

Icărus or Icărĭa (Ἴκαρος, Ἰκαρία: Nikaria), an island of the Aegean Sea; one of the Sporades; W. of Samos; called also Doliche (δολιχή, i.e. long island). Its common name, and that of the surrounding sea, Icarium Mare, were derived from the myth of Icarus. It was first colonised by the Milesians, but afterwards belonged to the Samians, who fed their herds on its rich pastures.

Iccĭus, a friend of Horace, who addressed to him an ode (Carm. i. 29), and an epistle (Ep. i. 12). The ode was written in B. C. 25, when Iccius was preparing to join Aelius Gallus in his expedition to Arabia. The epistle was composed about 10 years afterwards, when Iccius had become Vipsanius Agrippa's steward in Sicily. In both poems Horace reprehends pointedly, but delicately, in Iccius an inordinate desire for wealth.

Icēni, called Simēni (Σιμενοί) by Ptolemy, a numerous and powerful people in Britain, who dwelt N. of the Trinobantes, in the modern counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. Their revolt from the Romans, under their heroic queen Boadicēa, is celebrated in history. [Boadicea.] Their chief town was Venta Icenorum (Caister), about 3 miles from Norwich.

Ichnae (Ἴχναι: Ἰχναῖος). 1. A town in Bottiaea in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Axius. — 2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, celebrated for its worship of Themis, who was hence surnamed Ichnaea.

Ichnae or Ischnae (Ἴχναι, Ἴσχναι), a Greek city in the N. of Mesopotamia, founded by the Macedonians, was the scene of the first battle between Crassus and the Parthians, in which the former gained the victory. According to Appian, the Parthians soon after defeated the Romans near the same spot.

Ichthyŏphăgi (Ἰχθυοφάγοι, i. e. Fish-eaters), was a vague descriptive name given by the ancients to various peoples on the coasts of Asia and Africa, of whom they knew but little. Thus we find Ichthyophagi: 1. in the extreme S. E. of Asia, in the country of the Sinae: 2. on the coast of Gedrosia: 3. on the N.E. coast of Arabia Felix: 4. in Africa, on the coast of the Red Sea, above Egypt: 5. on the W. coast of Africa.

Icilĭus. 1. Sp., was one of the 3 envoys sent by the plebeians, after their secession to the Sacred Mount, to treat with the senate, B. C. 494. He was thrice elected tribune of the plebs, namely, in 492, 481, and 471. — 2. L., a man of great energy and eloquence, was tribune of the plebs, 456, when he claimed for the tribunes the right of convoking the senate, and also carried the important law for the assignment of the Aventine (de Aventino publicando) to the plebs. In the following year (455), he was again elected tribune. He was one of the chief leaders in the outbreak against the decemvirs, 449. Virginia had been betrothed to him, and he boldly defended her cause before App. Claudius; and when at length she fell by her father's hand, Icilius hurried to the army which was carrying on the war against the Sabines, and prevailed upon them to desert the government.

Icŏnĭum (Ἰκόνιον: Ἰκονιεύς: Koniyeh), the capital of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor, was, when visited by St. Paul, a flourishing city, with a mixed population of Jews and Greeks: under the later emperors, a colony: and in the middle ages, one of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, and important in the history of the crusades.

Ictīnus (Ἰκτῖνος), a contemporary of Pericles, was the architect of two of the most celebrated of the Greek temples, namely, the great temple of Athene, in the acropolis of Athens, called the Parthenon, and the temple of Apollo Epicurius, near Phigalia in Arcadia. Callicrates was associated with Ictinus in building the Parthenon.

Ida (Ἴδη, Dor. Ἴδα). 1. (Ida, or Kas-Dagh), a mountain range of Mysia, in Asia Minor, which formed the S. boundary of the Troad; extending from Lectum Pr. in the S. W. corner of the Troad, E.-wards along the N. side of the Gulf of Adramyttium, and further E. into the centre of Mysia. Its highest summits were Cotylus on the N. and Gargara on the S.: the latter is about 5000 feet high, and is often capped with snow. Lower down, the slopes of the mountain are well-wooded; and lower still, they form fertile fields and valleys. The sources of the Scamander and the Aesepus, besides other rivers and numerous brooks, are on Ida. The mountain is celebrated in mythology, as the scene of the rape of Ganymede, whom Ovid (Fast. ii. 145) calls Idaeus puer and of the judgment of Paris, who is called Idaeus Judex by Ovid (Fast. vi. 44), and Idaeus pastor by Cicero (ad Att. i. 18). In Homer, too, its summit is the place from which the gods watch the battles in the plain of Troy. Ida was also an ancient seat of the worship of Cybele, who obtained from it the name of Idaea Mater. 2. (Psilorati), a mountain in the centre of Crete, belonging to the mountain range which runs through the whole length of the island. Mt. Ida is said to be 7674 feet above the level of the sea. It was closely connected with the worship of Zeus, who is said to have been brought up in a cave in this mountain.

Idaea Mater. [Ida.]

Idaei Dactўli. [Dactyli.]

Idălĭum (Ἰδάλιον), a town in Cyprus, sacred to Venus, who hence bore the surname Idalia.

Idas (Ἴδας), son of Aphareus and Arene, the daughter of Oebalus, brother of Lynceus, husband of Marpessa, and father of Cleopatra or Alcyone. From the name of their father, Idas and Lynceus are called Apharetidae or Apharīdae. Apollo was in love with Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus, but Idas carried her off in a winged chariot which Poseidon had given him. Evenus could not overtake Idas, but Apollo found him in Messene, and took the maiden from him. The lovers fought for her possession, but Zeus separated them, and left the decision with Marpessa, who chose Idas, from fear lest Apollo should desert her if she grew old. The Apharetidae also took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. But the most celebrated part of their story is their battle with the Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux, which is related elsewhere [p. 228, b.].

Idistavīsus Campus, a plain in Germany near the Weser, probably in the neighbourhood of the Porta Westphalica, between Rinteln and Hausberge, memorable for the victory of Germanicus over the Cherusci, A. D. 16.

Idmon (Ἴδμων), son of Apollo and Asteria, or Cyrene, was a soothsayer, and accompanied the Argonauts, although he knew beforehand that death awaited him. He was killed in the country of the Mariandynians by a boar or a serpent ; or, according to others, he died there of a disease.

Idŏmĕneus (Ἰδομενεύς). 1. Son of the Cretan Deucalion, and grandson of Minos and Pasiphae, was king of Crete. He is sometimes called Lyctius or Cnossius, from the Cretan towns of Lyctus and Cnossus. He was one of the suitors of Helen; and in conjunction with Meriones, the son of his half-brother Molus, he led the Cretans in 80 ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and distinguished himself especially in the battle near the ships. According to Homer, Idomeneus returned home in safety after the fall of Troy. Later traditions relate that once in a storm he vowed to sacrifice to Poseidon whatever he should first meet on his landing, if the god would grant him a safe return. This was his own son, whom he accordingly sacrificed. As Crete was thereupon visited by a plague, the Cretans expelled Idomeneus. He went to Italy, where he settled in Calabria, and built a temple to Athena. From thence he is said to have migrated again to Colophon, on the coast of Asia. His tomb, however, was shown at Cnosus, where he and Meriones were worshipped as heroes. — 2. Of Lampsacus, a friend and disciple of Epicurus, flourished about B. C. 310—270. He wrote several philosophical and historical works, all of which are lost. The latter were chiefly devoted to an account of the private life of the distinguished men of Greece.

Idŏthea (Εἰδοθέα), daughter of Proteus, taught Menelaus how he might secure her father, and compel him to declare in what manner he might reach home in safety.

Idrīeus or Hidrīeus (Ἰδριεύς, Ἱδριεύς), king of Caria, 2nd son of Hecatomnus, succeeded to the throne on the death of Artemisia, the widow of his brother Maussolus, in B. C. 351. He died in 344, leaving the kingdom to his sister ADA, whom he had married.

Idubĕda (Sierra de Oca and Lorenzo), a range of mountains in Spain, begins among the Cantabri, forms the S. boundary of the plain of the Ebro, and runs S.E. to the Mediterranean.

Idūmaea (Ἰδουμαία), is the Greek form of the scriptural name Edom, but the terms are not precisely equivalent. In the O. T., and in the time before the Babylonish captivity of the Jews, Edom is the district of Mt. Seir, that is, the mountainous region extending N. and S. from the Dead Sea to the E. head of the Red Sea, peopled by the descendants of Esau, and added by David to the Israelitish monarchy. The decline of the kingdom of Judaea, and at last its extinction by Nebuchadnezzar, enabled the Edomites to extend their power to the N.W. over the S. part of Judaea as far as Hebron, while their original territory was taken possession of by the Nabathaean Arabs. Thus the Idumaea of the later Jewish, and of the Roman, history is the S. part of Judaea, and a small portion of the N. of Arabia Petraea, extending N.W. and S. E. from the Mediterranean to the W. side of Mt. Seir. Under the Maccabees, the Idumaeans were again subjected to Judaea (B. C. 129), and governed, under them, by prefects (στρατηγοί), who were very probably descended from the old princes of Edom; but the internal dissensions in the Asmonaean family led at last to the establishment of an Idumaean dynasty on the Jewish throne. [ANTIPATER, Nos. 3, 4; HERODES.] The Roman writers of the Augustan age and later use Idumaea and Judaea as equivalent terms. Soon after the destruction of Jerusalem the name of Idumaea disappears from history, and is merged in that of Arabia. Both the old Edomites and the later Idumaeans were a commercial people, and carried on a great part of the traffic between the East and the shores of the Mediterranean.

Idyia (Ἰδυῖα), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of the Colchian king AEETES.

Iernē. [HIBERNIA.]

Iĕtae (Ἰεταί : Ἰετῖνος : Jato), a town in the interior of Sicily, on a mountain of the same name, S.W. of Macella.

Igīlĭum (Giglio), a small island off the Etruscan coast, opposite Cosa.

Ignatĭus (Ἰγνάτιος), one of the Apostolical Fathers, was a hearer of the Apostle John, and succeeded Evodius as bishop of Antioch in A. D. 69. He was condemned to death by Trajan at Antioch, and was taken to Rome, where he was thrown to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre. The date of his martyrdom is uncertain. Some place it in 107, but others as late as 116. On his way from Antioch to Rome, Ignatius wrote several epistles in Greek to various churches. There are extant at present 15 epistles ascribed to Ignatius, but of these only 7 are considered to be genuine ; and even these 7 are much interpolated. The ancient Syriac version of some of these epistles, which has been recently discovered, is free from many of the interpolations found in the present Greek text, and was evidently executed when the Greek text was in a state of greater purity than it is at present. The Greek text has been published in the Patres Apostolici by Cotelerius, Amsterd. 1724, and by Jacobson, Oxon. 1838 ; and the Syriac version, accompanied with the Greek text, by Cureton, Lond. 1849.

Igŭvĭum (Iguvīnus, Iguvinas, -ātis : Gubbio or Eugubio), an important town in Umbria, on the S. slope of the Apennines. On a mountain in the neighbourhood of this town was a celebrated temple of Jupiter, in the ruins of which were discovered, 4 centuries ago, 7 brazen tables, covered with Umbrian inscriptions, and which are still preserved at Gubbio. These tables, frequently called the Eugubian Tables, contain more than 1000 Umbrian words, and are of great importance for a knowledge of the ancient languages of Italy. They are explained by Grotefend, Rudimenta Linguae Umbricae, &c., Hannov. 1835, seq., and by Lepsius, Inscriptiones Umbricae et Oscae, Lips. 1841.

Ilaīra (Ἰλάειρα), daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, and sister of Phoebe. The 2 sisters are frequently mentioned by the poets under the name of Leucippidae. Both were carried off by the Dioscuri, and Ilaira became the wife of Castor.

Ileracones, Ilercaonenses, or Illurgavonenses, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis on the W. coast between the Ibērus and M. Idubĕda. Their chief town was DERTOSA.

Ilerda (Lerida), a town of the Ilergetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a height above the river Sicoris (Segre), which was here crossed by a stone bridge. It was afterwards a Roman colony, but in the time of Ausonius had ceased to be a place of importance. It was here that Afranius and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, were defeated by Caesar (B. C. 49).

Ilergētes, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees.

Ilĭa or Rhea Silvĭa. [ROMULUS.]

Ilĭci or Illĭce (Elche), a town of the Contestani on the E. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Carthago Nova to Valentia, was a colonia immunis. The modern Elche lies at a greater distance from the coast than the ancient town.

Ilienses, an ancient people in SARDINIA.

Ilĭŏna (Ἰλιόνη), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, wife of Polymnestor or Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whom she bore a son Deipylus. At the beginning of the Trojan war her brother Polydorus was intrusted to her care, and she brought him up as her own son. For details see POLYDORUS. Iliona was the name of one of the tragedies of Pacuvius. (Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 61.)

Ilĭŏneus (Ἰλιονεύς), a son of Niobe, whom Apollo would have liked to save, because he was praying ; but the arrow was no longer under the control of the god. [NIOBE.]

Ilĭpa (Pennaflor), a town in Hispania Baetica, on the right bank of the Baetis, which was navigable to this place with small vessels.

Ilissus (Ἰλισσός, more rarely Εἰλισσός), a small river in Attica, rises on the N. slope of Mt. Hymettus, receives the brook Eridanus near the Lyceum outside the walls of Athens, then flows through the E. side of Athens, and loses itself in the marshes in the Athenian plain. The Ilissus is now usually dry, as its waters are drawn off to supply the city.

Ilīthȳia (Εἰλείθυια), also called Elithyia, Ilethyia, or Eleutho, the goddess of birth, who came to the assistance of women in labour. When she was kindly disposed, she furthered the birth ; but when she was angry, she protracted the labour. In the Iliad the Ilithyiae (in the plural) are called the daughters of Hera. But in the Odyssey and Hesiod, and in the later poets in general, there is only one goddess of this name. Ilithyia was the servant of Hera, and was employed by the latter to retard the birth of Hercules. [HERCULES.] — The worship of Ilithyia appears to have been first established among the Dorians in Crete, where she was believed to have been born in a cave in the territory of Cnossus. From thence her worship spread over Delos and Attica. According to a Delian tradition Ilithyia was not born in Crete, but had come to Delos from the Hyperboreans, for the purpose of assisting Leto. In an ancient hymn attributed to Olen, which was sung in Delos, Ilithyia was called the mother of Eros (Love). It is probable that Ilithyia was originally a goddess of the moon, and hence became identified with Artemis or Diana. The moon was supposed to exercise great influence over growth in general, and consequently over that of children.

Ilĭum. [TROAS.]

Illĭbĕris (Ἰλλιβερίς). 1. (Tech), called Tichis or Techum by the Romans, a river in Gallia Narbonensis in the territory of the Sardones, rises in the Pyrenees and falls, after a short course, into the Mare Gallicum. — 2. (Elne), a town of the Santones, on the above-mentioned river, at the foot of the Pyrenees, was originally a place of importance, but afterwards sunk into insignificance. It was restored by Constantine, who changed its name into Helĕna, whence the modern Elne.

Illiturgis or Illiturgi (Andujar), an important town of the Turduli in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a steep rock near the Baetis, and on the road from Corduba to Castulo ; it was destroyed by Scipio B. C. 210, but was rebuilt, and received the name of Forum Julium.

Illȳrĭcum or Illȳris, more rarely Illyrĭa (τὸ Ἰλλυρικόν, Ἰλλυρίς, Ἰλλυρία), included, in its widest signification, all the land W. of Macedonia and E. of Italy and Rhaetia, extending S. as far as Epirus, and N. as far as the valleys of the Savus and Dravus, and the junction of these rivers with the Danube. This wide extent of country was inhabited by numerous Illyrian tribes, all of whom were more or less barbarous. They were probably of the same origin as the Thracians, but some Celts were mingled with them. The country was divided into 2 parts : 1. Illyris Barbara or Romana, the Roman province of Illyricum, extended along the Adriatic sea from Italy (Istria), from which it was separated by the Arsia, to the river Drilo, and was bounded on the E. by Macedonia and Moesia Superior, from which it was separated by the Drinus, and on the N. by Pannonia, from which it was separated by the Dravus. It thus comprehended a part of the modern Croatia, the whole of Dalmatia, almost the whole of Bosnia, and a part of Albania. It was divided in ancient times into 3 districts, according to the tribes by which it was inhabited : — Iapydia, the interior of the country on the N., from the Arsia to the Tedanius [IAPYDES] ; Liburnia, along the coast from the Arsia to the Titius [LIBURNI] ; and Dalmatia, S. of Liburnia, along the coast from the Titius to the Drilo. [DALMATIA.] The Liburnians submitted at an early time to the Romans ; but it was not till after the conquest of the Dalmatians in the reign of Augustus, that the entire country was organised as a Roman province. From this time the Illyrians, and especially the Dalmatians, formed an important part of the Roman legions. — 2. Illyris Graeca, or Illyria proper, also called Epīrus Nova, extended from the Drilo, along the Adriatic, to the Ceraunian mountains, which separated it from Epirus proper : it was bounded on the E. by Macedonia. It thus embraced the greater part of the modern Albania. It was a mountainous country, but possessed some fertile land on the coast. Its principal rivers were the AOUS, APSUS, GENUSUS, and PANYASUS. In the interior was an important lake, the LYCHNITIS. On the coast there were the Greek colonies of Epidamnus, afterwards DYRRHACHIUM, and APOLLONIA. It was at these places that the celebrated Via Egnatia commenced, which ran through Macedonia to Byzantium. The country was inhabited by various tribes, ATINTANES, TAULANTII, PARTHINI, DASSARETAE, &c. In early times they were troublesome and dangerous neighbours to the Macedonian kings. They were subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who defeated and slew in battle their king Bardylis, B. C. 359. After the death of Alexander the Great, most of the Illyrian tribes recovered their independence. At a later time the injury which the Roman trade suffered from their piracies brought against them the arms of the republic. The forces of their queen Teuta were easily defeated by the Romans, and she was obliged to purchase peace by the surrender of part of her dominions and the payment of an annual tribute, 229. The 2nd Illyrian war was finished by the Romans with the same ease. It was commenced by Demetrius of Pharos, who was guardian of Pineus, the son of Agron, but he was conquered by the consul Aemilius Paulus, 219. Pineus was succeeded by Pleuratus, who cultivated friendly relations with the Romans. His son Gentius formed an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia, against Rome; but he was conquered by the praetor L. Anicius, in the same year as Perseus, 168; whereupon Illyria, as well as Macedonia, became subject to Rome. — In the new division of the empire under Constantine, Illyricum formed one of the great provinces of the empire. It was divided into Illyricum Occidentale, which included Illyricum proper, Pannonia, and Noricum, and Illyricum Orientale, which comprehended Dacia, Moesia, Macedonia, and Thrace.

Ilus (Ἶλος). 1. Son of Dardanus by Batea, the daughter of Teucer. Ilus died without issue, and left his kingdom to his brother, Erichthonius. — 2. Son of Tros and Callirhoë, grandson of Erichthonius, and great-grandson of Dardanus; whence he is called Dardanides. He was the father of Laomedon and the grandfather of Priam. He was believed to be the founder of Ilion, which was also called Troy, after his father. Zeus gave him the palladium, a statue of 3 cubits high, with its feet close together, holding a spear in its right hand, and a distaff in its left, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, the city should be safe. The tomb of Ilus was shown in the neighbourhood of Troy. — 3. Son of Mermerus, and grandson of Jason and Medea. He lived at Ephyra, between Elis and Olympia; and when Ulysses came to him to fetch the poison for his arrows, Ilus refused it, from fear of the vengeance of the gods.

Ilva. [AETHALIA.]

Ilvātes, a people in Liguria, S. of the Po, in the modern Montferrat.

Imachăra (Imacharensis: Maccara), a town in Sicily, in the Heraean mountains.

Imăus (τὸ Ἴμαον ὄρος), the name of a great mountain range of Asia, is one of those terms which the ancient geographers appear to have used indefinitely, for want of exact knowledge. In its most definite application, it appears to mean the W. part of the Himalaya, between the Paropamisus and the Emodi Montes; but when it is applied to some great chain, extending much further to the N. and dividing Scythia into 2 parts, Scythia intra Imaum and Scythia extra Imaum, it must either be understood to mean the Moussour or Altai mountains, or else some imaginary range, which cannot be identified with any actually existing mountains.

Imbrăsus (Ἴμβρασος), a river in the island of Samos, formerly called Parthenius, flowing into the sea not far from the city of Samos. The celebrated temple of Hera (Ἥραιον) stood near it, and it gave the epithet of Imbrasia both to Hera and to Artemis.

Imbros (Ἴμβρος: Ἴμβριος; Embro or Imbrus), an island in the N. of the Aegean sea, near the Thracian Chersonesus, about 18 miles S. E. of Samothrace, and about 22 N. E. of Lemnos. It is about 25 miles in circumference, and is hilly, but contains many fertile valleys. Imbros, like the neighbouring island of Samothrace, was in ancient times one of the chief seats of the worship of the Cabiri and Hermes. There was a town of the same name on the E. of the island, of which there are still some ruins.

Inăchis (Ἰναχίς), a surname of Io, the daughter of Inachus. The goddess Isis is also called Inachis, because she was identified with Io; and sometimes Inachis is used as synonymous with an Argive or Greek woman. — Inachides in the same way was used as a name of Epaphus, a grandson of Inachus, and also of Perseus, because he was born at Argos, the city of Inachus.

Inăchus (Ἴναχος), son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Phoroneus and Aegialeus, to whom others add Io, Argos Panoptes, and Phegeus or Pegeus. He was the first king and the most ancient hero of Argos, whence the country is frequently called the land of Inachus; and he is said to have given his name to the river Inachus. The ancients made several attempts to explain the stories about Inachus: sometimes they looked upon him as a native of Argos, who, after the flood of Deucalion, led the Argives from the mountains into the plains; and sometimes they regarded him as the leader of an Egyptian or Libyan colony, which settled on the banks of the Inachus.

Inăchus (Ἴναχος). 1. (Banitza), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the mountain Lyrceus on the borders of Arcadia, flows in a S.E.-ly direction, receives near Argos the Charadrus, and falls into the Sinus Argolicus S. of Argos. — 2. A river in Acarnania, which rises in Mt. Lacmon in the range of Pindus, and falls into the Achelous.

Inărĭmē. [AENARIA.]

Inăros (Ἰνάρως, occasionally Ἴναρος), son of Psammitichus, a chief of some Libyan tribes to the W. of Egypt, commenced hostilities against the Persians, which ended in a revolt of the whole of Egypt, B.C. 461. In 460 Inaros called in the Athenians, who, with a fleet of 200 galleys, were then off Cyprus: the ships sailed up to Memphis, and, occupying two parts of the town, besieged the third. In the same year Inaros defeated the Persians in a great battle, in which Achaemenes, the brother of the king Artaxerxes, was slain. But a new army, under a new commander, Megabyzus, was more successful. The Egyptians and their allies were defeated; and Inaros was taken by treachery and crucified, 455.

Indĭa (ἡ Ἰνδία: Ἰνδός, Indus), was a name used by the Greeks and Romans, much as the modern term East Indies, to describe the whole of the S.E. part of Asia, to the E., S. and S.E. of the great ranges of mountains now called the Soliman and Himalaya Mountains, including the 2 peninsulas of Hindustan, and of Burmah, Cochin-China, Siam, and Malacca, and also the islands of the Indian Archipelago. There is ample evidence that commercial intercourse was carried on, from a very early time, between the W. coast of Hindustan and the W. parts of Asia, by the way of the Persian Gulf, the Euphrates, and across the Syrian Desert to Phoenicia, and also by way of the Red Sea and Idumaea, both to Egypt and to Phoenicia; and so on from Phoenicia to Asia Minor and Europe. The direct acquaintance of the western nations with India dates from the reign of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, who added to the Persian empire a part of its N.W. regions, perhaps only as far as the Indus, certainly not beyond the limits of the Punjab; and the slight knowledge of the country thus obtained by the Persians was conveyed to the Greeks through the inquiries of travellers, especially Herodotus, and afterwards by those Greeks who resided for some time in the Persian empire, such as CTESIAS, who wrote a special work on India (Ἰνδικά). The expedition of ALEXANDER into India first brought the Greeks into actual contact with the country; but the conquests of Alexander only extended within Scinde, and the Punjab, as far as the river HYPHASIS, down which he sailed into the Indus, and down the Indus to the sea. The Greek king of Syria, Seleucus Nicator, crossed the Hyphasis, and made war with the Prasii, a people dwelling on the banks of the upper Ganges, to whom he afterwards sent ambassadors, named Megasthenes and Daimachus, who lived for several years at Palibothra, the capital of the Prasii, and had thus the opportunity of obtaining much information respecting the parts of India about the Ganges. Megasthenes composed a work on India, which appears to have been the chief source of all the accurate information contained in the works of later writers. After the death of Seleucus Nicator, B.C. 281, the direct intercourse of the western nations with India, except in the way of commerce, ceased almost entirely; and whatever new information the later writers obtained was often very erroneous. Meanwhile, the foundation of Alexandria had created an extensive commerce between India and the West, by way of the Indian Ocean, the Red Sea, and Egypt, which made the Greeks better acquainted with the W. coast of the peninsula, and extended their knowledge further into the eastern seas; but the information they thus obtained of the countries beyond Cape Comorin was extremely vague and scanty. Another channel of information, however, was opened, during this period, by the establishment of the Greek kingdom of Bactria, to which a considerable part of N. India appears to have been subject. The later geographers made two great divisions of India, which are separated by the Ganges, and are called India intra Gangem, and India extra Gangem, the former including the peninsula of Hindustan, the latter the Burmese peninsula. They were acquainted with the division of the people of Hindustan into castes, of which they enumerate 7. It is not necessary, for the object of this work, to mention the other particulars which they relate concerning India and its people.

Indibilis and Mandonius, 2 brothers, and chiefs of the Spanish tribe of the Ilergetes, who played an important part in the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Spain during the 2nd Punic war. For some years they were faithful allies of the Carthaginians; but in consequence of the generous treatment which the wife of Mandonius and the daughters of Indibilis received from P. Scipio, when they fell into his hands, the 2 brothers deserted the Carthaginian cause, and joined Scipio in 209 with all the forces of their nation. But in 206 the illness and reported death of Scipio gave them hopes of shaking off the yoke of Rome, and they excited a general revolt not only among their own subjects, but the neighbouring Celtiberian tribes also. They were defeated by Scipio, and upon suing for forgiveness were pardoned. But when Scipio left Spain in the next year (205), they again revolted. The Roman generals whom Scipio had left in Spain forthwith marched against them; Indibilis was slain in battle, and Mandonius was taken soon afterwards and put to death.

Indicētae or Indigetes, a people in the N.E. corner of Hispania Tarraconensis, close upon the Pyrenees. Their chief town was EMPORIUM.

Indicus Oceănus. [ERYTHRAEUM MARE.]

Indigĕtes, the name of those indigenous gods and heroes at Rome, who once lived on earth as mortals, and were worshipped after their death as gods, such as Janus, Picus, Faunus, Aeneas, Evander, Hercules, Latinus, Romulus, and others. Thus Aeneas, after his disappearance on the banks of the Numicus, became a deus Indiges, pater Indiges, or Jupiter Indiges; and in like manner Romulus became Quirinus, and Latinus Jupiter Latiaris. The Indigetes are frequently mentioned together with the Lares and Penates; and many writers connect the Indigetes with those divinities to whom a share in the foundation of the Latin and Roman state is ascribed, such as Mars, Venus, Vesta, &c.

Indus or Sindus (Ἰνδός: Indus, Sind), a great river of India, rises in the table land of Thibet, N. of the Himalaya mountains, flows nearly parallel to the great bend of that chain on its N. side, till it breaks through the chain a little E. of Attock, in the N.W. corner of the Punjab, and then flows S.W. through the great plain of the Punjab, into the Erythraeum Mare (Indian Ocean), which it enters by several mouths, 2 according to the earlier Greek writers, 6 according to the later. Its chief tributaries are the Cophen (Cabul), which enters it from the N.W. at Attock, and the Acesines on the E. side. [HYPHASIS.] Like the Nile, the Indus overflows its banks, but with a much less fertilising result, as the country about its lower course is for the most part a sandy desert, and the deposit it brings down is much less rich than that of the Nile. The erroneous notions of the early Greeks respecting the connection between the S.E. parts of the continents of Africa and Asia, led to a confusion between the Indus and the Nile; but this and other mistakes were corrected by the voyage of Alexander's fleet down the Hyphasis and the Indus. The ancient name of India was derived from the native name of the Indus (Sind).

Indus (Ἰνδός: Dollomon-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rising in the S.W. of Phrygia, and flowing through the district of Cibyratis and the S.E. corner of Caria into the Mediterranean, opposite to Rhodes.

Indutiomărus, or Induciomărus, one of the leading chiefs of the Treviri in Gaul. As he was opposed to the Romans, Caesar induced the leading men of the nation to side with Cingetorix, the son-in-law but rival of Indutiomarus, B.C. 54. Indutiomarus in consequence took up arms against the Romans, but was defeated and slain by Labienus.

Inessa. [AETNA, No. 2.]

Infĕri, the gods of the Nether World, in contradistinction from the Superi, or the gods of heaven In Greek the Inferi are called οἱ κάτω, οἱ χθόνιοι, οἱ ὑπὸ γαῖαν, οἱ ἔνερθε, or οἱ ὑπένερθε θεοί; and the Superi, οἱ ἄνω, ὕπατοι and οὐράνιοι. But the word Inferi is also frequently used to designate the dead, in contradistinction from those living upon the earth; so that apud inferos is equivalent to "in Hades," or "in the lower world." The Inferi therefore comprise all the inhabitants of the lower world, the gods, viz. Hades or Pluto, his wife Persephone (Proserpina), the Erinnyes or Furies, and others, as well as the souls of departed men. The gods of the lower world are treated of in separate articles.

Infĕrum Mare. [ETRURIA.]

Ingaevŏnes. [GERMANIA, pp. 281, b., 282, a.]

Ingauni, a people in Liguria on the coast, whose chief town was ALBIUM INGAUNUM.

Ingenŭus, one of the Thirty Tyrants, was governor of Pannonia when Valerian set out upon his campaign against the Persians A. D. 258. He assumed the purple in his province, but was defeated and slain by Gallienus.

Ino (Ἰνώ), daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, and wife of Athamas. For details see ATHAMAS.

Inōus, a name both of Melicertes and of Palaemon, because they were the sons of Ino.

Insubrēs, a Gallic people, who crossed the Alps and settled in Gallia Transpadana in the N. of Italy. Their chief town was MEDIOLANUM. Next to the Boii, they were the most powerful and warlike of the Gallic tribes in Cisalpine Gaul. They were conquered by the Romans, shortly before the commencement of the 2nd Punic war.

Intaphernes (Ἰνταφέρνης), one of the 7 conspirators against the 2 Magi in Persia, B.C. 522. He was afterwards put to death by Darius.

Intĕmĕlĭi, a people in Liguria on the coast, whose chief town was ALBIUM INTEMELIUM.

Interamna (Interamnas), the name of several towns in Italy, so called from their lying between 2 streams. — 1. (Terni), an ancient municipium in Umbria, situated on the Nar, and surrounded by a canal flowing into this river, whence its inhabitants were called Interamnates Nartes. It was the birthplace of the historian Tacitus, as well as of the emperor of the same name. — 2. A town in Latium on the Via Latina, and at the junction of the Casinus with the Liris, whence its inhabitants are called Interamnates Lirinates. It was made a Roman colony, B. C. 312, but subsequently sunk into insignificance.

Intercatĭa, an important town of the Vaccaei in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Caesaraugusta.

Intercīsa or Petra Pertusa, a town in Umbria, so called because a road was here cut through the rocks by order of Vespasian. An ancient inscription on the spot still commemorates this work.

Internum Mare, the Mediterranean Sea, extended on the W. from the Straits of Hercules, which separated it from the Atlantic, to the coasts of Syria and Asia Minor on the E. In the N.E. it was usually supposed to terminate at the Hellespont. From the Straits of Hercules to the furthest shores of Syria it is 2000 miles in length; and, including the islands, it occupies an area of 734,000 square miles. It was called by the Romans Mare Internum or Intestinum; by the Greeks ἡ ἔσω θάλαττα or ἡ ἐντὸς θάλαττα, or, more fully, ἡ ἐντὸς Ἡρακλείων στηλῶν θάλαττα, and by Herodotus ἥδε ἡ θάλαττα; and from its washing the coasts both of Greece and Italy, it was also called both by Greeks and Romans Our Sea (ἡ ἡμετέρα θάλαττα, ἡ καθ' ἡμᾶς θάλαττα, Mare Nostrum). The term Mare Mediterraneum is not used by the best classical writers, and occurs first in Solinus. Most of the ancients believed that the Mediterranean received its waters from the Atlantic, and poured them through the Hellespont and the Propontis into the Euxine; but others, on the contrary, maintained that the waters came from the Euxine into the Mediterranean. The ebb and flow of the tide are perceptible in only a few parts of the Mediterranean, such as in the Syrtes on the coast of Africa, in the Adriatic, &c. The different parts of the Mediterranean are called by different names, which are spoken of in separate articles. See MARE TYRRHENUM or INFERUM, ADRIA or M. ADRIATICUM or M. SUPERUM, M. SICULUM, M. AEGAEUM, &c.

Intonsus, the Unshorn, a surname of Apollo and Bacchus, in allusion to the eternal youth of these gods, since the Greek youths allowed their hair to grow until they attained manhood.

Inŭi Castrum. [CASTRUM, No. 1.]

Inȳcum (Ἴνυκον or -ος: Ἰνυκῖνος: Calda Bellota?), a small town in the S. of Sicily, not far from Selinus, on the river Hypsas.

Io (Ἰώ), daughter of Inachus, the first king of Argos, or, according to others, of Iasus or Piren. Zeus loved Io, but on account of Hera's jealousy, he metamorphosed her into a white heifer. The goddess, who was aware of the change, obtained the heifer from Zeus, and placed her under the care of Argus Panoptes; but Zeus sent Hermes to slay Argus and deliver Io. [ARGUS.] Hera then tormented Io with a gad-fly, and drove her in a state of phrenzy from land to land over the whole earth, until at length she found rest on the banks of the Nile. Here she recovered her original form, and bore a son to Zeus, called Epaphus. [EPAPHUS.] This is the common story, which appears to be very ancient, since Homer constantly gives the epithet of Argiphontes (the slayer of Argus) to Hermes. The wanderings of Io were very celebrated in antiquity, and were extended and embellished with the increase of geographical knowledge. Of these there is a full account in the Prometheus of Aeschylus. The Bosporus is said to have derived its name from her swimming across it. According to some traditions Io married Telegonus, king of Egypt, and was afterwards identified with Isis. — The legend of Io is difficult to explain. It appears that Io was identical with the moon; which is probably signified by her being represented as a woman, with the horns of a heifer. Her connection with Egypt seems to be an invention of later times, and was probably suggested by the resemblance which was found to exist between the Argive Io and the Egyptian Isis.

Iol. [CAESAREA, No. 4.]

Iolaenses. [IOLAUS.]

Iŏlāus (Ἰόλαος), son of Iphicles and Automedusa. Iphicles was the half-brother of Hercules, and Iolaus was the faithful companion and charioteer of the hero. [HERCULES.] He assisted Hercules in slaying the Lernaean Hydra. After Hercules had instituted the Olympic games, Iolaus won the victory with the horses of his master. Hercules sent him to Sardinia at the head of his sons whom he had by the daughters of Thespius. He introduced civilisation among the inhabitants of that island, and was worshipped by them. From Sardinia he went to Sicily, and then returned to Hercules shortly before the death of the latter. After the death of the hero, Iolaus was the first who offered sacrifices to him as a demigod. According to Pausanias, Iolaus died in Sardinia, whereas, according to others, he was buried in the tomb of his grandfather, Amphitryon. His descendants in Sardinia were called Ἰολαεῖς and Iolaenses. [SARDINIA.] Iolaus after his death obtained permission from the gods of the Nether World to come to the assistance of the children of Hercules. He slew Eurystheus, and then returned to the shades.

Iolcus (Ἰωλκός, Ep. Ἰαωλκός, Dor. Ἰαλκός: Ἰώλκιος), an ancient town in Magnesia in Thessaly at the top of the Pagasaean gulf, 7 stadia from the sea. It is said to have been founded by the mythical Cretheus, and to have been colonised by Minyans from Orchomenus. It was celebrated in mythology as the residence of Pelias and Jason, and as the place from which the Argonauts sailed in quest of the golden fleece. At a later time it fell into decay, and its inhabitants were removed to the neighbouring town of Demetrias, which was founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Iŏlē (Ἰόλη), daughter of Eurytus of Oechalia, was beloved by Hercules. For details see p. 310. After the death of Hercules, she married his son Hyllus.

Iollas or Iolāus (Ἰόλλας or Ἰόλαος). 1. Son of Antipater, and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He was cup-bearer to Alexander at the period of his last illness. Those writers who adopt the idea of the king having been poisoned, represent Iollas as the person who actually administered the fatal draught. — 2. Of Bithynia, a writer on materia medica, flourished in the 3rd century B. C.

Ion (Ἴων). 1. The fabulous ancestor of the Ionians, is described as the son of Apollo by Creusa, the daughter of Erectheus and wife of Xuthus. The most celebrated story about Ion is the one which forms the subject of the Ion of Euripides. Apollo had visited Creusa in a cave below the Propylaea, at Athens; and when she gave birth to a son, she exposed him in the same cave. The god, however, had the child conveyed to Delphi, where he was educated by a priestess. Some time afterwards Xuthus and Creusa came to consult the oracle about the means of obtaining an heir. They received for answer that the first human being which Xuthus met on leaving the temple should be his son. Xuthus met Ion, and acknowledged him as his son; but Creusa, imagining him to be a son of her husband by a former mistress, caused a cup to be presented to the youth, which was filled with the poisonous blood of a dragon. However, her object was discovered, for as Ion, before drinking, poured out a libation to the gods, a pigeon which drank of it died on the spot. Creusa thereupon fled to the altar of the god. Ion dragged her away, and was on the point of killing her, when a priestess interfered, explained the mystery, and showed that Ion was the son of Creusa. Mother and son thus became reconciled, but Xuthus was not let into the secret. —Among the inhabitants of the Aegialus, i. e. the N. coast of Peloponnesus, who were Ionians, there was another tradition current. Xuthus, when expelled from Thessaly, came to the Aegialus. After his death Ion was on the point of marching against the Aegialeans, when their king Selinus gave him his daughter Helice in marriage. On the death of Selinus, Ion succeeded to the throne, and thus the Aegialeans received the name of Ionians, and the town of Helice was built in honour of Ion's wife. — Other traditions represent Ion as king of Athens between the reigns of Erechtheus and Cecrops; for it is said that his assistance was called in by the Athenians in their war with the Eleusinians, that he conquered Eumolpus, and then became king of Athens. He there became the father of 4 sons, Geleon, Aegicores, Argades, and Hoples, whose names were given to the 4 Athenian classes. After his death he was buried at Potamus. —2. Of Chios, son of Orthomenes, was a celebrated tragic poet. He went to Athens when young, and there enjoyed the society of Aeschylus and Cimon. The number of his tragedies is variously stated at 12, 30, and 40. We have the titles and a few fragments of 11. Ion also wrote other kinds of poetry, and prose works both in history and philosophy. — 3. Of Ephesus, a rhapsodist in the time of Socrates, from whom one of Plato's dialogues is named.

Iōnĭa (Ἰωνία: Ἴωνες) and Iōnis (Rom. poet.), a district on the W. coast of Asia Minor, so called from the Ionian Greeks who colonized it at a time earlier than any distinct historical records. The mythical account of "the great Ionic migration" relates that in consequence of the disputes between the sons of Codrus, king of Athens, about the succession to his government, his younger sons, Neleus and Androclus, resolved to seek a new home beyond the Aegean Sea. Attica was at the time overpeopled by numerous exiles, whom the great revolution, known as "the return of the Heraclidae," had driven out of their own states, the chief of whom were the Ionians who had been expelled from Peloponnesus by the Dorian invaders. A large portion of this superfluous population went forth as Athenian colonists, under the leadership of Androclus and Neleus, and of other chieftains of other races, and settled on that part of the W. shores of Asia Minor which formed the coast of Lydia and part of Caria, and also in the adjacent islands of Chios and Samos, and in the Cyclades. The mythical chronology places this great movement 140 years after the Trojan war, or 60 years after the return of the Heraclidae, that is in B. C. 1060 or 1044, according to the 2 chief dates imagined for the Trojan war. Passing from mythology to history, the earliest authentic records show us the existence of 12 great cities on the above-named coast, claiming to be (though some of them only partially) of Ionic origin, and all united into one confederacy, similar to that of the 12 ancient Ionian cities on the N. coast of the Peloponnesus. The district they possessed formed a narrow strip of coast, extending between, and somewhat beyond, the mouths of the rivers Maeander, on the S., and Hermus, on the N. The names of the 12 cities, going from S. to N., were MILETUS, MYUS, PRIENE, SAMOS (city and island), EPHESUS, COLOPHON, LEBEDUS, TEOS, ERYTHRAE, CHIOS (city and island), CLAZOMENAE, and PHOCAEA; the first 3 on the coast of Caria, the rest on that of Lydia: the city of Smyrna, which lay within this district, but was of Aeolic origin, was afterwards (about B. C. 700) added to the Ionian confederacy. The common sanctuary of the league was the Panionium (πανιώνιον), a sanctuary of Poseidon Heliconius, on the N. side of the promontory of Mycale, opposite to Samos; and here was held the great national assembly (πανήγυρις) of the confederacy, called Panionia (πανιόνια: see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.). It is very important to observe that the inhabitants of these cities were very far from being exclusively and purely of Ionian descent. The traditions of the original colonization and the accounts of the historians agree in representing them as peopled by a great mixture, not only of Hellenic races, but also of these with the earlier inhabitants, such as Carians, Leleges, Lydians, Cretans, and Pelasgians; their dialects, Herodotus expressly tells us, were very different, and nearly all of them were founded on the sites of pre-existing native settlements. The religious rites, also, which the Greeks of Ionia observed, in addition to their national worship of Poseidon, were borrowed in part from the native peoples; such were the worship of Apollo Didymaeus at Branchidae near Miletus, of Artemis at Ephesus, and of Apollo Clarius at Colophon. All these facts point to the conclusion, that the Greek colonization of this coast was effected, not by one, but by successive emigrations from different states, but chiefly of the Ionic race. The central position of this district, its excellent harbours, and the fertility of its plains, watered by the Maeander, the Caÿster, and the Hermus, combined with the energetic character of the Ionian race to confer a high degree of prosperity upon these cities; and it was not long before they began to send forth colonies to many places on the shores of the Mediterranean and the Euxine, and even to Greece itself. During the rise of the Lydian empire, the cities of Ionia preserved their independence until the reign of Croesus, who subdued those on the mainland, but relinquished his design of attacking the islands. When Cyrus had overthrown Croesus, he sent his general Harpagus to complete the conquest of the Ionic Greeks, B. C. 545. Under the Persian rule, they retained their political organization, subject to the government of the Persian satraps, and of tyrants who were set up in single cities, but they were required to render tribute and military service to the king. In B. C. 500 they revolted from Darius Hystaspis, under the leadership of HISTIAEUS, the former tyrant of Miletus, and his brother-in-law ARISTAGORAS, and supported by aid from the Athenians. The Ionian army advanced as far as Sardis, which they took and burnt, but they were driven back to the coast, and defeated near Ephesus B. C. 499. The reconquest of Ionia by the Persians was completed by the taking of Miletus, in 496, and the Ionians were compelled to furnish ships, and to serve as soldiers, in the 2 expeditions against Greece. After the defeat of Xerxes, the Greeks carried the war to the coasts of Asia, and effected the liberation of Ionia by the victories of Mycale (479), and of the Eurymedon (469). In 387 the peace of Antalcidas restored Ionia to Persia; and after the Macedonian conquest, it formed part, successively, of the kingdom of Pergamus, and of the Roman province of Asia. For the history of the several cities, see the respective articles. In no country inhabited by the Hellenic race, except at Athens, were the refinements of civilisation, the arts, and literature, more highly cultivated than in Ionia. The restless energy and free spirit of the Ionic race, the riches gained by commerce, and the neighbourhood of the great seats of Asiatic civilisation, combined to advance with rapidity the intellectual progress and the social development of its people; but these same influences, unchecked by the rigid discipline of the Doric race, or the simple earnestness of the Aeolic, imbued their social life with luxury and licence, and invested their works of genius with the hues of enchanting beauty at the expense of severe good taste and earnest purpose. Out of the long list of the authors and artists of Ionia, we may mention Mimnermus of Colophon, the first poet of the amatory elegy; Anacreon of Teos, who sang of love and wine to the music of the lyre; Thales of Miletus, Anaxagoras of Clazomenae, and several other early philosophers; the early annalists, Cadmus, Dionysius, and Hecataeus, all of Miletus; and, in the fine arts, besides being the home of that exquisitely beautiful order of architecture, the Ionic, and possessing many of the most magnificent temples in the world, Ionia was the native country of that refined school of painting, which boasted the names of Zeuxis, Apelles, and Parrhasius. The most flourishing period in the history of Ionia is that during which it was subject to Persia; but its prosperity lasted till the decline of the Roman empire, under which its cities were among the chief resorts of the celebrated teachers of rhetoric and philosophy. The important place which some of the chief cities of Ionia occupy in the early history of Christianity, is attested by the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of St. Paul to the Ephesians, and of St. John to the 7 churches of Asia.

Iŏnĭum Mare (Ἰόνιος πόντος, Ἰόνιον πέλαγος, Ἰονίη θάλαττα, Ἰόνιος πόρος), a part of the Mediterranean Sea between Italy and Greece, was S. of the Adriatic, and began on the W. at Hydruntum in Calabria, and on the E. at Oricus in Epirus, or at the Ceraunian mountains. In more ancient times the Adriatic was called Ἰόνιος μυχὸς or Ἰόνιος κόλπος; while at a later time the Ionium Mare itself was included in the Adriatic. In its widest signification the Ionium Mare included the Mare Siculum, Creticum and Icarium. Its name was usually derived by the ancients from the wanderings of Io, but it was more probably so called from the Ionian colonies, which settled in Cephallenia and the other islands off the W. coasts of Greece.

Iŏphon (Ἰοφῶν), son of Sophocles, by Nicostrate, was a distinguished tragic poet. He brought out tragedies during the life of his father, and was still flourishing in B. C. 405, the year in which Aristophanes brought out the Frogs. For the celebrated story of his undutiful charge against his father, see SOPHOCLES.

Iphĭas (Ἰφιάς), i. e. Evadne, a daughter of Iphis, and wife of Capaneus.

Iphicles or Iphiclus (Ἰφικλῆς, Ἴφικλος or Ἰφικλεύς). 1. Son of Amphitryon and Alcmene of Thebes, was one night younger than his half-brother Hercules. He was first married to Automedusa, the daughter of Alcathous, by whom he became the father of Iolaus, and afterwards to the youngest daughter of Creon. He accompanied Hercules on several of his expeditions, and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. He fell in battle against the sons of Hippocoon, or, according to another account, was wounded in the battle against the Molionidae, and was carried to Pheneus, where he died. — 2. Son of Thestius by Laophonte or Deïdamia or Eurythemis or Leucippe. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the expedition of the Argonauts. — 3. Son of Phylacus, and grandson of Deion and Clymene, or son of Cephalus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. He was married to Diomedia or Astyoche, and was the father of Podarces and Protesilaus. He was also one of the Argonauts; and he possessed large herds of oxen, which he gave to the seer Melampus. He was also celebrated for his swiftness in running.

Iphicrătes (Ἰφικράτης), the famous Athenian general, was the son of a shoemaker. He distinguished himself at an early age by his gallantry in battle; and in B.C. 394, when he was only 25 years of age, he was appointed by the Athenians to the command of the forces which they sent to the aid of the Boeotians after the battle of Coronea. In 393 he commanded the Athenian forces at Corinth, and at the same time introduced an important improvement in military tactics — the formation of a body of targeteers (πελτασταί) possessing, to a certain extent, the advantages of heavy and light-armed forces. This he effected by substituting a small target for the heavy shield, adopting a longer sword and spear, and replacing the old coat of mail by a linen corslet. At the head of his targeteers he defeated and nearly destroyed a Spartan Mora in the following year (392), an exploit which became very celebrated throughout Greece. In the same year he was succeeded in the command at Corinth by Chabrias. In 389 he was sent to the Hellespont to oppose Anaxibius, who was defeated by him and slain in the following year. On the peace of Antalcidas, in 387, Iphicrates went to Thrace to assist Seuthes, king of the Odrysae, but he soon afterwards formed an alliance with Cotys, who gave him his daughter in marriage. In 377 Iphicrates was sent by the Athenians, with the command of a mercenary force, to assist Pharnabazus, in reducing Egypt to subjection; but the expedition failed through a misunderstanding between Iphicrates and Pharnabazus. In 373 Iphicrates was sent to Corcyra, in conjunction with Callistratus and Chabrias, in the command of an Athenian force, and he remained in the Ionian sea till the peace of 371 put an end to hostilities. About 367, he was sent against Amphipolis, and after carrying on the war against this place for 3 years, was superseded by Timotheus. Shortly afterwards, he assisted his father-in-law Cotys, in his war against Athens for the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus. But his conduct in this matter was passed over by the Athenians. After the death of Chabrias (357) Iphicrates, Timotheus, and Menestheus were joined with Chares as commanders in the Social War, and were prosecuted by their unscrupulous colleague, because they had refused to risk an engagement in a storm. Iphicrates was acquitted. From the period of his trial he seems to have lived quietly at Athens. He died before 348. Iphicrates has been commended for his combined prudence and energy as a general. The worst words, he said, that a commander could utter were, "I should not have expected it." His services were highly valued by the Athenians, and were rewarded by them with almost unprecedented honours.

Iphĭgĕnīa (Ἰφιγένεια), according to the most common tradition, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, but according to others, a daughter of Theseus and Helena, and brought up by Clytaemnestra as a foster-child. Agamemnon had once killed a stag in the grove of Artemis; or he had boasted that the goddess herself could not hit better; or he had vowed in the year in which Iphigenia was born to sacrifice the most beautiful production of that year, but had afterwards neglected to fulfil his vow. One of these circumstances is said to have been the cause of the calm which detained the Greek fleet in Aulis, when the Greeks wanted to sail against Troy. The seer Calchas declared that the sacrifice of Iphigenia was the only means of propitiating Artemis. Agamemnon was obliged to yield, and Iphigenia was brought to Chalcis under the pretext of being married to Achilles. When Iphigenia was on the point of being sacrificed, Artemis carried her in a cloud to Tauris, where she became the priestess of the goddess, and a stag was substituted for her by Artemis. While Iphigenia was serving Artemis as priestess in Tauris, her brother Orestes and his friend Pylades came to Tauris to carry off the image of the goddess at this place, which was believed to have fallen from heaven. As strangers they were to be sacrificed in the temple of Artemis; but Iphigenia recognised her brother, and fled with him and the statue of the goddess. In the meantime Electra, another sister of Orestes, had heard that he had been sacrificed in Tauris by the priestess of Artemis. At Delphi she met Iphigenia, whom she supposed had murdered Orestes. She therefore resolved to deprive Iphigenia of her sight, but was prevented by the interference of Orestes; and a scene of recognition took place. All now returned to Mycenae; but Iphigenia carried the statue of Artemis to the Attic town of Brauron near Marathon. She there died as priestess of the goddess. — As a daughter of Theseus Iphigenia was connected with the heroic families of Attica, and after her death the veils and most costly garments which had been worn by women who had died in childbirth were dedicated to her. According to some traditions Iphigenia never died but was changed by Artemis into Hecate, or was endowed by the goddess with immortality and eternal youth, and under the name of Orilochia became the wife of Achilles in the island of Leuce. — The Lacedaemonians maintained that the image of Artemis, which Iphigenia and Orestes had carried away from Tauris, was preserved in Sparta and not in Attica, and was worshipped in the former place under the name of Artemis Orthia. Both in Attica and in Sparta human sacrifices were offered to Iphigenia in early times. In place of these human sacrifices the Spartan youths were afterwards scourged at the festival of Artemis Orthia. It appears probable that Iphigenia was originally the same as Artemis herself.

Iphĭmĕdīa or Iphĭmĕdē (Ἰφιμέδεια, Ἰφιμέδη), daughter of Triops, and wife of Aloeus. Being in love with Poseidon, she often walked on the seashore, and collected its waters in her lap, whence she became, by Poseidon, the mother of the Aloïdae, Otus and Ephialtes. While Iphimedia and her daughter, Pancratis, were celebrating the orgies of Dionysus on Mount Drius, they were carried off by Thracian pirates to Naxos or Strongyle; but they were delivered by the Aloïdae.

Iphis (Ἶφις). 1. Son of Alector, and father of Eteoclus and Evadne, the wife of Capaneus, was king of Argos. He advised Polynices to give the celebrated necklace of Harmonia to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband Amphiaraus to take part in the expedition against Thebes. He lost his two children, and therefore left his kingdom to Sthenelus, son of Capaneus. — 2. Son of Sthenelus, and brother of Eurystheus, was one of the Argonauts who fell in the battle with Aeetes. — 3. A youth in love with Anaxarete. [ANAXARETE.] — 4. Daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Phaestus in Crete. She was brought up as a boy, on the advice of Isis, because her father, previous to her birth, had ordered the child to be killed, if it should be a girl. When Iphis had grown up, and was to be betrothed to Ianthe, she was metamorphosed by Isis into a youth.

Iphĭtus (Ἴφιτος). 1. Son of Eurytus of Oechalia, one of the Argonauts, was afterwards killed by Hercules. (For details, see p. 310, a.) — 2. Son of Naubolus, and father of Schedius, Epistrophus, and Eurynome, in Phocis, likewise one of the Argonauts. — 3. Son of Haemon, or Praxonides, or Iphitus, king of Elis, restored the Olympic games, and instituted the cessation of all war during their celebration, B. C. 884.

Ipsus (Ἴψος), a small town in Great Phrygia, celebrated in history as the scene of the decisive battle which closed the great contest between the generals of Alexander for the succession to his empire, and in which Antigonus was defeated and slain, B. C. 301. [ANTIGONUS.] The site is unknown, but it appears to have been about the centre of Phrygia, not far from SYNNADA.

Ira (Εἶρα, Ἰρά), a mountain fortress in Messenia, memorable as the place where Aristomenes defended himself for 11 years against the Spartans. Its capture by the Spartans in B. C. 668 put an end to the 2nd Messenian war. It is doubtful whether it is the same as Ira (Il. ix. 150), one of the 7 cities, which Agamemnon promised to Achilles.

Irēnaeus (Εἰρηναῖος), one of the early Christian fathers, was probably born at Smyrna between A.D. 120 and 140. In his early youth he heard Polycarp. He afterwards went to Gaul, and in 177 succeeded Pothinus as bishop of Lyon. He made many converts from heathenism, and was most active in opposing the Gnostics, especially the Valentinians. He seems to have lived till about the end of the 2nd century. The only work of Irenaeus now extant, Adversus Haereses, is intended to refute the Gnostics. The original Greek is lost, with the exception of a few fragments, but the work exists in a barbarous, but ancient Latin version. Edited by Grabe, Oxon. 1702.

Irēnē (Εἰρήνη), called Pax by the Romans, the goddess of peace, was, according to Hesiod, a daughter of Zeus and Themis, and one of the Horae. [HORAE.] After the victory of Timotheus over the Lacedaemonians, altars were erected to her at Athens at the public expense. Her statue at Athens stood by the side of that of Amphiaraus, carrying in its arms Plutus, the god of wealth, and another stood near that of Hestia in the Prytaneum. At Rome, where peace was also worshipped as a goddess, she had a magnificent temple, which was built by the emperor Vespasian. Pax is represented on coins as a youthful female, holding in her left arm a cornucopia, and in her right hand an olive branch or the staff of Mercury. Sometimes she appears in the act of burning a pile of arms, or carrying corn-ears in her hand or upon her head.

Iris (Ἶρις), daughter of Thaumas (whence she is called Thaumantias) and of Electra, and sister of the Harpies. In the Iliad she appears as the messenger of the gods, especially of Zeus and Hera. In the Odyssey, Hermes is the messenger of the gods, and Iris is never mentioned. Iris appears to have been originally the personification of the rainbow, for this brilliant phenomenon in the skies, which vanishes as quickly as it appears, was regarded as the swift messenger of the gods. Some poets describe Iris as the rainbow itself, but other writers represent the rainbow as only the road on which Iris travels, and which therefore appears whenever the goddess wants it, and vanishes when it is no longer needed. In the earlier poets, Iris appears as a virgin goddess; but in the later, she is the wife of Zephyrus, and the mother of Eros. Iris is represented in works of art dressed in a long and wide tunic, over which hangs a light upper garment, with wings attached to her shoulders, carrying the herald's staff in her left hand, and sometimes also holding a pitcher.

Iris (Ἶρις: Yeshil-Irmak), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises on the N. side of the N.most range of the Anti-Taurus, in the S. of Pontus, and flows first W. past Comana Pontica, then N. to Amasia, where it turns to the E. to Eupatoria (Megalopolis), where it receives the Lycus, and then flows N. through the territory of Themiscyra into the Sinus Amisenus. Xenophon states its breadth at 3 plethra.

Irus (Ἶρος). 1. Son of Actor, and father of Eurydamus and Eurytion. He purified Peleus, when the latter had murdered his brother; but during the chase of the Calydonian boar, Peleus unintentionally killed Eurytion, the son of Irus. Peleus endeavoured to soothe him by offering him his flocks; but Irus would not accept them, and at the command of an oracle, Peleus allowed them to run wherever they pleased. A wolf devoured the sheep, but was thereupon changed into a stone, which was shown, in later times, on the frontier between Locris and Phocis. — 2. The well-known beggar of Ithaca. His real name was Arnaeus, but he was called Irus because he was the messenger of the suitors of Penelope. He was slain by Ulysses.

Is (Ἶς: Hit), a city in the S. of Mesopotamia, 8 days' journey from Babylon, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, and upon a little river of the same name. In its neighbourhood were the springs of asphaltus, from which was obtained the bitumen that was used, instead of mortar, in the walls of Babylon.

Isaeus (Ἰσαῖος). 1. One of the 10 Attic orators, was born at Chalcis, and came to Athens at an early age. He was instructed in oratory by Lysias and Isocrates. He was afterwards engaged in writing judicial orations for others, and established a rhetorical school at Athens, in which Demosthenes is said to have been his pupil. It is further said that Isaeus composed for Demosthenes the speeches against his guardians, or at least assisted him in the composition. We have no particulars of his life. He lived between B. C. 420 and 348. Isaeus is said to have written 64 orations, but of these only 11 are extant. They all relate to questions of inheritance, and afford considerable information respecting this branch of the Attic law. The style of Isaeus is clear and concise, and at the same time vigorous and powerful. His orations are contained in the collections of the Greek orators. [DEMOSTHENES.] There is a good separate edition by Schömann, Greifswald, 1831. — 2. A sophist and rhetorician, a native of Assyria, taught at Rome in the time of the younger Pliny.

Isăgŏras (Ἰσαγόρας), the leader of the oligarchical party at Athens, in opposition to Clisthenes, B. C. 510. He was expelled from Athens by the popular party, although supported by Cleomenes and the Spartans.

Isander (Ἴσανδρος), son of Bellerophon, killed by Ares in the fight with the Solymi.

Isăra (Isère), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, descends from the Graian Alps, flows W. with a rapid stream, and flows into the Rhone N. of Valentia. At its junction with the Rhone Fabius Aemilianus defeated the Allobroges and Arverni, B. C. 121.

Isaurĭa (ἡ Ἰσαυρία, ἡ Ἰσαυρική), a district of Asia Minor, on the N. side of the Taurus, between Pisidia and Cilicia, of which the ancients knew little beyond the troublesome fact, that its inhabitants, the Isauri (Ἴσαυροι) were daring robbers, whose incursions into the surrounding districts received only a temporary check from the victory over them, which gained for L. Servilius the surname of Isauricus (B. C. 75). Their chief city was called Isaura.

Isca. 1. (Axminster or Bridport or Exeter), the capital of the Damnonii or Dumnonii in the S.W. of Britain. — 2. (Caer Leon, at the mouth of the Usk), a town of the Silures in Britain, and the head quarters of the Legio II. There are many Roman remains at Caer Leon. The word Leon is a corruption of Legio: Caer is the old Celtic name.

Ischys. [AESCULAPIUS.]

Isidōrus (Ἰσίδωρος). 1. Of Aegae, a Greek poet of uncertain age, 5 of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology. — 2. Of Charax, a geographical writer, who probably lived under the early Roman emperors. His work, Σταθμοὶ Παρθικοί, is printed in the edition of the minor geographers, by Hudson, Oxon. 1703. — 3. Of Gaza, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, the friend of Proclus and Marinus, whom he succeeded as chief of the school. — 4. Of Pelusium, a Christian exegetical writer, a native of Alexandria, who spent his life in a monastery near Pelusium, of which he was the abbot. He died about A. D. 450. As many as 2013 of his letters are extant. They are almost all expositions of Scripture. Published at Paris, 1638. — 5. Bishop of Hispalis (Seville) in Spain, from A. D. 600 to 636, one of the most learned men of his age, and an ardent cultivator of ancient literature. A great number of his works is still extant, but by far the most important of them is his Originum s. Etymologiarum Libri XX. This work is an Encyclopaedia of Arts and Sciences, and treats of all subjects in literature, science, and religion, which were studied at that time. It was much used in the middle ages. Published in the Corpus Grammaticorum Veterum, Lindemann, Lips. 1833. A complete collection of the works of Isidorus was published by Arevali, Rom., 1797—1803, 7 vols. 4to. — 6. Of Miletus, the elder and younger, were eminent architects in the reign of Justinian.

Isĭgŏnus (Ἰσίγονος), a Greek writer, of uncertain date, but who lived before the time of Pliny, wrote a work entitled Ἄπιστα, a few fragments of which are extant. Published in Westermann's Paradoxographi, Brunswick, 1839.

Isĭonda (Ἰσιόνδα: Ἰσιονδεύς, Isiondensis), a city of Pisidia in Asia Minor, E. of the district of Cibyra, and 5 Roman miles N.W. of Termessus. Mr. Fellows lately discovered considerable ruins 12 miles from Perge, which he supposes to be those of Isionda.

Isis (Ἶσις), one of the principal Egyptian divinities. The ideas entertained about her underwent very great changes in antiquity. She is described as the wife of Osiris and the mother of Horus. As Osiris, the god of the Nile, taught the people the use of the plough, so Isis invented the cultivation of wheat and barley, which were carried about in the processions at her festival. She was the goddess of the earth, which the Egyptians called their mother: whence she and Osiris were the only divinities that were worshipped by all the Egyptians. This simple and primitive notion of the Egyptians was modified at an early period through the influence of the East, with which Egypt came into contact, and at a later time through the influence of the Greeks. Thus Osiris and Isis came gradually to be considered as divinities of the sun and the moon. The Egyptian priests represented that the principal religious institutions of Greece came from Egypt; and after the time of Herodotus, this belief became established among the learned men in Greece. Hence Isis was identified with Demeter, and Osiris with Dionysus, and the sufferings of Isis were accordingly modified to harmonise with the mythus of the unfortunate Demeter. As Isis was the goddess of the moon, she was also identified with Io. [Io.] — The worship of Isis prevailed extensively in Greece. It was introduced into Rome in the time of Sulla; and though the senate made many attempts to suppress her worship, and ordered her temples to be destroyed, yet the new religious rites took deep root at Rome, and became very popular. In B. C. 43 the triumvirs courted the popular favour by building a new temple of Isis and Serapis. Augustus forbade any temples to be erected to Isis in the city; but this command was afterwards disregarded; and under the early Roman emperors the worship of Isis and Serapis became firmly established. The most important temple of Isis at Rome stood in the Campus Martius, whence she was called Isis Campensis. The priests and servants of the goddess wore linen garments, whence she herself is called linigera. Those initiated in her mysteries wore in the public processions masks representing the heads of dogs. In works of art Isis appears in figure and countenance like Hera: she wears a long tunic, and her upper garment is fastened on her breast by a knot: her head is crowned with a lotus flower, and her right hand holds the sistrum. Her son Horus is often represented with her as a fine naked boy, holding the fore-finger on the mouth, with a lotus flower on his head, and a cornucopia in his left hand. The German goddess Isis mentioned by Tacitus is probably the same as Hertha.

Ismărus (Ἴσμαρος: Ἰσμάριος), a town in Thrace, near Maronēa, situated on a mountain of the same name, which produced excellent wine. It is mentioned in the Odyssey as a town of the Cicones. Near it was the lake Ismăris (Ἰσμαρίς). The poets frequently use the adjective Ismarius as equivalent to Thracian. Thus Ovid calls Tereus, king of Thrace, Ismarius tyrannus (Am. ii. 6. 7), and Polymnestor, king of Thrace, Ismarius rex (Met. xiii. 530).

Ismēnē (Ἰσμήνη). 1. Daughter of Asopus, wife of Argus, and mother of Iasus and Io. — 2. Daughter of Oedipus and Jocasta, and sister of Antigone.

Ismēnus (Ἰσμηνος), a small river in Boeotia, which rises in Mt. Cithaeron, flows through Thebes, and falls into the lake Hylica. The brook Dirce, so celebrated in Theban story, flowed into the Ismenus. From this river Apollo was called Ismenius. His temple, the Ismenium, at which the festival of the Daphnephoria was celebrated, was situated outside the city. The river is said to have been originally called Ladon, and to have derived its subsequent name from Ismenus, a son of Asopus and Metope. According to other traditions, Ismenus was a son of Amphion and Niobe, who when struck by the arrow of Apollo leaped into a river near Thebes, which was hence called Ismenus.

Isŏcrătes (Ἰσοκράτης), one of the 10 Attic orators, was the son of Theodorus, and was born at Athens B. C. 436. Theodorus was a man of wealth, and educated his son with the greatest care. Among his teachers were Tisias, Gorgias, Prodicus, and also Socrates. Since Isocrates was naturally timid, and of a weakly constitution, he did not come forward as a public speaker himself, but devoted himself to giving instruction in oratory, and writing orations for others. He first taught rhetoric in Chios, and afterwards at Athens. At the latter place he met with great success, and gradually acquired a large fortune by his profession. He had 100 pupils, every one of whom paid him 1000 drachmae. He also derived a large income from the orations which he wrote for others; thus, he received 20 talents for the speech which he composed for Nicocles, king of Cyprus. Although Isocrates took no part in public affairs, he was an ardent lover of his country; and, accordingly, when the battle of Chaeronea had destroyed the last hopes of freedom, he put an end to his life, B. C. 338, at the age of 98. — The school of Isocrates exercised the greatest influence upon the development of public oratory at Athens. No other rhetorician had so many disciples of celebrity. The language of Isocrates forms a great contrast with the natural simplicity of Lysias, as well as with the sublime power of Demosthenes. His style is artificial. The carefully-rounded periods, and the frequent application of figurative expressions, are features which remind us of the sophists. The immense care he bestowed upon the composition of his orations may be inferred from the statement, that he was engaged for 10, or, according to others, 15 years, upon his Panegyric oration alone. There were in antiquity 60 orations which went under the name of Isocrates, but they were not all recognised as genuine. Only 21 have come down to us. Of these 8 were written for the courts; all the others are political discourses, intended to be read by a large public. The most celebrated is his Panegyric oration, in which he shows what services Athens had rendered to Greece in every period of her history, and contends that she, and not Sparta, deserves the supremacy in Greece. The orations are printed in the collections of the Greek orators. The best separate edition is by Baiter and Sauppe, Turici, 1839.

Issa (Ἴσσα), daughter of Macareus of Lesbos, and beloved by Apollo, from whom the Lesbian town of Issa is said to have received its name.

Issa (Issaeus: Lissa), a small island in the Adriatic sea, with a town of the same name, off the coast of Dalmatia, was colonized at an early period by Greeks. It was inhabited by a hardy race of sailors, whose barks (lembi Issaei) were much prized. The Issaei placed themselves under the protection of the Romans, when they were attacked by the Illyrian queen, Teuta, B. C. 229; and their town is spoken of as a place of importance in Caesar's time.

Issĕdŏnes (Ἰσσηδόνες), a Scythian tribe, in Scythia extra Imaum, the E.most people with whom the Greeks of the time of Herodotus had any intercourse. Their country was in Great Tartary, near the Massagetae, whom they resembled in their manners. They are represented as extending as far as the borders of Serica.

Issĭcus Sinus (ὁ Ἰσσικὸς κόλπος: Gulf of Iskenderoon), the deep gulf at the N.E. corner of the Mediterranean, between Cilicia and Syria, named after the town of Issus. The width is about 8 miles. The coast is much altered since ancient times.

Issōrĭa (Ἰσσωρία), a surname of Artemis, derived from Mt. Issorion, in Laconia, on which she had a sanctuary.

Issus (Ἰσσός, also Ἰσσοί, Xen.: Ἰσσαῖος), a city in the S.E. extremity of Cilicia, near the head of the Issicus Sinus, and at the N. foot of the pass of M. Amanus called the Syrian Gates; memorable for the great battle in which Alexander defeated Darius Codomannus (B. C. 333), which was fought in a narrow valley near the town. It was at that time large and flourishing, but its importance was much diminished by the foundation of Alexandria in its neighbourhood. Its exact site is doubtful.

Ister. [DANUBIUS.]

Ister, a Greek historian, was at first a slave of Callimachus, and afterwards his friend, and accordingly lived in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes (B. C. 247—222). He wrote a large number of works, the most important of which was an Atthis, or history of Attica. His fragments are published by C. and Th. Müller, Fragmenta Histor. Graec.

Istrĭa or Histrĭa, a peninsula at the N. extremity of the Adriatic, between the Sinus Tergestinus on the W. and the Sinus Flanaticus on the E. It was separated from Venetia on the N.W. by the river Timavus, and from Illyricum on the E. by the river Arsia. Its inhabitants, the Istri or Histri, were a warlike Illyrian race, who carried on several wars with the Romans, till their final subjugation by the consul C. Claudius Pulcher, B. C. 177. Their chief towns were TERGESTE and POLA. Istria was originally reckoned part of Illyricum, but from the time of Augustus it formed one of the divisions of Upper Italy. In consequence of its name it was believed at one time that a branch of the river Ister (Danube) flowed into the Adriatic.

Istrŏpŏlis, Istros or Istrĭa (Ἰστρόπολις, Ἴστρος, Ἰστρίη, Herod. ii. 33: Istere), a town in Lower Moesia, not far from the mouth of the Danube, and at a little distance from the coast, was a colony from Miletus.

Itălĭa (Ἰταλία), signified, from the time of Augustus, the country which we call Italy. It was bounded on the W. by the Mare Ligusticum and Tyrrhenum, Tuscum or Inferum; on the S. by the Mare Siculum or Ausonium; on the E. by the Mare Adriaticum or Superum: and on the N. by the Alps, which sweep round it in a semicircle, the river Varus (Var, Varo) separating it on the N.W. from Transalpine Gaul, and the river Arsia (Arsa) on the N.E. from Illyricum. The name Italia, however, was originally used to indicate a much more limited extent of country. Most of the ancients, according to their usual custom, derived the name from an ancient king Italus; but others, still more absurdly, connected it with the old Italian word Italus (in Oscan, vitlu or vitelu), an ox, because the country was rich in oxen! But there can be no doubt that Italia, or Vitalia, as it was also called, was the land of the Itali, Vitali, Vitelli, or Vituli, an ancient race, who are better known under the name of Siculi. This race was widely spread over the S. half of the peninsula, and may be said to have been bounded on the N. by a line drawn from Mt. Garganus on the E. to Terracina on the W. The Greeks were ignorant of this wide extent of the name. According to them Italia was originally only the S.most part of what was afterwards called Bruttium, and was bounded on the N. by a line drawn from the Lametic to the Scylletic gulf. They afterwards extended the name to signify the whole country S. of Posidonia on the W. and Tarentum on the E. After the Romans had conquered Tarentum and the S. part of the peninsula, about B.C. 272, the name Italia had a still further extension given to it. It then signified the whole country subject to the Romans, from the Sicilian straits as far N. as the Arnus and the Rubico. The country N. of these rivers continued to be called Gallia Cisalpina and Liguria down to the end of the republic. Augustus was the first who extended the name of Italia, so as to comprehend the whole of the basin of the Po and the S. part of the Alps, from the Maritime Alps to Pola in Istria, both inclusive. In the later times of the empire, when Maximian had transferred the imperial residence to Milan, the name Italia was again used in a narrower compass. As it had originally signified only the S. of the country, so now it was restricted to the N., comprising the 5 provinces of Aemilia, Liguria, Flaminia, Venetia, and Istria. — Besides Italia, the country was called by various other names, especially by the poets. These were Hesperia, a name which the Greeks gave to it, because it lay to the W. of Greece, or Hesperia Magna, to distinguish it from Spain [HESPERIA], and Saturnia, because Saturn was said to have once reigned in Latium. The names of separate parts of Italy were also applied by the poets to the whole country. Thus it was called Oenotria, originally the land of the Oenotri, in the country afterwards called Bruttium and Lucania: Ausonia, or Opica, or Opicia, originally the land of the Ausones or Ausonii, Opici or Osci, on the W. coast, in the country afterwards called Campania: Tyrrhenia, properly the land of the Tyrrheni, also on the W. coast, N. of Ausonia or Opica, and more especially in the country afterwards called Etruria: Iapygia, properly the land of the Iapyges on the E. coast, in the country afterwards called Calabria: and Ombrica, the land of the Umbri on the E. coast, alongside of Etruria. — Italy was never inhabited by one single race. It contained a great number of different races, who had migrated into the country at a very early period. The most ancient inhabitants were Pelasgians or Oenotrians, a branch of the same great race who originally inhabited Greece and the coasts of Asia Minor. They were also called Aborigines and Siculi, who, as we have already seen, were the same as the Vitali or Itali. At the time when Roman history begins, Italy was inhabited by the following races. From the mouth of the Tiber, between its right bank and the sea, dwelt the Etruscans, who extended as far N. as the Alps. Alongside of these, between the left bank of the Tiber and the Adriatic, dwelt the Umbrians. To the S. of the Etruscans were the Sacrani, Casci, or Prisci, Oscan tribes, who had been driven out of the mountains by the Sabines, had overcome the Pelasgian tribes of the Siculi, Aborigines, or Latins, and, uniting with these conquered people, had formed the people called Prisci Latini, subsequently simply Latini. S. of these again, as far as the river Laus, were the Opici, who were also called Ausones or Aurunci, and to whom the Volsci, Sidicini, Saticuli, and Aequi, also belonged. The S. of the peninsula was inhabited by the Oenotrians, who were subsequently driven into the interior by the numerous Greek colonies founded along the coasts. S. of the Umbrians, extending as far as Mt. Garganus, dwelt the various Sabellian or Sabine tribes, the Sabines proper, the Peligni, Marsi, Marrucini, Vestini, and Hernici, from which tribes the warlike race of the Samnites subsequently sprung. From Mt. Garganus to the S.E. extremity of the peninsula, the country was inhabited by the Daunians or Apulians, Peucetii, Messapii, and Sallentini. An account of these people is given in separate articles. They were all eventually subdued by the Romans, who became the masters of the whole of the peninsula. At the time of Augustus the following were the chief divisions of Italy, an account of which is also given in separate articles: I. Upper Italy, which extended from the Alps to the rivers Macra on the W. and Rubico on the E. It comprehended, 1. LIGURIA. 2. GALLIA CISALPINA. 3. VENETIA, including Carnia. 4. ISTRIA. II. Central Italy, sometimes called Italia Propria (a term not used by the ancients), to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina or Upper Italy, and Magna Graecia or Lower Italy, extended from the rivers Macra on the W. and Rubico on the E., to the rivers Silarus on the W. and Frento on the E. It comprehended, 1. ETRURIA. 2. UMBRIA. 3. PICENUM. 4. SAMNIUM, including the country of the Sabini, Vestini, Marrucini, Marsi, Peligni, &c. 5. LATIUM. 6. CAMPANIA. III. Lower Italy, or Magna Graecia, included the remaining part of the peninsula, S. of the rivers Silarus and Frento. It comprehended, 1. APULIA, including Calabria. 2. LUCANIA. 3. BRUTTIUM. — Augustus divided Italy into the following 11 Regiones. 1. Latium and Campania. 2. The land of the Hirpini, Apulia and Calabria. 3. Lucania and Bruttium. 4. The land of the Frentani, Marrucini, Peligni, Marsi, Vestini, and Sabini, together with Samnium. 5. Picenum. 6. Umbria and the district of Ariminum, in what was formerly called Gallia Cisalpina. 7. Etruria. 8. Gallia Cispadana. 9. Liguria. 10. The E. part of Gallia Transpadana, Venetia, Carnia, and Istria. 11. The W. part of Gallia Transpadana. — The leading features of the physical geography of Italy are so well described by a modern writer, that we cannot do better than quote his words. "The mere plan-geography of Italy gives us its shape and the position of its towns; to these it may add a semicircle of mountains round the N. boundary, to represent the Alps; and another long line stretching down the middle of the country, to represent the Apennines. But let us carry this on a little further, and give life and harmony to what is at present at once lifeless and confused. Observe, in the first place, how the Apennine line, beginning from the S. extremity of the Alps, runs across Italy to the very edge of the Adriatic, and thus separates naturally the Italy proper of the Romans from Cisalpine Gaul. Observe again, how the Alps, after running N. and S. where they divide Italy from France, turn then away to the E.ward, running almost parallel to the Apennines, till they too touch the head of the Adriatic, on the confines of Istria. Thus between these 2 lines of mountains there is enclosed one great basin or plain; enclosed on 3 sides by mountains, open only on the E. to the sea. Observe how widely it spreads itself out, and then see how well it is watered. One great river (the Po) flows through it in its whole extent; and this is fed by streams almost unnumbered, descending towards it on either side, from the Alps on one side, and from the Apennines on the other. Then, descending into Italy proper, we find the complexity of its geography quite in accordance with its manifold political divisions. It is not one simple central ridge of mountains, having a broad belt of level country on either side between it and the sea; nor yet is it a chain rising immediately from the sea on one side, like the Andes in S. America, and leaving room therefore on the other side for wide plains of table land, and for rivers with a sufficient length of course to become at last great and navigable. It is a back-bone, thickly set with spines of unequal length, some of them running out at regular distances parallel to each other, but others twisted so strangely that they often run for a long way parallel to the back-bone, or main ridge, and interlace with one another in a maze almost inextricable. And, as if to complete the disorder, in those spots where the spines of the Apennines, being twisted round, run parallel to the sea and to their own central chain, and thus leave an interval of plain between their bases and the Mediterranean, volcanic agency has broken up the space thus left with other and distinct groups of hills of its own creation, as in the case of Vesuvius and of the Alban hills near Rome. Speaking generally, then, Italy is made up of an infinite multitude of valleys pent in between high and steep hills, each forming a country to itself, and cut off by natural barriers from the others. Its several parts are isolated by nature, and no art of man can thoroughly unite them. Hence arises the romantic character of Italian scenery: the constant combination of a mountain outline, and all the wild features of a mountain country, with the wild vegetation of a southern climate in the valleys." More minute details respecting the physical features of the different parts of Italy are given in the articles on the separate provinces into which it is divided.

Itălĭca. 1. (Sevilla la vieja nr. Santiponce), a municipium in Hispania Baetica, on the W. bank of the Baetis, N. W. of Hispalis, was founded by Scipio Africanus in the 2nd Punic war, who settled here some of his veterans. It was the birthplace of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian. — 2. The name given to Corfinium by the Italian Socii during their war with Rome. [Corfinium.]

Italĭcus, Silĭus. [Silius.]

Itălus (Ἰταλός), an ancient king of the Pelasgians, Siculians, or Oenotrians, from whom Italy was believed to have derived its name. Some call him a son of Telegonus by Penelope.

Itānus (Ἴτανος), a town on the E. coast of Crete, near a promontory of the same name, founded by the Phoenicians.

Ithăca (Ἰθάκη: Ἰθακήσιος: Thiaki), a small island in the Ionian Sea, celebrated as the birthplace of Ulysses, lies off the coast of Epirus, and is separated from Cephalonia by a channel about 3 or 4 miles wide. The island is about 12 miles long, and 4 in its greatest breadth. It is divided into 2 parts, which are connected by a narrow isthmus, not more than half a mile across. In each of these parts there is a mountain-ridge of considerable height; the one in the N. called Neritum (Νήριτον, now Anoi), and the one in the S. Neïum (Νήϊον, now Stefano). The city of Ithaca, the residence of Ulysses, was situated on a precipitous, conical hill, now called Aeto, or "eagle's cliff," occupying the whole breadth of the isthmus mentioned above. The acropolis, or castle of Ulysses, crowned the extreme summit of the mountain, and is described by a modern traveller as "about as bleak and dreary a spot as can well be imagined for a princely residence." Hence Cicero (de Orat. i. 44) describes it, in asperrimis saxulis tanquam nidulus affixa. It is at the foot of Mt. Neium, and is hence described by Telemachus as "Under-Neïum" (Ἰθάκης Ὑπονηΐου, Hom. Od. iii. 81). The walls of the ancient city are in many places well preserved. — Ithaca is now one of the 7 Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain.

Ithōmē (Ἰθώμη: Ἰθωμήτης, Ἰθωμαῖος). 1. A strong fortress in Messenia, situated on a mountain of the same name, which afterwards formed the citadel of the town of Messene. On the summit of the mountain stood the ancient temple of Zeus, who was hence surnamed Ithometas (Ἰθωμήτης, Dor. Ἰθωμάτας). Ithome was taken by the Spartans, B. C. 723, at the end of the last Messenian war, after an heroic defence by Aristodemus, and again in 455, at the end of the 3rd Messenian war. — 2. A mountain fortress in Pelasgiotis, in Thessaly, near Metropolis, also called Thome.

Itĭus Portus, a harbour of the Morini, on the N. coast of Gaul, from which Caesar set sail for Britain. The position of this harbour is much disputed. It used to be identified with Gesoriacum, or Boulogne, but it is now usually supposed to be some harbour near Calais, probably Vissant, or Witsand.

Iton. [Itonia.]

Itōnĭa, Itōnĭas, or Itōnis (Ἰτωνία, Ἰτωνιάς, or Ἰτωνίς), a surname of Athena, derived from the town of Iton, in the S. of Phthiotis in Thessaly. The goddess there had a celebrated sanctuary and festivals, and hence is called Incola Itoni. From Iton her worship spread into Boeotia and the country about lake Copais, where the Pamboeotia was celebrated, in the neighbourhood of a temple and grove of Athena. According to another tradition, Athena received the surname of Itonia from Itonus, a king or priest.

Itucci (Ἰτύκκη, App.), a town in Hispania Baetica, in the district of Hispalis, and a Roman colony under the name of Virtus Julia.

Itūna (Solway Frith), an aestuary on the W. coast of Britain, between England and Scotland.

Itūraea, Itўraea (Ἰτουραία: Ἰτουραῖοι, Ituraei, Ityraei: El-Jeidur), a district on the N.E. borders of Palestine, bounded on the N. by the plain of Damascus, on the W. by the mountain-chain (Jebel-Heish), which forms the E. margin of the valley of the Jordan, on the S.W. and S. by Gaulanitis, and on the E. by Auranitis and Trachonitis. It occupied a part of the elevated plain into which Mt. Hermon sinks down on the S.E., and was inhabited by an Arabian people, of warlike and predatory habits, which they exercised upon the caravans from Arabia to Damascus, whose great road lay through their country. In the wars between the Syrians and Israelites, they are found acting as allies of the kings of Damascus. They are scarcely heard of again till B.C. 105, when they were conquered by the Asmonaean king of Judah, Aristobulus, who compelled them to profess Judaism. Restored to independence by the decline of the Asmonaean house, they seized the opportunity offered, on the other side, by the weakness of the kings of Syria, to press their predatory incursions into Coele-Syria, and even beyond Lebanon, to Byblos, Botrys, and other cities on the coast of Phoenice. Pompey reduced them again to order, and many of their warriors entered the Roman army, in which they became celebrated for their skill in horsemanship and archery. They were not, however, reduced to complete subjection to Rome until after the civil wars. Augustus gave Ituraea, which had been hitherto ruled by its native princes, to the family of Herod. During the ministry of our Saviour, it was governed by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, as tetrarch. Upon Philip's death, in A.D. 37, it was united to the Roman province of Syria, from which it was presently again separated, aud assigned partly to Herod Agrippa I., and partly to Soaemus, the prince of Emesa. In A.D. 50, it was finally reunited by Claudius to the Roman province of Syria, and there are inscriptions which prove that the Ituraeans continued to serve with distinction in the Roman armies. There were no cities or large towns in the country, a fact easily explained by the unsettled character of the people, who lived in the Arab fashion, in unwalled villages and tents, and even, according to some statements, in the natural caves with which the country abounds.

Itys. [TEREUS.]

Iūlis (Ἰουλίς: Ἰουλιήτης, Ἰουλιεύς), the chief town in Ceos; the birthplace of Simonides. [CEOS.]

Iūlus. 1. Son of Aeneas, usually called Ascanius. [ASCANIUS.] — 2. Eldest son of Ascanius, who claimed the government of Latium, but was obliged to give it up to his brother Silvius.

Ixīon (Ἰξίων), son of Phlegyas, or of Antion and Perimela, or of Pasion, or of Ares. According to the common tradition, his mother was Dia, a daughter of Deïoneus. He was king of the Lapithae or Phlegyes, and the father of Pirithous. When Deïoneus demanded of Ixion the bridal gifts he had promised, Ixion treacherously invited him to a banquet, and then contrived to make him fall into a pit filled with fire. As no one purified Ixion of this treacherous murder, Zeus took pity upon him, purified him, carried him to heaven, and caused him to sit down at his table. But Ixion was ungrateful to the father of the gods, and attempted to win the love of Hera. Zeus thereupon created a phantom resembling Hera, and by it Ixion became the father of a Centaur. [CENTAURI.] Ixion was fearfully punished for his impious ingratitude. His hands and feet were chained by Hermes to a wheel, which is said to have rolled perpetually in the air or in the lower world. He is further said to have been scourged, and compelled to exclaim, "Benefactors should be honoured."

Ixionĭdes, i. e. Pirithous, the son of Ixion. — The Centaurs are also called Ixionidae.

Ixius (Ἴξιος), a surname of Apollo, derived from a district of the island of Rhodes which was called Ixiae or Ixia.

Iynx (Ἴυγξ), daughter of Peitho and Pan, or of Echo. She endeavoured to charm Zeus, or make him fall in love with Io; but she was metamorphosed by Hera into the bird called Iynx.

Jana. [JANUS.]

Janĭcŭlum. [ROMA.]

Jānus and Jāna, a pair of ancient Latin divinities, who were worshipped as the sun and moon. The names Janus and Jana are only other forms of Dianus and Diana, which words contain the same root as dies, day. Janus was worshipped both by the Etruscans and Romans, and occupied an important place in the Roman religion. He presided over the beginning of everything, and was therefore always invoked first in every undertaking, even before Jupiter. He opened the year and the seasons, and hence the first month of the year was called after him. He was the porter of heaven, and therefore bore the surnames Patulcus or Patulcius, the "opener," and Clusius or Clusivius, the "shutter." In this capacity he is represented with a key in his left hand, and a staff or sceptre in his right. On earth also he was the guardian deity of gates, and hence is commonly represented with 2 heads, because every door looks 2 ways. (Janus bifrons.) He is sometimes represented with 4 heads (Janus quadrifrons), because he presided over the 4 seasons. Most of the attributes of this god, which are very numerous, are connected with his being the god who opens and shuts; and this latter idea probably has reference to his original character as the god of the sun, in connection with the alternations of day and night. At Rome, Numa is said to have dedicated to Janus the covered passage bearing his name, which was opened in times of war, and closed in times of peace. This passage is commonly, but erroneously, called a temple. It stood close by the forum. It appears to have been left open in war, to indicate symbolically that the god had gone out to assist the Roman warriors, and to have been shut in time of peace that the god, the safeguard of the city, might not escape. A temple of Janus was built by C. Duilius in the time of the first Punic war: it was restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius. On new year's day, which was the principal festival of the god, people gave presents to one another, consisting of sweetmeats and copper coins, showing on one side the double head of Janus and on the other a ship. The general name for these presents was strenae. The sacrifices offered to Janus consisted of cakes (called janual), barley, incense, and wine.

Jāson (Ἰάσων). 1. The celebrated leader of the Argonauts, was a son of Aeson and Polymede or Alcimede, and belonged to the family of the Aeolidae, at Iolcus in Thessaly. Cretheus, who had founded Iolcus, was succeeded by his son Aeson; but the latter was deprived of the kingdom by his half-brother Pelias, who attempted to take the life of the infant Jason. He was saved by his friends, who pretended that he was dead, and intrusted him to the care of the centaur Chiron. Pelias was now warned by an oracle to be on his guard against the one-sandaled man. When Jason had grown up, he came to claim the throne. As he entered the market-place, Pelias, perceiving he had only one sandal, asked him who he was; whereupon Jason declared his name, and demanded the kingdom. Pelias consented to surrender it to him, but persuaded him to remove the curse which rested on the family of the Aeolidae, by fetching the golden fleece, and soothing the spirit of Phrixus. Another tradition related that Pelias, once upon a time, invited all his subjects to a sacrifice, which he intended to offer to Poseidon. Jason came with the rest, but, on his journey to Iolcus, he lost one of his sandals in crossing the river Anaurus. Pelias, remembering the oracle about the one-sandaled man, asked Jason what he would do if he were told by an oracle that he should be killed by one of his subjects? Jason, on the suggestion of Hera, who hated Pelias, answered, that he would send him to fetch the golden fleece. Pelias accordingly ordered Jason to fetch the golden fleece, which was in the possession of king Aeëtes in Colchis, and was guarded by an ever-watchful dragon. Jason willingly undertook the enterprize, and set sail in the ship Argo, accompanied by the chief heroes of Greece. He obtained the fleece with the assistance of Medea, whom he made his wife, and along with whom he returned to Iolcus. The history of his exploits on this memorable enterprize, and his adventures on his return home, are related elsewhere. [ARGONAUTAE.] On his arrival at Iolcus, Jason, according to one account, found his aged father Aeson still alive, and Medea made him young again; but according to the more common tradition, Aeson had been slain by Pelias, during the absence of Jason, who accordingly called upon Medea to take vengeance on Pelias. Medea thereupon persuaded the daughters of Pelias to cut their father to pieces and boil him, in order to restore him to youth and vigour, as she had before changed a ram into a lamb, by boiling the body in a cauldron. But Pelias was never restored to life, and his son Acastus expelled Jason and Medea from Ioclus. They then went to Corinth, where they lived happily for several years, until Jason deserted Medea, in order to marry Glauce or Creusa, daughter of Creon, the king of the country. Medea fearfully revenged this insult. She sent Glauce a poisoned garment, which burnt her to death when she put it on. Creon likewise perished in the flames. Medea also killed her children by Jason, viz. Mermerus and Pheres, and then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. Later writers represent Jason as becoming in the end reconciled to Medea, returning with her to Colchis, and there restoring Aeëtes to his kingdom, of which he had been deprived. The death of Jason is related differently. According to some, he made away with himself from grief, according to others, he was crushed by the poop of the ship Argo, which fell upon him as he was lying under it. — 2. Tyrant of Pherae and Tagus of Thessaly (Dict. of Antiq. art. Tagus), was probably the son of Lycophron, who established a tyranny on the ruins of aristocracy at Pherae. He succeeded his father as tyrant of Pherae soon after B.C. 395, and in a few years extended his power over almost the whole of Thessaly. Pharsalus was the only city in Thessaly which maintained its independence under the government of Polydamas; but even this place submitted to him in 375. In the following year (374) he was elected Tagus or generalissimo of Thessaly. His power was strengthened by the weakness of the other Greek states, and by the exhausting contest in which Thebes and Sparta were engaged. He was now in a position which held out to him every prospect of becoming master of Greece; but when at the height of his power, he was assassinated at a public audience, 370. — Jason had an insatiable appetite for power, which he sought to gratify by any and every means. With the chief men in the several states of Greece, as e. g. with Timotheus and Pelopidas, he cultivated friendly relations. He is represented as having all the qualifications of a great general and diplomatist — as active, temperate, prudent, capable of enduring much fatigue, and skilful in concealing his own designs and penetrating those of his enemies. He was an admirer of the rhetoric of Gorgias; and Isocrates was one of his friends. — 3. Of Argos, an historian, lived under Hadrian, and wrote a work on Greece in 4 books.

Javolēnus Priscus, an eminent Roman jurist, was born about the commencement of the reign of Vespasian (A. D. 79), and was one of the council of Antoninus Pius. He was a pupil of Caelius Sabinus, and a leader of the Sabinian or Cassian school. [See p. 144, b.] There are 206 extracts from Javolenus in the Digest.

Jaxartes (Ἰαξάρτης: Syr, Syderia, or Syhoun), a great river of Central Asia, about which the ancient accounts are very different and confused. It rises in the Comēdi Montes (Moussour), and flows N.W. into the Sea of Aral: the ancients supposed it to fall into the N. side of the Caspian, not distinguishing between the 2 seas. It divided Sogdiana from Scythia. On its banks dwelt a Scythian tribe called Jaxartae.

Jerĭcho or Hiĕrĭchus (Ἱεριχώ, Ἱεριχοῦς: Er-Riha ? Ru.), a city of the Canaanites, in a plain on the W. side of the Jordan near its mouth, was destroyed by Joshua, rebuilt in the time of the Judges, and formed an important frontier fortress of Judaea. It was again destroyed by Vespasian, rebuilt under Hadrian, and finally destroyed during the crusades.

Jĕrūsălēm or Hĭĕrŏsŏlўmă (Ἱερουσαλήμ, Ἱεροσόλυμα: Ἱεροσολυμίτης: Jerusalem, Arab. El-Kuds, i. e. the Holy City), the capital of Palestine, in Asia. At the time of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, under Joshua, Jerusalem, then called Jebus, was the chief city of the Jebusites, a Canaanitish tribe, who were not entirely driven out from it till B.C. 1050, when David took the city, and made it the capital of the kingdom of Israel. It was also established as the permanent centre of the Jewish religion, by the erection of the temple by Solomon. After the division of the kingdom, under Rehoboam, it remained the capital of the kingdom of Judah, until it was entirely destroyed, and its inhabitants were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B.C. 588. In B.C. 536, the Jewish exiles, having been permitted by Cyrus to return, began to rebuild the city and temple; and the work was completed in about 24 years. In B.C. 332, Jerusalem quietly submitted to Alexander. During the wars which followed his death, the city was taken by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus (B.C. 320), and remained subject to the Greek kings of Egypt, till the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus III. the Great, king of Syria, B.C. 198. Up to this time the Jews had been allowed the free enjoyment of their religion and their own internal government, and Antiochus confirmed them in these privileges; but the altered government of his son, Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, provoked a rebellion, which was at first put down when Antiochus took Jerusalem and polluted the temple (B. C. 170); but the religious persecution which ensued drove the people to despair, and led to a new revolt under the Maccabees, by whom Jerusalem was retaken, and the temple purified in B. C. 163 [MACCABAEI]. In B. C. 133, Jerusalem was retaken by Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and its fortifications dismantled, but its government was left in the hands of the Maccabee, John Hyrcanus, who took advantage of the death of Antiochus in Parthia (B. C. 128) to recover his full power. His son Aristobulus assumed the title of king of Judaea, and Jerusalem continued to be the capital of the kingdom till B. C. 63, when it was taken by Pompey, and the temple was again profaned. For the events which followed, see HYRCANUS, HERODES, and PALAESTINA. In A. D. 70, the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans was put down, and Jerusalem was taken by Titus, after a siege of several months, during which the inhabitants endured the utmost horrors; the survivors were all put to the sword or sold as slaves, and the city and temple were utterly razed to the ground. In consequence of a new revolt of the Jews, the emperor Hadrian resolved to destroy all vestiges of their national and religious peculiarities; and, as one means to this end, he established a new Roman colony, on the ground where Jerusalem had stood, by the name of Aelia Capitolina, and built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, on the site of the temple of Jehovah, A. D. 135. The establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire restored to Jerusalem its sacred character, and led to the erection of several churches; but the various changes which have taken place in it, since its conquest by the Arabs under Omar in A. D. 638, have left very few vestiges even of the Roman city. Jerusalem stands due W. of the head of the Dead Sea, at the distance of about 20 miles (in a straight line) and about 35 miles from the Mediterranean, on an elevated platform, divided, by a series of valleys, from hills which surround it on every side. This platform has a general slope from W. to E. its highest point being the summit of Mt. Zion, in the S. W. corner of the city on which stood the original "city of David." The S. E. part of the platform is occupied by the hill called Moriah, on which the temple stood, and the E. part by the hill called Acra; but these two summits are now hardly distinguishable from the general surface of the platform, probably on account of the gradual filling up of the valleys between. The height of Mt. Zion is 2535 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and about 300 feet above the valley below. The extent of the platform is 5400 feet from N. to S., and 1100 feet from E. to W.

Jŏcastē (Ἰοκάστη), called Epicaste in Homer, daughter of Menoeceus, and wife of the Theban king Laius, by whom she became the mother of Oedipus. She afterwards married Oedipus, not knowing that he was her son; and when she discovered the crime she had unwittingly committed, she put an end to her life. For details see OEDIPUS.

Joppē, Joppa (Ἰόππη: O. T. Japho: Jaffa), a very ancient maritime city of Palestine, and, before the building of Caesarea, the only sea-port of the whole country, and therefore called by Strabo the port of Jerusalem, lay just S. of the boundary between Judaea and Samaria, S.W. of Antipatris, and N.W. of Jerusalem.

Jordānes (Ἰορδάνης, Ἰόρδανος: Jordan, Arab. Esh-Sheriah el-Kebir, or el-Urdun), has its source at the S. foot of M. Hermon (the S.most part of Anti-Libanus), near Paneas (aft. Caesarea Philippi), whence it flows S. into the little lake Semechonitis, and thence into the Sea of Galilee (Lake of Tiberias), and thence through a narrow plain, depressed below the level of the surrounding country into the lake Asphaltites (Dead Sea), where it is finally lost. [PALAESTINA.] Its course, from the lake Semechonitis to the Dead Sea, is about 60 miles; the depression through which it runs consists, first, of a sandy valley, from 5 to 10 miles broad, within which is a lower valley, in width about half a mile, and, for the most part, beautifully clothed with grass and trees; and, in some places, there is still a lower valley within this. The average width of the river itself is calculated at 30 yards, and its average depth at 9 feet. It is fordable in many places in summer, but in spring it becomes much deeper, and often overflows its banks. Its bed is considerably below the level of the Mediterranean.

Jornandes, or Jordānes, an historian, lived in the time of Justinian, or in the 6th century of our era. He was a Goth by birth; was secretary to the king of the Alani, adopted the Christian religion, took orders, and was made a bishop in Italy. There is not sufficient evidence for the common statement that he was bishop of Ravenna. He wrote 2 historical works in the Latin language. 1. De Getarum (Gothorum) Origine et Rebus Gestis, containing the history of the Goths, from the earliest times down to their subjugation by Belisarius in 541. The work is abridged from the lost history of the Goths by Cassiodorus, to which Jornandes added various particulars; but it is compiled without judgment, and is characterised by partiality to the Goths. 2. De Regnorum ac Temporum Successione, a short compendium of history from the creation down to the victory obtained by Narses, in 552, over king Theodatus. It is only valuable for some accounts of the barbarous nations of the North, and the countries which they inhabited. Edited by Lindenbrog, Hamburg, 1611.

Josēphus, Flāvius, the Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem, A. D. 37. On his mother's side he was descended from the Asmonaean princes, while from his father, Matthias, he inherited the priestly office. He enjoyed an excellent education; and at the age of 26 he went to Rome to plead the cause of some Jewish priests whom Felix, the procurator of Judaea, had sent thither as prisoners. After a narrow escape from death by shipwreck, he safely landed at Puteoli; and being introduced to Poppaea, he not only effected the release of his friends, but received great presents from the empress. On his return to Jerusalem he found his countrymen eagerly bent on a revolt from Rome, from which he used his best endeavours to dissuade them; but failing in this, he professed to enter into the popular designs. He was chosen one of the generals of the Jews, and was sent to manage affairs in Galilee. When Vespasian and his army entered Galilee, Josephus threw himself into Iotapata, which he defended for 47 days.

When the place was taken, the life of Josephus was spared by Vespasian through the intercession of Titus. Josephus thereupon assumed the character of a prophet, and predicted to Vespasian that the empire should one day be his and his son's. Vespasian treated him with respect, but did not release him from captivity, till he was proclaimed emperor nearly 3 years afterwards (A. D. 70). Josephus was present with Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterwards accompanied him to Rome. He received the freedom of the city from Vespasian, who assigned him, as a residence, a house formerly occupied by himself, and treated him honourably to the end of his reign. The same favour was extended to him by Titus and Domitian as well. He assumed the name of Flavius, as a dependant of the Flavian family. His time at Rome appears to have been employed mainly in the composition of his works. He died about 100. — The works of Josephus are written in Greek. They are: — 1. The History of the Jewish War (Περὶ τοῦ Ἰουδαϊκοῦ πολέμου ἢ Ἰουδαϊκῆς ἱστορίας περὶ ἁλώσεως), in 7 books, published about A. D. 75. Josephus first wrote it in Hebrew, and then translated it into Greek. It commences with the capture of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in B. C. 170, runs rapidly over the events before Josephus's own time, and gives a detailed account of the fatal war with Rome. — 2. The Jewish Antiquities (Ἰουδαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία), in 20 books, completed about A. D. 93, and addressed to Epaphroditus. The title as well as the number of books may have been suggested by the Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἀρχαιολογία of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. It gives an account of Jewish History from the creation of the world to A. D. 66, the 12th year of Nero, in which the Jews were goaded to rebellion by Gessius Florus. In this work Josephus seeks to accommodate the Jewish religion to heathen tastes and prejudices. Thus he speaks of Moses and his law in a tone which might be adopted by any disbeliever in his divine legation. He says that Abraham went into Egypt (Gen. xii.), intending to adopt the Egyptian views of religion, should he find them better than his own. He speaks doubtfully of the preservation of Jonah by the whale. He intimates a doubt of there having been any miracle in the passage of the Red Sea, and compares it with the passage of Alexander the Great along the shore of the sea of Pamphylia. He interprets Exod. xxii. 28, as if it conveyed a command to respect the idols of the heathen. Many similar instances might be quoted from his work. — 3. His own life, in one book. This is an appendage to the Archaeologia, and is addressed to the same Epaphroditus. It was not written earlier than A. D. 97, since Agrippa II. is mentioned in it as no longer living. — 4. A treatise on the Antiquity of the Jews, or Against Apion, in 2 books, also addressed to Epaphroditus. It is in answer to such as impugned the antiquity of the Jewish nation, on the ground of the silence of Greek writers respecting it. [APION.] The treatise exhibits extensive acquaintance with Greek literature and philosophy. — 5. Εἰς Μακκαβαίους ἢ περὶ αὐτοκράτορος λογισμοῦ, in 1 book. Its genuineness is doubtful. It is a declamatory account of the martyrdom of Eleazar (an aged priest), and of 7 youths and their mother, in the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes. The best editions of Josephus are by Hudson, Oxon. 1720; and by Havercamp, Amst. 1726.

Jovianus, Flavius Claudius, was elected emperor by the soldiers, in June A. D. 363, after the death of Julian [JULIANUS], whom he had accompanied in his campaign against the Persians. In order to effect his retreat in safety, Jovian surrendered to the Persians the Roman conquests beyond the Tigris, and several fortresses in Mesopotamia. He died suddenly at a small town on the frontiers of Bithynia and Galatia, February 17th, 364, after a reign of little more than 7 months. Jovian was a Christian; but he protected the heathens.

Juba (Ἰόβας). 1. King of Numidia, was son of Hiempsal, who was re-established on the throne by Pompey. On the breaking out of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, he actively espoused the cause of the latter; and, accordingly, when Caesar sent Curio into Africa (B. C. 49), he supported the Pompeian general Attius Varus with a large body of troops. Curio was defeated by their united forces, and fell in the battle. In 46 Juba fought along with Scipio against Caesar himself, and was present at the decisive battle of Thapsus. After this defeat he wandered about for some time, and then put an end to his own life. — 2. King of Mauretania, son of the preceding, was a mere child at his father's death (46), was carried a prisoner to Rome by Caesar, and compelled to grace the conqueror's triumph. He was brought up in Italy, where he received an excellent education, and applied himself with such diligence to study, that he turned out one of the most learned men of his day. After the death of Antony (30), Augustus conferred upon Juba his paternal kingdom of Numidia, and at the same time gave him in marriage Cleopatra, otherwise called Selene, the daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. At a subsequent period (25), Augustus gave him Mauretania in exchange for Numidia, which was reduced to a Roman province. He continued to reign in Mauretania till his death, which happened about A. D. 19. He was beloved by his subjects, among whom he endeavoured to introduce the elements of Greek and Roman civilisation; and, after his death, they even paid him divine honours. — Juba wrote a great number of works in almost every branch of literature. They are all lost, with the exception of a few fragments. They appear to have been all written in Greek. The most important of them were: — 1. A History of Africa (Λιβυκά), in which he made use of Punic authorities. — 2. On the Assyrians. — 3. A History of Arabia. — 4. A Roman History (Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία). — 5. Θεατρικὴ ἱστορία, a general treatise on all matters connected with the stage. — 6. Περὶ γραφικῆς, or περὶ ζωγράφων, seems to have been a general history of painting. He also wrote some treatises on botany and on grammatical subjects.

Judaea, Judaei. [PALAESTINA.]

Juguntbi, a German people, sometimes described as a Gothic, and sometimes as an Alemannic tribe.

Jugurtha (Ἰουγούρθας or Ἰογόρθας), king of Numidia, was an illegitimate son of Mastanabal, and a grandson of Masinissa. He lost his father at an early age, but was adopted by his uncle Micipsa, who brought him up with his own sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha quickly distinguished himself both by his abilities and his skill in all bodily exercises, and rose to so much favour and popularity with the Numidians, that he began to excite the jealousy of Micipsa. In order to remove him to a distance, Micipsa sent him, in B. C. 134. with an auxiliary force, to assist Scipio against Numantia. Here his zeal, courage, and ability, gained for him the favour and commendation of Scipio, and of all the leading nobles in the Roman camp. On his return to Numidia he was received with honour by Micipsa, who was obliged to dissemble the fears which he entertained of his ambitious nephew. Micipsa died in 118, leaving the kingdom to Jugurtha and his 2 sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal, in common. Jugurtha soon showed that he aspired to the sole sovereignty of the country. In the course of the same year he found an opportunity to assassinate Hiempsal at Thirmida, and afterwards defeated Adherbal in battle. Adherbal fled to Rome to invoke the assistance of the senate; but Jugurtha, by a lavish distribution of bribes, counteracted the just complaints of his enemy. The senate decreed that the kingdom of Numidia should be equally divided between the 2 competitors; but the senators entrusted with the execution of this decree were also bribed by Jugurtha, who thus succeeded in obtaining the W. division of the kingdom, adjacent to Mauretania, by far the larger and richer portion of the two (117). But this advantage was far from contenting him. Shortly afterwards he invaded the territories of Adherbal with a large army, and defeated him. Adherbal made his escape to the strong fortress of Cirta, where he was closely blockaded by Jugurtha. The Romans commanded Jugurtha to abstain from further hostilities; but he paid no attention to their commands, and at length gained possession of Cirta, and put Adherbal to death, 112. War was now declared against Jugurtha at Rome, and the consul, L. Calpurnius Bestia, was sent into Africa, 111. Jugurtha had recourse to his customary arts; and by means of large sums of money given to Bestia and M. Scaurus, his principal lieutenant, he purchased from them a favourable peace. The conduct of Bestia excited the greatest indignation at Rome; and Jugurtha was summoned to the city under a safe conduct, the popular party hoping to be able to convict the nobility by means of his evidence. The scheme, however, failed; since one of the tribunes who had been gained over by the friends of Bestia and Scaurus forbade the king to give evidence. Soon afterwards Jugurtha was compelled to leave Italy, in consequence of his having ventured on the assassination of Massiva, whose counter influence he regarded with apprehension. [MASSIVA.] The war was now renewed; but the consul, Sp. Postumius Albinus, who arrived to conduct it (110), was able to effect nothing against Jugurtha. When the consul went to Rome to hold the comitia, he left his brother Aulus in command of the army. Aulus was defeated by Jugurtha; great part of his army was cut to pieces, and the rest only escaped a similar fate by the ignominy of passing under the yoke. But this disgrace at once roused all the spirit of the Roman people: the treaty concluded by Aulus was instantly annulled; and the consul Q. Caecilius Metellus was sent into Africa at the head of a new army (109). Metellus was an able general and an upright man, whom Jugurtha was unable to cope with in the field, or to seduce by bribes. In the course of 2 years Metellus frequently defeated Jugurtha, and at length drove him to take refuge among the Gaetulians. In 107 Metellus was succeeded in the command by Marius; but the cause of Jugurtha had meantime been espoused by his father-in-law Bocchus, king of Mauretania, who had advanced to his support with a large army. The united forces of Jugurtha and Bocchus were defeated in a decisive battle by Marius; and Bocchus purchased the forgiveness of the Romans by surrendering his son-in-law to Sulla, the quaestor of Marius (106). Jugurtha remained in captivity till the return of Marius to Rome, when, after adorning the triumph of his conqueror (Jan. 1, 104), he was thrown into a dungeon, and there starved to death.

Jūlĭa. 1. Aunt of Caesar the dictator, and wife of C. Marius the elder. She died B. C. 68, and her nephew pronounced her funeral oration. — 2. Mother of M. Antonius, the triumvir. In the proscription of the triumvirate (43) she saved the life of her brother, L. Caesar [CAESAR, No. 5.] — 3. Sister of Caesar the dictator, and wife of M. Atius Balbus, by whom she had Atia, the mother of Augustus [ATIA]. — 4. Daughter of Caesar the dictator, by Cornelia, and his only child in marriage, was married to Cn. Pompey in 59. She was a woman of beauty and virtue, and was tenderly attached to her husband, although 23 years older than herself. She died in childbed in 54. — 5. Daughter of Augustus by Scribonia, and his only child, was born in 39. She was educated with great strictness, but grew up one of the most profligate women of her age. She was thrice married: —1. to M. Marcellus, her first cousin in 25: 2. after his death (23) without issue, to M. Agrippa, by whom she had 3 sons, C. and L. Caesar, and Agrippa Postumus, and 2 daughters, Julia and Agrippina: 3. after Agrippa's death in 12, to Tiberius Nero, the future emperor. In B. C. 2 Augustus at length became acquainted with the misconduct of his daughter, whose notorious adulteries had been one reason why her husband Tiberius had quitted Italy 4 years before. Augustus was incensed beyond measure, and banished her to Pandataria, an island off the coast of Campania. At the end of 5 years she was removed to Rhegium, but she was never suffered to quit the bounds of the city. Even the testament of Augustus showed the inflexibility of his anger. He bequeathed her no legacy, and forbade her ashes to repose in his mausoleum. Tiberius on his accession (A. D. 14) deprived her of almost all the necessaries of life; and she died in the course of the same year. — 6. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of L. Aemilius Paulus. She inherited her mother's licentiousness, and was in consequence banished by her grandfather Augustus to the little island Tremerus, on the coast of Apulia, A. D. 9, where she lived nearly 20 years. She died in 28. It was probably this Julia whom Ovid celebrated as Corinna in his elegies and other erotic poems; and his intrigues with her appear to have been the cause of the poet's banishment in A. D. 9. — 7. Youngest child of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A. D. 18; was married to M. Vinicius in 33; and was banished in 37 by her brother Caligula, who was believed to have had an incestuous intercourse with her. She was recalled by Claudius, but was afterwards put to death by this emperor at Messalina's instigation. The charge brought against her was adultery, and Seneca, the philosopher, was banished to Corsica as the partner of her guilt. — 8. Daughter of Drusus and Livia, the sister of Germanicus. She was married, A. D.

20, to her first cousin, Nero, son of Germanicus and Agrippina; and after Nero's death, to Rubellius Blandus, by whom she had a son, Rubellius Plautus. She, too, was put to death by Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina, 59. — 9. Daughter of Titus, the son of Vespasian, married Flavius Sabinus, a nephew of the emperor Vespasian. Julia died of abortion, caused by her uncle Domitian, with whom she lived in criminal intercourse. — 10. Domna [DOMNA]. — 11. Drusilla [DRUSILLA]. — 12. Maesa [MAESA].

Jūlĭa Gens, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome, was of Alban origin, and was removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius upon the destruction of Alba Longa. It claimed descent from the mythical Iulus, the son of Venus and Anchises. The most distinguished family in the gens is that of CAESAR. Under the empire we find an immense number of persons of the name of Julius, the most important of whom are spoken of under their surnames.

Juliānus Didĭus. [DIDIUS.]

Juliānus, Flavĭus Claudĭus, usually called Julian, and surnamed the Apostate, Roman emperor, A. D. 361—363. He was born at Constantinople, A. D. 331, and was the son of Julius Constantius by his second wife, Basilina, and the nephew of Constantine the Great. Julian and his elder brother, Gallus, were the only members of the imperial family whose lives were spared by the sons of Constantine the Great, on the death of the latter in 337. The 2 brothers were educated with care, and were brought up in the principles of the Christian religion ; but as they advanced to manhood, they were watched with jealousy and suspicion by the emperor Constantius. After the execution of Gallus in 354 [GALLUS], the life of Julian was in great peril; but he succeeded in pacifying the suspicions of the emperor, and was allowed to go to Athens in 355 to pursue his studies. Here he devoted himself with ardour to the study of Greek literature and philosophy, and attracted universal attention both by his attainments and abilities. Among his fellow-students were Gregory of Nazianzus and Basil, both of whom afterwards became so celebrated in the Christian church. Julian had already abandoned Christianity in his heart and returned to the pagan faith of his ancestors; but fear of Constantius prevented him from making an open declaration of his apostacy. Julian did not remain long at Athens. In November, 355, he received from Constantius the title of Caesar, and was sent into Gaul to oppose the Germans, who had crossed the Rhine, and were ravaging some of the fairest provinces of Gaul. During the next 5 years (356—360) Julian carried on war against the 2 German confederacies of the Alemanni and Franks with great success, and gained many victories over them. His internal administration was distinguished by justice and wisdom ; and he gained the goodwill and affection of the provinces intrusted to his care. His growing popularity awakened the jealousy of Constantius, who commanded him to send some of his best troops to the East, to serve against the Persians. His soldiers refused to leave their favourite general, and proclaimed him emperor at Paris in 360. After several fruitless negotiations between Julian and Constantius, both parties prepared for war. In 361 Julian marched along the valley of the Danube towards Constantinople; but Constantius, who had set out from Syria to oppose his rival, died on his march in Cilicia. His death left Julian the undisputed master of the empire. On the 11th of December Julian entered Constantinople. He lost no time in publicly avowing himself a pagan, but he proclaimed that Christianity would be tolerated equally with paganism. He did not, however, act impartially towards the Christians. He preferred pagans as his civil and military officers, forbade the Christians to teach rhetoric and grammar in the schools, and, in order to annoy them, allowed the Jews to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem. In the following year (362) Julian went to Syria in order to make preparations for the war against the Persians. He spent the winter at Antioch, where he made the acquaintance of the orator Libanius ; and in the spring of 363 he set out against the Persians. He crossed the Euphrates and the Tigris; and after burning his fleet on the Tigris, that it might not fall into the hands of the enemy, he boldly marched into the interior of the country in search of the Persian king. His army suffered much from the heat, want of water, and provisions; and he was at length compelled to retreat. The Persians now appeared and fearfully harassed his rear. Still the Romans remained victorious in many a bloody engagement; but in the last battle fought on the 26th of June, Julian was mortally wounded by an arrow, and died in the course of the day. Jovian was chosen emperor in his stead, on the field of battle. [JOVIANUS.] Julian was an extraordinary character. As a monarch he was indefatigable in his attention to business, upright in his administration, and comprehensive in his views; as a man, he was virtuous, in the midst of a profligate age, and did not yield to the luxurious temptations to which he was exposed. In consequence of his apostacy he has been calumniated by Christian writers; but for the same reason he has been unduly extolled by heathen authors. He wrote a large number of works, many of which are extant. He was a man of reflection and thought, but possessed no creative genius. He did not however write merely for the sake of writing, like so many of his contemporaries; his works show that he had his subjects really at heart, and that in literature as well as in business his extraordinary activity arose from the wants of a powerful mind, which desired to improve itself and the world. The style of Julian is remarkably pure, and is a close imitation of the style of the classical Greek writers. The following are his most important works:—1. Letters, most of which were intended for public circulation, and are of great importance for the history of the time. Edited by Heyler, Mainz, 1828.—2. Orations, on various subjects, as for instance, On the emperor Constantius, On the worship of the sun, On the mother of the gods (Cybele), On true and false Cynicism, &c. — 3. The Caesars or the Banquet (Καίσαρες ἢ Συμπόσιον), a satirical composition, which is one of the most agreeable and instructive productions of ancient wit. Julian describes the Roman emperors approaching one after the other to take their seat round a table in the heavens ; and as they come up, their faults, vices, and crimes, are censured with a sort of bitter mirth by old Silenus, whereupon each Caesar defends himself as well as he can. Edited by Heusinger, Gotha, 1736, and by Harless, Erlangen, 1785. — 4. Misopogon or the Enemy of the Beard (Μισοπώγων), a severe satire on the licentious and effeminate manners of the inhabitants of Antioch, who had ridiculed Julian, when he resided in the city, on account of his austere virtues, and had laughed at his allowing his beard to grow in the ancient fashion. — 5. Against the Christians (Κατὰ Χριστιανῶν). This work is lost, but some extracts from it are given in Cyrill's reply to it, which is still extant.—The best edition of the collected works of Julian is by Spanheim, Lips. 1696.

Juliānus, Salvīus, an eminent Roman jurist, who flourished under Hadrian and the Antonines. He was praefectus urbi, and twice consul, but his name does not appear in the Fasti. By the order of Hadrian, he drew up the edictum perpetuum, which forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. His work appears to have consisted in collecting and arranging the clauses which the praetors were accustomed to insert in their annual edict, in condensing the materials, and in omitting antiquated provisions. He was a voluminous legal writer, and his works are cited in the Digest.

Jūlīas (Ἰουλίας: Bib. Bethsaida: Et-Tell, Ru.), a city of Palestine on the E. side of the Jordan, N. of the Lake of Tiberias, so called by the tetrarch Philip, in honour of Julia, the daughter of Augustus.

Juliobrīga (Retortillo, nr. Reynosa), a town of the Cantabri in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the sources of the Iberus.

Juliomăgus. [Andecavi.]

Juliŏpŏlis (Ἰουλιόπολις). [Gordium; Tarsus.]

Jūlius. [Julia Gens.]

Juncārĭa (Junquera), a town of the Indigetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Barcino to the frontiers of Gaul, in a plain covered with rushes (Ἰουγκάριον πεδίον).

Jūnĭa. 1. Half-sister of M. Brutus, the murderer of Caesar, and wife of M. Lepidus, the triumvir. — 2. Tertĭa, or Tertulla, own sister of the preceding, was the wife of C. Cassius, one of Caesar's murderers. She survived her husband a long while, and did not die till A. D. 22.

Jūnĭa Gens, an ancient patrician house at Rome, to which belonged the celebrated M. Junius Brutus, who took such an active part in expelling the Tarquins. But afterwards the gens appears as only a plebeian one. Under the republic the chief families were those of Brutus, Bubulcus, Gracchanus, Norbanus, Pullus, Silanus. The Junii who lived under the empire, are likewise spoken of under their various surnames.

Jūno, called Hera by the Greeks. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. [Hera.] The word Ju-no contains the same root as Ju-piter. As Jupiter is the king of heaven and of the gods, so Juno is the queen of heaven, or the female Jupiter. She was worshipped at Rome as the queen of heaven, from early times, with the surname of Regina. At a later period her worship was solemnly transferred from Veii to Rome, where a sanctuary was dedicated to her on the Aventine. As Jupiter was the protector of the male sex, so Juno watched over the female sex. She was supposed to accompany every woman through life, from the moment of her birth to her death. Hence she bore the special surnames of Virginalis and Matrona, as well as the general ones of Opigena and Sospita, and under the last mentioned name she was worshipped at Lanuvium. On their birthday women offered sacrifices to Juno surnamed Natalis, just as men sacrificed to their genius natalis. The great festival, celebrated by all the women, in honour of Juno, was called Matronalia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), and took place on the 1st of March. Her protection of women, and especially her power of making them fruitful, is further alluded to in the festival Populifugia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), as well as in the surname of Febrûlis, Februata, Februta, or Februalis. Juno was further, like Saturn, the guardian of the finances, and under the name of Moneta she had a temple on the Capitoline hill, which contained the mint. The most important period in a woman's life is that of her marriage, and she was therefore believed especially to preside over marriage. Hence she was called Juga or Jugalis, and had a variety of other names, such as Pronuba, Cinxia, Lucina, &c. The month of June, which is said to have been originally called Junonius, was considered to be the most favourable period for marrying. Women in childbed invoked Juno Lucina to help them, and newly-born children were likewise under her protection: hence she was sometimes confounded with the Greek Artemis or Ilithyia. In Etruria she was worshipped under the name of Cupra. She was also worshipped at Falerii, Lanuvium, Aricia, Tibur, Praeneste, and other places. In the representations of the Roman Juno that have come down to us, the type of the Greek Hera is commonly adopted.

Jūpĭter, called Zeus by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article [Zeus.] Jupiter was originally an elemental divinity, and his name signifies the father or lord of heaven, being a contraction of Diovis pater, or Diespiter. Being the lord of heaven, he was worshipped as the god of rain, storms, thunder, and lightning, whence he had the epithets of Pluvius, Fulgurator, Tonitrualis, Tonans, and Fulminator. As the pebble or flint stone was regarded as the symbol of lightning, Jupiter was frequently represented with such a stone in his hand instead of a thunderbolt. In concluding a treaty, the Romans took the sacred symbols of Jupiter, viz. the sceptre and flint stone, together with some grass from his temple, and the oath taken on such an occasion was expressed by per Jovem Lapidem jurare. In consequence of his possessing such powers over the elements, and especially of his always having the thunderbolt at his command, he was regarded as the highest and most powerful among the gods. Hence he is called the Best and Most High (Optimus Maximus). His temple at Rome stood on the lofty hill of the Capitol, whence he derived the surnames of Capitolinus and Tarpeius. He was regarded as the special protector of Rome. As such he was worshipped by the consuls on entering upon their office; and the triumph of a victorious general was a solemn procession to his temple. He therefore bore the surnames of Imperator, Victor, Invictus, Stator, Opitulus, Feretrius, Praedator, Triumphator, and the like. Under all these surnames he had temples or statues at Rome; and 2 temples, viz. those of Jupiter Stator and of Jupiter Feretrius, were believed to have been built in the time of Romulus. Under the name of Jupiter Capitolinus, he presided over the great Roman games; and under the name of Jupiter Latialis or Latiaris, over the Feriae Latinae. Jupiter, according to the belief of the Romans, determined the course of all human affairs. He foresaw the future, and the events happening in it were the results of his will. He revealed the future to man through signs in the heavens and the flight of birds, which are hence called the messengers of Jupiter, while the god himself is designated as Prodigialis, that is, the sender of prodigies. For the same reason the god was invoked at the beginning of every undertaking, whether sacred or profane, together with Janus, who blessed the beginning itself. Jupiter was further regarded as the guardian of law, and as the protector of justice and virtue. He maintained the sanctity of an oath, and presided over all transactions which were based upon faithfulness and justice. Hence Fides was his companion on the Capitol, along with Victoria; and hence a traitor to his country, and persons guilty of perjury, were thrown down from the Tarpeian rock. — As Jupiter was the lord of heaven, and consequently the prince of light, the white colour was sacred to him, white animals were sacrificed to him, his chariot was believed to be drawn by 4 white horses, his priests wore white caps, and the consuls were attired in white when they offered sacrifices in the Capitol the day they entered on their office. The worship of Jupiter at Rome was under the special care of the Flamen Dialis, who was the highest in rank of all the flamens. (Dict. of Ant. art. Flamen.) The Romans, in their representations of the god, adopted the type of the Greek Zeus.

Jura or Jurassus Mons (Jura), a range of mountains, which run N. of the lake Lemanus as far as Augusta Rauracorum (August near Basle), on the Rhine, forming the boundary between the Sequani and Helvetii.

Justĭniāna. 1. Prima, a town in Illyria, near Tauresium, was the birthplace of Justinian, and was built by that emperor; it became the residence of the archbishop of Illyria, and, in the middle ages, of the Servian kings. — 2. Secunda, also a town in Illyria, previously called Ulpiana, was enlarged and embellished by Justinian.

Justiniānus, surnamed the Great, emperor of Constantinople, A. D. 527—565. He was born near Tauresium in Illyria, A. D. 483; was adopted by his uncle, the emperor Justinus, in 520; succeeded his uncle in 527; married the beautiful but licentious actress, Theodora, who exercised great influence over him; and died in 565, leaving the crown to his nephew, Justin II. He was, during the greater part of his reign, a firm supporter of orthodoxy, and thus has received from ecclesiastical writers the title of Great; but towards the end of his life, he became a heretic, being one of the adherents of Nestorianism. His foreign wars were glorious, but all his victories were won by his generals. The empire of the Vandals in Africa was overthrown by Belisarius, and their king Gelimer led a prisoner to Constantinople; and the kingdom of the Ostrogoths in Italy was likewise destroyed, by the successive victories of Belisarius and Narses. [BELISARIUS; NARSES.] Justinian adorned Constantinople with many public buildings of great magnificence; but the cost of their erection, as well as the expenses of his foreign wars, obliged him to impose many new taxes, which were constantly increased by the natural covetousness and rapacity of the emperor. — The great work of Justinian is his legislation. He resolved to establish a perfect system of written legislation for all his dominions; and, for this end, to make 2 great collections, one of the imperial constitutions, the other of all that was valuable in the works of jurists. His first work was the collection of the imperial constitutions. This he commenced in 528, in the 2nd year of his reign. The task was entrusted to a commission of 10, who completed their labours in the following year (529); and their collection was declared to be law under the title of Justinianeus Codex. — In 530 Tribonian, who had been one of the commission of 10 employed in drawing up the Code, was authorised by the emperor to select fellow-labourers to assist him in the other division of the undertaking. Tribonian selected 16 coadjutors; and this commission proceeded at once to lay under contribution the works of those jurists who had received from former emperors "auctoritatem conscribendarum interpretandique legum." They were ordered to divide their materials into 50 Books, and to subdivide each Book into Titles (Tituli). Nothing that was valuable was to be excluded, nothing that was obsolete was to be admitted, and neither repetition nor inconsistency was to be allowed. This work was to bear the name Digesta or Pandectae. The work was completed, in accordance with the instructions that had been given, in the short space of 3 years; and on the 30th of Dec. 533, it received from the imperial sanction the authority of law. It comprehends upwards of 9000 extracts, in the selection of which the compilers made use of nearly 2000 different books, containing more than 3,000,000 lines.—The Code and the Digest contained a complete body of law; but as they were not adapted to elementary instruction, a commission was appointed, consisting of Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus, to compose an institutional work, which should contain the elements of the law (legum incunabula), and should not be encumbered with useless matter. Accordingly they produced a treatise under the title of Institutiones, which was based on elementary works of a similar character, but chiefly on the Institutiones of Gaius. [GAIUS.] The Institutiones consisted of 4 books, and were published with the imperial sanction, at the same time as the Digest. — After the publication of the Digest and the Institutiones, 50 decisiones and some new constitutiones also were promulgated by the emperor. This rendered a revision of the Code necessary; and accordingly a new Code was promulgated at Constantinople, on the 16th of November, 534, and the use of the decisiones, of the new constitutiones, and of the first edition of the Code, was forbidden. The 2nd edition (Codex Repetitae Praelectionis) is the Code that we now possess, in 12 books, each of which is divided into titles. — Justinian subsequently published various new constitutiones, to which he gave the name of Novellae Constitutiones. These Constitutiones form a kind of supplement to the Code, and were published at various times from 535 to 565, but most of them appeared between 535 and 539. It does not seem, however, that any official compilation of these Novellae appeared in the lifetime of Justinian. — The 4 legislative works of Justinian, the Institutiones, Digesta or Pandectae, Codex, and Novellae, are included under the general name of Corpus Juris Civilis, and form the Roman law, as received in Europe. — The best editions of the Corpus for general use are by Gothofredus and Van Leeuwen, Amst. 1663, 2 vols. fol.; by Gebauer and Spangenberg, Gotting. 1776—1797, 2 vols. 4to.; and by Beck, Lips. 1836, 2 vols. 4to.

Justīnus. 1. The historian, of uncertain date, but who did not live later than the 4th or 5th century of our aera, is the author of an extant work entitled Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV. This work is taken from the Historiae Philippicae of Trogus Pompeius, who lived in the time of Augustus. The title Philippicae was given to it, because its main object was to give the history of the Macedonian monarchy, with all its branches; but in the execution of this design, Trogus permitted himself to indulge in so many excursions, that the work formed a kind of universal history from the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the conquest of the East by Rome. The original work of Trogus, which was one of great value, is lost. The work of Justin is not so much an abridgment of that of Trogus, as a selection of such parts as seemed to him most worthy of being generally known. Edited by Graevius, Lug. Bat. 1683; by Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1719 and 1760; and by Frotscher, Lips. 1827, 3 vols. — 2. Surnamed the Martyr, one of the earliest of the Christian writers, was born about A. D. 103, at Flavia Neapolis, the Shechem of the Old Testament, a city in Samaria. He was brought up as a heathen, and in his youth studied the Greek philosophy with zeal and ardour. He was afterwards converted to Christianity. He retained as a Christian the garb of a philosopher, but devoted himself to the propagation, by writing and otherwise, of the faith which he had embraced. He was put to death at Rome in the persecution under M. Antoninus, about 165. Justin wrote a large number of works in Greek, several of which have come down to us. Of these the most important are: — 1. An Apology for the Christians, addressed to Antoninus Pius, about 139; 2. A Second Apology for the Christians, addressed to the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus; 3. A Dialogue with Tryphon the Jew, in which Justin defends Christianity against the objections of Tryphon. The best edition of the collected works of Justin is by Otto, Jena, 1842—1844, 2 vols. 8vo.

Justus, a Jewish historian of Tiberias in Galilaea, was a contemporary of the historian Josephus, who was very hostile to him.

Jūturna, the nymph of a fountain in Latium, famous for its healing qualities. Its water was used in nearly all sacrifices; a chapel was dedicated to its nymph at Rome in the Campus Martius by Lutatius Catulus; and sacrifices were offered to her on the 11th of January. A pond in the forum, between the temples of Castor and Vesta, was called Lacus Juturnae, whence we must infer that the name of the nymph Juturna is not connected with jugis, but probably with juvare. She is said to have been beloved by Jupiter, who rewarded her with immortality and the rule over the waters. Some writers call her the wife of Janus and mother of Fontus, but in the Aeneid she appears as the affectionate sister of Turnus.

Juvāvum or Juvāvĭa (Salzburg), a town in Noricum, on the river Jovavus or Isonta (Salza), was a Roman colony founded by Hadrian, and the residence of the Roman governor of the province. It was destroyed by the Heruli in the 5th century, but was afterwards rebuilt.

Jŭvĕnālis, Dĕcĭmus Jūnĭus, the great Roman satirist, but of whose life we have few authentic particulars. His ancient biographers relate that he was either the son or the "alumnus" of a rich freedman; that he occupied himself, until he had nearly reached the term of middle life, in declaiming; that, having subsequently composed some clever lines upon Paris the pantomime, he was induced to cultivate assiduously satirical composition; and that in consequence of his attacks upon Paris becoming known to the court, the poet, although now an old man of 80, was appointed to the command of a body of troops, in a remote district of Egypt, where he died shortly afterwards. It is supposed by some that the Paris, who was attacked by Juvenal, was the contemporary of Domitian, and that the poet was accordingly banished by this emperor. But this opinion is clearly untenable. 1. We know that Paris was killed in A. D. 83, upon suspicion of an intrigue with the empress Domitia. 2. The 4th satire, as appears from the concluding lines, was written after the death of Domitian, that is, not earlier than 96. 3. The 1st satire, as we learn from the 49th line, was written after the condemnation of Marius Priscus, that is, not earlier than 100. These positions admit of no doubt; and hence it is established that Juvenal was alive at least 17 years after the death of Paris, and that some of his satires were composed after the death of Domitian. — The only facts with regard to Juvenal upon which we can implicitly rely are, that he flourished towards the close of the first century, that Aquinum, if not the place of his nativity, was at least his chosen residence (Sat. iii. 319), and that he is in all probability the friend whom Martial addresses in 3 epigrams. There is, perhaps, another circumstance which we may admit. We are told that he declaimed for many years of his life; and every page in his writings bears evidence to the accuracy of this assertion. Each piece is a finished rhetorical essay, energetic, glowing, and sonorous. He denounces vice in the most indignant terms; but the obvious tone of exaggeration which pervades all his invectives leaves us in doubt how far this sustained passion is real, and how far assumed for show. The extant works of Juvenal consist of 16 satires, the last being a fragment of very doubtful authenticity, all composed in heroic hexameters. Edited by Ruperti, Lips. 1819; and by Heinrich, Bonn, 1839.

Labdacĭdae. [LABDACUS.]

Labdăcus (Λάβδακος), son of the Theban king, Polydorus, by Nycteis, daughter of Nycteus. Labdacus lost his father at an early age, and was placed under the guardianship of Nycteus, and afterwards under that of Lycus, a brother of Nycteus. When Labdacus had grown up to manhood, Lycus surrendered the government to him; and on the death of Labdacus, which occurred soon after, Lycus undertook the guardianship of his son Laius, the father of Oedipus. — The name Labdacĭdae is frequently given to the descendants of Labdacus, — Oedipus, Polynices, Eteocles and Antigone.

Lăbĕo, Antistĭus. 1. A Roman jurist, was one of the murderers of Julius Caesar, and put an end to his life after the battle of Philippi, B. C. 42. — 2. Son of the preceding, and a still more eminent jurist. He adopted the republican opinions of his father, and was in consequence disliked by Augustus. It is probable that the Labeone insanior of Horace (Sat. i. 3. 80) was a stroke levelled against the jurist, in order to please the emperor. Labeo wrote a large number of works, which are cited in the Digest. He was the founder of one of the 2 great legal schools, spoken of under CAPITO.

Lăbĕo, Q. Fabĭus, quaestor urbanus B. C. 196; praetor 189, when he commanded the fleet in the war against Antiochus; and consul 183.

Lăbĕrĭus, Decĭmus, a Roman eques, and a distinguished writer of mimes, was born about B. C. 107, and died in 43 at Puteoli, in Campania. At Caesar's triumphal games in October, 45, P. Syrus, a professional mimus, seems to have challenged all his craft to a trial of wit in extemporaneous farce, and Caesar offered Laberius 500,000 sesterces to appear on the stage. Laberius was 60 years old, and the profession of a mimus was infamous, but the wish of the dictator was equivalent to a command, and he reluctantly complied. He had however revenge in his power, and took it. His prologue awakened compassion, and perhaps indignation: and during the performance he adroitly availed himself of his various characters to point his wit at Caesar. In the person of a beaten Syrian slave he cried out, — "Marry! Quirites, but we lose our freedom," and all eyes were turned upon the dictator; and in another mime he uttered the pregnant maxim "Needs must he fear, who makes all else adread." Caesar, impartially or vindictively, awarded the prize to Syrus. The prologue of Laberius has been preserved by Macrobius (Sat. ii. 7); and if this may be taken as a specimen of his style, he would rank above Terence, and second only to Plautus, in dramatic vigour. Laberius evidently made great impression on his contemporaries, although he is depreciated by Horace (Sat. i. 10. 6).

Labīcum, Labīci, Lavīcum, Lavīci (Labicānus: Colonna), an ancient town in Latium on one of the hills of the Alban mountain, 15 miles S.E. of Rome, W. of Praeneste, and N.E. of Tusculum. It was an ally of the Aequi; it was taken and was colonised by the Romans, B. C. 418.

Labĭēnus. 1. T., tribune of the plebs B. C. 63, the year of Cicero's consulship. Under pretence of avenging his uncle's death, who had joined Saturninus (100), and had perished along with the other conspirators, he accused Rabirius of perduellio or high treason. Rabirius was defended by Cicero. [RABIRIUS] In his tribuneship Labienus was entirely devoted to Caesar's interests. Accordingly when Caesar went into Transalpine Gaul in 58, he took Labienus with him as his legatus. Labienus continued with Caesar during the greater part of his campaigns in Gaul, and was the ablest officer he had. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he deserted Caesar and joined Pompey. His defection caused the greatest joy among the Pompeian party; but he disappointed the expectations of his new friends, and never performed any thing of importance. He fought against his old commander at the battle of Pharsalia in Greece, 48, at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, 46, and at the battle of Munda in Spain, 45. He was slain in the last of these battles. — 2. Q., son of the preceding, joined the party of Brutus and Cassius after the murder of Caesar, and was sent by them into Parthia to seek aid from Orodes, the Parthian king. Before he could obtain any definite answer from Orodes, the news came of the battle of Philippi, 42. Two years afterwards he persuaded Orodes to entrust him with the command of a Parthian army; and Pacorus, the son of Orodes, was associated with him in the command. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates and met with great success. They defeated Decidius Saxa, the lieutenant of Antony, obtained possession of the two great towns of Antioch and Apamea, and penetrated into Asia Minor. But in the following year, 39, P. Ventidius, the most able of Antony's legates, defeated the Parthians. Labienus fled in disguise into Cilicia, where he was apprehended, and put to death. — 3. T., a celebrated orator and historian in the reign of Augustus, either son or grandson of No. 1. He retained all the republican feelings of his family, and never became reconciled to the imperial government, but took every opportunity to attack Augustus and his friends. His enemies obtained a decree of the senate that all his writings should be burnt; whereupon he shut himself up in the tomb of his ancestors, and thus perished, about A. D. 12.

Labranda (τὰ Λάϐρανδα: Λαϐρανδεύς, Λαϐρανδηνός, Labrandēnus), a town in Caria, 68 stadia N. of Mylasa, celebrated for its temple of Zeus Stratios or Labrandenus, on a hill near the city. Mr. Fellowes considers some ruins at Jakli to be those of the temple; but this is doubtful.

Labro, a sea-port in Etruria, mentioned by Cicero along with Pisae, and supposed by some to be the Liburnum, mentioned by Zosimus, and the modern Livorno or Leghorn. Others however maintain that the ancient Portus Pisanus corresponds to Leghorn.

Labus or Labūtas (Λάϐος or Λαϐούτας: Sobad Koh, part of the Elburz), a mountain of Parthia, between the Coronus and the Sariphi Montes.

Labynētus (Λαϐύνητος), a name common to several of the Babylonian monarchs, seems to have been a title rather than a proper name. The Labynetus, mentioned by Herodotus (i. 74) as mediating a peace between Cyaxares and Alyattes, is the same with Nebuchadnezzar. The Labynetus who is mentioned by Herodotus (i. 77) as a contemporary of Cyrus and Croesus, is the same with the Belshazzar of the prophet Daniel. By other writers he is called Nabonadius or Nabonidus. He was the last king of Babylon. [CYRUS.]

Labyrinthus. [See Dict. of Antiq. s. v.]

Lacedaemon (Λακεδαίμων), son of Zeus and Taygete, was married to Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, by whom he became the father of Amyclas, Eurydice, and Asine. He was king of the country which he called after his own name, Lacedaemon, while he called the capital Sparta after the name of his wife. [SPARTA.]

Lacedaemŏnĭus (Λακεδαιμόνιος), son of Cimon, so named in honour of the Lacedaemonians.

Lacēdas (Λακήδας), or Leocedes (Herod. vi. 127), king of Argos, and father of Melas.

Lacetāni, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis at the foot of the Pyrenees.

Lachāres (Λαχάρης). 1. An Athenian demagogue, made himself tyrant of Athens, B. C. 296, when the city was besieged by Demetrius. When Athens was on the point of falling into the hands of Demetrius, Lachares made his escape to Thebes. — 2. An eminent Athenian rhetorician, who flourished in the 5th century of our era.

Lăches (Λάχης), an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war, is first mentioned in B. C. 427. He fell at the battle of Mantinea, 418. In the dialogue of Plato which bears his name, he is represented as not over-acute in argument, and with temper on a par with his acuteness.

Lăchĕsis, one of the Fates. [MOERAE.]

Lacĭa or Lacĭădae (Λακία, Λακιάδαι: Λακιάδης, Λακιεύς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Oeneis, W. of, and near to Athens.

Lacīnĭum (Λακίνιον ἄκρον), a promontory on the E. coast of Bruttium, a few miles S. of Croton, and forming the W. boundary of the Tarentine gulf. It possessed a celebrated temple of Juno, who was worshipped here under the surname of Lacinia. The remains of this temple are still extant, and have given the modern name to the promontory, Capo delle Colonne or Capo di Nao (ναός). Hannibal dedicated in this temple a bilingual inscription (in Punic and Greek), which recorded the history of his campaigns, and of which Polybius made use in writing his history.

Lacippo (Alecippe), a town in Hispania Baetica not far from the sea, and W. of Malaca.

Lacmon or Lacmus (Λάκμων, Λάκμος), the N. part of Mt. Pindus, in which the river Aous takes its origin.

Lacobrīga. 1. (Lobera), a town of the Vaccaei in the N. of Hispania Tarraconensis on the road from Asturica to Tarraco. — 2. (Lagoa), a town on the S.W. of Lusitania, E. of the Prom. Sacrum.

Lacōnĭca (Λακωνική), sometimes called Lacōnĭa by the Romans, a country of Peloponnesus, was bounded on the N. by Argolis and Arcadia, on the W. by Messenia, and on the E. and S. by the sea. Laconica was a long valley, running southwards to the sea, and was inclosed on 3 sides by mountains. On the N. it was separated by Mt. Parnon from Argolis, and by Mt. Sciritis from Arcadia. It was bounded by Mt. Taygetus on the W. and by Mt. Parnon on the E., which are 2 masses of mountains extending from Arcadia to the S. extremities of the Peloponnesus, Mt. Taygetus terminating at the Prom. Taenarum, and Mt. Parnon, continued under the names of Thornax and Zarex, terminating at the Prom. Malea. The river Eurotas flows through the valley lying between these mountain masses, and falls into the Laconian gulf. In the upper part of its course the valley is narrow, and near Sparta the mountains approach so close to each other as to leave little more than room for the channel of the river. It is for this reason that we find the vale of Sparta called the hollow Lacedaemon. Below Sparta the mountains recede, and the valley opens out into a plain of considerable extent. The soil of this plain is poor, but on the slopes of the mountains there is land of considerable fertility. There were valuable marble quarries near Taenarus. Off the coast shell-fish were caught, which produced a purple dye inferior only to the Tyrian. Laconica is well described by Euripides as difficult of access to an enemy. On the N. the country could only be invaded by the valleys of the Eurotas and the Oenus; the range of Taygetus formed an almost insuperable barrier on the W.; and the want of good harbours on the E. coast protected it from invasion by sea on that side. Sparta was the only town of importance in the country [SPARTA].—The most ancient inhabitants of the country are said to have been Cynurians and Leleges. They were expelled or conquered by the Achaeans, who were the inhabitants of the country in the heroic age. The Dorians afterwards invaded Peloponnesus and became the ruling race in Laconica. Some of the old Achaean inhabitants were reduced to slavery; but a great number of them became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Perioeci (Περίοικοι). The general name for the inhabitants is Lacōnes (Λάκωνες) or Lacedaemŏnĭi (Λακεδαιμόνιοι); but the Perioeci are frequently called Lacedaemonii, to distinguish them from the Spartans.

Lacōnĭcus Sinus (κόλπος Λακωνικὸς), a gulf in the S. of Peloponnesus, into which the Eurotas falls, beginning W. at the Prom. Taenarum and E. at the Prom. Malea.

Lactantĭus, a celebrated Christian Father, but his exact name, the place of his nativity, and the date of his birth, are uncertain. In modern works we find him denominated Lucius Coelius Firmianus Lactantius; but the 2 former appellations, in the 2nd of which Caecilius is often substituted for Coelius, are omitted in many MSS., while the 2 latter are frequently presented in an inverted order. Since he is spoken of as far advanced in life about A. D. 315, he must have been born not later than the middle of the 3rd century, probably in Italy, possibly at Firmum, on the Adriatic, and certainly studied in Africa, where he became the pupil of Arnobius, who taught rhetoric at Sicca. His fame became so widely extended, that about 301 he was invited by Diocletian to settle at Nicomedia, and there to practise his art. At this period he appears to have become a Christian. He was summoned to Gaul, about 312—318, when now an old man, to superintend the education of Crispus, son of Constantine, and he probably died at Treves some 10 or 12 years afterwards (325—330.) — The extant works of Lactantius are: — 1. Divinarum Institutionum Libri VII., a sort of introduction to Christianity, intended to supersede the less perfect treatises of Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and Cyprian. Each of the 7 books bears a separate title: (1.) De Falsa Religione. (2.) De Origine Erroris. (3.) De Falsa Sapientia. (4.) De Vera Sapientia et Religione. (5.) De Justitia. (6.) De Vero Cultu. (7.) De Vita Beata. — 2. An Epitome of the Institutions. — 3. De Ira Dei. — 4. De Opificio Dei s. De Formatione Hominis. — 5. De Mortibus Persecutorum. — 6. Various Poems, most of which were probably not written by Lactantius. — The style of Lactantius, formed upon the model of the great orator of Rome, has gained for him the appellation of the Christian Cicero, and not undeservedly. The best edition of Lactantius is by Le Brun and Lenglet du Fresnoy, Paris, 1748.

Lactārĭus Mons or Lactis Mons, a mountain in Campania, belonging to the Apennines, 4 miles E. of Stabiae, so called because the cows which grazed upon it produced excellent milk. Here Narses gained a victory over the Goths, A. D. 553.

Lacȳdes (Λακύδης), a native of Cyrene, succeeded Arcesilaus as president of the Academy at Athens. The place where his instructions were delivered was a garden, named the Lacydeum (Λακύδειον), provided for the purpose by his friend Attalus Philometor, king of Pergamus. This alteration in the locality of the school seems at least to have contributed to the rise of the name of the New Academy. He died about 215, from the effects, it is said, of excessive drinking.

Ladē (Λάδη), an island off the W. coast of Caria, opposite to Miletus and to the bay into which the Maeander falls.

Ladon (Λάδων), the dragon who guarded the apples of the Hesperides, was the offspring of Typhon and Echidna, or of Ge, or of Phorcys and Ceto. He was slain by Hercules; and the representation of the battle was placed by Zeus among the stars.

Lādon (Λάδων). 1. A river in Arcadia, which rose near Clitor, and fell into the Alphēus between Heraea and Phrixa. In mythology Ladon is the husband of Stymphalis, and the father of Daphne and Metope. — 2. A small river in Elis, which rose on the frontiers of Achaia and fell into the Penēus.

Laeētāni, a people on the E. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the mouth of the river Rubricatus (Llobregat), probably the same as the Laletani, whose country, Laletānia produced good wine, and whose chief town was Barcino.

Laelaps (Λαῖλαψ), i. e. the storm wind, personified in the legend of the dog of Procris which bore this name. Procris had received this swift animal from Artemis, and gave it to her husband Cephalus. When the Teumessian fox was sent to punish the Thebans, Cephalus sent the dog Laelaps against the fox. The dog overtook the fox, but Zeus changed both animals into a stone, which was shown in the neighbourhood of Thebes.

Laeliānus, one of the 30 tyrants, emperor in Gaul after the death of Postumus, A. D. 267, was slain, after a few months, by his own soldiers, who proclaimed Victorinus in his stead.

Laelius. 1. C., was from early manhood the friend and companion of Scipio Africanus the elder, and fought under him in almost all his campaigns. He was consul B. C. 190, and obtained the province of Cisalpine Gaul. — 2. C., surnamed Sapiens, son of the preceding. His intimacy with Scipio Africanus the younger was as remarkable as his father's friendship with the elder, and it obtained an imperishable monument in Cicero's treatise Laelius sive de Amicitia. He was born about 186, was tribune of the plebs 151; praetor 145; and consul 140. Though not devoid of military talents, as his campaign against the Lusitanian Viriathus proved, he was more of a statesman than a soldier, and more of a philosopher than a statesman. From Diogenes of Babylon, and afterwards from Panaetius, he imbibed the doctrines of the stoic school; his father's friend Polybius was his friend also; the wit and idiom of Terence were pointed and polished by his and Scipio's conversation; and the satirist Lucilius was his familiar companion. The political opinions of Laelius were different at different periods of his life. He endeavoured, probably during his tribunate, to procure a re-division of the public land, but he desisted from the attempt, and for his forbearance received the appellation of the Wise or the Prudent. He afterwards became a strenuous supporter of the aristocratical party. Several of his orations were extant in the time of Cicero, but were characterised more by smoothness (lenitas) than by power. — Laelius is the principal interlocutor in Cicero's dialogue De Amicitia, and is one of the speakers in the De Senectute, and in the De Republica. His two daughters were married, the one to Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, the other to C. Fannius Strabo. The opinion of his worth seems to have been universal, and it is one of Seneca's injunctions to his friend Lucilius "to live like Laelius."

Laenas, Popīlius, plebeians. The family was unfavourably distinguished, even among the Romans, for their sternness, cruelty, and haughtiness of character. 1. M., 4 times consul B. C. 359, 356, 350, 348. In his 3rd consulship (350) he won a hard-fought battle against the Gauls, for which he celebrated a triumph—the first ever obtained by a plebeian. — 2. M., praetor 176, consul 172, and censor 159. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurian mountaineers; and when the remainder of the tribe surrendered to him, he sold them all as slaves. — 3. C., brother of No. 2, was consul 172. He was afterwards sent as ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, whom the senate wished to abstain from hostilities against Egypt. Antiochus was just marching upon Alexandria, when Popilius gave him the letter of the senate, which the king read and promised to take into consideration with his friends. Popilius straightway described with his cane a circle in the sand round the king, and ordered him not to stir out of it before he had given a decisive answer. This boldness so frightened Antiochus, that he at once yielded to the demand of Rome. — 4. P., consul 132, the year after the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He was charged by the victorious aristocratical party with the prosecution of the accomplices of Gracchus; and in this odious task he showed all the hard-heartedness of his family. He subsequently withdrew himself, by voluntary exile, from the vengeance of C. Gracchus, and did not return to Rome till after his death.

Laertes (Λαέρτης), king of Ithaca, was son of Acrisius and Chalcomedusa, and husband of Anticlēa, by whom he became the father of Ulysses and Ctimene. Some writers call Ulysses the son of Sisyphus. [Anticlea.] Laertes took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was still alive when Ulysses returned to Ithaca after the fall of Troy.

Laertĭus, Diogĕnes. [Diogenes.]

Laestrygŏnes (Λαιστρυγόνες), a savage race of cannibals, whom Ulysses encountered in his wanderings. They were governed by Antiphates and Lamus. They belong however to mythology rather than to history. The modern interpreters of Homer place them on the N. W. coast of Sicily. The Greeks themselves placed them on the E. coast of the island in the plains of Leontini, which are therefore called Laestrygonii Campi. The Romans however, and more especially the Roman poets, who regarded the prom. Circeium as the Homeric island of Circe, transplanted the Laestrygones to the S. coast of Latium in the neighbourhood of Formiae, which they supposed to have been built by Lamus, the king of this people. Hence Horace (Carm. iii. 16. 34) speaks of Laestrygonia Bacchus in amphora, that is, Formian wine; and Ovid (Met. xiv. 233) calls Formiae, Laestrygonis Lami Urbs.

Laevi or Levi, a Ligurian people in Gallia Transpadana on the river Ticinus, who, in conjunction with the Marici, built the town of Ticinum (Pavia).

Laevīnus, Valerĭus. 1. P., consul B.C. 280, had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king wrote to Laevinus, offering to arbitrate between Rome and Tarentum; but Laevinus bluntly bade him mind his own business, and begone to Epirus. An Epirot spy having been taken in the Roman lines, Laevinus showed him the legions under arms, and bade him tell his master, if he was curious about the Roman men and tactics, to come and see them himself. In the battle which followed, Laevinus was defeated by Pyrrhus on the banks of the Siris. — 2. M., praetor 215, crossed over to Greece and carried on war against Philip. He continued in the command in Greece till 211, when he was elected consul in his absence. In his consulship (210) he carried on the war in Sicily, and took Agrigentum. He continued as proconsul in Sicily for several years, and in 208 made a descent upon the coast of Africa. He died 200, and his sons Publius and Marcus honoured his memory with funeral games and gladiatorial combats, exhibited during 4 successive days in the forum. — 3. C., son of No. 2, was by the mother's side brother of M. Fulvius Nobilior, consul 189. Laevinus was himself consul in 176, and carried on war against the Ligurians.

Lagos, a city in great Phrygia.

Lāgus (Λάγος), a Macedonian of obscure birth, was the father, or reputed father, of Ptolemy, the founder of the Egyptian monarchy. He married Arsinoë, a concubine of Philip of Macedon, who was said to have been pregnant at the time of their marriage, on which account the Macedonians generally looked upon Ptolemy as the son of Philip.

Lāis (Λαΐς), the name of 2 celebrated Grecian Hetaerae, or courtezans. — 1. The elder, a native probably of Corinth, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her age. She was notorious also for her avarice and caprice. — 2. The younger, was the daughter of Timandra, and was probably born at Hyccara in Sicily. According to some accounts she was brought to Corinth when 7 years old, having been taken prisoner in the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and bought by a Corinthian. This story, however, involves numerous difficulties, and seems to have arisen from a confusion between this Lais and the elder one of the same name. She was a contemporary and rival of Phryne. She became enamoured of a Thessalian named Hippolochus, or Hippostratus, and accompanied him to Thessaly. Here, it is said, some Thessalian women, jealous of her beauty, enticed her into a temple of Aphrodite, and there stoned her to death.

Laĭus (Λάϊος), son of Labdacus, lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by Lycus. [LABDACUS.] When Lycus was slain by Amphion and Zethus, Laius took refuge with Pelops in Peloponnesus. After the death of Amphion and Zethus, Laius returned to Thebes, and ascended the throne of his father. He married Jocasta, and became by her the father of Oedipus, by whom he was slain. For details see OEDIPUS.

Lălăgē, a common name of courtezans, from the Greek λαλαγή, prattling, used as a term of endearment, "little prattler."

Laletāni. [LAEETANI.]

Lamăchus (Λάμαχος), an Athenian, son of Xenophanes, was the colleague of Alcibiades and Nicias, in the great Sicilian expedition, B.C. 415. He fell under the walls of Syracuse, in a sally of the besieged. He appears amongst the dramatis personae of Aristophanes, as the brave and somewhat blustering soldier, delighting in the war, and thankful, moreover, for its pay. Plutarch describes him as brave, but so poor, that on every fresh appointment he used to beg for money from the government to buy clothing and shoes.

Lamētus (Lamato), a river in Bruttium, near Croton, which falls into the Lameticus Sinus. Upon it was the town Lamētīni (St. Eufemia).

Lămĭa (Λαμία). 1. A female phantom. [EMPUSA.] — 2. A celebrated Athenian courtezan, was a favourite mistress for many years of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

Lamĭa, Aelĭus. This family claimed a high antiquity, and pretended to be descended from the mythical hero, LAMUS. — 1. L., a Roman eques, supported Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, B. C. 63, and was accordingly banished by the influence of the consuls Gabinius and Piso in 58. He was subsequently recalled from exile, and during the civil wars espoused Caesar's party. — 2. L., son of the preceding, and the friend of Horace, was consul A. D. 3. He was made praefectus urbi in 32, but he died in the following year. — 3. L., was married to Domitia Longina, the daughter of Corbulo; but during the lifetime of Vespasian he was deprived of her by Domitian, who first lived with her as his mistress, and subsequently married her. Lamia was put to death by Domitian after his accession to the throne.

Lamĭa (Λαμία: Λαμιεύς, Λαμιώτης: Zeitun or Zeituni), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, situated on the small river Achelous, and 50 stadia inland from the Maliac gulf, on which it possessed a harbour, called Phalara. It has given its name to the war, which was carried on by the confederate Greeks against Antipater after the death of Alexander, B.C. 323. The confederates under the command of Leosthenes, the Athenian, defeated Antipater, who took refuge in Lamia, where he was besieged for some months. Leosthenes was killed during the siege; and the confederates were obliged to raise it in the following year (322), in consequence of the approach of Leonnatus. The confederates under the command of Antiphilus defeated Leonnatus who was slain in the action. Soon afterwards Antipater was joined by Craterus; and thus strengthened he gained a decisive victory over the confederates at the battle of Cranon, which put an end to the Lamian war.

Laminĭum (Laminitānus), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, 95 miles S.E. of Toletum.

Lampa or Lappa (Λάμπη, Λάππη: Λαμπαῖος, Λαμπεύς), a town in the N. of Crete, a little inland, S. of Hydramum, said to have been built by Agamemnon, but to have been called after Lampus.

Lampēa (ἡ Λάμπεια) or Lampēus Mons, a part of the mountain range of Erymanthus, on the frontiers of Achaia and Elis.

Lampĕtĭa (Λαμπετίη), daughter of Helios by the nymph Neaera. She and her sister Phaetusa tended the flocks of their father in Sicily. In some legends she appears as one of the sisters of Phaethon.

Lampon (Λάμπων), an Athenian, a celebrated soothsayer and interpreter of oracles. In conjunction with Xenocritus, he led the colony which founded Thurii in Italy, B. C. 443.

Lamponĭa, or -ĭum (Λαμπώνεια, -ώνιον), an important city of Mysia, in the interior of the Troad, near the borders of Aeolia.

Lampra, Lamprae, or Lamptrae (Λαμπρά, Λαμπραί, Λαμπτραί: Λαμπρεύς: Lamorica), a demus on the W. coast of Attica, near the promontory Astypalaea, belonging to the tribe Erechtheis. It was divided into an upper and a lower city.

Lamprĭdius, Aelĭus, one of the Scriptores Historiae Augustae, lived in the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, and wrote the lives of the emperors: — 1. Commodus; 2. Antoninus Diadumenus; 3. Elagabalus, and 4. Alexander Severus. It is not improbable that Lampridius is the same as Spartianus, and that the name of the author in full was Aelius Lampridius Spartianus. For the editions of Lampridius, see CAPITOLINUS.

Lampsăcus (Λάμψακος: Λαμψακηνός: Lapsaki, Ru.), an important city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Hellespont, possessed a good harbour. It was celebrated for its wine; and hence it was one of the cities assigned by Xerxes to Themistocles for his maintenance. It was the chief seat of the worship of Priapus; and the birthplace of the historian Charon, the philosophers Adimantus and Metrodorus, and the rhetorician Anaximenes. Lampsacus was a colony of the Phocaeans: the name of the surrounding district, Berbrўcia, connects its old inhabitants with the Thracian BEBRYCES.

Lămus (Λάμος), son of Poseidon, and king of the Laestrygones, was said to have founded Formiae, in Italy. [FORMIAE.]

Lamus (Λάμος: Lamas), a river of Cilicia, the boundary between Cilicia Aspera and Cilicia Campestris; with a town of the same name.

Lancia (Lancienses). 1. (Sollanco or Sollancia, near Leon), a town of the Astures in Hispania Tarraconensis, 9 miles E. of Legio, was destroyed by the Romans. — 2. Surnamed Oppidāna, a town of the Vettones in Lusitania, not far from the sources of the river Munda.

Langobardi or Longobardi, corrupted into Lombards, a German tribe of the Suevic race. They dwelt originally on the left bank of the Elbe, near the river Saale; but they afterwards crossed the Elbe, and dwelt on the E. bank of the river, where they were for a time subject to Maroboduus in the reign of Tiberius. After this they disappear from history for 4 centuries. Like most of the other German tribes, they migrated southwards; and in the 2nd half of the 5th century we find them again on the N. bank of the Danube, in Upper Hungary. Here they defeated and almost annihilated the Heruli. In the middle of the 6th century they crossed the Danube, at the invitation of Justinian, and settled in Pannonia. Here they were engaged for 30 years in a desperate conflict with the Gepidae, which only ended with the extermination of the latter people. In A. D. 568, Alboin, the king of the Lombards, under whose command they had defeated the Gepidae, led his nation across the Julian Alps, and conquered the plains of N. Italy, which have ever since received the name of Lombardy. Here he founded the celebrated kingdom of the Lombards, which existed for upwards of 2 centuries, till its overthrow by Charlemagne. — Paulus Diaconus, who was a Lombard by birth, derives their name of Langobardi from their long beards; but modern critics reject this etymology, and suppose the name to have reference to their dwelling on the banks of the Elbe, inasmuch as Börde signifies in low German a fertile plain on the bank of a river, and there is still a district in Magdeburg called the lange Börde. Paulus Diaconus also states that the Lombards came originally from Scandinavia, where they were called Vinili, and that they did not receive the name of Langobardi or Long-Beards, till they settled in Germany; but this statement ought probably to be rejected.

Lanīcē (Λανίκη), nurse of Alexander the Great, and sister of Clitus.

Lanuvĭum (Lanuvīnus: Lavigna), an ancient city in Latium, situated on a hill of the Alban Mount, not far from the Appia Via, and subsequently a Roman municipium. It possessed an ancient and celebrated temple of Juno Sospita. Under the empire it obtained some importance as the birthplace of Antoninus Pius. Part of the walls of Lanuvium and the substructions of the temple of Juno are still remaining.

Laŏcŏon (Λαοκόων), a Trojan, who plays a prominent part in the post-Homeric legends, was a son of Antenor or Acoëtes, and a priest of the Thymbraean Apollo. He tried to dissuade his countrymen from drawing into the city the wooden horse, which the Greeks had left behind them when they pretended to sail away from Troy; and, to show the danger from the horse, he hurled a spear into its side. The Trojans, however, would not listen to his advice; and as he was preparing to sacrifice a bull to Poseidon, suddenly 2 fearful serpents were seen swimming towards the Trojan coast from Tenedos. They rushed towards Laocoon, who, while all the people took to flight, remained with his 2 sons standing by the altar of the god. The serpents first coiled around the 2 boys, and then around the father, and thus all 3 perished. The serpents then hastened to the acropolis of Troy, and disappeared behind the shield of Tritonis. The reason why Laocoon suffered this fearful death is differently stated. According to some, it was because he had run his lance into the side of the horse; according to others, because, contrary to the will of Apollo, he had married and begotten children; or, according to others again, because Poseidon, being hostile to the Trojans, wanted to show to the Trojans in the person of Laocoon what fate all of them deserved. — The story of Laocoon's death was a fine subject for epic and lyric as well as tragic poetry, and was therefore frequently related by ancient poets, such as by Bacchylides, Sophocles, Euphorion, Virgil, and others. His death also formed the subject of many ancient works of art; and a magnificent group, representing the father and his 2 sons entwined by the 2 serpents, is still extant, and preserved in the Vatican. [AGESANDER.]

Laŏdămas (Λαοδάμας). 1. Son of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, and Arete. — 2. Son of Eteocles, and king of Thebes, in whose reign the Epigoni marched against Thebes. In the battle against the Epigoni, he slew their leader Aegialeus, but was himself slain by Alcmaeon. Others related, that after the battle was lost, Laodamas fled to the Encheleans in Illyricum.

Lăŏdămīa (Λαοδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Acastus, and wife of Protesilaus. When her husband was slain before Troy, she begged the gods to be allowed to converse with him for only 3 hours. The request was granted. Hermes led Protesilaus back to the upper world, and when Protesilaus died a second time, Laodamia died with him. A later tradition states, that after the second death of Protesilaus, Laodamia made an image of her husband, to which she payed divine honours; but as her father Acastus interfered, and commanded her to burn the image, she herself leaped into the fire. — 2. Daughter of Bellerophontes, became by Zeus the mother of Sarpedon, and was killed by Artemis while she was engaged in weaving. — 3. Nurse of Orestes, usually called Arsinoe.

Laŏdĭcē (Λαοδίκη). 1. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and wife of Helicaon. Some relate that she fell in love with Acamas, the son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes as ambassador to Troy, and that she became by Acamas the mother of Munitus. On the death of this son, she leaped down a precipice, or was swallowed up by the earth. — 2. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra (Hom. Il. ix. 146), called Electra by the tragic poets. [Electra.] — 3. Mother of Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy. — 4. Wife of Antiochus II. Theos, king of Syria, and mother of Seleucus Callinicus. For details, see p. 55, a. — 5. Wife of Seleucus Callinicus, and mother of Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great. — 6. Wife of Antiochus the Great, was a daughter of Mithridates IV. king of Pontus, and granddaughter of No. 4. — 7. Wife of Achaeus, the cousin and adversary of Antiochus the Great, was a sister of No. 6. — 8. Daughter of Antiochus the Great by his wife Laodice [No. 6]. She was married to her eldest brother Antiochus, who died in his father's lifetime, 195. — 9. Daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was married to Perseus, king of Macedonia. — 10. Daughter of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, was married to the impostor Alexander Balas. — 11. Wife and also sister of Mithridates Eupator (commonly called the Great), king of Pontus. During the absence of her husband, and deceived by a report of his death, she gave free scope to her amours; and, alarmed for the consequences, on his return attempted his life by poison. Her designs were, however, betrayed to Mithridates, who immediately put her to death. — 12. Another sister of Mithridates Eupator, married to Ariarathes VI., king of Cappadocia. After the death of her husband she married Nicomedes, king of Bithynia.

Laŏdĭcēa (Λαοδίκεια: Λαοδικεύς, Laodicensis, Laodicēnus), the name of 6 Greek cities in Asia, 4 of which (besides another now unknown) were founded by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honour of his mother Laodice, the other 2 by Antiochus II. and Antiochus I. or III. (See Nos. 1. & 5). — 1. L. ad Lycum (Λ. πρὸς τῷ Λύκῳ, Eski-Hissar, Ru.), a city of Asia Minor, stood on a ridge of hills near the S. bank of the river Lycus (Choruk-Su), a tributary of the Maeander, a little to the W. of Colossae, and to the S. of Hierapolis, on the borders of Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia, to each of which it is assigned by different writers; but, after the definitive division of the provinces, it is reckoned as belonging to Great Phrygia, and under the later Roman emperors it was the capital of Phrygia Pacatiana. It was founded by Antiochus II. Theos, on the site of a previously existing town, and named in honour of his wife Laodice. It passed from the kings of Syria to those of Pergamus, and from them to the Romans, to whom Attalus III. bequeathed his kingdom. Under the Romans it belonged to the province of Asia. At first it was comparatively an insignificant place, and it suffered much from the frequent earthquakes to which its site seems to be more exposed than that of any other city of Asia Minor, and also from the Mithridatic War. Under the later Roman republic and the early emperors, it rose to importance; and, though more than once almost destroyed by earthquakes, it was restored by the aid of the emperors and the munificence of its own citizens, and became, next to Apamea, the greatest city in Phrygia, and one of the most flourishing in Asia Minor. In an inscription it is called "the most splendid city of Asia," a statement confirmed by the magnificent ruins of the city, which comprise an aqueduct, a gymnasium, several theatres, a stadium almost perfect, besides remains of roads, porticoes, pillars, gates, foundations of houses, and sarcophagi. This great prosperity was owing partly to its situation, on the high road for the traffic between the E. and W. of Asia, and partly to the fertility and beauty of the country round it. Already in the apostolic age it was the seat of a flourishing Christian Church, which, however, became very soon infected with the pride and luxury produced by the prosperity of the city, as we learn from St. John's severe Epistle to it. (Revel. iii. 14—22). St. Paul also addresses it in common with the nighbouring church of Colossae (Coloss. ii. 1; iv. 13. 16). — 2. L. Combusta (Λ. ἡ κατακεκαυμένη or κεκαυμένη, i. e. the burnt; the reason of the epithet is doubtful: Ladik, Ru.), a city of Lycaonia, N. of Iconium, on the high road from the W. coast of Asia Minor to the Euphrates. — 3. L. ad Mare (Λ. ἐπὶ τῇ θαλάττῃ: Ladikiyeh), a city on the coast of Syria, about 50 miles S. of Antioch, was built by Seleucus I. on the site of an earlier city, called Ramitha or Λευκὴ Ἀκτή. It had the best harbour in Syria, and the surrounding country was celebrated for its wine and fruits, which formed a large part of the traffic of the city. In the civil contests during the later period of the Syrian kingdom, Laodicea obtained virtual independence, in which it was confirmed probably by Pompey, and certainly by Julius Caesar, who greatly favoured the city. In the civil wars, after Caesar's death, the Laodiceans were severely punished by Cassius for their adherence to Dolabella, and the city again suffered in the Parthian invasion of Syria, but was recompensed by Antony with exemption from taxation. Herod the Great built the Laodiceans an aqueduct, the ruins of which still exist. It is mentioned occasionally as an important city under the later Roman empire; and, after the conquest of Syria by the Arabs, it was one of those places on the coast which still remained in the hands of the Greek emperors, and with a Christian population. It was taken and destroyed by the Arabs in 1188. It is now a poor Turkish village, with very considerable ruins of the ancient city, the chief of which are a triumphal arch, the remains of the mole of the harbour, of a portico near it, of catacombs on the sea-coast, of the aqueducts and cisterns, and of pillars where the Necropolis is supposed to have stood. — 4. L. ad Libănum (Λ. Λιβανοῦ, πρὸς Λιβανῷ), a city of Coele-Syria, at the N. entrance to the narrow valley (αὐλών), between Libanus and Antilibanus, appears to have been, through its favourable situation, a place of commercial importance. During the possession of Coele-Syria by the Greek kings of Egypt, it was the S. W. border fortress of Syria. It was the chief city of a district called Laodicene. — 5. A city in the S. E. of Media, near the boundary of Persis, founded either by Antiochus I., Soter, or Antiochus II. the Great: site unknown. — 6. In Mesopotamia: site unknown.

Laŏdŏcus (Λαοδόκος). 1. Son of Bias and Pero and brother of Talaus, took part in the expeditions of the Argonauts, and of the Seven against Thebes. — 2. Son of Antenor.

Laŏmĕdon (Λαομέδων). 1. King of Troy, son of Ilus and Eurydice, and father of Priam, Hesione, and other children. His wife is called Strymo, Rhoeo, Placia, Thoosa, Zeuxippe, or Leucippe. Poseidon and Apollo, who had displeased Zeus, were doomed to serve Laomedon for wages. Accordingly, Poseidon built the walls of Troy, while Apollo tended the king's flocks on Mount Ida. When the two gods had done their work, Laomedon refused them the reward he had promised them, and expelled them from his dominions. Thereupon Poseidon in wrath let loose the sea over the lands, and also sent a marine monster to ravage the country. By the command of an oracle, the Trojans were obliged, from time to time, to sacrifice a maiden to the monster; and on one occasion it was decided by lot that Hesione, the daughter of Laomedon himself, should be the victim. But it happened that Hercules was just returning from his expedition against the Amazons, and he promised to save the maiden, if Laomedon would give him the horses which Tros had once received from Zeus as a compensation for Ganymedes. Laomedon promised them to Hercules, but again broke his word, when Hercules had killed the monster and saved Hesione. Hereupon Hercules sailed with a squadron of 6 ships against Troy, killed Laomedon, with all his sons, except Podarces (Priam), and gave Hesione to Telamon. Hesione ransomed her brother Priam with her veil. — Priam, as the son of Laomedon, is called Laomedontiădes; and the Trojans, as the subjects of Laomedon, are called Laomedontiădae. — 2. Of Mytilene, was one of Alexander's generals, and after the king's death (B.C. 323), obtained the government of Syria. He was afterwards defeated by Nicanor, the general of Ptolemy, and deprived of Syria.

Lapēthus or Lapathus (Λάπηθος, Λάπαθος: Λαπήθιος, Λαπηθεύς: Lapitho or Lapta), an important town on the N. coast of Cyprus, on a river of the same name, E. of the prom. Crommyon.

Laphrĭa (Λαφρία), a surname of Artemis among the Calydonians, from whom the worship of the goddess was introduced into Naupactus and Patrae, in Achaia. The name was traced back to a hero, Laphrius, son of Castalius, who was said to have instituted her worship at Calydon.

Laphystĭus (Λαφύστιος), a mountain in Boeotia, between Coronea, Lebadea, and Orchomenus, on which was a temple of Zeus, who hence bore the surname Laphystius.

Lapidĕi Campi. [CAMPI LAPIDEI.]

Lăpĭthes (Λαπίθης), son of Apollo and Stilbe, brother of Centaurus, and husband of Orsinome, the daughter of Eurynomus, by whom he became the father of Phorbas, Triopas, and Periphas. He was regarded as the ancestor of the Lapithae in the mountains of Thessaly. The Lapithae were governed by Pirithous, who being a son of Ixion, was a half-brother of the Centaurs. The latter, therefore, demanded their share in their father's kingdom, and, as their claims were not satisfied, a war arose between the Lapithae and Centaurs, which, however, was terminated by a peace. But when Pirithous married Hippodamia, and invited the Centaurs to the marriage feast, the latter, fired by wine, and urged on by Ares, attempted to carry off the bride and the other women. Thereupon a bloody conflict ensued, in which the Centaurs were defeated by the Lapithae.—The Lapithae are said to have been the inventors of bits and bridles for horses. It is probable that they were a Pelasgian people, who defeated the less civilised Centaurs, and compelled them to abandon Mt. Pelion.

Lar or Lars, was an Etruscan praenomen, borne for instance by Porsena and Tolumnius. From the Etruscans it passed over to the Romans, whence we read of Lar Herminius, who was consul B. C. 448. This word signified lord, king, or hero in the Etruscan.

Lara. [LARUNDA.]

Laranda (τὰ Λάρανδα: Larenda or Caraman), a considerable town in the S. of Lycaonia, at the N. foot of M. Taurus, in a fertile district: taken by storm by Perdiccas, but afterwards restored. It was used by the Isaurian robbers as one of their strongholds.

Larentĭa. [ACCA LARENTIA.]

Lāres, inferior gods at Rome. Their worship was closely connected with that of the Manes, and was analogous to the hero worship of the Greeks. The Lares may be divided into 2 classes, the Lares domestici and Lares publici. The former were the Manes of a house raised to the dignity of heroes. The Manes were more closely connected with the place of burial, while the Lares were more particularly the divinities presiding over the hearth and the whole house. It was only the spirits of good men that were honoured as Lares. All the domestic Lares were headed by the Lar familiaris, who was regarded as the founder of the family. He was inseparable from the family; and when the latter changed their abode, he went with them. Among the Lares publici we have mention made of Lares praestites and Lares compitales, who are in reality the same, and differ only in regard to the place or occasion of their worship. Servius Tullius is said to have instituted their worship; and when Augustus improved the regulations of the city, he also renewed the worship of the public Lares. Their name, Lares praestites, characterises them as the protecting spirits of the city, in which they had a temple in the uppermost part of the Via Sacra, that is, near a compitum, whence they might be called Compitales. This temple (Sacellum Larum or aedes Larum) contained 2 images, which were probably those of Romulus and Remus. Now, while these Lares were the general protectors of the whole city, the Lares compitales must be regarded as those who presided over the several divisions of the city, which were marked by the compita or the points where two or more streets crossed each other, and where small chapels (aediculae) were erected to them. In addition to the Lares praestites and compitales, there are other Lares which must be reckoned among the public ones, viz., the Lares rurales, who were worshipped in the country; the Lares viales, who were worshipped on the high-roads by travellers; and the Lares marini or permarini, to whom P. Aemilius dedicated a sanctuary in remembrance of his naval victory over Antiochus. — The worship of the domestic Lares, together with that of the Penates and Manes, constituted what are called the sacra privata. The images of the Lares, in great houses, were usually in a separate compartment, called aediculae or lararia. They were generally represented in the cinctus Gabinus. Their worship was very simple, especially in early times and in the country. The offerings were set before them in patellae, whence they themselves are called patellarii. Pious people made offerings to them every day; but they were more especially worshipped on the calends, nones, and ides of every month. When the inhabitants of the house took their meals, some portion was offered to the Lares, and on joyful family occasions they were adorned with wreaths, and the lararia were thrown open. When the young bride entered the house of her husband, her first duty was to offer a sacrifice to the Lares. Respecting the public worship of the Lares, and the festival of the Larentalia, see Dict. of Ant. art. Larentalia, Compitalia.

Lares (Λάρης: Alarbous), a city of N. Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena), S. W. of Zama; a place of some importance at the time of the war with Jugurtha.

Largus, Scribonĭus. [SCRIBONIUS.]

Larīnum (Larīnas, ātis: Larino), a town of the Frentani (whence the inhabitants are sometimes called Frentani Larinates), on the river Tifernus, and near the borders of Apulia, subsequently a Roman municipium, possessed a considerable territory extending down to the Adriatic sea. The town of Clitoria on the coast was subject to Larinum.

Larissa (Λάρισσα), the name of several Pelasgian places, whence Larissa is called in mythology the daughter of Pelasgus. I. In Europe. 1. (Larissa or Larza), an important town of Thessaly, in Pelasgiotis, situated on the Peneus, in an extensive plain. It was once the capital of the Pelasgi, and had a democratical constitution, but subsequently became subject to the Macedonians. It retained its importance under the Romans, and after the time of Constantine the Great, became the capital of the province of Thessaly. — 2. Surnamed Cremaste (ἡ Κρεμαστή), another important town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, situated on a height, whence probably its name, and distant 20 stadia from the Maliac gulf. II. In Asia. 1. An ancient city on the coast of the Troad, near Hamaxitus; ruined at the time of the Persian war. — 2. L. Phricōnis (Λ. ἡ Φρικωνίς, also αἱ Λήρισσαι), a city on the coast of Mysia, near Cyme (hence called ἡ περὶ τὴν Κύμην), of Pelasgian origin, but colonised by the Aeolians, and made a member of the Aeolic confederacy. It was also called the Egyptian Larissa (ἡ Αἰγυπτία), because Cyrus the Great settled in it a body of his Egyptian mercenary soldiers. — 3. L. Ephesia (Λ. ἡ Ἐφεσία), a city of Lydia, in the plain of the Caÿster, on the N. side of M. Messogis, N.E. of Ephesus; with a temple of Apollo Larissaeus. — 4. In Assyria, an ancient city on the E. bank of the Tigris, some distance N. of the mouth of the river Zabatas or Lycus, described by Xenophon (Anab. iii. 4). It was deserted when Xenophon saw it; but its brick walls still stood, 25 feet thick, 100 feet high, and 2 parasangs (=60 stadia =6 geog. miles), in circuit, and there was a stone pyramid near it. Xenophon relates the tradition that, when the empire passed from the Medes to the Persians, the city resisted all the efforts of the Persian king (i. e. Cyrus) to take it, until the inhabitants, terrified at an obscuration of the sun, deserted the city. Mr. Layard identifies the site of Larissa with that of the ruins near Nimroud, the very same site as that of Nineveh. The name Larissa is no doubt a corruption of some Assyrian name (perhaps Al-Assur), which Xenophon naturally fell into through his familiarity with the word as the name of cities in Greece. — 5. In Syria, called by the Syrians Sizara (Σίζαρα: Kulat Seijar), a city in the district of Apamene, on the W. bank of the Orontes, about half-way between Apamea and Epiphania.

Larissus or Larisus (Λάρισσος, Λάρισος: Risso), a small river forming the boundary between Achaia and Elis, rises in Mt. Scollis, and flows into the Ionian sea.

Lārĭus Lacus (Lake of Como), a beautiful lake in Gallia Transpadana, running from N. to S., through which the river Adda flows. After extending about 15 miles, it is divided into 2 branches, of which the one to the S.W. is about 18 miles in length, and the one to the S.E. about 12 miles. At the extremity of the S.W. branch is the town of Comum; and at the extremity of the S.E. branch the river Adda issues out of the lake. The beauty of the scenery of this lake is praised by Pliny. He had several villas on the banks of the lake, of which he mentions 2 particularly; one called Comoedia, and the other Tragoedia. (Plin. Ep. ix. 7.) Some believe Comoedia to have been situated at the modern Bellagio, on the promontory which divides the 2 branches of the lake; and Tragoedia at Lenno, on the W. bank, where the scenery is more wild. The intermitting fountain, of which Pliny gives an account in another letter (Ep. iv. 30), is still called Pliniana.

Lars Tolumnius. [TOLUMNIUS.]

Lartĭa Gens, patrician, distinguished at the beginning of the republic through 2 of its members, T. Lartius, the first dictator, and Sp. Lartius, the companion of Horatius on the wooden bridge. The name soon after disappears entirely from the annals. The Lartii were of Etruscan origin, as is clearly shown by their name, which comes from the Etruscan word Lar or Lars. [LAR.]

Larunda, or Lāra, daughter of Almon, was a nymph who informed Juno of the connexion between Jupiter and Juturna; hence her name is connected with λαλεῖν. Jupiter deprived her of her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her into the lower world. On the way thither, Mercury fell in love with her, and she afterwards gave birth to 2 Lares.

Larvae. [LEMURES.]

Larymna (Λάρυμνα), the name of 2 towns on the river Cephissus, on the borders of Boeotia and Locris, and distinguished as Upper and Lower Larymna. The latter was at the mouth of the river and the former a little way inland.

Las (Λᾶς: Ep. Λάας: Passava), an ancient town of Laconia, on the E. side of the Laconian gulf, 10 stadia from the sea, and S. of Gytheum. It is said to have been once destroyed by the Dioscuri, who hence received the surname of Lapersae, or the Destroyers of Las. In the time of the Romans it had ceased to be a place of importance.

Lasaea (Λασαία), a town in the E. of Crete, not far from the Prom. Samonium, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (xxvii. 8).

Lasīon (Λασίων: Λασιώνιος: Lala), a fortified town in Elis, on the frontiers of Arcadia, and not far from the confluence of the Erymanthus and the Alpheus. The possession of this town was a constant source of dispute between the Eleans and Arcadians.

Lasthĕnes (Λασθένης) 1. An Olynthian, who, together with Euthycrates, betrayed his country to Philip of Macedon, by whom he had been bribed, B. C. 347. — 2. A Cretan, one of the principal leaders of his countrymen in their war with the Romans. He was defeated and taken prisoner by Q. Metellus, 67.

Lasus (Λάσος), one of the principal Greek lyric poets, was a native of Hermione, in Argolis. He is celebrated as the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry, and as the teacher of Pindar. He was cotemporary with Simonides, like whom he lived at Athens, under the patronage of Hipparchus. It would appear that Lasus introduced a greater freedom, both of rhythm and of music, into the dithyrambic Ode; that he gave it a more artificial and more mimetic character; and that the subjects of his poetry embraced a far wider range than had been customary.

Latĕra Stagnum (Etang de Maguelone et de Perols), a lake in the territory of Nemausus in Gallia Narbonensis, connected with the sea by a canal. On this lake was a fortress of the same name. (Chateau de la Latte.)

Laterensis, Juventĭus, was one of the accusers of Plancius, whom Cicero defended, B. C. 54. [PLANCIUS.] He was praetor in 51. He served as a legate in the army of M. Lepidus, and when the soldiers of Lepidus passed over to Antony, Laterensis put an end to his life.

Lāthon, Lēthon, Lēthes, Lēthaeus (Λάθων Doric, Λήθων, Ληθαῖος), a river of Cyrenaica in N. Africa, falling into a Lacus Hesperidum, near the city of Hesperis or Berenice, in the region which the early Greek navigators identified with the gardens of the Hesperides.

Lătiălis or Lătiăris, a surname of Jupiter as the protecting divinity of Latium. The Latin towns and Rome celebrated to him every year the feriae Latinae, on the Alban mount, which were conducted by one of the Roman consuls. [LATINUS.]

Lătīnus. 1. King of Latium, son of Faunus and the nymph Marica, brother of Lavinius, husband of Amata, and father of Lavinia, whom he gave in marriage to Aeneas. [LAVINIA.] This is the common tradition; but according to Hesiod he was a son of Ulysses and Circe, and brother of Agrius, king of the Tyrrhenians; according to Hyginus he was a son of Telemachus and Circe; while others describe him as a son of Hercules, by an Hyperborean woman, who was afterwards married to Faunus, or as a son of Hercules by a daughter of Faunus. According to one account Latinus after his death became Jupiter Latiaris, just as Romulus became Quirinus. — 2. A celebrated player in the farces called mimes (Dict. of Ant. s. v.) in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was a great favourite, and whom he served as a delator. He frequently acted as mimus with Thymele as mima.

Lătium (ἡ Λατίνη), a country in Italy, inhabited by the Lătīni. The origin of the name is uncertain. Most of the ancients derived it from a king Latinus, who was supposed to have been a cotemporary of Aeneas [LATINUS]; but there can be no doubt that the name of the people was transferred to this fictitious king. Other ancient critics connected the name with the verb latere, either because Saturn had been hidden in the country, or because Italy is hidden between the Alps and the Apennines! But neither of these explanations deserves a serious refutation. A modern writer derives Latium from latus (like Campania from campus), and supposes it to mean the "flat land;" but the quantity of the ă in lătus is opposed to this etymology. — The boundaries of Latium varied at different periods. 1. In the most ancient times it reached only from the river Tiber on the N., to the river Numicus and the town of Ardea on the S., and from the sea-coast on the W. to the Alban Mt. on the E. 2. The territory of Latium was subsequently extended S.wards; and long before the conquest of the Latins by the Romans, it stretched from the Tiber on the N., to the Prom. Circeium and Anxur or Tarracina on the S. Even in the treaty of peace made between Rome and Carthage in B. C. 509, we find Antium, Circeii, and Tarracina, mentioned as belonging to Latium. The name of Latium antiquum or vetus was subsequently given to the country from the Tiber to the Prom. Circeium. 3. The Romans still further extended the territories of Latium, by the conquest of the Hernici, Aequi, Volsci, and Aurunci, as far as the Liris on the S., and even beyond this river to the town Sinuessa and to Mt. Massicus. This new accession of territory was called Latium novum or adjectum. — Latium, therefore, in its widest signification was bounded by Etruria on the N., from which it was separated by the Tiber; by Campania on the S., from which it was separated by the Liris; by the Tyrrhene sea on the W.; and by the Sabine and Samnite tribes on the E. The greater part of this country is an extensive plain of volcanic origin, out of which rise an isolated range of mountains known by the name of MONS ALBANUS, of which the Algidus and the Tusculan hills are branches. Part of this plain, on the coast between Antium and Tarracina, which was at one time well cultivated, became a marsh in consequence of the rivers Nymphaeus, Ufens, and Amasenus finding no outlet for their waters [POMPTINAE PALUDES]; but the remainder of the country was celebrated for its fertility in antiquity. — The Latini were some of the most ancient inhabitants of Italy. They appear to have been a Pelasgian tribe, and are frequently called Aborigines. At a period long anterior to the foundation of Rome, these Pelasgians or Aborigines descended into the narrow plain between the Tiber and the Numicus, expelled or subdued the Siculi, the original inhabitants of that district, and there became known under the name of Latini. These ancient Latins, who were called Prisci Latini, to distinguish them from the later Latins, the subjects of Rome, formed a league or confederation, consisting of 30 states. The town of Alba Longa subsequently became the head of the league. This town, which founded several colonies, and among others Rome, boasted of a Trojan origin; but the whole story of a Trojan settlement in Italy is probably an invention of later times. Although Rome was a colony from Alba, she became powerful enough in the reign of her 3rd king, Tullus Hostilius, to take Alba and raze it to the ground.

In this war Alba seems to have received no assistance from the other Latin towns. Ancus Marcius and Tarquinius Priscus carried on war successfully with several other Latin towns. Under Servius Tullius Rome was admitted into the Latin League; and his successor Tarquinius Superbus compelled the other Latin towns to acknowledge Rome as the head of the league, and to become dependent upon the latter city. But upon the expulsion of the kings the Latins asserted their independence, and commenced a struggle with Rome, which, though frequently suspended and apparently terminated by treaties, was as often renewed, and was not brought to a final close till B.C. 340, when the Latins were defeated by the Romans at the battle of Mt. Vesuvius. The Latin league was now dissolved, and the Latins became the subjects of Rome. — The following were the most important institutions of the Latins during the time of their independence: — The towns of Latium were independent of one another, but formed a league for purposes of mutual protection. This league consisted, as we have already seen, of 30 cities, a number which could not be exceeded. Each state sent deputies to the meetings of the league, which were held in a sacred grove at the foot of the Alban Mt., by the fountain of Ferentina. On the top of the mountain was a temple of Jupiter Latiaris, and a festival was celebrated there in honour of this god from the earliest times. This festival, which was called the Feriae Latinae, is erroneously said to have been instituted by Tarquinius Superbus, in commemoration of the alliance between the Romans and Latins. It is true, however, that the festival was raised into one of much greater importance when Rome became the head of the league; for it was now a festival common both to Rome and Latium, and served to unite the 2 nations by a religious bond. Having thus become a Roman as well as a Latin festival, it continued to be celebrated by the Romans after the dissolution of the Latin league. (Dict. of Ant. art. Feriae.) — The chief magistrate in each Latin town appears to have borne the title of dictator. He was elected annually, but might be re-elected at the close of his year of office. Even in the time of Cicero we find dictators in the Latin towns, as for instance in Lanuvium. (Cic. pro Mil. 10.) In every Latin town there was also a senate and a popular assembly, but the exact nature of their powers is unknown. — The old Latin towns were built for the most part on isolated hills, the sides of which were made by art very steep and almost inaccessible. They were surrounded by walls built of great polygonal stones, the remains of which still excite our astonishment. — On the conquest of the Latins in 340, several of the Latin towns, such as Lanuvium, Aricia, Nomentum, Pedum, and Tusculum, received the Roman franchise. All the other towns became Roman Socii, and are mentioned in history under the general name of Nomen Latinum or Latini. The Romans, however, granted to them from time to time certain rights and privileges, which the other Socii did not enjoy; and in particular they founded many colonies, consisting of Latins, in various parts of Italy. These Latin colonies formed a part of the Nomen Latinum, although they were not situated in Latium. Thus the Latini came eventually to hold a certain status intermediate between that of Roman citizens and peregrini. (For details see Dict. of Ant. art. Latini.)

Latmĭcus Sinus (ὁ Λατμικὸς κόλπος), a gulf on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor, into which the river Maeander fell, named from M. Latmus, which overhangs it. Its width from Miletus, which stood on its S. side, to Pyrrha, was about 30 stadia. Through the changes effected on this coast by the Maeander, the gulf is now an inland lake, called Akees-Chai or Ufa-Bassi.

Latmus (Λάτμος: Monte di Palatia), a mountain in Caria, extending in a S.E. direction from its commencement on the S. side of the Maeander, N.E. of Miletus and the Sinus Latmicus. It was the mythological scene of the story of Luna and Endymion, who is hence called by the Roman poets "Latmius heros" and "Latmius venator:" he had a temple on the mountain, and a cavern in its side was shown as his grave.

Latobrigi, a people in Gallia Belgica, who are mentioned, along with the Tulingi and Rauraci, as neighbours of the Helvetii. They probably dwelt near the sources of the Rhine, in Switzerland.

Latōna. [LETO.]

Latŏpŏlis (Λατόπολις: Esneh, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, between Thebes and Apollonopolis; the seat of the worship of the Nile-fish called latus, which was the symbol of the goddess Neith, whom the Greeks identified with Athena.

Latovĭci, a people in the S.W. of Pannonia on the river Savus, in the modern Illyria and Croatia.

Latro, M. Porcĭus, a celebrated Roman rhetorician in the reign of Augustus, was a Spaniard by birth, and a friend and contemporary of the elder Seneca, by whom he is frequently mentioned. His school was one of the most frequented at Rome, and he numbered among his pupils the poet Ovid. He died B.C. 4. Many modern writers suppose that he was the author of the Declamations of Sallust against Cicero, and of Cicero against Sallust.

Laureăcum or Lauriăcum (Lorch near Ens), a strongly fortified town on the Danube in Noricum Ripense, the head-quarters of the 2nd legion, and the station of a Roman fleet.

Laurentĭa, Acca. [ACCA LAURENTIA.]

Laurentĭus Lydus. [LYDUS.]

Laurentum (Laurens, -ntis: Casale of Copocotta, not Paterno), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, was situated on a height between Ostia and Ardea, not far from the sea, and was surrounded by a grove of laurels, from which the place was supposed to have derived its name. According to Virgil, it was the residence of king Latinus and the capital of Latium; and it is certain that it was a place of importance in the time of the Roman kings, as it is mentioned in the treaty concluded between Rome and Carthage in B.C. 509. The younger Pliny and the emperor Commodus had villas at Laurentum, which appears to have been a healthy place, notwithstanding the marshes in the neighbourhood. These marshes supplied the tables of the Romans with excellent boars. — In the time of the Antonines Laurentum was united with Lavinium, from which it was only 6 miles distant, so that the 2 formed only one town, which was called Laurolavinium, and its inhabitants were named Laurentes Lavinates.

Lauretānus Portus, a harbour of Etruria, on the road from Populonia to Cosa.

Laurĭăcum. [LAUREACUM.]

Laurium (Λαύριον, Λαύρειον), a mountain in the S. of Attica, a little N. of the Prom. Sunium, celebrated for its silver mines, which in early times were so productive that every Athenian citizen received annually 10 drachmae. On the advice of Themistocles, the Athenians applied this money to equip 200 triremes, shortly before the invasion of Xerxes. In the time of Xenophon the produce of the mines was 100 talents. They gradually became less and less productive, and in the time of Strabo they yielded nothing.

Lauron (Laury, W. of Xucar in Valencia), a town in the E. of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the sea and the river Sucro, celebrated on account of its siege by Sertorius, and as the place where Cn. Pompey, the Younger, was put to death after the battle of Munda.

Lāus (Λᾶος: Λαῖνος), a Greek city in Lucania, situated near the mouth of the river Laus, which formed the boundary between Lucania and Bruttium. It was founded by the Sybarites, after their own city had been taken by the inhabitants of Croton, B.C. 510, but it had disappeared in the time of Pliny. — The gulf into which the river Laus flowed, was also called the gulf of Laus.

Laus Pompeii (Lodi Vecchio), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, N.W. of Placentia, and S.E. of Mediolanum. It was founded by the Boii, and was afterwards made a municipium by Pompeius Strabo, the father of Pompeius Magnus, whence it was called by his name.

Lausus. 1. Son of Mezentius, king of the Etruscans, slain by Aeneas. — 2. Son of Numitor and brother of Ilia, killed by Amulius.

Lautŭlae, a village of the Volsci in Latium, in a narrow pass between Tarracina and Fundi.

Lăverna, the Roman goddess of thieves and impostors. A grove was sacred to her on the via Salaria, and she had an altar near the porta Lavernalis, which derived its name from her.

Lavīcum. [LABICUM.]

Lavīnĭa, daughter of Latinus and Amata, was betrothed to Turnus [TURNUS], but was afterwards given in marriage to Aeneas, by whom she became the mother of Aeneas Silvius.

Lavīnĭum (Laviniensis: Pratica), an ancient town of Latium, 3 miles from the sea and 6 miles E. of Laurentum, on the Via Appia, and near the river Numicus, which divided its territory from that of Ardea. It is said to have been founded by Aeneas, and to have been called Lavinium, in honour of his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus. It possessed a temple of Venus, common to all the Latins, of which the inhabitants of Ardea had the oversight. It was at Lavinium that the king Titus Tatius was said to have been murdered. Lavinium was at a later time united with Laurentum; respecting which see LAURENTUM.

Lazae or Lazi (Λᾶζαι, Λαζοί), a people of Colchis, S. of the Phasis.

Leaena (Λέαινα), an Athenian hetaera, beloved by Aristogīton or Harmodius. On the murder of Hipparchus she was put to the torture; but she died under her sufferings without making any disclosure, and, if we may believe one account, she bit off her tongue, that no secret might be wrung from her. The Athenians honoured her memory greatly, and in particular by a bronze statue of a lioness (λέαινα) without a tongue, in the vestibule of the Acropolis.

Leander (Λείανδρος or Λέανδρος), the famous youth of Abydos, who was in love with Hero, the priestess of Aphrodite in Sestus, and swam every night across the Hellespont to visit her, and returned before daybreak. Once during a stormy night he perished in the waves. Next morning his corpse was washed on the coast of Sestus, whereupon Hero threw herself into the sea. This story is the subject of the poem of Musaeus, entitled De Amore Herois et Leandri [MUSAEUS], and is also mentioned by Ovid (Her. xviii. 19), and Virgil. (Georg. iii. 258.)

Learchus (Λέαρχος). 1. [ATHAMAS.] — 2. Of Rhegium, one of those Daedalian artists who stand on the confines of the mythical and historical periods, and about whom we have extremely uncertain information. One account made him a pupil of Daedalus, another of Dipoenus and Scyllis.

Lĕbădēa (Λεβάδεια: Livadhia), a town in Boeotia, W. of the lake Copais, between Chaeronēa and Mt. Helicon, at the foot of a rock from which the river Hercyna flows. In a cave of this rock, close to the town, was the celebrated oracle of Trophonius, to which the place owed its importance.

Lĕbĕdos (Λέβεδος: Λεβέδιος), one of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy, in Asia Minor, stood on the coast of Lydia, between Colophon and Teos, 90 stadia E. of the promontory of Myonnesus. It was said to have been built at the time of the Ionian migration, on the site of an earlier Carian city; and it flourished, chiefly by commerce, until Lysimachus transplanted most of its inhabitants to Ephesus. Near it were some mineral springs, which still exist near Ekklesia, but no traces remain of the city itself.

Lĕbēn or Lĕbēna (Λεβήν, Λεβήνα), a town on the S. coast of Crete, 90 stadia S.E. of Gortyna, of which it was regarded as the harbour. It possessed a celebrated temple of Aesculapius.

Lebinthus (Λέβινθος: Lebitha), an island in the Aegaean sea, one of the Sporades, W. of Calymna, E. of Amorgos and N. of Astypalaea.

Lechaeum (τὸ Λεχαῖον: Λεχαῖος), one of the 2 harbours of Corinth, with which it was connected by 2 long walls. It was 12 stadia from Corinth, was situated on the Corinthian gulf, and received all the ships which came from Italy and Sicily. It possessed a temple of Poseidon, who was hence surnamed Lechaeus.

Lectum (τὸ Λεκτόν: C. Baba or S. Maria), the S. W. promontory of the Troad, is formed where the W. extremity of M. Ida juts out into the sea, opposite to the N. side of the island of Lesbos. It was the S. limit of the Troad; and, under the Byzantine emperors, the N. limit of the province of Asia. An altar was shown here in Strabo's time, which was said to have been erected by Agamemnon to the 12 chief gods of Greece.

Lēda (Λήδα), daughter of Thestius, whence she is called Thestias, and wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta. One night she was embraced both by her husband and by Zeus; by the former she became the mother of Castor and Clytaemnestra, by the latter of Pollux and Helena. According to Homer (Od. xi. 298), both Castor and Pollux were sons of Tyndareus and Leda, while Helena is described as a daughter of Zeus. Other traditions reverse the story, making Castor and Pollux the sons of Zeus, and Helena the daughter of Tyndareus. According to the common legend Zeus visited Leda in the form of a swan; and she brought forth 2 eggs, from the one of which issued Helena, and from the other Castor and Pollux. The visit of Zeus to Leda in the form of a swan was frequently represented by ancient artists. The Roman poets sometimes call Helena Ledaea, and Castor and Pollux Ledaei Dii.

Lĕdon (Λέδων), a town in Phocis, N. W. of Tithorea; the birth-place of Philomelus, the commander of the Phocians in the Sacred war; it was destroyed in this war.

Ledus or Ledum (Les or Lez, near Montpellier), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis.

Lēgae (Λῆγαι or Λῆγες), a people on the S. shore of the Caspian Sea, belonging to the same race as the Cadusii. A branch of them was found by the Romans in the N. mountains of Albania, at the time of Pompey's expedition into those regions.

Legio Septima Gemina (Leon), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, in the country of the Astures, which was originally the head-quarters of the legion so-called.

Lēĭtus (Λήϊτος), son of Alector or Alectryon, by Cleobule, and father of Peneleus, was one of the Argonauts, and commanded the Boeotians in the war against Troy.

Lelantus Campus (τὸ Λήλαντον πεδίον), a plain in Euboea, between Eretria and Chalcis, for the possession of which these two cities often contended. It contained warm springs and mines of iron and copper, but was subject to frequent earthquakes.

Lĕlĕges (Λέλεγες), an ancient race which inhabited Greece before the Hellenes. They are frequently mentioned along with the Pelasgians as the most ancient inhabitants of Greece. Some writers erroneously identify them with the Pelasgians, but their character and habits were essentially different: the Pelasgians were a peaceful and agricultural people, whereas the Leleges were a warlike and migratory race. They appear to have first taken possession of the coasts and the islands of Greece, and afterwards to have penetrated into the interior. Piracy was probably their chief occupation; and they are represented as the ancestors of the Teleboans and the Taphians, who sailed as far as Phoenicia, and were notorious for their piracies. The coasts of Acarnania and Aetolia appear to have been inhabited by Leleges at the earliest times; and from thence they spread over other parts of Greece. Thus we find them in Phocis and Locris, in Boeotia, in Megaris, in Laconia, which is said to have been more anciently called Lelegia, in Elis, in Euboea, in several of the islands of the Aegaean sea, and also on the coasts of Asia Minor, in Caria, Ionia, and the S. of Troas. — The origin of the Leleges is uncertain. Many of the ancients connected them with the Carians, and according to Herodotus (i. 171), the Leleges were the same as the Carians; but whether there was any real connection between these peoples cannot be determined. The name of the Leleges was derived, according to the custom of the ancients, from an ancestor Lelex, who is called king either of Megaris or of Lacedaemon. According to some traditions this Lelex came from Egypt, and was the son of Poseidon and Libya; but the Egyptian origin of the people was evidently an invention of later times. — The Leleges must be regarded as a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who became gradually incorporated with the Hellenes, and thus ceased to exist as an independent people.

Lelex. [Leleges.]

Lemannus or Lemānus Lacus (Lake of Geneva), a large lake formed by the river Rhodanus, was the boundary between the old Roman province in Gaul and the land of the Helvetii. Its greatest length is 55 miles, and its greatest breadth 6 miles.

Lemnos (Λῆμνος: Λήμνιος, fem. Λημνιάς: Stalimene, i. e. εἰς τὰν Λῆμνον), one of the largest islands in the Aegaean sea, was situated nearly midway between Mt. Athos and the Hellespont, and about 22 miles S. W. of Imbros. Its area is about 147 square miles. In the earliest times it appears to have contained only one town, which bore the same name as the island (Hom. Il. xiv. 230); but at a later period we read of 2 towns, Myrina (Palaeo Castro) on the W. of the island, and Hephaestia or Hephaestias (nr. Rapanidi) on the N.W., with a harbour. Lemnos was sacred to Hephaestus (Vulcan), who is said to have fallen here, when Zeus hurled him down from Olympus. Hence the workshop of the god is sometimes placed in this island. The legend appears to have arisen from the volcanic nature of Lemnos, which possessed in antiquity a volcano called Mosychlus (Μόσυχλος). The island still bears traces of having been subject to the action of volcanic fire, though the volcano has long since disappeared. — The most ancient inhabitants of Lemnos, according to Homer, were the Thracian Sinties; a name, however, which probably only signifies robbers (Σίντιες from σίνομαι). When the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, they are said to have found it inhabited only by women, who had murdered all their husbands, and had chosen as their queen Hypsipyle, the daughter of Thoas, the king of the island. [Hypsipyle.] Some of the Argonauts settled here, and became by the Lemnian women the fathers of the Minyae, the later inhabitants of the island. The Minyae are said to have been driven out of the island by the Pelasgians, who had been expelled from Attica. These Pelasgians are further said to have carried away from Attica some Athenian women; but as the children of these women despised their half-brothers, born of Pelasgian women, the Pelasgians murdered both them and their children. In consequence of this atrocity, and of the former murder of the Lemnian husbands by the wives, Lemnian Deeds became a proverb in Greece for all atrocious acts. Lemnos was afterwards conquered by one of the generals of Darius; but Miltiades delivered it from the Persians, and made it subject to Athens, in whose power it remained for a long time. Pliny speaks of a remarkable labyrinth in Lemnos, but no traces of it have been discovered by modern travellers. The principal production of the island was a red earth called terra Lemnia or sigillata, which was employed by the ancient physicians as a remedy for wounds and the bites of serpents, and which is still much valued by the Turks and Greeks for its supposed medicinal virtues.

Lemonĭa, one of the country tribes of Rome, named after a village Lemonium, situated on the Via Latina before the Porta Capena.

Lemovīces, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, between the Bituriges and Arverni, whose chief town was Augustoritum, subsequently called Lemovices, the modern Limoges.

Lemovĭi, a people of Germany, mentioned along with the Rugii, who inhabited the shores of the Baltic in the modern Pommerania.

Lĕmūres, the spectres or spirits of the dead. Some writers describe Lemures as the common name for all the spirits of the dead, and divide them into 2 classes; the Lares, or the souls of good men, and the Larvae, or the souls of wicked men. But the common idea was that the Lemures and Larvae were the same. They were said to wander about at night as spectres, and to torment and frighten the living. In order to propitiate them the Romans celebrated the festival of the Lemuralia or Lemuria. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v.)

Lēnaeus (Ληναῖος), a surname of Dionysus, derived from ληνός, the wine-press or the vintage.

Lentia (Linz), a town in Noricum, on the Danube.

Lentienses, a tribe of the Alemanni, who lived on the N. shore of the Lacus Brigantinus (Lake of Constance), in the modern Linzgau.

Lento, Caesennĭus, a follower of M. Antony. He was one of Antony's 7 agrarian commissioners (septemviratus) in B. C. 44, for apportioning the Campanian and Leontine lands, whence Cicero terms him divisor Italiae.

Lentŭlus, Cornēlĭus, one of the haughtiest patrician families at Rome; so that Cicero coins the words Appietas and Lentulitas to express the qualities of the high aristocratic party (ad Fam. iii. 7). The name was derived from lens, like Cicero from cicer. — 1. L., consul B. C. 327; legate in the Caudine campaign, 321; and dictator 320, when he avenged the disgrace of the Furculae Caudinae. This was indeed disputed (Liv. ix. 15); but his descendants at least claimed the honour for him, by assuming the agnomen of Caudinus. — 2. L., surnamed Caudinus, pontifex maximus, and consul 237, when he triumphed over the Ligurians. He died 213. — 3. P., surnamed Caudinus, served with P. Scipio in Spain, 210; praetor 204; one of the 10 ambassadors sent to Philip of Macedon, 196. — 4. P., praetor in Sicily 214, and continued in his province for the 2 following years. In 189 he was one of 10 ambassadors sent into Asia after the submission of Antiochus. — 5. Cn., quaestor 212; curule aedile 204; consul 201; and proconsul in Hither Spain 199. — 6. L., praetor in Sardinia 211, succeeded Scipio as proconsul in Spain, where he remained for 11 years, and on his return was only allowed an ovation, because he only held proconsular rank. He was consul 199, and the next year proconsul in Gaul. — 7. L., curule aedile 163; consul 156; censor 147. — 8. P., curule aedile with Scipio Nasica 169, consul suffectus, with C. Domitius 162, the election of the former consuls being declared informal. He became princeps senatus, and must have lived to a good old age, since he was wounded in the contest with C. Gracchus in 121. — 9. P., surnamed Sura, the man of chief note in Catiline's crew. He was quaestor to Sulla in 81: before him and L. Triarius, Verres had to give an account of the monies he had received as quaestor in Cisalpine Gaul. He was soon after himself called to account for the same matter, but was acquitted. It is said that he got his cognomen of Sura from his conduct on this occasion; for when Sulla called him to account, he answered by scornfully putting out his leg, " like boys," says Plutarch, " when they make a blunder in playing at ball." Other persons, however, had borne the name before, one perhaps of the Lentulus family. In 75 he was praetor; and Hortensius, pleading before such a judge, had no difficulty in procuring the acquittal of Terentius Varro, when accused of extortion. In 71 he was consul. But in the next year he was ejected from the senate, with 63 others, for infamous life and manners. It was this, probably, that led him to join Catiline and his crew. From his distinguished birth and high rank, he calculated on becoming chief of the conspiracy; and a prophecy of the Sibylline books was applied by flattering haruspices to him. Three Cornelii were to rule Rome, and he was the 3rd after Sulla and Cinna; the 20th year after the burning of the capitol, &c., was to be fatal to the city. To gain power, and recover his place in the senate, he became praetor again in 63. When Catiline quitted the city for Etruria, Lentulus was left as chief of the home conspirators, and his irresolution probably saved the city from being fired. For it was by his over-caution that the negotiation with the ambassadors of the Allobroges was entered into: these unstable allies revealed the secret to the consul Cicero, who directed them to feign compliance with the conspirators' wishes, and thus to obtain written documents which might be brought in evidence against them. The well-known sequel will be found under the life of Catiline. Lentulus was deposed from the praetorship, and was strangled in the Capitoline prison on the 5th of December. His step-son Antony pretended that Cicero refused to deliver up his corpse for burial. — 10. P., surnamed Spinther. He received this nickname from his resemblance to the actor Spinther. Caesar commonly calls him by this name: not so Cicero; but there could be no harm in it, for he used it on his coins when pro-praetor in Spain, simply to distinguish himself from the many of the same family; and his son bore it after him. He was curule aedile in 63, the year of Cicero's consulship, and was entrusted with the care of the apprehended conspirator, P. Sura [No. 9]. His games were long remembered for their splendour; but his toga, edged with Tyrian purple, gave offence. He was praetor in 60; and by Caesar's interest he obtained Hither Spain for his next year's province, where he remained into part of 58. In 57 he was consul, which dignity he also obtained by Caesar's support. In his consulship he moved for the immediate recall of Cicero, brought over his colleague Metellus Nepos to the same views; and his services were gratefully acknowledged by Cicero. Now, therefore, notwithstanding his obligations to Caesar, he had openly taken part with the aristocracy. He received Cilicia as his province, but he attempted in vain to obtain a decree of the senate, charging him with the office of restoring Ptolemy Auletes, the exiled king of Egypt. He remained as proconsul in Cilicia from 56 till July, 53, and obtained a triumph, though not till 51. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined the Pompeian party. He fell into Caesar's hands at Corfinium, but was dismissed by the latter uninjured. He then joined Pompey in Greece; and after the battle of Pharsalia, he followed Pompey to Egypt, and got safe to Rhodes. — 11. P., surnamed Spinther, son of No. 10, followed Pompey's fortunes with his father. He was pardoned by Caesar, and returned to Italy. In 45 he was divorced from his abandoned wife, Metella. (Comp. Hor., Serm. ii. 3. 239.) After the murder of Caesar (44) he joined the conspirators. He served with Cassius against Rhodes; with Brutus in Lycia. — 12. Cn., surnamed Clodianus, a Claudius adopted into the Lentulus family. He was consul in 72, with L. Gellius Publicola. In the war with Spartacus both he and his colleague were defeated — but after their consulship. With the same colleague he held the censorship in 70, and ejected 63 members from the senate for infamous life, among whom were Lentulus Sura [No. 9] and C. Antonius, afterwards Cicero's colleague in the consulship. Yet the majority of those expelled were acquitted by the courts, and restored; and Lentulus supported the Manilian law, appointing Pompey to the command against Mithridates. As an orator, he concealed his want of talent by great skill and art, and by a good voice. — 13. L., surnamed Crus, appeared in 61 as the chief accuser of P. Clodius, for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. In 58 he was praetor, and in 49 consul with C. Marcellus. He was raised to the consulship in consequence of his being a known enemy of Caesar. He did all he could to excite his wavering party to take arms and meet Caesar: he called Cicero cowardly; blamed him for seeking a triumph at such a time; urged war at any price, in the hope, says Caesar (B. C. i. 4), of retrieving his ruined fortunes, and becoming another Sulla. It was mainly at Lentulus' instigation that the violent measures passed the senate early in the year, which gave the tribunes a pretence for flying to Caesar at Ravenna. He himself fled from the city at the approach of Caesar, and afterwards crossed over to Greece. After the battle of Pharsalia, he fled to Egypt, and arrived there the day after Pompey's murder. On landing, he was apprehended by young Ptolemy's ministers, and put to death in prison. — 14. L., surnamed Niger, flamen of Mars. In 57, he was one of the priests to whom was referred the question whether the site of Cicero's house was consecrated ground. In 56 he was one of the judges in the case of P. Sextius, and he died in the same year, much praised by Cicero. — 15. L., son of the last, and also flamen of Mars. He defended M. Scaurus, in 54, when accused of extortion; he accused Gabinius of high treason, about the same time, but was suspected of collusion. In the Philippics he is mentioned as a friend of Antony's. — 16. Cossus, surnamed Gaetulicus, consul B. C. 1, was sent into Africa in A. D. 6, where he defeated the Gaetuli: hence his surname. On the accession of Tiberius, A. D. 14, he accompanied Drusus, who was sent to quell the mutiny of the legions in Pannonia. He died 25, at a very great age, leaving behind him an honourable reputation. — 17. Cn., surnamed Gaetulicus, son of the last, consul A. D. 26. He afterwards had the command of the legions of Upper Germany for 10 years, and was very popular among the troops. In 39 he was put to death by order of Caligula, who feared his influence with the soldiers. He was an historian and a poet; but we have only 3 lines of his poems extant, unless he is the author of 9 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, inscribed with the name of Gaetulicus.

Lĕo, or Lĕon (Λέων). 1. Also called Leonides (Λεωνίδης), of Heraclea on the Pontus, disciple of Plato, was one of the conspirators who, with their leader, Chion, assassinated Clearchus, tyrant of Heraclea, B. C. 353. — 2. Of Byzantium, a rhetorician and historical writer of the age of Philip and Alexander the Great. — 3. Diaconus or the Deacon, a Byzantine historian of the 10th century. His history, in 10 books, includes the period from the Cretan expedition of Nicephorus Phocas, in the reign of the emperor Romanus II., A. D. 959, to the death of Joannes I. Zimisces, 975. The style of Leo is vicious: he employs unusual and inappropriate words (many of them borrowed from Homer, Agathias the historian, and the Septuagint), in the place of simple and common ones; and he abounds in tautological phrases. His history, however, is a valuable contemporary record of a stirring time, honestly and fearlessly written. Edited for the first time by Hase, Paris, 1818. — 4. Grammaticus, one of the continuators of Byzantine history from the period when Theophanes leaves off. His work, entitled Chronographia, extends from the accession of Leo V. the Armenian, 813, to the death of Romanus Lecapenus, 944. Edited with Theophanes by Combéfis, Paris, 1655. — 5. Archbishop of Thessalonica, an eminent Byzantine philosopher and ecclesiastic of the 9th century. His works are lost, but he is frequently mentioned in terms of the highest praise by the Byzantine writers, especially for his knowledge of geometry and astronomy. — 6. Magentenus, a commentator on Aristotle, flourished during the 1st half of the 14th century. He was a monk, and afterwards archbishop of Mytilene. Several of his commentaries on Aristotle are extant, and have been published. — 7. Leo was also the name of 6 Byzantine emperors. Of these Leo VI., surnamed the philosopher, who reigned 886—911, is celebrated in the history of the later Greek literature. He wrote a treatise on Greek tactics, 17 oracles, 33 orations, and several other works, which are still extant. He is also celebrated in the history of legislation. As the Latin language had long ceased to be the official language of the Eastern empire, Basil, the father of Leo, had formed and partly executed the plan of issuing an authorised Greek version of Justinian's legislation. This plan was carried out by Leo. The Greek version is known under the title of Βασιλικαὶ Διατάξεις, or shortly, Βασιλικαί; in Latin, Basilica, which means "Imperial Constitutions," or "Laws." It is divided into 60 books, subdivided into titles, and contains the Institutes, the Digest, the Codex, and the Novellae; and likewise such constitutions as were issued by the successors of Justinian down to Leo VI. There are, however, many laws of the Digest omitted in the Basilica, which contain, on the other hand, a considerable number of laws or extracts from ancient jurists which are not in the Digest. The publication of this authorised body of law in the Greek language led to the gradual disuse of the original compilations of Justinian in the East. But the Roman law was thus more firmly established in Eastern Europe and Western Asia, where it has maintained itself among the Greek population to the present day. The best edition of the Basilica is the one now publishing by Heimbach, Lips. 1833, seq.

Leobōtes. [LABOTAS.]

Leōchāres (Λεωχάρης), an Athenian statuary and sculptor, was one of the great artists of the later Athenian school, at the head of which were Scopas and Praxiteles. He flourished B. C. 352—338. The masterpiece of Leochares seems to have been his statue of the rape of Ganymede. The original work was in bronze. Of the extant copies in marble, the best is one, half the size of life, in the Museo Pio-Clementino.

Leocōrium (Λεωκόριον), a shrine in Athens, in the Ceramicus, erected in honour of the daughters of Leos. Hipparchus was murdered here.

Leōdămas (Λεωδάμας), a distinguished Attic orator, was educated in the school of Isocrates, and is greatly praised by Aeschines.

Leonĭca, a town of the Edetani in the W. of Hispania Tarraconensis.

Leōnĭdas (Λεωνίδας). 1. I. King of Sparta, B. C. 491—480, was one of the sons of Anaxandrides by his first wife, and, according to some accounts, was twin-brother to Cleombrotus. He succeeded his half-brother Cleomenes I., B. C. 491, his elder brother Dorieus also having previously died. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, 480, Leonidas was sent with a small army to make a stand against the enemy at the pass of Thermopylae. The number of his army is variously stated: according to Herodotus, it amounted to somewhat more than 5000 men, of whom 300 were Spartans; in all probability, the regular band of (so called) knights (ἱππεῖς). The Persians in vain attempted to force their way through the pass of Thermopylae. They were driven back by Leonidas and his gallant band with immense slaughter. At length the Malian Ephialtes betrayed the mountain path of the Anopaea to the Persians, who were thus able to fall upon the rear of the Greeks. When it became known to Leonidas that the Persians were crossing the mountain, he dismissed all the other Greeks, except the Thespian and Theban forces, declaring that he and the Spartans under his command must needs remain in the post they had been sent to guard. Then, before the body of Persians, who were crossing the mountain under Hydarnes, could arrive to attack him in the rear, he advanced from the narrow pass and charged the myriads of the enemy with his handful of troops, hopeless now of preserving their lives, and anxious only to sell them dearly. In the desperate battle which ensued, Leonidas himself fell soon. His body was rescued by the Greeks, after a violent struggle. On the hillock in the pass, where the remnant of the Greeks made their last stand, a lion of stone was set up in his honour. — 2. II. King of Sparta, was son of the traitor, Cleonymus. He acted as guardian to his infant relative, Areus II., on whose death he ascended the throne, about 256. Being opposed to the projected reforms of his contemporary Agis IV., he was deposed, and the throne was transferred to his son-in-law, Cleombrotus; but he was soon afterwards recalled, and caused Agis to be put to death, 240. He died about 236, and was succeeded by his son, Cleomenes III. — 3. A kinsman of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, was entrusted with the main superintendence of Alexander's education in his earlier years, before he became the pupil of Aristotle. Leonidas was a man of austere character, and trained the young prince in hardy and self-denying habits. There were 2 excellent cooks (said Alexander afterwards) with which Leonidas had furnished him,—a night's march to season his breakfast, and a scanty breakfast to season his dinner. — 4. Of Tarentum, the author of upwards of 100 epigrams in the Doric dialect. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager. They are chiefly inscriptions for dedicatory offerings and works of art, and, though not of a very high order of poetry, are usually pleasing, ingenious, and in good taste. Leonidas probably lived in the time of Pyrrhus. — 5. Of Alexandria, also an epigrammatic poet, flourished under Nero and Vespasian. In the Greek Anthology, 43 epigrams are ascribed to him: they are of a very low order of merit.

Leonnātus (Λεοννάτος), a Macedonian of Pella, one of Alexander's most distinguished officers. His father's name is variously given, as Anteas, Anthes, Onasus, and Eunus. He saved Alexander's life in India in the assault on the city of the Malli. After the death of Alexander (B. C. 323), he obtained the satrapy of the Lesser or Hellespontine Phrygia, and in the following year he crossed over into Europe, to assist Antipater against the Greeks; but he was defeated by the Athenians and their allies, and fell in battle.

Leontĭădes (Λεοντιάδης). 1. A Theban, commanded at Thermopylae the forces supplied by Thebes to the Grecian army, B. C. 480. — 2. A Theban, assisted the Spartans in seizing the Cadmea, or citadel of Thebes, in 382. He was slain by Pelopidas in 379, when the Spartan exiles recovered possession of the Cadmea.

Leontīni (οἱ Λεοντῖνοι: Λεοντῖνος: Lentini), a town in the E. of Sicily, about 5 miles from the sea, N. W. of Syracuse, was situated upon the small river Lissus. It was built upon 2 hills, which were separated from one another by a valley, in which were the forum, the senate-house, and the other public buildings, while the temples and the private houses occupied the hills. The rich plains N. of the city, called Leontini Campi, were some of the most fertile in Sicily, and produced abundant crops of most excellent wheat. Leontini was founded by Chalcidians from Naxos, B. C. 730, only 6 years after the foundation of Naxos itself. It never attained much political importance in consequence of its proximity to Syracuse, to which it soon became subject, and whose fortunes it shared. At a later time it joined the Carthaginians, and was in consequence taken and plundered by the Romans. Under the Romans it sunk into insignificance. Gorgias was a native of Leontini.

Leontĭum (Λεόντιον), an Athenian hetaera, the disciple and mistress of Epicurus, wrote a treatise against Theophrastus. She had a daughter, Danaë, who was also an hetaera of some notoriety.

Leontĭum (Λεόντιον), a town in Achaia, between Pharae and Aegium.

Leontŏpŏlis (Λεοντόπολις, Λεόντων πόλις). 1. A city in the Delta of Egypt, S. of Thmuïs, and N. W. of Athribis, was the capital of the Nomos Leontopolites, and probably of late foundation, as no writer before Strabo mentions it. Its site is uncertain. — 2. [NICEPHORIUM.]

Leoprepĭdes, i. e. Simonides, the son of Leoprepes.

Leos (Λεώς), one of the heroes eponymi of the Athenians, said to have been a son of Orpheus. The phyle or tribe of Leontis derived its name from him. Once, when Athens was suffering from famine or plague, the Delphic oracle demanded that the daughters of Leos should be sacrificed, and the father complied with the command of the oracle. The maidens were afterwards honoured by the Athenians, who erected the Leocorium (from Λεώς and κόραι) to them. Their names were Praxithea, Theope, and Eubule.

Leosthĕnes (Λεωσθένης), an Athenian commander of the combined Greek army in the Lamian war. In the year after the death of Alexander (B. C. 323), he defeated Antipater near Thermopylae; Antipater thereupon threw himself into the small town of Lamia. Leosthenes pressed the siege with the utmost vigour, but was killed by a blow from a stone. His loss was mourned by the Athenians as a public calamity. He was honoured with a public burial in the Ceramicus, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Hyperides.

Leotychides (Λεωτυχίδης, Λευτυχίδης, Herod.). 1. King of Sparta, B. C. 491—469. He commanded the Greek fleet in 479, and defeated the Persians at the battle of Mycale. He was afterwards sent with an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the Persians; but in consequence of his accepting the bribes of the Aleuadae, he was brought to trial on his return home, and went into exile to Tegea, 469, where he died. He was succeeded by his grandson, Archidamus II.—2. Grandson of Archidamus II., and son of Agis II. There was, however, some suspicion that he was in reality the fruit of an intrigue of Alcibiades with Timaea, the queen of Agis; in consequence of which he was excluded from the throne, mainly through the influence of Lysander, and his uncle, Agesilaus II., was substituted in his room.

Lepidus Aemilius, a distinguished patrician family. 1. M., aedile B. C. 192; praetor 191, with Sicily as his province; consul 187, when he defeated the Ligurians; pontifex maximus 180; censor 179 with M. Fulvius Nobilior; and consul a second time 175. He was six times chosen by the censors princeps senatus, and he died 152, full of years and honours. Lepidus the triumvir is called by Cicero (Phil. xiii. 7) the pronepos of this Lepidus; but he would seem more probably to have been his abnepos, or great-great-grandson. — 2. M., consul 137, carried on war in Spain against the Vaccaei, but unsuccessfully. Since he had attacked the Vaccaei in opposition to the express orders of the senate, he was deprived of his command, and condemned to pay a fine. He was a man of education and refined taste. Cicero, who had read his speeches, speaks of him as the greatest orator of his age. He helped to form the style of Tib. Gracchus and C. Carbo, who were accustomed to listen to him with great care. — 3. M., the father of the triumvir, was praetor in Sicily in 81, where he earned a character by his oppressions only second to that of Verres. In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla he belonged at first to the party of the latter, but he afterwards came forward as a leader of the popular party. In his consulship, 78, he attempted to rescind the laws of Sulla, who had lately died, but he was opposed by his colleague Catulus, who received the powerful support of Pompey. In the following year (77) Lepidus took up arms, and marched against Rome. He was defeated by Pompey and Catulus, under the walls of the city, in the Campus Martius, and was obliged to take to flight. Finding it impossible to hold his ground in Italy, Lepidus sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia; but repulsed even in this island by the propraetor, he died shortly afterwards of chagrin and sorrow, which is said to have been increased by the discovery of his wife's infidelity. — 4. Mam., surnamed Livianus, because he belonged originally to the Livia gens, consul 77, belonged to the aristocratical party, and was one of the influential persons who prevailed upon Sulla to spare the life of the young Julius Caesar. — 5. M., consul 66, with L. Volcatius Tullus, the same year in which Cicero was praetor. He belonged to the aristocratical party, but on the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he retired to his Formian villa to watch the progress of events. — 6. L. Aemilius Paulus, son of No. 3, and brother of M. Lepidus, the triumvir. His surname of Paulus was probably given him by his father, in honour of the celebrated Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia. But since he belonged to the family of the Lepidi, and not to that of the Pauli, he is inserted in this place and not under Paulus. Aemilius Paulus did not follow the example of his father, but commenced his public career by supporting the aristocratical party. His first public act was the accusation of Catiline in 63. He was quaestor in Macedonia 59; aedile 55; praetor 53; and consul 50, along with M. Claudius Marcellus. Paulus was raised to the consulship, on account of his being one of the most determined enemies of Caesar, but Caesar gained him over to his side by a bribe of 1500 talents, which he is said to have expended on the completion of a magnificent basilica which he had commenced in his aedileship. After the murder of Caesar (44), Paulus joined the senatorial party. He was one of the senators who declared M. Lepidus a public enemy, on account of his having joined Antony; and, accordingly, when the triumvirate was formed, his name was set down first in the proscription list by his own brother. The soldiers, however, who were appointed to kill him, allowed him to escape. He passed over to Brutus in Asia, and after the death of the latter repaired to Miletus. Here he remained, and refused to go to Rome, although he was pardoned by the triumvirs. —7. M. Aemilius Lepidus, the Triumvir, brother of the last. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), Lepidus, who was then praetor, joined Caesar's party; and as the consuls had fled with Pompey from Italy, Lepidus, as praetor, was the highest magistrate remaining in Italy. During Caesar's absence in Spain, Lepidus presided at the comitia in which the former was appointed dictator. In the following year (48) he received the province of Nearer Spain. On his return to Rome in 47, Caesar granted him a triumph, and made him his magister equitum; and in the next year (46), his colleague in the consulship. In 44 he received from Caesar the government of Narbonese Gaul and Nearer Spain, but had not quitted the neighbourhood of Rome at the time of the dictator's death. Having the command of an army near the city, he was able to render M. Antony efficient assistance; and the latter in consequence allowed Lepidus to be chosen pontifex maximus, which dignity had become vacant by Caesar's death. Lepidus soon afterwards repaired to his provinces of Gaul and Spain. He remained neutral in the struggle between Antony and the senate; but he subsequently joined Antony, when the latter fled to him in Gaul after his defeat at Mutina. This was in the end of May, 43; and when the news reached Rome, the senate proclaimed Lepidus a public enemy. In the autumn Lepidus and Antony crossed the Alps at the head of a powerful army. Octavian (afterwards Augustus) joined them; and in the month of October the celebrated triumvirate was formed, by which the Roman world was divided between Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus. [See p. 108, a.] In 42 Lepidus remained in Italy as consul, while the two other triumvirs prosecuted the war against Brutus and Cassius. In the fresh division of the provinces after the battle of Philippi, Lepidus received Africa, where he remained till 36. In this year Octavian summoned him to Sicily to assist him in the war against Sex. Pompey. Lepidus obeyed, but tired of being treated as a subordinate, he resolved to make an effort to acquire Sicily for himself and to regain his lost power. He was easily subdued by Octavian, who spared his life, but deprived him of his triumvirate, his army, and his provinces, and commanded that he should live at Circeii, under strict surveillance. He allowed him, however, to retain his dignity of pontifex maximus. He died B. C. 13. Augustus succeeded him as pontifex maximus. Lepidus was fond of ease and repose, and it is not improbable that he possessed abilities capable of effecting much more than he ever did. — 8. Paulus Aemilius Lepidus, son of No. 6, with whom he is frequently confounded. His name is variously given by the ancient writers Aemilius Paulus, or Paulus Aemilius, or Aemilius Lepidus Paulus, but Paulus Aemilius Lepidus seems to be the most correct form. He probably fled with his father to Brutus, but he afterwards made his peace with the triumvirs. He accompanied Octavian in his campaign against Sex. Pompey in Sicily in 36. In 34 he was consul suffectus. In 22 he was censor with L. Munatius Plancus, and died while holding this dignity. — 9. M. Aemilius Lepidus, son of the triumvir [No. 7] and Junia, formed a conspiracy in 30, for the purpose of assassinating Octavian on his return to Rome after the battle of Actium. Maecenas, who had charge of the city, became acquainted with the plot, seized Lepidus, and sent him to Octavian in the East, who put him to death. His father was ignorant of the conspiracy, but his mother was privy to it. Lepidus was married twice: his first wife was Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his 2nd Servilia, who put an end to her life by swallowing burning coals when the conspiracy of her husband was discovered. — 10. Q. Aemilius Lepidus, consul 21 with M. Lollius. (Hor. Ep. i. 20. 28.) — 11. L. Aemilius Paulus, son of No. 8 and Cornelia, married Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus. [JULIA, No. 6.] Paulus is therefore called the progener of Augustus. He was consul A. D. 1 with C. Caesar, his wife's brother. He entered into a conspiracy against Augustus, of the particulars of which we are not informed. — 12. M. Aemilius Lepidus, brother of the last, consul A. D. 6 with L. Arruntius. He lived on the most intimate terms with Augustus, who employed him in the war against the Dalmatians in A. D. 9. After the death of Augustus, he was also held in high esteem by Tiberius. — 13. M. Aemilius Lepidus, consul with T. Statilius Taurus in A. D. 11, must be carefully distinguished from the last. In A. D. 21 he obtained the province of Asia. — 14. Aemilius Lepidus, the son of 11 and Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus, and consequently the great-grandson of Augustus. He was one of the minions of the emperor Caligula, with whom he had the most shameful connection. He married Drusilla, the favourite sister of the emperor; but he was notwithstanding put to death by Caligula, A. D. 39.

Lepontĭi, a people inhabiting the Alps, in whose country Caesar places the sources of the Rhine, and Pliny the sources of the Rhone. They dwelt on the S. slope of the St. Gotthard and the Simplon, towards the Lago Maggiore, and their name is still retained in the Val Leventina. Their chief town was Oscela (Domo d'Ossola).

Leprēa (Λέπρεα), daughter of Pyrgeus, from whom the town of Lepreum in Elis was said to have derived its name. [LEPREUM.] Another tradition derived the name from Lepreus, a son of Caucon, Glaucon, or Pyrgeus, by Astydamia. He was a grandson of Poseidon, and a rival of Hercules both in his strength and his powers of eating, but he was conquered and slain by the latter. His tomb was believed to exist at Phigalia.

Leprēum (Λέπρεον, Λέπρεος: Λεπρεάτης: Strovitzi), a town of Elis in Triphylia, situated 40 stadia from the sea, was said to have been founded in the time of Theseus by Minyans from Lemnos. After the Messenian wars it was subdued by the Eleans with the aid of Sparta; but it recovered its independence in the Peloponnesian war, and was assisted by the Spartans against Elis. At the time of the Achaean league it was subject to Elis.

Q. Lepta, a native of Cales in Campania, and praefectus fabrûm to Cicero in Cilicia B.C. 51. He joined the Pompeian party in the civil war, and is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters.

Leptīnes (Λεπτίνης). 1. A Syracusan, son of Hermocrates, and brother of Dionysius the elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He commanded his brother's fleet in the war against the Carthaginians B. C. 397, but was defeated by Mago with great loss. In 390 he was sent by Dionysius with a fleet to the assistance of the Lucanians against the Italian Greeks. Some time afterwards he gave offence to the jealous temper of the tyrant, by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Philistus, without any previous intimation to Dionysius, and on this account he was banished from Syracuse, together with Philistus. He thereupon retired to Thurii, but was subsequently recalled by Dionysius to Syracuse. Here he was completely reinstated in his former favour, and obtained one of the daughters of Dionysius in marriage. In 383, he again took an active part in the war against the Carthaginians, and commanded the right wing of the Syracusan army in the battle near Cronium; in which he was killed. — 2. A Syracusan, who joined with Calippus in expelling the garrison of the younger Dionysius from Rhegium, 351. Soon afterwards he assassinated Calippus, and then crossed over to Sicily, where he made himself tyrant of Apollonia and Engyum. He was expelled in common with the other tyrants by Timoleon; but his life was spared and he was sent into exile at Corinth, 342. — 3. An Athenian, known only as the proposer of a law taking away all special exemptions from the burden of public charges (ἀτέλειαι τῶν λειτουργιῶν), against which the celebrated oration of Demosthenes is directed, usually known as the oration against Leptines. This speech was delivered 355: and the law must have been passed above a year before, as we are told that the lapse of more than that period had already exempted Leptines from all personal responsibility. Hence the efforts of Demosthenes were directed solely to the repeal of the law, not to the punishment of its proposer. His arguments were successful, and the law was repealed. — 4. A Syrian Greek, who assassinated with his own hand at Laodicea, Cn. Octavius, the chief of the Roman deputies, who had been sent into Syria, 162. Demetrius caused Leptines to be seized, and sent as a prisoner to Rome; but the senate refused to receive him, being desirous to reserve this cause of complaint as a public grievance.

Leptis (Λεπτίς). 1. Leptis Magna or Neapolis (ἡ Λεπτὶς μεγάλη, Νεάπολις), a city on the coast of N. Africa, between the Syrtes, E. of Abrotonum, and W. of the mouth of the little river Cinyps, was a Phoenician colony, with a flourishing commerce, though it possessed no harbour. With Abrotonum and Oea it formed the African Tripolis. The Romans made it a colony: it was the birthplace of the emperor Septimius Severus: and it continued to flourish till A. D. 366, when it was almost ruined by an attack from a Libyan tribe. Justinian did something towards its restoration; but the Arabian invasion completed its destruction. Its ruins are still considerable. — 2. Leptis Minor or Parva (Λεπτὶς ἡ μικρὰ: Lamta, Ru.), usually called simply Leptis, a Phoenician colony on the coast of Byzacium, in N. Africa, between Hadrumetum and Thapsus: an important place under both the Carthaginians and the Romans.

Lerina (St. Honorat), an island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, opposite Antipolis (Antibes).

Lerna or Lernē (Λέρνη), a district in Argolis, not far from Argos, in which was a marsh and a small river of the same name. It was celebrated as the place where Hercules killed the Lernean Hydra. [See p. 308, b.]

Lero (St. Marguerite), a small island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis.

Lĕros (Λέρος: Λέριος), a small island, one of the Sporades, opposite to the mouth of the Sinus Iassius, on the coast of Caria. Its inhabitants, who came originally from Miletus, bore a bad character. Besides a city of the same name, it had in it a temple of Artemis, where the transformation of the sisters of Meleager into guinea-fowls was said to have taken place, in memory of which guinea-fowls were kept in the court of that temple.

Lesbōnax (Λεσβῶναξ). 1. Son of Potamon of Mytilene, a philosopher and sophist, in the time of Augustus. He was the father of Polemon, the teacher and friend of the emperor Tiberius. Lesbonax wrote several political orations, of which 2 have come down to us, one entitled περὶ τοῦ πολέμου Κορινθίων, and the other προτρεπτικὸς λόγος, both of which are not unsuccessful imitations of the Attic orators of the best times. They are printed in the collections of the Greek orators [DEMOSTHENES], and separately by Orelli, Lips. 1820. — 2. A Greek grammarian, of uncertain age, but later than No. 1, the author of an extant work on grammatical figures (περὶ σχημάτων), published by Valckenaer in his edition of Ammonius.

Lesbos (Λέσβος: Λέσβιος, Lesbĭus: Mytilene, Metelin), the largest, and by far the most important, of the islands of the Aegean along the coast of Asia Minor, lay opposite to the Gulf of Adramyttium, off the coast of Mysia, the direction of its length being N. W. and S. E. It is intersected by lofty mountains, and indented with large bays, the chief of which, on the W. side, runs more than half way across the island. It had 3 chief headlands, Argennum on the N. E., Sigrium on the W., and Malea on the S. Its vallies were very fertile, especially in the N. part, near Methymna; and it produced corn, oil, and wine renowned for its excellence. In early times it was called by various names, the chief of which were, Issa, Pelasgia, Mytanis, and Macaria: the late Greek writers called it Mytilene, from its chief city, and this name has been preserved to modern times. The earliest reputed inhabitants were Pelasgians; the next, an Ionian colony, who were said to have settled in it 2 generations before the Trojan War; lastly, at the time of the great Aeolic migration (130 years after the Trojan War, according to the mythical chronology), the island was colonised by Aeolians, who founded in it an Hexapolis, consisting of the 6 cities, Mytilene, Methymna, Eresus, Pyrrha, Antissa, and Arisbe, afterwards reduced to 5 through the destruction of Arisbe by the Methymnaeans. The Aeolians of Lesbos afterwards founded numerous settlements along the coast of the Troad and in the region of Mt. Ida, and at one time a great part of the Troad seems to have been subject to Lesbos. The chief facts in the history of the island are connected with its principal city, Mytilene, which was the scene of the struggles between the nobles and the commons, in which ALCAEUS and PITTACUS took part. At the time of the Peloponnesian War, Lesbos was subject to Athens. After various changes, it fell under the power of Mithridates, and passed from him to the Romans. The island is most important in the early history of Greece, as the native region of the Aeolian school of lyric poetry. It was the birthplace of the musician and poet TERPANDER, of the lyric poets ALCAEUS, SAPPHO, and others, and of the dithyrambic poet ARION. Other forms of literature and philosophy early and long flourished in it: the sage and statesman PITTACUS, the historians HELLANICUS and Theophanes, and the philosophers Theophrastus and Phanias, were all Lesbians.

Lesbŏthĕmis (Λεσβόθεμις), a statuary of ancient date, and a native of Lesbos.

Lesches or Lescheus (Λέσχης, Λέσχευς), one of the so-called cyclic poets, son of Aeschylinus, a native of Pyrrha, in the neighbourhood of Mytilene, and hence called a Mytilenean or a Lesbian. He flourished about B.C. 708, and was usually regarded as the author of the Little Iliad (Ἰλιὰς ἡ ἐλάσσων or Ἰλιὰς μικρά), though this poem was also ascribed to various other poets. It consisted of 4 books, and was intended as a supplement to the Homeric Iliad. It related the events after the death of Hector, the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Philoctetes, Neoptolemus, and Ulysses, and the final capture and destruction of Troy, which part of the poem was called The Destruction of Troy (Ἰλίου πέρσις). There was no unity in the poem, except that of historical and chronological succession. Hence Aristotle remarks that the little Iliad furnished materials for 8 tragedies, whilst only one could be based upon the Iliad or Odyssey of Homer.

Lethaeus (Ληθαῖος). 1. A river of Ionia, in Asia Minor, flowing S. past Magnesia into the Maeander. — 2. A river in the S. of Crete, flowing past Gortyna. — 3. [LATHON.]

Lēthē (Λήθη), the personification of oblivion, called by Hesiod a daughter of Eris. A river in the lower world was likewise called Lethe. The souls of the departed drank of this river, and thus forgot all they had said or done in the upper world.

Lethe, a river in Spain. See LIMAEA.

Lēto (Λητώ), called Latōna by the Romans, is described by Hesiod as a daughter of the Titan Coeus and Phoebe, a sister of Asteria, and the mother of Apollo and Artemis by Zeus, to whom she was married before Hera. Homer likewise calls her the mother of Apollo and Artemis by Zeus; he mentions her in the story of Niobe, who paid so dearly for her conduct towards Leto [NIOBE], and he also describes her as the friend of the Trojans in the war with the Greeks. In later writers these elements of her story are variously embellished, for they do not describe her as the lawful wife of Zeus, but merely as his mistress, who was persecuted by Hera during her pregnancy. All the world being afraid of receiving Leto on account of Hera, she wandered about till she came to Delos, which was then a floating island, and bore the name of Asteria or Ortygia. When Leto arrived there, Zeus fastened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting-place for his beloved, and here she gave birth to Apollo and Artemis. The tradition is also related with various other modifications. Some said that Zeus changed Leto into a quail (ὄρτυξ), and that in this state she arrived in the floating island, which was hence called Ortygia. Others related that Zeus was enamoured with Asteria, but that she being metamorphosed into a bird, flew across the sea; that she was then changed into a rock, which for a long time, lay under the surface of the sea; and that this rock arose from the waters and received Leto when she was pursued by Python. Leto was generally worshipped only in conjunction with her children. Delos was the chief seat of her worship. [APOLLO.] — It is probable that the name of Leto belongs to the same class of words as the Greek λήθη and the Latin lateo. Leto would therefore signify "the obscure" or "concealed," not as a physical power, but as a divinity yet quiescent and invisible, from whom issued the visible divinity with all his splendour and brilliancy. This view is supported by the account of her genealogy given by Hesiod. — From their mother Apollo is frequently Letoïus or Latoïus, and Artemis (Diana) Letoïa, Letoïs, Latoïs, or Latoë.

Leuca (τὰ Λευκά), a town at the extremity of the Iapygian promontory in Calabria, with a stinking fountain, under which the giants who were vanquished by Hercules are said to have been buried. The promontory is still called Capo di Leuca.

Leucae, Leuca (Λεῦκαι, Λεύκη: Lefke), a small town on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor, near Phocaea, built by the Persian general Tachos in B. C. 352, and remarkable as the scene of the battle between the consul Licinius Crassus and Aristonicus, in 131.

Leucas or Leucădĭa (Λευκάς, Λευκαδία: Λευκάδιος: Santa Maura), an island in the Ionian sea, off the W. coast of Acarnania, about 20 miles in length, and from 5 to 8 miles in breadth. It has derived its name from the numerous calcareous hills which cover its surface. It was originally united to the mainland at its N.E. extremity by a narrow isthmus. Homer speaks of it as a peninsula, and mentions its well fortified town Nericus (Νήρικος). It was at that time inhabited by the Teleboans and Leleges. Subsequently the Corinthians under Cypselus, between B.C. 665 and 625, founded a new town, called Leucas in the N.E. of the country near the isthmus, in which they settled 1000 of their citizens, and to which they removed the inhabitants of Nericus, which lay a little to the W. of the new town. The Corinthians also cut a canal through the isthmus and thus converted the peninsula into an island. This canal was afterwards filled up by deposits of sand; and in the Peloponnesian war it was no longer available for ships, which during that period were conveyed across the isthmus on more than one occasion (Thuc. iii. 81, iv. 8). The canal was opened again by the Romans. At present the channel is dry in some parts, and has from 3 to 4 feet of water in others. The town of Leucas was a place of importance, and during the war between Philip and the Romans was at the head of the Acarnanian league, and the place where the meetings of the league were held. It was in consequence taken and plundered by the Romans, B.C. 197. The remains of this town are still to be seen. The other towns in the island were Hellomĕnum (Ἑλλόμενον) on the S.E. coast, and Phara (Φαρά), on the S.W. coast.—At the S. extremity of the island, opposite Cephallenia, was the celebrated promontory, variously called Leucas, Leucătas, Leucātes, or Leucăte (C. Ducato), on which was a temple of Apollo, who hence had the surname of Leucadius. At the annual festival of the god it was the custom to cast down a criminal from this promontory into the sea: to break his fall birds of all kinds were attached to him, and if he reached the sea uninjured, boats were ready to pick him up. This appears to have been an expiatory rite; and it gave rise to the well known story that lovers leaped from this rock, in order to seek relief from the pangs of love. Thus Sappho is said to have leapt down from this rock, when in love with Phaon; but this well known story vanishes at the first approach of criticism.

Leucē (Λευκή), an island in the Euxine sea, near the mouth of the Borysthenes, sacred to Achilles. [ACHILLEUS DROMOS.]

Leuci, a people in the S. E. of Gallia Belgica, S. of the Mediomatrici, between the Matrona and Mosella. Their chief town was Tullum (Toul).

Leucippē. [ALCATHOE.]

Leucippĭdes (Λευκιππίδες), i. e. Phoebe and Hilaïra, the daughters of Leucippus. They were priestesses of Athena and Artemis, and betrothed to Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus; but Castor and Pollux being charmed with their beauty, carried them off and married them.

Leucippus (Λεύκιππος). 1. Son of Oenomaus. For details see DAPHNE.—2. Son of Perieres and Gorgophone, brother of Aphareus, and prince of the Messenians, was one of the Calydonian hunters. By his wife Philodice, he had 2 daughters, Phoebe and Hilaira, usually called LEUCIPPIDES.—3. A Grecian philosopher, the founder of the atomic theory of the ancient philosophy, which was more fully developed by Democritus. Where and when he was born we have no data for deciding. Miletus, Abdera, and Elis have been assigned as his birth-place; the 1st, apparently, for no other reason than that it was the birth-place of several natural philosophers; the 2nd, because Democritus came from that town; the 3rd, because he was looked upon as a disciple of the Eleatic school. The period when he lived is equally uncertain. He is called the teacher of Democritus the disciple of Parmenides, or, according to other accounts, of Zeno, of Melissus, nay even of Pythagoras. With regard to his philosophical system it is impossible to speak with certainty, since the writers who mention him, either mention him in conjunction with Democritus, or attribute to him doctrines which are in like manner attributed to Democritus. [DEMOCRITUS.]

Leucon (Λεύκων). 1. Son of Poseidon or Athamas and Themisto, and father of Erythrus and Evippe. — 2. A powerful king of Bosporus, who reigned B. C. 393—353. He was in close alliance with the Athenians, whom he supplied with corn in great abundance, and who, in return for his services, admitted him and his sons to the citizenship of Athens. — 3. An Athenian poet, of the old comedy, a contemporary and rival of Aristophanes.

Leucōnĭum (Λευκώνιον), a place in the island of Chios. (Thuc. viii. 24.)

Leucŏnŏē (Λευκονόη), daughter of Minyas, usually called Leucippe. [ALCATHOE.]

Leucopetra (Λευκόπετρα: C. dell' Armi), a promontory in the S.W. of Bruttium, on the Sicilian straits, and a few miles S. of Rhegium, to whose territory it belonged. It was regarded by the ancient writers as the termination of the Apennines, and it derived its name from the white colour of its rocks.

Leucophrys (Λευκόφρυς). 1. A city of Caria, in the plain of the Maeander, close to a curious lake of warm water, and having a renowned temple of Artemis Leucophryne. — 2. A name given to the island of TENEDOS, from its white cliffs.

Leucophrȳnē. [LEUCOPHRYS.]

Leucōsĭa or Leucasĭa (Piana), a small island in the S. of the gulf of Paestum, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the promontory Posidium, said to have been called after one of the Sirens.

Leucŏsȳri (Λευκόσυροι, i. e. White Syrians), was a name early applied by the Greeks to the inhabitants of Cappadocia, who were of the Syrian race, in contradistinction to the Syrian tribes of a darker colour beyond the Taurus. Afterwards, when Cappadoces came to be the common name for the people of S. Cappadocia, the word Leucosyri was applied specifically to the people in the N. of the country (aft. Pontus) on the coast of the Euxine, between the rivers Halys and Iris: these are the White Syrians of Xenophon (Anab. v. 6). After the Macedonian conquest, the name appears to have fallen into disuse.

Leucŏthĕa (Λευκοθέα), a marine goddess, was previously Ino, the wife of Athamas. For details see ATHAMAS.

Leucŏthŏē, daughter of the Babylonian king Orchamus and Eurynome, was beloved by Apollo. Her amour was betrayed by the jealous Clytia to her father, who buried her alive; whereupon Apollo metamorphosed her into an incense shrub.— Leucothoe is in some writers only another form for Leucothea.

Leuctra (τὰ Λεῦκτρα: Lefka or Lefkra), a small town in Boeotia, on the road from Plataeae to Thespiae, memorable for the victory which Epaminondas and the Thebans here gained over Cleombrotus and the Spartans, B. C. 371.

Leuctrum (Λεῦκτρον). 1. Or Leuctra (Leftro), a town in Messenia, on the E. side of the Messenian gulf, between Cardamyle and Thalama, on the small river Pamisus. The Spartans and Messenians disputed for the possession of it. — 2. A small town in Achaia, dependent on Rhypae.

Lexovii or Lexobii, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Ocean, W. of the mouth of the Sequana. Their capital was Noviomagus. (Lisieux).

Liba (ἡ Λίβα), a city of Mesopotamia, between Nisibis and the Tigris.

Libanĭus (Λιβάνιος), a distinguished Greek sophist and rhetorician, was born at Antioch, on the Orontes, about A. D. 314. He studied at Athens, where he imbibed an ardent love for the great classical writers of Greece; and he afterwards set up a private school of rhetoric at Constantinople, which was attended by so large a number of pupils, that the classes of the public professors were completely deserted. The latter, in revenge, charged Libanius with being a magician, and obtained his expulsion from Constantinople about 346. He then went to Nicomedia, where he taught with equal success, but also drew upon himself an equal degree of malice from his opponents. After a stay of five years at Nicomedia, he was recalled to Constantinople. Eventually he took up his abode at Antioch, where he spent the remainder of his life. Here he received the greatest marks of favour from the emperor Julian, 362. In the reign of Valens he was at first persecuted, but he afterwards succeeded in winning the favour of that monarch also. The emperor Theodosius likewise showed him marks of respect, but his enjoyment of life was disturbed by ill health, by misfortunes in his family, and more especially by the disputes in which he was incessantly involved, partly with rival sophists, and partly with the prefects. It cannot, however, be denied, that he himself was as much to blame as his opponents, for he appears to have provoked them by his querulous disposition, and by the pride and vanity which everywhere appear in his orations, and which led him to interfere in political questions which it would have been wiser to have left alone. He was the teacher of St. Basil and Chrysostom, with whom he always kept up a friendly connexion. The year of his death is uncertain, but from one of his epistles it is evident that he was alive in 391, and it is probable that he died a few years after, in the reign of Arcadius. The extant works of Libanius are: 1. Models for rhetorical exercises (Προγυμνασμάτων παραδείγματα). 2. Orations (Λόγοι), 67 in number. 3. Declamations (Μελέται), i. e. orations on fictitious subjects, and descriptions of various kinds, 50 in number. 4. A life of Demosthenes, and arguments to the speeches of the same orator. 5. Letters (Ἐπιστολαί), of which a very large number is still extant. Many of these letters are extremely interesting, being addressed to the most eminent men of his time, such as the emperor Julian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and others. The style of Libanius is superior to that of the other rhetoricians of the 4th century. He took the best orators of the classic age as his models, and we can often see in him the disciple and happy imitator of Demosthenes; but he is not always able to rise above the spirit of his age, and we rarely find in him that natural simplicity which constitutes the great charm of the best Attic orators. His diction is a curious mixture of the pure old Attic with what may be termed modern. Moreover it is evident that, like all other rhetoricians, he is more concerned about the form than the substance. As far as the history of his age is concerned, some of his orations, and still more his epistles are of great value, such as the oration in which he relates the events of his own life, the eulogies on Constantius and Constans, the orations on Julian, several orations describing the condition of Antioch, and those which he wrote against his professional and political opponents. There is no complete edition of all the works of Libanius. The best edition of the orations and declamations is by Reiske, Altenburg, 1791—97, 4 vols. 8vo., and the best edition of the epistles is by Wolf, Amsterdam, 1738, fol.

Lĭbănus (ὁ Λίβανος, τὸ Λίβανον: Heb. Lebanon, i. e. the White Mountain: Jebel Libnan), a lofty and steep mountain range on the confines of Syria and Palestine, dividing Phoenice from Coele-Syria. It extends from above Sidon, about lat. 33½° N., in a direction N.N.E. as far as about lat. 34½°. Its highest summits are covered with perpetual snow, its sides were in ancient times clothed with forests of cedars, of which only scattered trees now remain, and on its lower slopes grow vines, figs, mulberries, and other fruits: its wines were highly celebrated in ancient times. It is considerably lower than the opposite range of Antilibanus. In the Scriptures the word Lebanon is used for both ranges, and for either of them; but in classical authors the names Libanus and Antilibanus are distinctive terms, being applied to the W. and E. ranges respectively.

Libarna or Libarnum, a town of Liguria on the Via Aurelia, N.W. of Genua.

Lĭbentīna, Lŭbentīna, or Lubentĭa, a surname of Venus among the Romans, by which she is described as the goddess of sexual pleasure (dea libidinis).

Lĭber, or Liber Pater, a name frequently given by the Roman poets to the Greek Bacchus or Dionysus, who was accordingly regarded as identical with the Italian Liber. But the god Liber, and the goddess Libera were ancient Italian divinities, presiding over the cultivation of the vine and the fertility of the fields. Hence they were worshipped even in early times in conjunction with Ceres. A temple to these 3 divinities was vowed by the dictator, A. Postumius, in B.C. 496, and was built near the Circus Flaminius; it was afterwards restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius. The name Liber is probably connected with liberare. Hence Seneca says, Liber dictus est quia liberat servitio curarum animi; while others, who were evidently thinking of the Greek Bacchus, found in the name an allusion to licentious drinking and speaking. Poets usually called him Liber Pater, the latter word being very commonly added by the Italians to the names of gods. The female Libera was identified by the Romans with Cora or Proserpĭna, the daughter of Demeter (Ceres); whence Cicero calls Liber and Libera children of Ceres; whereas Ovid calls Ariadne Libera. The festival of the Liberalia was celebrated by the Romans every year on the 17th of March.

Lĭbĕra. [Liber.]

Libertas, the personification of Liberty, was worshipped at Rome as a divinity. A temple was erected to her on the Aventine by Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. Another was built by Clodius on the spot where Cicero's house had stood. A third was erected after Caesar's victories in Spain. From these temples we must distinguish the Atrium Libertatis, which was in the N. of the forum, towards the Quirinal. This building under the republic served as an office of the censors, and also contained tables with laws inscribed upon them. It was rebuilt by Asinius Pollio, and then became the repository of the first public library at Rome. —Libertas is usually represented in works of art as a matron, with the pileus, the symbol of liberty, or a wreath of laurel. Sometimes she appears holding the Phrygian cap in her hand.

Libēthrĭdes. [Libethrum.]

Libethrĭus Mons (τὸ Λιβήθριον ὄρος), a mountain in Boeotia, a branch of Mt. Helicon, 40 stadia from Coronea, possessing a grotto of the Libethrian nymphs, adorned with their statues, and 2 fountains Libethrias and Petra.

Libethrum (Λειβηθρον, τὰ Λείβηθρα, τὰ Λίβηθρα), an ancient Thracian town in Pieria in Macedonia, on the slope of Olympus, and S.W. of Dium, where Orpheus is said to have lived. This town and the surrounding country were sacred to the Muses, who were hence called Libēthrĭdes; and it is probable that the worship of the Muses under this name was transferred from this place to Boeotia.

Lĭbĭtīna, an ancient Italian divinity, who was identified by the later Romans sometimes with Persephone (Proserpina), on account of her connection with the dead and their burial, and sometimes with Aphrodite (Venus). The latter was probably the consequence of etymological speculations on the name Libitina, which people connected with libido. Her temple at Rome was a repository of everything necessary for burials, and persons might there either buy or hire those things. Hence a person undertaking the burial of a person (an undertaker) was called libitinarius, and his business libitina; hence the expressions libitinam exercere, or facere, and libitina funeribus non sufficiebat, i.e. they could not all be buried. It is related that king Servius Tullius, in order to ascertain the number of deaths, ordained that for every person who died, a piece of money should be deposited in the temple of Libitina.—Owing to this connection of Libitina with the dead, Roman poets frequently employ her name in the sense of death itself.

Lĭbo, Scribonĭus, a plebeian family. 1. L., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 149, accused Ser. Sulpicius Galba on account of the outrages which he had committed against the Lusitanians. [Galba, No. 6.] It was perhaps this Libo who consecrated the Puteal Scribonianum or Puteal Libonis, of which we so frequently read in ancient writers. The Puteal was an enclosed place in the forum, near the Arcus Fabianus, and was so called from its being open at the top, like a puteal or well. It appears that there was only one such puteal at Rome, and not two, as is generally believed. It was dedicated in very ancient times either on account of the whetstone of the augur Navius (comp. Liv. i. 36), or because the spot had been struck by lightning; it was subsequently repaired and re-dedicated by Libo, who erected in its neighbourhood a tribunal for the praetor, in consequence of which the place was frequented by persons who had law-suits, such as money lenders and the like. (Comp. Hor. Sat. ii. 6. 35, Epist. i. 19. 8.)—2. L., the father-in-law of Sex. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he naturally sided with Pompey, and was entrusted with the command of Etruria. Shortly afterwards he accompanied Pompey to Greece, and was actively engaged in the war that ensued. On the death of Bibulus (48) he had the chief command of the Pompeian fleet. In the civil wars which followed Caesar's death, he followed the fortunes of his son-in-law Sex. Pompey. In 40, Octavian married his sister Scribonia, and this marriage was followed by a peace between the triumvirs and Pompey (39). When the war was renewed in 36, Libo for a time continued with Pompey, but, seeing his cause hopeless, he deserted him in the following year. In 34, he was consul with M. Antony.

Libon (Λίβων), an Elean, the architect of the great temple of Zeus in the Altis at Olympia, flourished about B.C. 450.

Libui, a Gallic tribe in Gallia Cispadana, to whom the towns of Brixia and Verona formerly belonged, from which they were expelled by the Cenomani. They are probably the same people whom we afterwards find in the neighbourhood of Vercellae under the name of Lebecii or Libici.

Liburnĭa, a district of Illyricum, along the coast of the Adriatic sea, was separated from Istria on the N. W. by the river Arsia, and from Dalmatia on the S. by the river Titius, thus corresponding to the W. part of Croatia, and the N. part of the modern Dalmatia. The country is mountainous and unproductive, and its inhabitants, the Liburni, supported themselves chiefly by commerce and navigation. They were celebrated at a very early period as bold and skilful sailors, and they appear to have been the first people who had the sway of the waters of the Adriatic. They took possession of most of the islands of this sea as far as Corcyra, and had settlements even on the opposite coast of Italy. Their ships were remarkable for their swift sailing, and hence vessels built after the same model were called Liburnicae or Liburnae naves. It was to light vessels of this description that Augustus was mainly indebted for his victory over Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. The Liburnians were the first Illyrian people who submitted to the Romans. Being hard pressed by the Iapydes on the N. and by the Dalmatians on the S., they sought the protection of Rome at a comparatively early period. Hence we find that many of their towns were immunes, or exempt from taxes. The islands off the coast were reckoned a part of Liburnia and are known by the general name of Liburnides or Liburnicae Insulae. [ILLYRICUM.]

Libўa (Λιβύη), daughter of Epaphus and Memphis, from whom Libya (Africa) is said to have derived its name. By Poseidon she became the mother of Agenor, Belus, and Lelex.

Lĭbўa (Λιβύη: Λίβυες, Libyes). 1. The Greek name for the continent of Africa in general [AFRICA].—2. L. Interior (Λ. ἡ ἐντός), the whole interior of Africa, as distinguished from the well-known regions on the N. and N.E. coasts. — 3. Libya, specifically, or Libyae Nomos (Λιβύης νομός), a district of N. Africa, between Egypt and Marmarica, so called because it once formed an Egyptian Nomos. It is sometimes called Libya Exterior.

Lĭbўci Montes (τὸ Λιβυκὸν ὄρος: Jebel Selseleh), the range of mountains which form the W. margin of the valley of the Nile. [AEGYPTUS.]

Lĭbўcum Mare (τὸ Λιβυκὸν πέλαγος), the part of the Mediterranean between the island of Crete and the N. coast of Africa.

Libyphoenīces (Λιβυφοίνικες, Λιβοφοίνικες), a term applied to the people of those parts of N. Africa, in which the Phoenicians had founded colonies, and especially to the inhabitants of the Phoenician cities on the coast of the Carthaginian territory: it is derived from the fact that these people were a mixed race of the Libyan natives with the Phoenician settlers.

Libyssa (Λίβυσσα: Herekeh?), a town of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, on the N. coast of the Sinus Astacenus, W. of Nicomedia, celebrated as the place where the tomb of Hannibal was to be seen.

Licātes or Licătii, a people of Vindelicia on the E. bank of the river Licus or Licia (Lech), one of the fiercest of the Vindelician tribes.

Lichădes (Λιχάδες: Ponticonesi), 3 small islands between Euboea and the coast of Locris, called Scarphia, Caresa, and Phocaria. See LICHAS, No. 1.

Lĭchas (Λίχας). 1. An attendant of Hercules, brought his master the poisoned garment, which destroyed the hero. [See p. 310, b.] Hercules, in anguish and wrath, threw Lichas into the sea, and the Lichadian islands were believed to have derived their name from him. — 2. A Spartan, son of Arcesilaus, was proxenus of Argos, and is frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war. He was famous throughout Greece for his hospitality, especially in his entertainment of strangers at the Gymnopaedia.

Licia or Licus. [LICATES.]

Lĭcinĭa. 1. A Vestal virgin, accused of incest, together with 2 other Vestals, Aemilia and Marcia, B.C. 114. L. Metellus, the pontifex maximus, condemned Aemilia, but acquitted Licinia and Marcia. The acquittal of the 2 last caused such dissatisfaction that the people appointed L. Cassius Longinus to investigate the matter; and he condemned both Licinia and Marcia. — 2. Wife of C. Sempronius Gracchus, the celebrated tribune. — 3. Daughter of Crassus the orator, and wife of the younger Marius.

Lĭcinĭa Gens, a celebrated plebeian house, to which belonged C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, whose exertions threw open the consulship to the plebeians. Its most distinguished families at a later time were those of CRASSUS, LUCULLUS and MURENA. There were likewise numerous other surnames in the gens, which are also given in their proper places.

Lĭcinĭus. 1. C. Licinius Calvus, surnamed Stolo, which he derived, it is said, from the care with which he dug up the shoots that sprang up from the roots of his vines. He brought the contest between the patricians and plebeians to a happy termination, and thus became the founder of Rome's greatness. He was tribune of the people from B.C. 376 to 367, and was faithfully supported in his exertions by his colleague L. Sextius. The laws which he proposed were: 1. That in future no more consular tribunes should be appointed, but that consuls should be elected, one of whom should always be a plebeian. 2. That no one should possess more than 500 jugera of the public land, or keep upon it more than 100 head of large and 500 of small cattle. 3. A law regulating the affairs between debtor and creditor. 4. That the Sibylline books should be entrusted to a college of ten men (decemviri), half of whom should be plebeians. These rogations were passed after a most vehement opposition on the part of the patricians, and L. Sextius was the first plebeian who obtained the consulship, 366. Licinius himself was elected twice to the consulship, 364 and 361. Some years later he was accused by M. Popilius Laenas of having transgressed his own law respecting the amount of public land which a person might possess. He was condemned and sentenced to pay a heavy fine. — 2. C. Licinius Macer, an annalist and an orator, was a man of praetorian dignity, who, when impeached (66) of extortion by Cicero, finding that the verdict was against him, forthwith committed suicide before the formalities of the trial were completed, and thus averted the dishonour and loss which would have been entailed upon his family by a public condemnation and by the confiscation of property which it involved. His Annales commenced with the very origin of the city, and extended to 21 books at least; but how far he brought down his history, is unknown. — 3. C. Licinius Macer Calvus, son of the last, a distinguished orator and poet, was born in 82, and died about 47 or 46, in his 35th or 36th year. His most celebrated oration was delivered against Vatinius, who was defended by Cicero, when he was only 27 years of age. So powerful was the effect produced by this speech, that the accused started up in the midst of the pleading, and passionately exclaimed, "Rogo vos, judices, num, si iste disertus est, ideo me damnari oporteat?" His poems were full of wit and grace, and possessed sufficient merit to be classed by the ancients with those of Catullus. His elegies, especially that on the untimely death of his mistress Quintilia, have been warmly extolled by Catullus, Propertius, and Ovid. Calvus was remarkable for the shortness of his stature, and hence the vehement action in which he indulged while pleading was in such ludicrous contrast with his insignificant person, that even his friend Catullus has not been able to resist a joke, and has presented him to us as the "Salaputium disertum," "the eloquent Tom Thumb."

Lĭcĭnius, Roman emperor A. D. 307—324, whose full name was Publius Flavius Galerius Valerius Licinianus Licinius. He was a Dacian peasant by birth, and the early friend and companion in arms of the emperor Galerius, by whom he was raised to the rank of Augustus, and invested with the command of the Illyrian provinces at Carmentum, on the 11th of November, A. D. 307. Upon the death of Galerius in 311, he concluded a peaceful arrangement with Maximinus II., in virtue of which the Hellespont and the Bosporus were to form the boundary of the two empires. In 313 he married at Milan, Constantia, the sister of Constantine, and in the same year set out to encounter Maximinus, who had invaded his dominions. Maximinus was defeated by Licinius near Heraclea, and died a few months afterwards at Tarsus. Licinius and Constantine were now the only emperors, and each was anxious to obtain the undivided sovereignty. Accordingly war broke out between them in 315. Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in Pannonia, and afterwards at Adrianople, and was compelled to purchase peace by ceding to Constantine Greece, Macedonia, and Illyricum. This peace lasted about 9 years, at the end of which time hostilities were renewed. The great battle of Adrinople (July, 323), followed by the reduction of Byzantium, and a second great victory achieved near Chalcedon (September), placed Licinius at the mercy of Constantine, who, although he spared his life for the moment, and merely sentenced him to an honourable imprisonment at Thessalonica, soon found a convenient pretext for putting him to death, 324.

Licĭnus. 1. A Gaul by birth, was taken prisoner in war, and became a slave of Julius Caesar, whose confidence he gained so much as to be made his dispensator or steward. Caesar gave him his freedom. He also gained the favour of Augustus, who appointed him in B. C. 15, governor of his native country, Gaul. By the plunder of Gaul and by other means, he acquired enormous wealth, and hence his name is frequently coupled with that of Crassus. He lived to see the reign of Tiberius. — 2. The barber (tonsor) Licinus spoken of by Horace (Ars Poët. 301), must have been a different person from the preceding, although identified by the Scholiast. — 3. Clōdius Licĭnus, a Roman annalist, who lived about the beginning of the first century B. C., wrote the history of Rome from its capture by the Gauls to his own time. This Clodius is frequently confounded with Q. Claudius Quadrigarius. [Quadrigarius.] — 4. L. Porcius Licĭnus, plebeian aedile, 210, and praetor 207, when he obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province. — 5. L. Porcius Licinus, praetor 193, with Sardinia as his province, and consul 184, when he carried on war against the Ligurians. — 6. Porcius Licinus, an ancient Roman poet, who probably lived in the latter part of the 2nd century B. C.

Licymnia, spoken of by Horace (Carm. ii. 12. 13, seq.), is probably the same as Terentia, the wife of Maecenas.

Licymnĭus (Λικύμνιος). 1. Son of Electryon and the Phrygian slave Midea, and consequently half-brother of Alcmene. He was married to Perimede, by whom he became the father of Oeonus, Argeus, and Melas. He was a friend of Hercules, whose son Tlepolemus slew him, according to some unintentionally, and according to others in a fit of anger. — 2. Of Chios, a distinguished dithyrambic poet, of uncertain date. Some writers place him before Simonides; but it is perhaps more likely that he belonged to the later Athenian dithyrambic school about the end of the 4th century B. C. — 3. Of Sicily, a rhetorician, the pupil of Gorgias, and the teacher of Polus.

Lĭdē (Λίδη), a mountain of Caria, above Pedasus.

Q. Ligarĭus, was legate, in Africa, of C. Considius Longus, who left him in command of the province, B. C. 50. Next year (49) Ligarius resigned the government of the province into the hands of L. Attius Varus. Ligarius fought under Varus against Curio in 49, and against Caesar himself in 46. After the battle of Thapsus, Ligarius was taken prisoner at Adrumetum; his life was spared, but he was banished by Caesar. Meantime, a public accusation was brought against Ligarius by Q. Aelius Tubero. The case was pleaded before Caesar himself in the forum. Cicero defended Ligarius in a speech still extant, in which he maintains that Ligarius had as much claims to the mercy of Caesar, as Tubero and Cicero himself. Ligarius was pardoned by Caesar, who was on the point of setting out for the Spanish war. The speech which Cicero delivered in his defence was subsequently published, and was much admired. Ligarius joined the conspirators, who assassinated Caesar in 44. Ligarius and his 2 brothers perished in the proscription of the triumvirs in 43.

Lĭger or Lĭgĕris (Loire), one of the largest rivers in Gaul, rises in M. Cevenna, flows through the territories of the Arverni, Aedui, and Carnutes, and falls into the ocean between the territories of the Namnetes and Pictones.

Ligurĭa (ἡ Λιγυστική, ἡ Λιγυστίνη), a district of Italy, was, in the time of Augustus, bounded on the W. by the river Varus, and the Maritime Alps, which separated it from Transalpine Gaul, on the S. E. by the river Macra, which separated it from Etruria, on the N. by the river Po, and on the S. by the Mare Ligusticum. The country is very mountainous and unproductive, as the Maritime Alps and the Apennines run through the greater part of it. The mountains run almost down to the coast, leaving only space sufficient for a road, which formed the highway from Italy to the S. of Gaul. The chief occupation of the inhabitants was the rearing and feeding of cattle. The numerous forests on the mountains produced excellent timber, which, with the other products of the country, was exported from Genua, the principal town of the country. The inhabitants were called by the Greeks Ligўes (Λίγυες) and Ligystīni (Λιγυστινοί) and by the Romans Ligŭres (Sing. Ligus, more rarely Ligur). They were in early times a powerful and widely extended people; but their origin is uncertain, some writers supposing them to be Celts, others Iberians, and others again of the same race as the Siculians, or most ancient inhabitants of Italy. It is certain that the Ligurians at one time inhabited the S. coast of Gaul as well as the country afterwards called Liguria, and that they had possession of the whole coast from the mouth of the Rhone to Pisae in Etruria. The Greeks probably became acquainted with them first from the Samians and Phocaeans, who visited their coasts for the purposes of commerce; and so powerful were they considered at this time that Hesiod names them, along with the Scythians and Ethiopians, as one of the chief people of the earth. Tradition also related that Hercules fought with the Ligurians on the plain of stones near Massilia; and even a writer so late as Eratosthenes gave the name of Ligystice to the whole of the W. peninsula of Europe. So widely were they believed to be spread that the Ligyes in Germany and Asia were supposed to be a branch of the same people. The Ligurian tribes were divided by the Romans into Ligures Transalpini and Cisalpini. The tribes which inhabited the Maritime Alps were called in general Alpini, and also Capillati or Comati, from their custom of allowing their hair to grow long. The tribes which inhabited the Apennines were called Montani. The names of the principal tribes were: — on the W. side of the Alps, the SALYES or SALLUVII, OXYBII, and DECIATES; on the E. side of the Alps, the INTEMELII, INGAUNI and APUANI near the coast, the VAGIENNI, SALASSI and TAURINI on the upper course of the Po, and the LAEVI and MARISCI N. of the Po. — The Ligurians were small of stature, but strong, active, and brave. In early times they served as mercenaries in the armies of the Carthaginians, and subsequently they carried on a long and fierce struggle with the Romans. Their country was invaded for the first time by the Romans in B. C. 238; but it was not till after the termination of the 2nd Punic war and the defeat of Philip and Antiochus that the Romans were able to devote their energies to the subjugation of Liguria. It was many years however before the whole country was finally subdued. Whole tribes, such as the Apuani, were transplanted to Samnium, and their place supplied by Roman colonists. The country was divided between the provinces of Gallia Narbonensis and Gallia Cisalpina; and in the time of Augustus and of the succeeding emperors, the tribes in the mountains were placed under the government of an imperial procurator, called Procurator or Praefectus Alpium Maritimarum.

Ligustĭcum Mare, the name originally of the whole sea S. of Gaul and of the N.W. of Italy, but subsequently only the E. part of this sea, or the Gulf of Genoa, whence later writers speak only of a Sinus Ligusticus.

Lilaea (Λίλαια: Λιλαιεύς), an ancient town in Phocis, near the sources of the Cephissus.

Lĭlўbaeum (Λιλύβαιον: Marsala), a town in the W. of Sicily, with an excellent harbour, situated on a promontory of the same name (C. Boeo or di Marsala), opposite to the Prom. Hermaeum or Mercurii (C. Bon) in Africa, the space between the 2 being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa. The town of Lilybaeum was founded by the Carthaginians about B. C. 397, and was made the principal Carthaginian fortress in Sicily. It was surrounded by massive walls and by a trench 60 feet wide and 40 feet deep. On the destruction of Selinus in 249, the inhabitants of the latter city were transplanted to Lilybaeum, which thus became still more powerful. Lilybaeum was besieged by the Romans in the 1st Punic war, but they were unable to take it; and they only obtained possession of it by the treaty of peace. Under the Romans Lilybaeum continued to be a place of importance. At Marsala, which occupies only the S. half of the ancient town, there are the ruins of a Roman aqueduct, and a few other ancient remains.

Limaea, Limia, Limius, Belion (Lima), a river in Gallaecia in Spain, between the Durius and the Minius, which flowed into the Atlantic Ocean. It was also called the river of Forgetfulness (ὁ τῆς Λήθης, Flumen Oblivionis); and it is said to have been so called, because the Turduli and the Celts on one occasion lost here their commander, and forgot the object of their expedition. This legend was so generally believed that it was with difficulty that Brutus Callaicus could induce his soldiers to cross the river, when he invaded Gallaecia, B. C. 136. On the banks of this river dwelt a small tribe called Limici.

Limĭtes Romāni, the name of a continuous series of fortifications, consisting of castles, walls, earthern ramparts, and the like, which the Romans erected along the Rhine and the Danube, to protect their possessions from the attacks of the Germans.

Limnae (Λίμναι, Λιμναῖος). 1. A town in Messenia, on the frontiers of Laconia, with a temple of Artemis, who was hence surnamed Limnatis. This temple was common to the people of both countries; and the outrage which the Messenian youth committed against some Lacedaemonian maidens, who were sacrificing at this temple, was the occasion of the 1st Messenian war. Limnae was situated in the Ager Dentheliatis, which district was a subject of constant dispute between the Lacedaemonians and Messenians after the re-establishment of the Messenian independence by Epaminondas. — 2. A town in the Thracian Chersonesus on the Hellespont, not far from Sestus, founded by the Milesians. — 3. See SPARTA.

Limnaea (Λιμναία: Λιμναῖος), a town in the N. of Acarnania, on the road from Argos Amphilochicum to Stratos, and near the Ambracian gulf, on which it had a harbour.

Limnaea, Limnētes, Limnēgĕnes (Λιμναία (ος), Λιμνήτης (ις), Λιμνηγενής), i. e. inhabiting or born in a lake or marsh, a surname of several divinities who were believed either to have sprung from a lake, or who had their temples near a lake. Hence we find this surname given to Dionysus at Athens, and to Artemis at various places.

Limonum. [PICTONES.]

Lĭmȳra (τὰ Λίμυρα: Ru. N. of Phineka ?), a city in the S.E. of Lycia, on the river LIMYRUS, 20 stadia from its mouth.

Lĭmȳrus (Λίμυρος: Phineka ?), a river of Lycia, flowing into the bay W. of the Sacrum Promontorium (Phineka Bay): navigable as far up as LIMYRA. The recent travellers differ as to whether the present river Phineka is the Limyra or its tributary the Arycandus.

Lindum (Lincoln), a town of the Coritani, in Britain, on the road from Londinium to Eboracum, and a Roman colony. The modern name Lincoln has been formed out of Lindum Colonia.

Lindus (Λίνδος: Λίνδιος: Lindo, Ru.), on the E. side of the island of Rhodes, was one of the most ancient Dorian colonies on the Asiatic coast. It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 656), with its kindred cities, Ialysus and Camirus. These 3 cities, with Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus, formed the original Hexapolis, in the S.W. corner of Asia Minor. Lindus stood upon a mountain in a district abounding in vines and figs, and had 2 celebrated temples, one of Athena surnamed Λινδία, and one of Hercules. It was the birthplace of Cleobulus, one of the 7 wise men. It retained much of its consequence even after the foundation of Rhodes. Inscriptions of some importance have lately been found in its Acropolis.

Lingŏnes. 1. A powerful people in Transalpine Gaul, whose territory extended from the foot of Mt. Vogesus and the sources of the Matrona and Mosa, N. as far as the Treviri, and S. as far as the Sequani, from whom they were separated by the river Arar. The emperor Otho gave them the Roman franchise. Their chief town was Andematurinum, afterwards Lingones (Langres). — 2. A branch of the above mentioned people, who migrated into Cisalpine Gaul along with the Boii, and shared the fortunes of the latter. [BOII.] They dwelt E. of the Boii as far as the Adriatic sea in the neighbourhood of Ravenna.

Linternum. [LITERNUM.]

Lĭnus (Λίνος), the personification of a dirge or lamentation, and therefore described as a son of Apollo by a Muse (Calliope, or by Psamathe or Chalciope), or of Amphimarus by Urania. Both Argos and Thebes claimed the honour of his birth. An Argive tradition related, that Linus was exposed by his mother after his birth, and was brought up by shepherds, but was afterwards torn to pieces by dogs. Psamathe's grief at the occurrence betrayed her misfortune to her father, who condemned her to death. Apollo, indignant at the father's cruelty, visited Argos with a plague; and, in obedience to an oracle, the Argives endeavoured to propitiate Psamathe and Linus by means of sacrifices. Matrons and virgins sang dirges which were called λίνοι. According to a Boeotian tradition Linus was killed by Apollo, because he had ventured upon a musical contest with the god; and every year before sacrifices were offered to the Muses, a funeral sacrifice was offered to him, and dirges (λίνοι) were sung in his honour. His tomb was claimed by Argos and by Thebes, and likewise by Chalcis in Euboea. It is probably owing to the difficulty of reconciling the different mythuses about Linus, that the Thebans thought it necessary to distinguish between an earlier and later Linus; the latter is said to have instructed Hercules in music, but to have been killed by the hero. In the time of the Alexandrine grammarians Linus was considered as the author of apocryphal works, in which the exploits of Dionysus were described.

Lipăra and Liparenses Insulae. [AEOLIAE.]

Lipăris (Λίπαρις), a small river of Cilicia, flowing past Soloë.

Liquentĭa (Livenza), a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy between Altinum and Concordia, which flowed into the Sinus Tergestinus.

Līris (Garigliano), more anciently called Clanis, or Glanis, one of the principal rivers in central Italy, rises in the Apennines W. of lake Fucinus, flows first through the territory of the Marsi in a S. E.-ly direction, then turns S. W. near Sora, and at last flows S. E. into the Sinus Caietanus near Minturnae, forming the boundary between Latium and Campania. Its stream was sluggish, whence the "Liris quieta aqua" of Horace (Carm. i. 31).

Lissus (Λισσός: Λίσσιος, Λισσεύς). 1. (Alessio), a town in the S. of Dalmatia, at the mouth of the river Drilon, founded by Dionysius of Syracuse, B. C. 385. It was situated on a hill near the coast, and possessed a strongly fortified acropolis, called Acrolissus, which was considered impregnable. The town afterwards fell into the hands of the Illyrians, and was eventually colonized by the Romans. — 2. A small river in Thrace W. of the Hebrus.

Lista (S. Anatoglia), a town of the Sabines, S. of Reate, is said to have been the capital of the Aborigines, from which they were driven out by the Sabines, who attacked them in the night.

Litāna Silva (Silva di Luge), a large forest on the Apennines in Cisalpine Gaul, S. E. of Mutina, in which the Romans were defeated by the Gauls, B. C. 216.

Liternum or Linternum (Patria), a town on the coast of Campania, at the mouth of the river Clanius or Glanis, which in the lower part of its course takes the name of Liternus (Patria or Clanio), and which flows through a marsh to the N. of the town called Literna Palus. The town was made a Roman colony B. C. 194, and was recolonized by Augustus. It was to this place that the elder Scipio Africanus retired, when the tribunes attempted to bring him to trial, and here he is said to have died. His tomb was shown at Liternum; but some maintained that he was buried in the family sepulchre near the Porta Capena at Rome.

Lĭvĭa. 1. Sister of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune, B. C. 91, was married first to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis, and subsequently to Q. Servilius Caepio, by whom she had a daughter, Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus, who killed Caesar. — 2. Livia Drusilla, the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus [DRUSUS, No. 3], was married first to Tib. Claudius Nero; and afterwards to Augustus, who compelled her husband to divorce her, B. C. 38. She had already borne her husband one son, the future emperor Tiberius, and at the time of her marriage with Augustus was 6 months pregnant with another, who subsequently received the name of Drusus. She never had any children by Augustus, but she retained his affections till his death. It was generally believed that she caused C. Caesar and L. Caesar, the 2 grandsons of Augustus to be poisoned, in order to secure the succession for her own children; and she was even suspected of having hastened the death of Augustus. On the accession of her son Tiberius to the throne, she at first attempted to obtain an equal share in the government; but this the jealous temper of Tiberius would not brook. He commanded her to retire altogether from public affairs, and soon displayed even hatred towards her. When she was on her death-bed, he refused to visit her. She died in A. D. 29, at the age of 82 or 86. Tiberius took no part in the funeral rites, and forbade her consecration, which had been proposed by the senate. — 3. Or Livilla, the daughter of Drusus senior and Antonia, and the wife of Drusus junior, the son of the emperor Tiberius. She was seduced by Sejanus, who persuaded her to poison her husband, A. D. 23. Her guilt was not discovered till the fall of Sejanus, 8 years afterwards, 31. — 4. Julia Livilla, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. [JULIA, No. 7.]

Līvia Gens, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious houses among the Roman nobility. The Livii obtained 8 consulships, 2 censorships, 3 triumphs, a dictatorship, and a mastership of the horse. The most distinguished families are those of DRUSUS and SALINATOR.

Līvius, T., the Roman historian, was born at Patavium (Padua), in the N. of Italy, B. C. 59. The greater part of his life appears to have been spent in Rome, but he returned to his native town before his death, which happened at the age of 76, in the 4th year of Tiberius, A. D. 17. We know that he was married, and that he had at least 2 children, a son and a daughter, married to L. Magius, a rhetorician. His literary talents secured the patronage and friendship of Augustus; he became a person of consideration at court, and by his advice Claudius, afterwards emperor, was induced in early life to attempt historical composition; but there is no ground for the assertion that Livy acted as preceptor to the young prince. Eventually his reputation rose so high and became so widely diffused, that a Spaniard travelled from Cadiz to Rome, solely for the purpose of beholding him, and having gratified his curiosity in this one particular, immediately returned home. The great and only extant work of Livy is a History of Rome, termed by himself Annales (xliii. 13), extending from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, B. C. 9, comprised in 142 books. Of these 35 have descended to us; but of the whole, with the exception of 2, we possess Epitomes, which must have been drawn up by one who was well acquainted with his subject. By some they have been ascribed to Livy himself, by others to Florus; but there is nothing in the language or context to warrant either of these conclusions; and external evidence is altogether wanting. From the circumstance that a short introduction or preface is found at the beginning of books 1, 21, and 31, and that each of these marks the commencement of an important epoch, the whole work has been divided into decades, containing 10 books each; but the grammarians Priscian and Diomedes, who quote repeatedly from particular books, never allude to any such distribution. The commencement of book xli. is lost, but there is certainly no remarkable crisis at this place which invalidates one part of the argument in favour of the antiquity of the arrangement. The 1st decade (bks. i—x.) is entire. It embraces the period from the foundation of the city to the year B. C. 294, when the subjugation of the Samnites may be said to have been completed. The 2nd decade (bks. xi—xx.) is altogether lost. It embraced the period from 294 to 219, comprising an account, among other matters, of the invasion of Pyrrhus and of the first Punic war. The 3rd decade (bks. xxi—xxx.) is entire. It embraces the period from 219 to 201, comprehending the whole of the 2nd Punic war. The 4th decade (bks. xxxi—xl.) is entire, and also one half of the 5th (bks. xli—xlv.). These 15 books embrace the period from 201 to 167, and develope the progress of the Roman arms in Cisalpine Gaul, in Macedonia, Greece and Asia, ending with the triumph of Aemilius Paulus. Of the remaining books nothing remains except inconsiderable fragments, the most notable being a few chapters of the 91st book, concerning the fortunes of Sertorius. The composition of such a vast work necessarily occupied many years; and we find indications which throw some light upon the epochs when different sections were composed. Thus in book first (c. 19) it is stated that the temple of Janus had been closed twice only since the reign of Numa, for the first time in the consulship of T. Manlius (B. C. 235), a few years after the termination of the first Punic war; for the second time by Augustus Caesar, after the battle of Actium, in 29. But we know that it was shut again by Augustus after the conquest of the Cantabrians, in 25; and hence it is evident that the first book must have been written between the years 29 and 25. Moreover, since the last book contained an account of the death of Drusus, it is evident that the task must have been spread over 17 years, and probably occupied a much longer time. — The style of Livy may be pronounced almost faultless. The narrative flows on in a calm, but strong current; the diction displays richness without heaviness, and simplicity without tameness. There is, moreover, a distinctness of outline and a warmth of colouring in all his delineations, whether of living men in action, or of things inanimate, which never fail to call up the whole scene before our eyes. — In judging of the merits of Livy as an historian, we are bound to ascertain, if possible, the end which he proposed to himself. No one who reads Livy with attention can suppose that he ever conceived the project of drawing up a critical history of Rome. His aim was to offer to his countrymen a clear and pleasing narrative, which, while it gratified their vanity, should contain no startling improbabilities nor gross amplifications. To effect this purpose he studied with care the writings of some of his more celebrated predecessors on Roman history. Where his authorities were in accordance with each other, he generally rested satisfied with this agreement; where their testimony was irreconcileable, he was content to point out their want of harmony, and occasionally to offer an opinion on their comparative credibility. But, in no case did he ever dream of ascending to the fountain head. He never attempted to test the accuracy of his authorities by examining monuments of remote antiquity, of which not a few were accessible to every inhabitant of the metropolis. Thus, it is perfectly clear that he had never read the Leges Regiae, nor the Commentaries of Servius Tullius, nor even the Licinian Rogations; and that he had never consulted the vast collection of decrees of the senate, ordinances of the plebs, treaties and other state papers, which were preserved in the city. Nay more, he did not consult even all the authors to whom he might have resorted with advantage, such as the Annals and Antiquities of Varro, and the Origines of Cato. And even those writers whose authority he followed, he did not use in the most judicious manner. He seems to have performed his task piecemeal. A small section was taken in hand, different accounts were compared, and the most plausible was adopted; the same system was adhered to in the succeeding portions, so that each considered by itself, without reference to the rest, was executed with care; but the witnesses who were rejected in one place were admitted in another, without sufficient attention being paid to the dependence and the connection of the events. Hence the numerous contradictions and inconsistencies which have been detected by sharp-eyed critics. Other mistakes also are found in abundance, arising from his want of anything like practical knowledge of the world, from his never having acquired even the elements of the military art, of jurisprudence, or of political economy, and above all, from his singular ignorance of geography. But while we fully acknowledge these defects in Livy, we cannot admit that his general good faith has ever been impugned with any show of justice. We are assured (Tacit. Ann. iv. 34) that he was fair and liberal upon matters of contemporary history; we know that he praised Cassius and Brutus, that his character of Cicero was a high eulogium, and that he spoke so warmly of the unsuccessful leader in the great civil war, that he was sportively styled a Pompeian by Augustus. It is true that in recounting the domestic strife which agitated the republic for nearly two centuries, he represents the plebeians and their leaders in the most unfavourable light. But this arose, not from any wish to pervert the truth, but from ignorance of the exact relation of the contending parties. It is manifest that he never can separate in his own mind the spirited plebeians of the infant commonwealth from the base and venal rabble which thronged the forum in the days of Marius and Cicero; while in like manner he confounds those bold and honest tribunes, who were the champions of liberty, with such men as Saturninus or Sulpicius, Clodius or Vatinius.—There remains one topic to which we must advert. We are told by Quintilian (i. 5. § 56, viii. 1. § 3) that Asinius Pollio had remarked a certain Patavinity in Livy. Scholars have given themselves a vast deal of trouble to discover what this term may indicate, and various hypotheses have been propounded; but if there is any truth in the story, it is evident that Pollio must have intended to censure some provincial peculiarities of expression, which we, at all events, are in no position to detect. The best edition of Livy is by Drakenborch, Lugd. Bat. 1738—46, 7 vols. 4to. There is also a valuable edition, now in course of publication, by Alchefski, Berol. 8vo. 1841, seq.

Livĭus Andronīcus. [ANDRONICUS.]

Lix, Lixa, Lixus (Λίξ, Λίξα, Λίξος: Al-Araish), a city on the W. coast of Mauretania Tingitana, in Africa, at the mouth of a river of the same name: it was a place of some commercial importance.

Locri, sometimes called Locrenses by the Romans, the inhabitants of Locris (ἡ Λοκρίς), were an ancient people in Greece, descended from the Leleges, with which some Hellenic tribes were intermingled at a very early period. They were, however, in Homer's time regarded as Hellenes; and according to tradition even Deucalion, the founder of the Hellenic race, was said to have lived in Locris in the town of Opus or Cynos. In historical times the Locrians were divided into 2 distinct tribes, differing from one another in customs, habits and civilization. Of these the Eastern Locrians, called Epicnemidii and Opuntii, who dwelt on the E. coast of Greece opposite the island of Euboea, were the more ancient and more civilized; while the Western Locrians, called Ozolae, who dwelt on the Corinthian gulf, were a colony of the former, and were more barbarous. Homer mentions only the E. Locrians. At a later time there was no connexion between the Eastern and Western Locrians; and in the Peloponnesian war we find the former siding with the Spartans, and the latter with the Athenians. — 1. Eastern Locris, extended from Thessaly and the pass of Thermopylae along the coast to the frontiers of Boeotia, and was bounded by Doris and Phocis on the W. It was a fertile and well cultivated country. The N. part was inhabited by the Locri Epicnēmĭdĭi (Ἐπικνημίδιοι), who derived their name from Mt. Cnemis. The S. part was inhabited by the Locri Opuntĭi (Ὀπούντιοι), who derived their name from their principal town, Opus. The two tribes were separated by Daphnus, a small slip of land, which at one time belonged to Phocis. These two tribes are frequently confounded with one another; and ancient writers sometimes use the name either of Epicnemidii or of Opuntii alone, when both tribes are intended. The Epicnemidii were for a long time subject to the Phocians, and were included under the name of the latter people; whence the name of the Opuntii occurs more frequently in Greek history. — 2. Western Locris, or the country of the Locri Ozŏlae (Ὀζόλαι), was bounded on the N. by Doris, on the W. by Aetolia, on the E. by Phocis, and on the S. by the Corinthian gulf. The origin of the name of Ozolae is uncertain. The ancients derived it either from the undressed skins worn by the inhabitants, or from ὄζειν "to smell," on account of the great quantity of asphodel that grew in their country, or from the stench arising from mineral springs, beneath which the centaur Nessus is said to have been buried. The country is mountainous, and for the most part unproductive. Mt. Corax from Aetolia, and Mt. Parnassus from Phocis, occupy the greater part of it. The Locri Ozolae resembled their neighbours, the Aetolians, both in their predatory habits and in their mode of warfare. They were divided into several tribes, and are described by Thucydides as a rude and barbarous people, even in the time of the Peloponnesian war. From B.C. 315 they belonged to the Aetolian League. Their chief town was AMPHISSA.

Locri Epizephyrĭi (Λοκροὶ Ἐπιζεφύριοι: Motta di Burzano), one of the most ancient Greek cities in Lower Italy, was situated in the S. E. of Bruttium, N. of the promontory of Zephyrium, from which it was said to have derived its surname Epizephyrii, though others suppose this name given to the place, simply because it lay to the W. of Greece. It was founded by the Locrians from Greece, B.C. 683. Strabo expressly says that it was founded by the Ozolae, and not by the Opuntii, as most writers related ; but his statement is not so probable as the common one. The inhabitants regarded themselves as descendants of Ajax Oileus ; and as he resided at the town of Naryx among the Opuntii, the poets gave the name of Narycia to Locris (Ov. Met. xv. 705), and called the founders of the town the Narycii Locri (Virg. Aen. iii. 399). For the same reason the pitch of Bruttium is frequently called Narycia (Virg. Georg. ii. 438). Locri was celebrated for the excellence of its laws, which were drawn up by Zaleucus soon after the foundation of the city. [ZALEUCUS.] The town enjoyed great prosperity down to the time of the younger Dionysius, who resided here for some years after his expulsion from Syracuse, and committed the greatest atrocities against the inhabitants. It suffered much in the wars against Pyrrhus, and in the 2nd Punic war. The Romans allowed it to retain its freedom and its own constitution, which was democratical ; but it gradually sunk in importance, and is rarely mentioned in later times. Near the town was an ancient and wealthy temple of Proserpina.

Lōcusta, or, more correctly, Lucusta, a woman celebrated for her skill in concocting poisons. She was employed by Agrippina in poisoning the emperor Claudius, and by Nero for despatching Britannicus. She was rewarded by Nero with ample estates ; but under the emperor Galba she was executed with other malefactors of Nero's reign.

Lollĭa Paulīna, granddaughter of M. Lollius, mentioned below, and heiress of his immense wealth. She was married to C. Memmius Regulus ; but on the report of her grandmother's beauty, the emperor Caligula sent for her, divorced her from her husband, and married her, but soon divorced her again. After Claudius had put to death his wife Messalina, Lollia was one of the candidates for the vacancy, but she was put to death by means of Agrippina.

Lolliānus (Λολλιανός), a celebrated Greek sophist in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, was a native of Ephesus, and taught at Athens.

Lollĭus. 1. M. Lollĭus Palicānus, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 71, and an active opponent of the aristocracy. — 2. M. Lollius, consul 21, and governor of Gaul in 16. He was defeated by some German tribes who had crossed the Rhine. Lollius was subsequently appointed by Augustus as tutor to his grandson, C. Caesar, whom he accompanied to the East, B.C. 2. Here he incurred the displeasure of C. Caesar, and is said in consequence to have put an end to his life by poison. Horace addressed an Ode (iv. 9) to Lollius, and 2 Epistles (i. 2, 18) to the eldest son of Lollius.

Londinĭum, also called Oppidum Londiniense Lundinium or Londinum (London), the capital of the Cantii in Britain, was situated on the S. bank of the Thames in the modern Southwark, though it afterwards spread over the other side of the river. It is not mentioned by Caesar, probably because his line of march led him in a different direction ; and its name first occurs in the reign of Nero, when it is spoken of as a flourishing and populous town, much frequented by merchants, although neither a Roman colony nor a municipium. On the revolt of the Britons under Boadicea, A.D. 62, the Roman governor Suetonius Paulinus abandoned Londinium to the enemy, who massacred the inhabitants and plundered the town. From the effects of this devastation it gradually recovered, and it appears again as an important place in the reign of Antoninus Pius. It was surrounded with a wall and ditch by Constantine the Great or Theodosius, the Roman governor of Britain ; and about this time it was distinguished by the surname of Augusta, whence some writers have conjectured that it was then made a colony. Londinium had now extended so much on the N. bank of the Thames, that it was called at this period a town of the Trinobantes, from which we may infer that the new quarter was both larger and more populous than the old part on the S. side of the river. The wall built by Constantine or Theodosius was on the N. side of the river, and is conjectured to have commenced at a fort near the present site of the tower, and to have been continued along the Minories, to Cripplegate, Newgate and Ludgate. London was the central point, from which all the Roman roads in Britain diverged. It possessed a Milliarium Aureum, from which the miles on the roads were numbered ; and a fragment of this Milliarium, the celebrated London Stone, may be seen affixed to the wall of St. Swithin's Church in Cannon Street. This is almost the only monument of the Roman Londinium still extant, with the exception of coins, tesselated pavements, and the like, which have been found buried under the ground.

Longănus (St. Lucia), a river in the N.E. of Sicily between Mylae and Tyndaris, on the banks of which Hieron gained a victory over the Mamertines.

Longīnus, a distinguished Greek philosopher and grammarian of the 3rd century of our era. His original name seems to have been Dionysius ; but he also bore the name of Dionysius Longinus, Cassius Longinus, or Dionysius Cassius Longinus, probably because either he or one of his ancestors had received the Roman franchise through the influence of some Cassius Longinus. The place of his birth is uncertain ; he was brought up with care by his uncle Fronto, who taught rhetoric at Athens, whence it has been conjectured that he was a native of that city. He afterwards visited many countries, and became acquainted with all the illustrious philosophers of his age, such as Ammonius Saccas, Origen the disciple of Ammonius, not to be confounded with the Christian writer, Plotinus, and Amelius. He was a pupil of the 2 former, and was an adherent of the Platonic philosophy ; but instead of following blindly the system of Ammonius, he went to the fountain-head, and made himself thoroughly familiar with the works of Plato. On his return to Athens he opened a school, which was attended by numerous pupils, among whom the most celebrated was Porphyry. He seems to have taught philosophy and criticism, as well as rhetoric and grammar ; and the extent of his information was so great, that he was called "a living library" and "a walking museum." After spending a considerable part of his life at Athens he went to the East, where he became acquainted with Zenobia, of Palmyra, who made him her teacher of Greek literature. On the death of her husband Odenathus Longinus became her principal adviser. It was mainly through his advice that she threw off her allegiance to the Roman empire. On her capture by Aurelian in 273, Longinus was put to death by the emperor. Longinus was unquestionably the greatest philosopher of his age. He was a man of excellent sense, sound judgment, and extensive knowledge. His work on the Sublime (Περὶ ὕψους), a great part of which is still extant, surpasses in oratorical power every thing written after the time of the Greek orators. There is scarcely any work in the range of ancient literature which, independent of its excellence of style, contains so many exquisite remarks upon oratory, poetry, and good taste in general. The best edition of this work is by Weiske, Lips. 1809, 8vo., reprinted in London, 1820. Longinus wrote many other works, both rhetorical and philosophical, all of which have perished.

Longīnus, Cassĭus. [Cassius.]

Longobardi. [Langobardi.]

Longŭla (Longulānus: Buon Riposo), a town of the Volsci in Latium, not far from Corioli, and belonging to the territory of Antium, but destroyed by the Romans at an early period.

Longus (Λόγγος), a Greek sophist, of uncertain date, but not earlier than the 4th or 5th century of our era, is the author of an erotic work, entitled Ποιμενικῶν τῶν κατὰ Δάφνιν καὶ Χλόην, or Pastoralia de Daphnide et Chloe, written in pleasing and elegant prose. The best editions are by Villoison, Paris, 1778; Schaefer, Lips. 1803; and Passow, Lips. 1811.

Lŏpădūsa (Λοπαδοῦσα: Lampedusa), an island in the Mediterranean, between Melita (Malta) and the coast of Byzacium in Africa.

Lorĭum or Lorii, a small place in Etruria with an imperial villa, 12 miles N. W. of Rome on the Via Aurelia, where Antoninus Pius was brought up, and where he died.

Lōrȳma (τὰ Λώρυμα: Aplotheki, Ru.), a city on the S. coast of Caria, close to the promontory of Cynossema (C. Aloupo), opposite to Ialysus in Rhodes, the space between the two being about the shortest distance between Rhodes and the coast of Caria.

Lōtis, a nymph, who, to escape the embraces of Priapus, was metamorphosed into a tree, called after her Lotus. (Ov. Met. ix. 347.)

Lōtŏphăgi (Λωτοφάγοι, i. e. lotus-eaters). Homer, in the Odyssey, represents Ulysses as coming in his wanderings to a coast inhabited by a people who fed upon a fruit called lotus, the taste of which was so delicious that every one who eat it lost all wish to return to his native country, but desired to remain there with the Lotophagi, and to eat the lotus (Od. ix. 94). Afterwards, in historical times, the Greeks found that the people on the N. coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, and especially about the Lesser Syrtis, used to a great extent, as an article of food, the fruit of a plant, which they identified with the lotus of Homer, and they called these people Lotophagi. To this day, the inhabitants of the same part of the coast of Tunis and Tripoli eat the fruit of the plant which is supposed to be the lotus of the ancients, and drink a wine made from its juice, as the ancient Lotophagi are also said to have done. This plant, the Zizyphus Lotus of the botanists (or jujube-tree), is a prickly branching shrub, with fruit of the size of a wild-plum, of a saffron colour and a sweetish taste. The ancient geographers also place the Lotophagi in the large island of Meninx or Lotophagitis (Jerbah), adjacent to this coast. They carried on a commercial intercourse with Egypt and with the interior of Africa, by the very same caravan routes which are used to the present day.

Loxĭas (Λοξίας), a surname of Apollo, derived by some from his intricate and ambiguous oracles (λόξα), but better from λέγειν, as the prophet or interpreter of Zeus.

Loxo (Λοξώ), daughter of Boreas, one of the Hyperborean maidens, who brought the worship of Artemis to Delos, whence the name is also used as a surname of Artemis herself.

Lua, also called Lua mater or Lua Saturni, one of the early Italian divinities, whose worship was forgotten in later times. It may be that she was the same as Ops, the wife of Saturn; but all we know of her is, that sometimes the arms taken from a defeated enemy were dedicated to her, and burnt as a sacrifice, with a view of averting calamity.

Luca (Lucensis: Lucca), a Ligurian city in Upper Italy, at the foot of the Apennines and on the river Ausus, N. E. of Pisae. It was included in Etruria by Augustus; but in the time of Julius Caesar it was the most S.-ly city in Liguria, and belonged to Cisalpine Gaul. It was made a Roman colony, B.C. 177. The amphitheatre of Lucca may still be seen at the modern town in a state of tolerable preservation, and its great size proves the importance and populousness of the ancient city.

Lucānĭa (Lucānus), a district in Lower Italy, was bounded on the N. by Campania and Samnium, on the E. by Apulia and the gulf of Tarentum, on the S. by Bruttium, and on the W. by the Tyrrhene sea, thus corresponding for the most part to the modern provinces of Principato, Citeriore and Basilicata, in the kingdom of Naples. It was separated from Campania by the river Silarus, and from Bruttium by the river Laus, and it extended along the gulf of Tarentum from Thurii to Metapontum. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through the greater part of it; but towards the gulf of Tarentum there is an extensive and fertile plain. Lucania was celebrated for its excellent pastures (Hor. Ep. i. 28); and its oxen were the finest and largest in Italy. Hence, the elephant was at first called by the Romans a Lucanian ox (Lucas bos). The swine also were very good; and a peculiar kind of sausages was celebrated at Rome under the name of Lucanica. The coast of Lucania was inhabited chiefly by Greeks, whose cities were numerous and flourishing. The most important were Metapontum, Heraclea, Thurii, Buxentum, Elea or Velia, Posidonia or Paestum. The interior of the country was originally inhabited by the Chones and Oenotrians. The Lucanians proper were Samnites, a brave and warlike race, who left their mother-country and settled both in Lucania and Bruttium. They not only expelled or subdued the Oenotrians, but they gradually acquired possession of most of the Greek cities on the coast. They are first mentioned in B.C. 396 as the allies of the elder Dionysius in his war against Thurii. They were subdued by the Romans after Pyrrhus had left Italy. Before the 2nd Punic war their forces consisted of 30,000 foot and 3000 horse; but in the course of this war their country was repeatedly laid waste, and never recovered its former prosperity.

Lucānus, M. Annaeus, usually called Lucan, a Roman poet, was born at Corduba in Spain, A.D. 39. His father was L. Annaeus Mella, a brother of M. Seneca, the philosopher. Lucan was carried to Rome at an early age, where his education was superintended by the most eminent preceptors of the day. His talents developed themselves at a very early age, and excited such general admiration as to awaken the jealousy of Nero, who, unable to brook competition, forbade him to recite in public. Stung to the quick by this prohibition Lucan embarked in the famous conspiracy of Piso, was betrayed, and, by a promise of pardon, was induced to turn informer. He began by denouncing his own mother Acilia (or Atilia), and then revealed the rest of his accomplices without reserve. But he received a traitor's reward. After the more important victims had been despatched, the emperor issued the mandate for the death of Lucan who, finding escape hopeless, caused his veins to be opened. When, from the rapid effusion of blood, he felt his extremities becoming chill, he began to repeat aloud some verses which he had once composed, descriptive of a wounded soldier perishing by a like death, and, with these lines upon his lips, expired A. D. 65, in the 26th year of his age. Lucan wrote various poems, the titles of which are preserved, but the only extant production is an heroic poem, in 10 books, entitled Pharsalia, in which the progress of the struggle between Caesar and Pompey is fully detailed, the events, commencing with the passage of the Rubicon, being arranged in regular chronological order. The 10th book is imperfect, and the narrative breaks off abruptly in the middle of the Alexandrian war, but we know not whether the conclusion has been lost, or whether the author ever completed his task. The whole of what we now possess was certainly not composed at the same time, for the different parts do not by any means breathe the same spirit. In the earlier portions we find liberal sentiments expressed in very moderate terms, accompanied by open and almost fulsome flattery of Nero; but, as we proceed, the blessings of freedom are loudly proclaimed, and the invectives against tyranny are couched in language the most offensive, evidently aimed directly at the emperor. The work contains great beauties and great defects. It is characterised by copious diction, lively imagination, and a bold and masculine tone of thought; but it is at the same time disfigured by extravagance, far-fetched conceits, and unnatural similes. The best editions are by Oudendorp, Lug. Bat. 1728; by Burmann, 1740; and by Weber, Lips. 1821—1831.

Lucānus, Ocellus. [OCELLUS.]

Lucceius. 1. L., an old friend and neighbour of Cicero. His name frequently occurs at the commencement of Cicero's correspondence with Atticus, with whom Lucceius had quarrelled. Cicero attempted to reconcile his two friends. In B. C. 63 Lucceius accused Catiline; and in 60 he became a candidate for the consulship, along with Julius Caesar, who agreed to support him; but he lost his election in consequence of the aristocracy bringing in Bibulus, as a counterpoise to Caesar's influence. Lucceius seems now to have withdrawn from public life and to have devoted himself to literature. He was chiefly engaged in the composition of a contemporaneous history of Rome, commencing with the Social or Marsic war. In 55 he had nearly finished the history of the Social and of the first Civil war, when Cicero wrote a most urgent letter to his friend, pressing him to suspend the thread of his history, and to devote a separate work to the period from Catiline's conspiracy to Cicero's recall from banishment (ad Fam. v. 12). Lucceius promised compliance with his request, but he appears never to have written the work. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he espoused the side of Pompey. He was subsequently pardoned by Caesar and returned to Rome, where he continued to live on friendly terms with Cicero. — 2. C., surnamed Hirrus, of the Pupinian tribe, tribune of the plebs 53, proposed that Pompey should be created dictator. In 52 he was a candidate with Cicero for the augurship, and in the following year a candidate with M. Caelius for the aedileship, but he failed in both. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined Pompey. He was sent by Pompey as ambassador to Orodes, king of Parthia, but he was thrown into prison by the Parthian king. He was pardoned by Caesar after the battle of Pharsalia, and returned to Rome.

Lucenses Callaici, one of the 2 chief tribes of the Callaici or Gallaeci on the N. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, derived their name from their town Lucus Augusti.

Lucentum (Alicante), a town of the Contestani, on the coast of Hispania Tarraconensis.

Lucĕrĭa (Lucerīnus: Lucera), sometimes called Nucĕrĭa, a town in Apulia on the borders of Samnium, S. W. of Arpi, was situated on a steep hill, and possessed an ancient temple of Minerva. In the war between Rome and Samnium, it was first taken by the Samnites (B. C. 321), and next by the Romans (319); but having revolted to the Samnites in 314, all the inhabitants were massacred by the Romans, and their place supplied by 2500 Roman colonists. Having thus become a Roman colony, it continued faithful to Rome in the 2nd Punic war. In the time of Augustus it had greatly declined in prosperity; but it was still of sufficient importance in the 3rd century to be the residence of the praetor of Apulia.

Lucianus (Λουκιανός), usually called Lucian, a Greek writer, born at Samosata, the capital of Commagene, in Syria. The date of his birth and death is uncertain; but it has been conjectured, with much probability, that he was born about A. D. 120, and he probably lived till towards the end of this century. We know that some of his more celebrated works were written in the reign of M. Aurelius. Lucian's parents were poor, and he was at first apprenticed to his maternal uncle, who was a statuary. He afterwards became an advocate, and practised at Antioch. Being unsuccessful in this calling, he employed himself in writing speeches for others, instead of delivering them himself. But he did not remain long at Antioch; and at an early period of his life he set out upon his travels, and visited the greater part of Greece, Italy, and Gaul. At that period it was customary for professors of the rhetorical art to proceed to different cities, where they attracted audiences by their displays, much in the same manner as musicians or itinerant lecturers in modern times. He appears to have acquired a good deal of money as well as fame. On his return to his native country, probably about his 40th year, he abandoned the rhetorical profession, the artifices of which, he tells us, were foreign to his temper, the natural enemy of deceit and pretension. He now devoted most of his time to the composition of his works. He still, however, occasionally travelled; for it appears that he was in Achaia and Ionia about the close of the Parthian war, 160—165; on which occasion, too, he seems to have visited Olympia, and beheld the self-immolation of Peregrinus. About the year 170, or a little previously, he visited the false oracle of the impostor Alexander, in Paphlagonia. Late in life he obtained the office of procurator of part of Egypt, which office was probably bestowed upon him by the emperor Commodus. The nature of Lucian's writings inevitably procured him many enemies, by whom he has been painted in very black colours. According to Suidas he was surnamed the Blasphemer, and was torn to pieces by dogs, as a punishment for his impiety; but on this account no reliance can be placed. Other writers state that Lucian apostatised from Christianity; but there is no proof in support of this charge; and the dialogue entitled Philopatris, which would appear to prove that the author had once been a Christian, was certainly not written by Lucian, and was probably composed in the reign of Julian the Apostate. — As many as 82 works have come down to us under the name of Lucian; but some of these are spurious. The most important of them are his Dialogues. They are of very various degrees of merit, and are treated in the greatest possible variety of style, from seriousness down to the broadest humour and buffoonery. Their subjects and tendency, too, vary considerably; for while some are employed in attacking the heathen philosophy and religion, others are mere pictures of manners without any polemic drift. Our limits only allow us to mention a few of the more important of these Dialogues: — The Dialogues of the Gods, 26 in number, consist of short dramatic narratives of some of the most popular incidents in the heathen mythology. The reader, however, is generally left to draw his own conclusions from the story, the author only taking care to put it in the most absurd point of view. — In the Jupiter Convicted a bolder style of attack is adopted; and the cynic proves to Jupiter's face, that every thing being under the dominion of fate, he has no power whatever. As this dialogue shows Jupiter's want of power, so the Jupiter the Tragedian strikes at his very existence, and that of the other deities. — The Vitarum Auctio, or Sale of the Philosophers, is an attack upon the ancient philosophers. In this humourous piece the heads of the different sects are put up to sale, Hermes being the auctioneer. — The Fisherman is a sort of apology for the preceding piece, and may be reckoned among Lucian's best dialogues. The philosophers are represented as having obtained a day's life for the purpose of taking vengeance upon Lucian, who confesses that he has borrowed the chief beauties of his writings from them. — The Banquet, or the Lapithae, is one of Lucian's most humourous attacks on the philosophers. The scene is a wedding feast, at which a representative of each of the principal philosophic sects is present. A discussion ensues, which sets all the philosophers by the ears, and ends in a pitched battle. — The Nigrinus is also an attack on philosophic pride; but its main scope is to satirise the Romans, whose pomp, vain-glory, and luxury, are unfavourably contrasted with the simple habits of the Athenians. — The more miscellaneous class of Lucian's dialogues, in which the attacks upon mythology and philosophy are not direct but incidental, or which are mere pictures of manners, contains some of his best. At the head must be placed Timon, which may perhaps be regarded as Lucian's masterpiece. — The Dialogues of the Dead are perhaps the best known of all Lucian's works. The subject affords great scope for moral reflection, and for satire on the vanity of human pursuits. Wealth, power, beauty, strength, not forgetting the vain disputations of philosophy, afford the materials. Among the moderns these dialogues have been imitated by Fontenelle and Lord Lyttelton. — The Icaro-Menippus is in Lucian's best vein, and a master-piece of Aristophanic humour. Menippus, disgusted with the disputes and pretensions of the philosophers, resolves on a visit to the stars, for the purpose of seeing how far their theories are correct. By the mechanical aid of a pair of wings he reaches the moon, and surveys thence the miserable passions and quarrels of men. Hence he proceeds to Olympus, and is introduced to the Thunderer himself. Here he is witness of the manner in which human prayers are received in heaven. They ascend by enormous ventholes, and become audible when Jupiter removes the covers. Jupiter himself is represented as a partial judge, and as influenced by the largeness of the rewards promised to him. At the end he pronounces judgment against the philosophers, and threatens in 4 days to destroy them all. — Charon is a very elegant dialogue, but of a graver turn than the preceding. Charon visits the earth to see the course of life there, and what it is that always makes men weep when they enter his boat. Mercury acts as his Cicerone. — Lucian's merits as a writer consist in his knowledge of human nature; his strong common sense; the fertility of his invention; the raciness of his humour; and the simplicity and Attic grace of his diction. There was abundance to justify his attacks, in the systems against which they were directed. Yet he establishes nothing in their stead. His aim is only to pull down; to spread a universal scepticism. Nor were his assaults confined to religion and philosophy, but extended to every thing old and venerated, the poems of Homer and Hesiod, and the history of Herodotus. — The best editions of Lucian are by Hemsterhuis and Reitz, Amst. 1743, 4 vols. 4to.; by Lehman, Lips. 1821—1831, 9 vols. 8vo.; and by Dindorf, with a Latin version, but without notes, Paris, 1840, 8vo.

Lūcĭfer or Phosphŏrus (Φωσφόρος, also by the poets Ἑωσφόρος or Φαεσφόρος), that is, the bringer of light, is the name of the planet Venus, when seen in the morning before sunrise. The same planet was called Hesperus, Vesperugo, Vesper, Noctifer, or Nocturnus, when it appeared in the heavens after sunset. Lucifer as a personification is called a son of Astraeus and Aurora or Eos, of Cephalus and Aurora, or of Atlas. By Philonis he is said to have been the father of Ceyx. He is also called the father of Daedalion and of the Hesperides Lucifer is also a surname of several goddesses of light, as Artemis, Aurora, and Hecate.

Lūcīlĭus. 1. C., was born at Suessa of the Aurunci, B. C. 148. He served in the cavalry under Scipio in the Numantine war; lived upon terms of the closest familiarity with Scipio and Laelius; and was either the maternal grand-uncle, or, which is less probable, the maternal grandfather of Pompey the Great. He died at Naples, 103, in the 46th year of his age. Ancient critics agree that, if not absolutely the inventor of Roman satire, he was the first to mould it into that form which afterwards received full developement in the hands of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal. The first of these 3 great masters, while he censures the harsh versification and the slovenly haste with which Lucilius threw off his compositions, acknowledges with admiration the fierceness and boldness of his attacks upon the vices and follies of his contemporaries. The Satires of Lucilius were divided into 30 books. Upwards of 800 fragments from these have been preserved, but the greatest number consist of isolated couplets, or single lines. It is clear from these fragments that his reputation for caustic pleasantry was by no means unmerited, and that in coarseness and broad personalities he in no respect fell short of the licence of the old comedy, which would seem to have been, to a certain extent, his model. The fragments were published separately, by Franciscus Dousa, Lug. Bat. 4to. 1597, reprinted by the brothers Volpi, 8vo. Patav. 1735; and, along with Censorinus, by the two sons of Havercamp, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1743. — 2. Lucilius Junior, probably the author of an extant poem in 640 hexameters, entitled Aetna, which exhibits throughout great command of language, and contains not a few brilliant passages. Its object is to explain upon philosophical principles, after the fashion of Lucretius, the causes of the various physical phenomena presented by the volcano. Lucilius Junior was the procurator of Sicily, and the friend to whom Seneca addresses his Epistles, his Natural Questions, and his tract on Providence, and whom he strongly urges to select this very subject of Aetna as a theme for his muse.

Lūcilla, Annĭa, daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born about A. D. 147. She was married to the emperor, L. Verus, and after his death (169) to Claudius Pompeianus. In 183 she engaged in a plot against the life of her brother Commodus, which, having been detected, she was banished to the island of Capreae, and there put to death.

Lūcīna, the goddess of light, or rather the goddess that brings to light, and hence the goddess that presides over the birth of children. It was therefore used as a surname of Juno and Diana. Lucina corresponded to the Greek goddess ILITHYIA.

Lucrētĭa, the wife of L. Tarquinius Collatinus, whose rape by Sex. Tarquinius led to the dethronement of Tarquinius Superbus and the establishment of the republic. For details see TARQUINIUS.

Lucrētĭa Gens, originally patrician, but subsequently plebeian also. The surname of the patrician Lucretii was Triciptinus, one of whom, Sp. Lucretius Triciptinus, the father of Lucretia, was elected consul, with L. Junius Brutus, on the establishment of the republic, B. C. 509. The plebeian families are known by the surnames of Gallus, Ofella, and Vespillo, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require notice.

Lucrētĭlis, a pleasant mountain in the country of the Sabines, overhanging Horace's villa, a part of the modern Monte Gennaro.

T. Lucrētĭus Carus, the Roman poet, respecting whose personal history, our information is both scanty and suspicious. The Eusebian Chronicle fixes B. C. 95 as the date of his birth, adding that he was driven mad by a love potion, that during his lucid intervals he composed several works which were revised by Cicero, and that he perished by his own hand in his 44th year, B. C. 52 or 51. Another ancient authority places his death in 55. From what source the tale about the philtre may have been derived we know not; but it is not improbable that the whole story was an invention of some enemy of the Epicureans. Not a hint is to be found anywhere which corroborates the assertion with regard to the editorial labours of Cicero. — The work, which has immortalised the name of Lucretius, is a philosophical didactic poem, composed in heroic hexameters, divided into 6 books, containing upwards of 7400 lines, addressed to C. Memmius Gemellus, who was praetor in 58, and is entitled De Rerum Natura. It was probably published about 57 or 56; for, from the way in which Cicero speaks of it in a letter to his brother, written in 55, we may conclude that it had only recently appeared. The poem has been sometimes represented as a complete exposition of the religious, moral, and physical doctrines of Epicurus, but this is far from being a correct description. Epicurus maintained that the unhappiness and degradation of mankind arose in a great degree from the slavish dread which they entertained of the power of the gods, and from terror of their wrath; and the fundamental doctrine of his system was, that the gods, whose existence he did not deny, lived in the enjoyment of absolute peace, and totally indifferent to the world and its inhabitants. To prove this position Epicurus adopted the atomic theory of Leucippus, according to which the material universe was not created by the Supreme Being, but was formed by the union of elemental particles which had existed from all eternity, governed by certain simple laws. He further sought to show that all those striking phaenomena which had been regarded by the vulgar as direct manifestations of divine power, were the natural results of ordinary processes. To state clearly and develope fully the leading principle of this philosophy, in such a form as might render the study attractive to his countrymen, was the object of Lucretius, his work being simply an attempt to show that there is nothing in the history or actual condition of the world which does not admit of explanation without having recourse to the active interposition of divine beings. The poem of Lucretius has been admitted by all modern critics to be the greatest of didatic poems. The most abstruse speculations are clearly explained in majestic verse; while the subject, which in itself was dry and dull, is enlivened by digressions of matchless power and beauty.—The best editions are by Wakefield, London, 1796, 3 vols. 4to., reprinted at Glasgow, 1813, 4 vols. 8vo.; and by Forbiger, Lips. 1828, 12mo.

Lucrīnus Lacus, was properly the inner part of the Sinus Cumanus or Puteolanus, a bay on the coast of Campania, between the promontory Misenum and Puteoli, running a considerable way inland. But at a very early period the Lucrine lake was separated from the remainder of the bay by a dike 8 stadia in length, which was probably formed originally by some volcanic change, and was subsequently rendered more complete by the work of man. Being thus separated from the rest of the sea, it assumed the character of an inland lake, and is therefore called Lacus by the Romans. Its waters still remained salt, and were celebrated for their oyster beds. Behind the Lucrine lake was another lake called LACUS AVERNUS. In the time of Augustus, Agrippa made a communication between the lake Avernus and the Lucrine lake, and also between the Lucrine lake and the Sinus Cumanus, thus forming out of the 3 the celebrated Julian Harbour. The Lucrine lake was filled up by a volcanic eruption in 1538, when a conical mountain rose in its place, called Monte Nuovo. The Avernus has thus become again a separate lake, and no trace of the dike is to be seen in the Gulf of Pozzuoli.

Lūcullus, Licinius, a celebrated plebeian family. 1. L., the grandfather of the conqueror of Mithridates, was consul B. C. 151, together with A. Postumius Albinus, and carried on war in Spain against the Vaccaei. — 2. L., son of the preceding, was praetor 103, and carried on war unsuccessfully against the slaves in Sicily. On his return to Rome he was accused, condemned, and driven into exile. — 3. L., son of the preceding, and celebrated as the conqueror of Mithridates. He was probably born about 110. He served with distinction in the Marsic or Social war, and accompanied Sulla as his quaestor into Greece and Asia, 88. When Sulla returned to Italy after the conclusion of peace with Mithridates in 84, Lucullus was left behind in Asia, where he remained till 80. In 79 he was curule aedile with his younger brother Marcus. So great was the favour at this time enjoyed by Lucullus with Sulla, that the dictator, on his death-bed, not only confided to him the charge of revising and correcting his Commentaries, but appointed him guardian of his son Faustus, to the exclusion of Pompey; a circumstance which is said to have first given rise to the enmity and jealousy that ever after subsisted between the two. In 77 Lucullus was praetor, and at the expiration of this magistracy obtained the government of Africa, where he distinguished himself by the justice of his administration. In 74 he was consul with M. Aurelius Cotta. In this year the war with Mithridates was renewed, and Lucullus received the conduct of it. He carried on this war for 8 years with great success. The details are given under MITHRIDATES, and it is only necessary to mention here the leading outlines. Lucullus defeated Mithridates with great slaughter, and drove him out of his hereditary dominions, and compelled him to take refuge in Armenia with his son-in-law Tigranes (71). He afterwards invaded Armenia, defeated Tigranes, and took his capital Tigranocerta (69). In the next campaign (68) he again defeated the combined forces of Mithridates, and laid siege to Nisibis; but in the spring of the following year (67), a mutiny among his troops compelled him to raise the siege of Nisibis, and return to Pontus. Mithridates had already taken advantage of his absence to invade Pontus, and had defeated his lieutenants Fabius and Triarius in several successive actions. But Lucullus on his arrival was unable to effect any thing against Mithridates, in consequence of the mutinous disposition of his troops. The adversaries of Lucullus availed themselves of so favourable an occasion, and a decree was passed to transfer to Acilius Glabrio, one of the consuls for the year, the province of Bithynia and the command against Mithridates. But Glabrio was wholly incompetent for the task assigned him: on arriving in Bithynia, he made no attempt to assume the command, but remained quiet within the confines of the Roman province. Mithridates meanwhile ably availed himself of this position of affairs, and Lucullus had the mortification of seeing Pontus and Cappadocia occupied by the enemy before his eyes, without being able to stir a step in their defence. But it was still more galling to his feelings when, in 66, he was called upon to resign the command to his old rival Pompey, who had been appointed by the Manilian law to supersede both him and Glabrio. Lucullus did not obtain his triumph till 63, in consequence of the opposition of his enemies. He was much courted by the aristocratical party, who sought in Lucullus a rival and antagonist to Pompey; but, instead of putting himself prominently forward as the leader of a party, he soon began to withdraw gradually from public affairs, and devote himself more and more to a life of indolence and luxury. He died in 57 or 56. Previous to his death he had fallen into a state of complete dotage, so that the management of his affairs was confided to his brother Marcus. The name of Lucullus is almost as celebrated for the luxury of his latter years as for his victories over Mithridates. He amassed vast treasures in Asia; and these supplied him the means, after his return to Rome, of gratifying his natural taste for luxury, together with an ostentatious display of magnificence. His gardens in the immediate suburbs of the city were laid out in a style of extraordinary splendour; but still more remarkable were his villas at Tusculum, and in the neighbourhood of Neapolis. In the construction of the latter, with its parks, fish-ponds, &c., he had laid out vast sums in cutting through hills and rocks, and throwing out advanced works into the sea. So gigantic indeed was the scale of these labours for objects apparently so insignificant, that Pompey called him, in derision, the Roman Xerxes. His feasts at Rome itself were celebrated on a scale of inordinate magnificence: a single supper in the hall, called that of Apollo, was said to cost the sum of 50,000 denarii. Even during his campaigns the pleasures of the table had not been forgotten; and it is well known that he was the first to introduce cherries into Italy, which he had brought with him from Cerasus in Pontus. Lucullus was an enlightened patron of literature, and had from his earliest years devoted much attention to literary pursuits. He collected a valuable library, which was opened to the free use of the literary public; and here he himself used to associate with the Greek philosophers and literati, and would enter warmly into their metaphysical and philosophical discussions. Hence the picture drawn by Cicero at the commencement of the Academics was probably to a certain extent taken from the reality. His constant companion from the time of his quaestorship had been Antiochus of Ascalon, from whom he imbibed the precepts of the Academic school of philosophy, to which he continued through life to be attached. His patronage of the poet Archias is well known. He composed a history of the Marsic war in Greek. — 4. L. or M., son of the preceding and of Servilia, half-sister of M. Cato, was a mere child at his father's death. His education was superintended by Cato and Cicero. After Caesar's death, he joined the republican party, and fell at the battle of Philippi, 42. — 5. M., brother of No. 3, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and consequently bore the names of M. TERENTIUS VARRO LUCULLUS. He fought under Sulla in Italy, 82; was curule aedile with his brother 79; praetor 77; and consul 73. After his consulship he obtained the province of Macedonia. He carried on war against the Dardanians and Bessi, and penetrated as far as the Danube. On his return to Rome he obtained a triumph, 71. He was a strong supporter of the aristocratical party. He pronounced the funeral oration of his brother, but died before the commencement of the civil war, 49.

Lugdunensis Gallia. [GALLIA.]

Lugdūnum (Lugdunensis). 1. (Lyon), the chief town of Gallia Lugdunensis, situated at the foot of a hill at the confluence of the Arar (Saône) and the Rhodanus (Rhone), is said to have been founded by some fugitives from the town of Vienna, further down the Rhone. In the year after Caesar's death (B.C. 43) Lugdunum was made a Roman colony by L. Munatius Plancus, and became under Augustus the capital of the province, and the residence of the Roman governor. Being situated on two navigable rivers, and being connected with the other parts of Gaul by roads, which met at this town as their central point, it soon became a wealthy and populous place, and is described by Strabo as the largest city in Gaul next to Narbo. It received many privileges from the emperor Claudius; but it was burnt down in the reign of Nero. It was, however, soon rebuilt, and continued to be a place of great importance till A.D. 197, when it was plundered and the greater part of it destroyed by the soldiers of Septimius Severus, after his victory over his rival Albinus in the neighbourhood of the town. From this blow it never recovered, and was more and more thrown into the shade by Vienna. Lugdunum possessed a vast aqueduct, of which the remains may still be traced for miles, a mint, and an imperial palace, in which Claudius was born, and in which many of the other Roman emperors resided. At the tongue of land between the Rhone and the Arar stood an altar dedicated to Augustus by the different states of Gaul; and here Caligula instituted contests in rhetoric, prizes being given to the victors, but the most ridiculous punishments inflicted on the vanquished. (Comp. Juv. i. 44.) Lugdunum is memorable in the history of the Christian church as the seat of the bishopric of Irenaeus, and on account of the persecutions which the Christians endured here in the 2nd and 3rd centuries. — 2. L. Batavōrum (Leyden), the chief town of the Batavi. [BATAVI.] — 3. Convenārum (St. Bertrand de Comminges), the chief town of the Convenae in Aquitania. [CONVENAE.]

Lūna. [SELENE.]

Lūna (Lunensis: Luni), an Etruscan town, situated on the left bank of the Macra, about 4 miles from the coast, originally formed part of Liguria, but became the most N.-ly city of Etruria, when Augustus extended the boundaries of the latter country as far as the Macra. The town itself was never a place of importance, but it possessed a large and commodious harbour at the mouth of the river, called Lunae Portus (Gulf of Spezzia). In B.C. 177 Luna was made a Roman colony, and 2000 Roman citizens were settled there. In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey it had sunk into utter decay, but was colonised a few years afterwards. Luna was celebrated for its white marble, which now takes its name from the neighbouring town of Carrara. The quarries, from which this marble was obtained, appear not to have been worked before the time of Julius Caesar; but it was extensively employed in the public buildings erected in the reign of Augustus. The wine and the cheeses of Luna also enjoyed a high reputation: some of these cheeses are said to have weighed 1000 pounds. The ruins of Luna are few and unimportant, consisting of the vestiges of an amphitheatre, fragments of columns, &c.

Lūnae Montes (τὸ τῆς Σελήνης ὄρος), a range of mountains, which some of the ancient geographers believed to exist in the interior of Africa, covered with perpetual snow, and containing the sources of the Nile. Their actual existence is neither proved nor disproved.

Lŭperca, or Lŭpa, an ancient Italian divinity, the wife of Lupercus, who, in the shape of a she-wolf, performed the office of nurse to Romulus and Remus. In some accounts she is identified with ACCA LAURENTIA, the wife of Faustulus.

Lŭpercus, an ancient Italian divinity, who was worshipped by shepherds as the protector of their flocks against wolves. On the N. side of the Palatine hill there had been in ancient times a cave, the sanctuary of Lupercus, surrounded by a grove, containing an altar of the god and his figure clad in a goat-skin, just as his priests, the Luperci. The Romans sometimes identified Lupercus with the Arcadian Pan. Respecting the festival celebrated in honour of Lupercus and his priests, the Luperci, see Dict. of Ant. art. Lupercalia and Luperci.

Lupia. [LUPPIA.]

Lupiae or Luppiae, a town in Calabria, between Brundusium and Hydruntum.

Lupodūnum (Ladenburg?), a town in Germany, on the river Nicer (Neckar).

Luppĭa or Lupĭa (Lippe), a navigable river in the N. W. of Germany, which falls into the Rhine at Wesel in Westphalia, and on which the Romans built a fortress of the same name. The river Eliso (Alme) was a tributary of the Luppia, and at the confluence of these 2 rivers was the fortress of Aliso.

Lŭpus, Rutilĭus. 1. P., consul, with L. Julius Caesar, in B.C. 90, was defeated by the Marsi, and slain in battle. — 2. P., tribune of the plebs, 56, and a warm partisan of the aristocracy. He was praetor in 49, and was stationed at Terracina with 3 cohorts. He afterwards crossed over to Greece. — 3. Probably a son of the preceding, the author of a rhetorical treatise in 2 books, entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, which appears to have been originally an abridgement of a work by Gorgias of Athens, one of the preceptors of young M. Cicero, but which has evidently undergone many changes. Its chief value is derived from the numerous translations which it contains, of striking passages from the works of Greek orators now lost. — Edited by Ruhnken along with Aquila and Julius Ruffinianus, Lug. Bat. 1768, reprinted by Frotscher, Lips. 1831.

Lurco, M. Aufidĭus, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 61, the author of a law on bribery (de Ambitu). He was the maternal grandfather of the empress Livia, wife of Augustus. He was the first person in Rome who fattened peacocks for sale, and he derived a large income from this source.

Luscīnus, Fabricĭus. [FABRICIUS.]

Lusitānĭa, Lusitāni. [HISPANIA.]

Lusōnes, a tribe of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the sources of the Tagus.

Lutātĭus Catŭlus. [CATULUS.]

Lutātĭus Cerco. [CERCO.]

Lutetĭa, or, more commonly, Lutetĭa Parisiōrum (Paris), the capital of the Parisii in Gallia Lugdunensis, was situated on an island in the Sequana (Seine), and was connected with the banks of the river by 2 wooden bridges. Under the emperors it became a place of importance, and the chief naval station on the Sequana. Here Julian was proclaimed emperor, A. D. 360.

Lycabettus (Λυκαβηττός: St. George), a mountain in Attica, belonging to the range of Pentelicus, close to the walls of Athens on the N. E. of the city, and on the left of the road leading to Marathon. It is commonly, but erroneously, supposed that the small hill N. of the Pnyx is Lycabettus, and that St. George is the ancient Anchesmus.

Lycaeus (Λυκαῖος), or Lyceus, a lofty mountain in Arcadia, N. W. of Megalopolis, from the summit of which a great part of the country could be seen. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Zeus, who was hence surnamed Lycaeus. Here was a temple of this god; and here also was celebrated the festival of the Lycaea (Dict. of Ant. s. v.). Pan was likewise called Lycaeus, because he was born and had a sanctuary on this mountain.

Lycambes. [ARCHILOCHUS.]

Lycāon (Λυκάων), king of Arcadia, son of Pelasgus by Meliboea or Cyllene. The traditions about Lycaon represent him in very different lights. Some describe him as the first civiliser of Arcadia, who built the town of Lycosura, and introduced the worship of Zeus Lycaeus. But he is more usually represented as an impious king, with a large number of sons as impious as himself. Zeus visited the earth in order to punish them. The god was recognised and worshipped by the Arcadian people. Lycaon resolved to murder him; and in order to try if he were really a god, served before him a dish of human flesh. Zeus pushed away the table which bore the horrible food, and the place where this happened was afterwards called Trapezus. Lycaon and all his sons, with the exception of the youngest (or eldest), Nyctimus, were killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, or according to others, were changed into wolves. — Callisto, the daughter of Lycaon, is said to have been changed into the constellation of the Bear, whence she is called by the poets Lycaonis Arctos, Lycaonia Arctos, or Lycaonia Virgo, or by her patronymic Lycaonis.

Lycaŏnia (Λυκαονία: Λυκάονες: part of Karaman), a district of Asia Minor, assigned, under the Persian Empire, to the satrapy of Cappadocia, but considered by the Greek and Roman geographers the S.E. part of Phrygia; bounded on the N. by Galatia, on the E. by Cappadocia, on the S. by Cilicia Aspera, on the S.W. by Isauria (which was sometimes reckoned as a part of it) and by Phrygia Paroreios, and on the N.W. by Great Phrygia. Its boundaries, however, varied much at different times. — It was a long narrow strip of country, its length extending in the direction of N.W. and S.E.; Xenophon, who first mentions it, describes its width as extending E. of Iconium (its chief city) to the borders of Cappadocia, a distance of 30 parasangs, about 110 miles, It forms a table land between the Taurus and the mountains of Phrygia, deficient in good water, but abounding in flocks of sheep. The people were, so far as can be traced, an aboriginal race, speaking a language which is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles as a distinct dialect: they were warlike, and especially skilled in archery. After the overthrow of Antiochus the Great by the Romans, Lycaonia, which had belonged successively to Persia and to Syria, was partly assigned to Eumenes, and partly governed by native chieftains, the last of whom, Antipater, a contempory of Cicero, was conquered by Amyntas, king of Galatia, at whose death in B. C. 25 it passed, with Galatia, to the Romans, and was finally united to the province of Cappadocia. Lycaonia was the chief scene of the labours of the Apostle Paul on his first mission to the Gentiles. (Acts, xiv.)

Lycēum (τὸ Λύκειον), the name of one of the 3 ancient gymnasia at Athens, called after the temple of Apollo Lyceus, in its neighbourhood. It was situated S. E. of the city, outside the walls, and just above the river Ilissus. Here the Polemarch administered justice. It is celebrated as the place where Aristotle and the Peripatetics taught.

Lycēus (Λύκειος), a surname of Apollo, the meaning of which is not quite certain. Some derive it from λύκος, a wolf, so that it would mean "the wolf-slayer;" others from λύκη, light, according to which it would mean "the giver of light;" and others again from the country of Lycia.

Lychnītis. [LYCHNIDUS.]

Lychnĭdus, more rarely Lychnĭdĭum or Lychnis (Λύχνιδος, Λυχνίδιον, Λυχνίς: Λυχνίδιος; Achrita, Ochrida), a town of Illyricum, was the ancient capital of the Dessaretii, but was in the possession of the Romans as early as their war with king Gentius. It was situated in the interior of the country, on a height on the N. bank of the lake Lychnītis (Λυχνῖτις, or ἡ Λυχνιδία λίμνη), from which the river Drilo rises. The town was strongly fortified, and contained many springs within its walls. In the middle ages it was the residence of the Bulgarian kings, and was called Achris or Achrita, whence its modern name.

Lycĭa (Λυκία: Λύκιος, Lycius: Meis), a small, but most interesting, district on the S. side of Asia Minor, jutting out into the Mediterranean in a form approaching to a rough semicircle, adjacent to parts of Caria and Pamphylia on the W. and E., and on the N. to the district of Cibyratis in Phrygia, to which, under the Byzantine emperors, it was considered to belong. It was bounded on the N.W. by the little river Glaucus and the gulf of the same name, on the N.E. by the mountain called CLIMAX (the N. part of the same range as that called Solyma), and on the N. its natural boundary was the Taurus, but its limits in this direction were not strictly defined. The N. parts of Lycia and the district of Cibyratis form together a high table land, which is supported on the N. by the Taurus; on the E. by the mountains called Solyma (Taktalu-Dagh), which run from N. to S. along the E. coast of Lycia, far out into the sea, forming the S.E. promontory of Lycia, called Sacrum Pr. (C. Khelidonia); the summit of this range is 7800 feet high, and is covered with snow *: the S.W. and S. sides of this table land are formed by the range called Massicytus (Aktar Dagh), which runs S.E. from the E. side of the upper course of the river Xanthus: its summits are about 4000 feet high; and its S. side descends towards the sea in a succession of terraces, terminated by bold cliffs. The mountain system of Lycia is completed by the Cragus, which fills up the space between the W. side of the Xanthus and the Gulf of Glaucus, and forms the S.W. promontory of Lycia: its summits are nearly 6000 feet high. The chief rivers are the Xanthus (Echen-Chai), which has its sources in the table-land S. of the Taurus, and flows from N. to S. between the Cragus and Massicytus, and the Limyrus, which flows from N. to S. between the Massicytus and the Solyma mountains. The vallies of these and the smaller rivers, and the terraces above the sea in the S. of the country were fertile in corn, wine, oil, and fruits, and the mountain slopes were clothed with splendid cedars, firs, and plane-trees: saffron also was one chief product of the land. The total length of the coast, from Telmissus on the W. to Phaselis on the E., including all windings, is estimated by Strabo at 1720 stadia (172 geog. miles), while a straight line drawn across the country, as the chord of this arc, is about 80 geog. miles in length. The general geographical structure of the peninsula of Lycia, as connected with the rest of Asia Minor, bears no little resemblance to that of the peninsula of Asia Minor itself, as connected with the rest of Asia. According to the tradition preserved by Herodotus, the most ancient name of the country was Milyas (ἡ Μιλυάς), and the earliest inhabitants (probably of the Syro-Arabian race) were called Milyae, and afterwards Solymi: subsequently the Termilae, from Crete, settled in the country: and lastly, the Athenian Lycus, the son of Pandion, fled from his brother Aegeus to Lycia, and gave his name to the country. Homer, who gives Lycia a prominent place in the Iliad, represents its chieftains, Glaucus and Sarpedon, as descended from the royal family of Argos (Aeolids): he does not mention the name of Milyas; and he speaks of the Solymi as a warlike race, inhabiting the mountains, against whom the Greek hero Bellerophontes is sent to fight, by his relative the king of Lycia. Besides the legend of Bellerophon and the chimaera, Lycia is the scene of another popular Greek story, that of the Harpies and the daughters of Pandarus; and memorials of both are preserved on the Lycian monuments now in the British Museum. On the whole, it is clear that Lycia was colonized by the Hellenic race (probably from Crete) at a very early period, and that its historical inhabitants were Greeks, though with a mixture of native blood. The earlier names were preserved in the district in the N. of the country called Milyas, and in the mountains called Solyma. The Lycians always kept the reputation they have in Homer, as brave warriors. They and the Cilicians were the only people W. of the Halys whom Croesus did not conquer, and they were the last who resisted the Persians. [XANTHUS.] Under the Persian empire they must have been a powerful maritime people, as they furnished 50 ships to the fleet of Xerxes. After the Macedonian conquest, Lycia formed part of the Syrian kingdom, from which it was taken by the Romans after their victory over Antiochus III. the Great, and given to the Rhodians. It was soon restored to independence, and formed a flourishing federation of cities, each having its own republican form of government, and the whole presided over by a chief magistrate, called Λυκιάρχης. There was a federal council, composed of deputies from the 23 cities of the federation, in which the 6 chief cities, Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, Olympus, Myra, and Tlos, had 3 votes each, certain lesser cities 2 each, and the rest 1 each: this assembly determined matters relating to the general government of the country, and elected the Lyciarches, as well as the judges and the inferior magistrates. Internal dissensions at length broke up this constitution, and the country was united by the emperor Claudius to the province of Pamphylia, from which it was again separated by Theodosius, who made it a separate province, with Myra for its capital. Its cities were numerous and flourishing (see the articles), and its people celebrated for their probity. Their customs are said to have resembled those both of the Carians and of the Cretans. Respecting the works of art found by Mr. Fellows in Lycia, and now in the British Museum, see XANTHUS.

Lycius (Λύκιος). 1. The Lycian, a surname of Apollo, who was worshipped in several places of Lycia, especially at Patara, where he had an oracle. Hence the Lyciae sortes are the responses of the oracle at Patara (Virg. Aen. iv. 346). — 2. Of Eleutherae, in Boeotia, a distinguished statuary, the disciple or son of Myron, flourished about B.C. 428.

Lycomedes (Λυκομήδης). 1. A king of the Dolopians, in the island of Scyros, near Euboea. It was to his court that Achilles was sent disguised as a maiden by his mother Thetis, who was anxious to prevent his going to the Trojan war. Here Achilles became by Deidamīa, the daughter of Lycomedes, the father of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. Lycomedes treacherously killed Theseus by thrusting him down a rock. — 2. A celebrated Arcadian general, was a native of Mantinea and one of the chief founders of Megalopolis B.C. 370. He afterwards showed great jealousy of Thebes, and formed a separate alliance between Athens and Arcadia, in 366. He was murdered in the same year on his return from Athens, by some Arcadian exiles.

Lycon (Λύκων). 1. An orator and demagogue at Athens, was one of the 3 accusers of Socrates and prepared the case against him. When the Athenians repented of their condemnation of Socrates, they put Meletus to death and banished Anytus and Lycon. — 2. Of Troas, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, and the disciple of Straton, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school, B.C. 272. He held that post for more than 44 years, and died at the age of 74. He enjoyed the patronage of Attalus and Eumenes. He was celebrated for his eloquence and for his skill in educating boys. He wrote on the boundaries of good and evil (De Finibus).

Lycophron (Λυκόφρων). 1. Younger son of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, by his wife Melissa. For details see PERIANDER. — 2. A citizen of Pherae, where he put down the government of the nobles and established a tyranny about B.C. 405. He afterwards endeavoured to make himself master of the whole of Thessaly, and in 404 he defeated the Larissaeans and others of the Thessalians, who opposed him. He was probably the father of JASON of Pherae. — 3. A son, apparently, of Jason, and one of the brothers of Thebe, wife of Alexander, the tyrant of Pherae, in whose murder he took part together with his sister and his 2 brothers, Tisiphonus and Pitholaus, 367. On Alexander's death the power appears to have been wielded mainly by Tisiphonus, though Lycophron had an important share in the government. Lycophron succeeded to the supreme power on the death of Tisiphonus, but in 352 he was obliged to surrender Pherae to Philip, and withdraw from Thessaly. — 4. A grammarian and poet, was a native of Chalcis in Euboea, and lived at Alexandria, under Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285—247), who entrusted to him the arrangement of the works of the comic poets in the Alexandrian library. In the execution of this commission Lycophron drew up an extensive work on comedy. Nothing more is known of his life. Ovid (Ibis, 533) states that he was killed by an arrow.— As a poet, Lycophron obtained a place in the Tragic Pleiad. He also wrote a satyric drama. But the only one of his poems which has come down to us is the Cassandra or Alexandra. This is neither a tragedy nor an epic poem, but a long iambic monologue of 1474 verses, in which Cassandra is made to prophesy the fall of Troy, the adventures of the Grecian and Trojan heroes, with numerous other mythological and historical events, going back as early as the fables of Io and Europa, and ending with Alexander the Great. The work has no pretensions to poetical merit. It is simply a cumbrous store of traditional learning. Its obscurity is proverbial. Its author obtained the epithet of the Obscure (σκοτεινός). Its stores of learning and its obscurity alike excited the efforts of the ancient grammarians, several of whom wrote commentaries on the poem. The only one of these works which survives, is the Scholia of Isaac and John Tzetzes, which are far more valuable than the poem itself. — The best editions are by Potter, Oxon. 1697, fol.; Reichard, Lips. 1788, 2 vols. 8vo.; and Bachmann, Lips. 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.

Lycŏpŏlis (ἡ Λύκων πόλις: Siout, Ru.), a city of Upper Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Ptolemais, said to have derived its name from the circumstance, that an Aethiopian army was put to flight near it by a pack of wolves.

Lycorēa (Λυκώρεια: Λυκωρεύς, Λυκώριος, Λυκωρείτης), an ancient town at the foot of Mt. Lycorea (Liakura), which was the southern of the 2 peaks of Mt. Parnassus. [PARNASSUS.] Hence Apollo derived the surname of Lycoreus. The town Lycorea is said to have been the residence of Deucalion, and Delphi is also reported to have been colonised by it.

Lycōris. [CYTHERIS.]

Lycortas (Λυκόρτας), of Megalopolis, was the father of Polybius, the historian, and the close friend of Philopoemen, whose policy he always supported. He is first mentioned in B.C. 189, as one of the ambassadors sent to Rome; and his name occurs for the last time in 168.

Lycosūra (Λυκόσουρα: Λυκοσουρεύς: Paleokrambavos or Sidhirokastro near Stala), a town in the S. of Arcadia, and on the N.W. slope of Mt. Lycaeus, and near the small river Plataniston, said by Pausanias to have been the most ancient town in Greece, and to have been founded by Lycaon, the son of Pelasgus.

Lyctus (Λύκτος: Λύκτιος), sometimes called Lyttus (Λύττος), an important town in the E. of Crete, S.E. of Cnossus, was situated on a height of Mt. Argaeus, 80 stadia from the coast. Its harbour was called Chersonesus. It was one of the most ancient cities in the island, and is mentioned in the Iliad. It was generally considered to be a Spartan colony, and its inhabitants were celebrated for their bravery. At a later time it was conquered and destroyed by the Cnossians, but it was afterwards rebuilt, and was extant in the 7th century of our era.

Lycurgus (Λυκοῦργος). 1. Son of Dryas, and king of the Edones in Thrace. He is famous for his persecution of Dionysus (Bacchus) and his worship in Thrace. Homer relates that, in order to escape from Lycurgus, Dionysus leaped into the sea, where he was kindly received by Thetis; and that Zeus thereupon blinded the impious king, who died soon afterwards, hated by the immortal gods. This story has received many additions from later poets and mythographers. Some relate that Dionysus, on his expeditions, came to the kingdom of Lycurgus; but was expelled by the impious king. Thereupon the god drove Lycurgus mad, in which condition he killed his son Dryas, and also hewed off one of his legs, supposing that he was cutting down vines. The country now produced no fruit; and the oracle declaring that fertility should not be restored unless Lycurgus were killed, the Edonians carried him to mount Pangaeum, where he was torn to pieces by horses. According to Sophocles (Antig. 955), Lycurgus was entombed in a rock. — 2. King in Arcadia, son of Aleus and Neaera, brother of Cepheus and Auge, husband of Cleophile, Eurynome, or Antinoe, and father of Ancaeus, Epochus, Amphidamas, and Iasus. Lycurgus killed Areïthous, who used to fight with a club. Lycurgus bequeathed this club to his slave Ereuthalion, his sons having died before him. — 3. Son of Pronax and brother of Amphithea, the wife of Adrastus. He took part in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and fought with Amphiaraus. He is mentioned among those whom Aesculapius called to life again after their death. — 4. King of Nemea, son of Pheres and Periclymene, brother of Admetus, husband of Eurydice or Amphithea, and father of Opheltes.

Lўcurgus. 1. The Spartan legislator. Of his personal history we have no certain information; and there are such discrepancies respecting him in the ancient writers, that many modern critics have denied his real existence altogether. The more generally received account about him was as follows:— Lycurgus was the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, and brother of Polydectes. The latter succeeded his father as king of Sparta, and afterwards died, leaving his queen with child. The ambitious woman proposed to Lycurgus to destroy her offspring if he would share the throne with her. He seemingly consented; but when she had given birth to a son (Charilaus), he openly proclaimed him king; and as next of kin, acted as his guardian. But to avoid all suspicion of ambitious designs, with which the opposite party charged him, Lycurgus left Sparta, and set out on his celebrated travels, which have been magnified to a fabulous extent. He is said to have visited Crete, and there to have studied the wise laws of Minos. Next he went to Ionia and Egypt, and is reported to have penetrated into Libya, Iberia, and even India. In Ionia he is said to have met either with Homer himself, or at least with the Homeric poems, which he introduced into the mother country. The return of Lycurgus to Sparta was hailed by all parties. Sparta was in a state of anarchy and licentiousness, and he was considered as the man who alone could cure the growing diseases of the state. He undertook the task; yet before he set to work, he strengthened himself with the authority of the Delphic oracle, and with a strong party of influential men at Sparta. The reform seems not to have been carried altogether peaceably. The new division of the land among the citizens must have violated many existing interests. But all opposition was over-borne, and the whole constitution, military and civil, was remodelled. After Lycurgus had obtained for his institutions an approving oracle of the national god of Delphi, he exacted a promise from the people not to make any alterations in his laws before his return. And now he left Sparta to finish his life in voluntary exile, in order that his countrymen might be bound by their oath to preserve his constitution inviolate for ever. Where and how he died nobody could tell. He vanished from the earth like a god, leaving no traces behind but his spirit; and he was honoured as a god at Sparta with a temple and yearly sacrifices down to the latest times. The date of Lycurgus is variously given, but it is impossible to place it later than B. C. 825.—Lycurgus was regarded through all subsequent ages as the legislator of Sparta, and therefore almost all the Spartan institutions were ascribed to him as their author. We therefore propose to give here a sketch of the Spartan institution, referring for details to the Dict. of Antiq.; though we must not imagine that this constitution was entirely the work of Lycurgus. The Spartan constitution was of a mixed nature: the monarchical principle was represented by the kings, the aristocracy by the senate, and the democratical element by the assembly of the people, and subsequently by their representatives, the ephors. The kings had originally to perform the common functions of the kings of the heroic age. They were high priests, judges, and leaders in war; but in all of these departments they were in course of time superseded more or less. As judges they retained only a particular branch of jurisdiction, that referring to the succession of property. As military commanders they were restricted and watched by commissioners sent by the senate; the functions of high priest were curtailed least, perhaps because least obnoxious. In compensation for the loss of power, the kings enjoyed great honours, both during their life and after their death. Still the principle of monarchy was very weak among the Spartans.—The powers of the senate were very important: they had the right of originating and discussing all measures before they could be submitted to the decision of the popular assembly; they had, in conjunction with the ephors, to watch over the due observance of the laws and institutions; and they were judges in all criminal cases, without being bound by any written code. For all this they were not responsible, holding their office for life.—But with all these powers, the elders formed no real aristocracy. They were not chosen either for property qualification or for noble birth. The senate was open to the poorest citizen, who, during 60 years, had been obedient to the laws and zealous in the performance of his duties.—The mass of the people, that is, the Spartans of pure Doric descent, formed the sovereign power of the state. The popular assembly consisted of every Spartan of 30 years of age, and of unblemished character; only those were excluded who had not the means of contributing their portion to the syssitia. They met at stated times, to decide on all important questions brought before them, after a previous discussion in the senate. They had no right of amendment, but only that of simple approval or rejection, which was given in the rudest form possible, by shouting. The popular assembly, however, had neither frequent nor very important occasions for directly exerting their sovereign power. Their chief activity consisted in delegating it; hence arose the importance of the ephors, who were the representatives of the popular element of the constitution. The ephors answer in every characteristic feature to the Roman tribunes of the people. Their origin was lost in obscurity and insignificance; but at the end they engrossed the whole power of the state.—With reference to their subjects, the few Spartans formed a most decided aristocracy. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, part of the ancient inhabitants of the country, under name of the Perioici, were allowed indeed to retain their personal liberty, but lost all civil rights, and were obliged to pay to the state a rent for the land that was left them. But a great part of the old inhabitants were reduced to a state of perfect slavery, different from that of the slaves of Athens and Rome, and more similar to the villanage of the feudal ages. These were called Helots. They were allotted with patches of land, to individual members of the ruling class. They tilled the land, and paid a fixed rent to their masters, not, as the perioici, to the state. The number of these miserable creatures was large. They were treated with the utmost cruelty by the Spartans, and were frequently put to death by their oppressors.—The Spartans formed, as it were, an army of invaders in an enemy's country, their city was a camp, and every man a soldier. At Sparta, the citizen only existed for the state; he had no interest but the state's, and no property but what belonged to the state. It was a fundamental principle of the constitution, that all citizens were entitled to the enjoyment of an equal portion of the common property. This was done in order to secure to the commonwealth a large number of citizens and soldiers, free from labour for their sustenance, and able to devote their whole time to warlike exercises, in order thus to keep up the ascendancy of Sparta over her perioici and helots. The Spartans were to be warriors and nothing but warriors. Therefore, not only all mechanical labour was thought to degrade them; not only was husbandry despised and neglected, and commerce prevented, or at least impeded, by prohibitive laws and by the use of iron money; but also the nobler arts and sciences were so effectually stifled, that Sparta is a blank in the history of the arts and literature of Greece. The state took care of a Spartan from his cradle to his grave, and superintended his education in the minutest points. This was not confined to his youth, but extended throughout his whole life. The syssitia, or, as they were called at Sparta, phiditia, the common meals, may be regarded as an educational institution; for at these meals subjects of general interest were discussed and political questions debated. The youths and boys used to eat separately from the men, in their own divisions.—2. A Lacedaemonian, who, though not of the royal blood, was chosen king, in B. C. 220, together with Agesipolis III., after the death of Cleomenes. It was not long before he deposed his colleague and made himself sole sovereign, though under the control of the Ephori. He carried on war against Philip V. of Macedon, and the Achaeans. He died about 210, and Machanidas then made himself tyrant.—3. An Attic orator, son of Lycophron, who belonged to the noble family of the Eteobutadae, was born at Athens, about B. C. 396. He was a disciple of Plato and Isocrates. In public life he was a warm supporter of the policy of Demosthenes, and was universally admitted to be one of the most virtuous citizens and upright statesmen of his age. He was thrice appointed Tamias or manager of the public revenue, and held this office each time for five years, beginning with 337. He discharged the duties of this office with such ability and integrity, that he raised the public revenue to the sum of 1200 talents. One of his laws enacted that bronze statues should be erected to Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and that copies of their tragedies should be preserved in the public archives. He often appeared as a successful accuser in the Athenian courts, but he himself was as often accused by others, though he always succeeded in silencing his enemies. He died while holding the office of President of the theatre of Dionysus, in 323. A fragment of an inscription, containing an account of his administration of the finances, is still extant. There were 15 orations of Lycurgus extant in antiquity; but only one has come down to us entire, the oration against Leocrates, which was delivered in 330. The style is noble and grand, but neither elegant nor pleasing. The oration is printed in the various collections of the Attic orators. [DEMOSTHENES.]

Lўcus (Λύκος). 1. Son of Poseidon and Celaeno, who was transferred by his father to the islands of the blessed. By Alcyone, the sister of Celaeno, Poseidon begot Hyrieus, the father of the following.—2. Son of Hyrieus and Clonia, and brother of Nycteus. Polydorus, king of Thebes, married the daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a son Labdacus; and on his death he left the government of Thebes and the guardianship of Labdacus to his father-in-law. Nycteus afterwards fell in battle against Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who had carried away his beautiful daughter Antiope. Lycus succeeded his brother in the government of Thebes, and in the guardianship of Labdacus. He surrendered the kingdom to Labdacus when the latter had grown up. On the death of Labdacus soon afterwards, Lycus again succeeded to the government of Thebes, and undertook the guardianship of Laius, the son of Labdacus. Lycus marched against Epopeus, whom he put to death (according to other accounts Epopeus fell in the war with Nycteus), and he carried away Antiope to Thebes. She was treated with the greatest cruelty by Dirce, the wife of Lycus; in revenge for which her sons by Zeus, Amphion and Zethus, afterwards put to death both Lycus and Dirce. [AMPHION.] — 3. Son of No. 2, or, according to others, son of Poseidon, was also king of Thebes. In the absence of Hercules, Lycus attempted to kill his wife Megara and her children, but was afterwards put to death by Hercules. — 4. Son of Pandion, and brother of Aegeus, Nisus, and Pallas. He was expelled by Aegeus, and took refuge in the country of the Termili, which was called Lycia after him. He was honoured at Athens as a hero, and the Lyceum derived its name from him. He is said to have introduced the Eleusinian mysteries into Andania in Messenia. He is sometimes also described as an ancient prophet, and the family of the Lycomedae, at Athens, traced their name and origin from him. — 5. Son of Dascylus, and king of the Mariandynians, who received Hercules and the Argonauts with hospitality. — 6. Of Rhegium, the father, real or adoptive, of the poet Lycophron, was an historical writer in the time of Demetrius Phalereus.

Lўcus (Λύκος), the name of several rivers, which are said to be so called from the impetuosity of their current. 1. (Kilij), a little river of Bithynia, falling into the sea S. of Heraclea Pontica. — 2. (Germeneh-Chai), a considerable river of Pontus, rising in the mountains on the N. of Armenia Minor, and flowing W. into the Iris at Eupatoria. — 3. (Choruk-Su), a considerable river of Phrygia, flowing from E. to W. past Colossae and Laodicea into the Maeander. — 4. (Nahr-el-Kelb), a river of Phoenicia, falling into the sea N. of Berytus. — 5. (Great Zab or Ulu-Su), a river of Assyria, rising in the mountains on the S. of Armenia, and flowing S. W. into the Tigris, just below Larissa (Nimroud). It is undoubtedly the same as the Zabatus of Xenophon.

Lydda (τὰ Λύδδα, ἡ Λύδδη: Lud), a town of Palestine, S. E. of Joppa, and N. W. of Jerusalem, at the junction of several roads which lead from the sea-coast, was destroyed by the Romans in the Jewish War, but soon after rebuilt, and called Diospolis.

Lўdĭa (Λυδία: Λυδός, Lydus), a district of Asia Minor, in the middle of the W. side of the peninsula, between Mysia on the N. and Caria on the S., and between Phrygia on the E. and the Aegean Sea on the W. Its boundaries varied so much at different times, that they cannot be described with any approach to exactness till we come to the time of the Roman rule over W. Asia. At that time the N. boundary, towards Mysia, was the range of mountains which form the N. margin of the valley of the Hermus, called Sardene, a S. W. branch of the Phrygian Olympus: the E. boundary towards Phrygia was an imaginary line: and the S. boundary towards Caria was the river Maeander, or, according to some authorities, the range of mountains which, under the name of Messogis (Kastane Dagh) forms the N. margin of the valley of the Maeander, and is a N. W. prolongation of the Taurus. From the E. part of this range, in the S. E. corner of Lydia, another branches off to the N. W., and runs to the W. far out into the Aegean Sea, where it forms the peninsula opposite to the island of Chios. This chain, which is called Tmolus (Kisilja Musa Dagh), divides Lydia into 2 unequal vallies; of which the S. and smaller is watered by the river CAYSTER, and the N. forms the great plain of the HERMUS: these vallies are very beautiful and fertile, and that of the Hermus especially is one of the most delicious regions of the earth. The E. part of Lydia, and the adjacent portion of Phrygia, about the upper course of the Hermus and its tributaries, is an elevated plain, showing traces of volcanic action, and hence called Catacecaumēne (κατακεκαυμένη). In the boundaries of Lydia, as just described, the strip of coast belonging to IONIA is included, but the name is sometimes used in a narrower signification, so as to exclude Ionia. In early times the country had another name, Maeŏnĭa (Μῃονιή, Μαιονία), by which alone it is known to Homer; and this name was afterwards applied specifically to the E. and S. part of Lydia, and then, in contradistinction to it, the name Lydia was used for the N.W. part. In the mythical legends the common name of the people and country, Lydi and Lydia, is derived from Lydus, the son of Atys, the first king. The Lydians appear to have been a race closely connected with the Carians and the Mysians, with whom they observed a common worship in the temple of Zeus Carius at Mylasa: they also practised the worship of Cybele, and other Phrygian customs. Amidst the uncertainties of the early legends, it is clear that Lydia was a very early seat of Asiatic civilization, and that it exerted a very important influence on the Greeks. The Lydian monarchy, which was founded at Sardis, before the time of authentic history, grew up into an empire, under which the many different tribes of Asia Minor W. of the river Halys were for the first time united. Tradition mentioned 3 dynasties of kings; the Atyădae, which ended (according to the backward computations of chronologers) about B.C. 1221; the Heraclīdae, which reigned 505 years, down to 716; and the Mermnădae, 160 years, down to 556. Only the last dynasty can be safely regarded as historical, and the fabulous element has a large place in the details of their history: their names and computed dates were:—(1) Gyges, B.C. 716—678; (2) Ardys, 678—629; (3) Sadyattes, 629—617; (4) Alyattes, 617—560; (5) Croesus, 560 (or earlier)—546; under whose names an account is given of the rise of the Lydian empire in Asia Minor, and of its overthrow by the Persians under Cyrus. Under these kings, the Lydians appear to have been a highly civilised, industrious, and wealthy people, practising agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and acquainted with various arts; and exercising, through their intercourse with the Greeks of Ionia, an important influence on the progress of Greek civilisation. Among the inventions, or improvements, which the Greeks are said to have derived from them, were the weaving and dyeing of fine fabrics; various processes of metallurgy; the use of gold and silver money, which the Lydians are said first to have coined, the former from the gold found on Tmolus and from the golden sands of the Pactolus; and various metrical and musical improvements, especially the scale or mode of music called the Lydian, and the form of the lyre called the magadis. (See Dict. of Antiq., Musica). The Lydians had also public games similar to those of the Greeks. Their high civilisation, however, was combined with a lax morality, and, after the Persian conquest, when they were forbidden by Cyrus to carry arms, they sank gradually into a bye-word for effeminate luxuriousness, and their very name and language had almost entirely disappeared by the commencement of our era. Under the Persians, Lydia and Mysia formed the 2nd satrapy: after the Macedonian conquest, Lydia belonged first to the kings of Syria, and next (after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans) to those of Pergamus, and so passed, by the bequest of Attalus III., to the Romans, under whom it formed part of the province of Asia.

Lydiădes (Λυδιάδης), a citizen of Megalopolis, who, though of an obscure family, raised himself to the sovereignty of his native city, about B.C. 244. In 234 he voluntarily abdicated the sovereignty, and permitted Megalopolis to join the Achaean League as a free state. He was elected several times general of the Achaean League, and became a formidable rival to Aratus. He fell in battle against Cleomenes, 226.

Lydĭas or Ludias (Λυδίας, Ion. Λυδίης, Λουδίας: Karasmak or Mavronero), a river in Macedonia, rises in Eordaea, passes Edessa, and after flowing through the lake on which Pella is situated, falls into the Axius, a short distance from the Thermaic gulf. In the upper part of its course it is called the Eordaean river (Ἐορδαϊκὸς ποταμὸς) by Arrian. Herodotus (vii. 127) by mistake makes the Lydias unite with the Haliacmon, the latter of which is W. of the former.

Lydus (Λύδος), son of Atys and Callithea, and brother of Tyrrhenus, said to have been the mythical ancestor of the Lydians.

Lydus, Joannes Laurentius, was born at Philadelphia, in Lydia (whence he is called Lydus or the Lydian), in A.D. 490. He held various public offices, and lived to an advanced age. He wrote: 1. Περὶ μηνῶν συγγραφή, De Mensibus Liber, of which there are two epitomae, or summaries, and a fragment extant. 2. Περὶ ἀρχῶν κ. τ. λ. De Magistratibus Reipublicae Romanae. 3. Περὶ διοσημειῶν, De Ostentis. The work De Mensibus is an historical commentary on the Roman calendar, with an account of the various festivals, derived from a great number of authorities, most of which have perished. Of the two summaries of this curious work, the larger one is by an unknown hand, the shorter one by Maximus Planudes. The work De Magistratibus was thought to have perished, but was discovered by Villoison in the suburbs of Constantinople, in 1785. The best edition of these works is by Bekker, Bonn, 1837.

Lygdămis (Λύγδαμις). 1. Of Naxos, a distinguished leader of the popular party of the island in the struggle with the oligarchy. He conquered the latter, and obtained thereby the chief power in the state. He assisted Pisistratus in his third return to Athens; but during his absence his enemies seem to have got the upper hand again; for Pisistratus afterwards subdued the island, and made Lygdamis tyrant of it, about B.C. 540. In 532 he assisted Polycrates in obtaining the tyranny of Samos. — 2. Father of Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, the contemporary of Xerxes. — 3. Tyrant of Halicarnassus, the son of Pisindelis, and the grandson of Artemisia. The historian Herodotus is said to have taken an active part in delivering his native city from the tyranny of this Lygdamis.

Lygĭi or Ligĭi, an important people in Germany, between the Viadus (Oder) and the Vistula, in the modern Silesia and Posen, were bounded by the Burgundiones on the N., the Goths on the E., the Bastarnae and Osi on the W., and the Marsingi, Silingae and Semnones on the S. They were divided into several tribes, the chief of which were the Manimi, Duni, Elysii, Burii, Arii, Naharvali and Helveconae. They first appear in history as members of the great Marcomannic league formed by Maroboduus in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. In the 3rd century some of the Lygii migrated with the Burgundians W.-wards, and settled in the country bordering on the Rhine.

Lyncestis (Λυγκηστίς), a district in the S. W. of Macedonia, N. of the river Erigon, and upon the frontiers of Illyria. Its inhabitants, the Lyncestae, were Illyrians, and were originally an independent people, who were governed by their own princes, said to be descended from the family of the Bacchiadae. The Lyncestae appear to have become subject to Macedonia by a marriage between the royal families of the 2 countries. The ancient capital of the country was Lyncus (ἡ Λύγκος), though Heraclea at a later time became the chief town in the district. Near Lyncus was a river, the waters of them are said to have been as intoxicating as wine. (Ov. Met. xv. 329.)

Lynceus (Λυγκεύς). 1. One of the 50 sons of Aegyptus, whose life was saved by his wife Hypermnestra, when all his other brothers were murdered by the daughters of Danaus on their wedding night. [AEGYPTUS.] Danaus thereupon kept Hypermnestra in strict confinement, but was afterwards prevailed upon to give her to Lynceus, who succeeded him on the throne of Argos. According to a different legend, Lynceus slew Danaus and all the sisters of Hypermnestra, in revenge for his brothers. Lynceus was succeeded as king of Argos by his son ABAS. — 2. Son of Aphareus and Arene, and brother of Idas, was one of the Argonauts and famous for his keen sight. He is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters, and was slain by Pollux. For details respecting his death, see p. 228, b. — 3. Of Samos, the disciple of Theophrastus, and the brother of the historian Duris, was a contemporary of Menander, and his rival in comic poetry. He survived Menander, upon whom he wrote a book. He seems to have been more distinguished as a grammarian and historian than as a comic poet.

Lyncus, king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Sicily, endeavoured to murder Triptolemus, who came to him with the gifts of Ceres, but he was metamorphosed by the goddess into a lynx.

Lyrcēa or Lyrcēum (Λυρκεία, Λύρκειον), a small town in Argolis, situated on a mountain of the same name.

Lyrnessus (Λυρνησσός), a town in the interior of Mysia, in Asia Minor, frequently mentioned by Homer: destroyed before the time of Strabo.

Lysander (Λύσανδρος), a Spartan, was of servile origin, or at least the offspring of a marriage between a freeman and a woman of inferior condition. He obtained the citizenship, and became one of the most distinguished of the Spartan generals and diplomatists. In B.C. 407, he was sent out to succeed Cratesippidas in the command of the fleet, off the coasts of Asia Minor. He fixed his head-quarters at Ephesus, and soon obtained great influence, not only with the Greek cities, but also with Cyrus, who supplied him with large sums of money to pay his sailors. Next year, 406, he was succeeded by Callicratidas. In one year the reputation and influence of Lysander had become so great, that Cyrus and the Spartan allies in Asia requested the Lacedaemonians to appoint Lysander again to the command of the fleet. The Lacedaemonian law, however, did not allow the office of admiral to be held twice by the same person; and, accordingly, Aracus was sent out in 405, as the nominal commander-in-chief, while Lysander, virtually invested with the supreme direction of affairs, had the title of vice-admiral (ἐπιστολεύς). In this year he brought the Peloponnesian war to a conclusion, by the defeat and capture of the Athenian fleet off Aegos-potami. Only 8 Athenian ships made their escape under the command of Conon. He afterwards sailed to Athens, and in the spring of 404 the city capitulated; the long walls and the fortifications of the Piraeus were destroyed, and an oligarchical form of government established, known by the name of the 30 Tyrants. Lysander was now by far the most powerful man in Greece, and he displayed more than the usual pride and haughtiness which distinguished the Spartan commanders in foreign countries. He was passionately fond of praise, and took care that his exploits should be celebrated by the most illustrious poets of his time. He always kept the poet Choerilus in his retinue; and his praises were also sung by Antilochus, Antimachus of Colophon, and Niceratus of Heraclea. He was the first of the Greeks to whom Greek cities erected altars as to a god, offered sacrifices, and celebrated festivals. His power and ambition caused the Spartan government uneasiness, and accordingly the Ephors recalled him from Asia Minor, to which he had again repaired, and for some years kept him without any public employment. On the death of Agis II. in 397, he secured the succession for Agesilaus, the brother of Agis, in opposition to Leotychides, the reputed son of the latter. He did not receive from Agesilaus the gratitude he had expected. He was one of the members of the council, 30 in number, which was appointed to accompany the new king in his expedition into Asia in 396. Agesilaus purposely thwarted all his designs, and refused all the favours which he asked. On his return to Sparta, Lysander resolved to bring about the change he had long meditated in the Spartan constitution, by abolishing hereditary royalty, and making the throne elective. He is said to have attempted to obtain the sanction of the gods in favour of his scheme, and to have tried in succession the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Zeus Ammon, but without success. He does not seem to have ventured upon any overt act, and his enterprise was cut short by his death in the following year. On the breaking out of the Boeotian war in 395, Lysander was placed at the head of one army, and the king Pausanias at the head of another. Lysander marched against Haliartus and perished in battle under the walls, 395.

Lysandra (Λύσανδρα), daughter of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater. She was married first to Alexander, the son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and after his death to Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus. After the murder of her 2nd husband, B.C. 284 [AGATHOCLES, No. 3], she fled to Asia, and besought assistance from Seleucus. The latter in consequence marched against Lysimachus, who was defeated and slain in battle 281.

Lysanias (Λυσανίας). 1. Tetrarch of Abilene, was put to death by Antony, to gratify Cleopatra, B.C. 36. — 2. A descendant of the last, who was tetrarch of Abilene at the time when our Saviour entered upon his ministry. (Luke, iii. 1.)

Lysias (Λυσίας), an Attic orator, was born at Athens, B.C. 458. He was the son of Cephalus, who was a native of Syracuse, and had taken up his abode at Athens, on the invitation of Pericles. At the age of 15, Lysias and his brothers joined the Athenians who went as colonists to Thurii in Italy, 443. He there completed his education under the instruction of two Syracusans, Tisias and Nicias. He afterwards enjoyed great esteem among the Thurians, and seems to have taken part in the administration of the city. After the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, he was expelled by the Spartan party from Thurii, as a partisan of the Athenians. He now returned to Athens, 411. During the rule of the 30 Tyrants (404), he was looked upon as an enemy of the government, his large property was confiscated, and he was thrown into prison; but he escaped, and took refuge at Megara. He joined Thrasybulus and the exiles, and in order to render them effectual assistance, he sacrificed all that remained of his fortune. He gave the patriots 2000 drachmas and 200 shields, and engaged a band of 300 mercenaries. Thrasybulus procured him the Athenian franchise, which he had not possessed hitherto, since he was the son of a foreigner; but he was afterwards deprived of this right, because it had been conferred without a probuleuma. Henceforth he lived at Athens as an isoteles, occupying himself, as it appears, solely with writing judicial speeches for others, and died in 378, at the age of 80. — Lysias wrote a great number of orations; and among those which were current under his name, the ancient critics reckoned 230 as genuine. Of these 35 only are extant; and even some of these are incomplete, and others are probably spurious. Most of these orations were composed after his return from Thurii to Athens. The only one which he delivered himself is that against Eratosthenes, 403. The language of Lysias is perfectly pure, and may be regarded as one of the best specimens of the Attic idiom. All the ancient writers agreed that his orations were distinguished by grace and elegance. His style is always clear and lucid; and his delineations of character striking and true to life. The orations of Lysias are contained in the collections of the Attic orators. [Demosthenes.] The best separate editions are by Foertsch, Lips. 1829: and by Franz, Monac. 1831.

Lysimachīa or -ēa (Λυσιμαχία, Λυσιμάχεια: Λυσιμαχεύς). 1. (Eksemil), an important town on the N. E. of the gulf of Melas, and on the isthmus connecting the Thracian Chersonesus with the mainland, was founded B.C. 309 by Lysimachus, who removed to his new city the greater part of the inhabitants of the neighbouring town of Cardia. It was subsequently destroyed by the Thracians, but was restored by Antiochus the Great. Under the Romans it greatly declined; but Justinian built a strong fortress on the spot, which he called Hexamilium (Ἑξαμίλιον), doubtless, from the width of the isthmus, under which name it is mentioned in the middle ages. — 2. A town in the S. W. of Aetolia, near Pleuron, situated on a lake of the same name, which was more anciently called Hydra.

Lȳsĭmăchus (Λυσίμαχος), king of Thrace, was a Macedonian by birth, and one of Alexander's generals, but of mean origin, his father Agathocles having been originally a Penest or serf in Sicily. He was early distinguished for his undaunted courage, as well as for his great activity and strength of body. We are told by Q. Curtius that Lysimachus, when hunting in Syria, had killed a lion of immense size single-handed; and this circumstance that writer regards as the origin of a fable gravely related by many authors, that on account of some offence, Lysimachus had been shut up by order of Alexander in the same den with a lion; but though unarmed, had succeeded in destroying the animal, and was pardoned by the king in consideration of his courage. In the division of the provinces, after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), Thrace and the neighbouring countries as far as the Danube were assigned to Lysimachus. For some years he was actively engaged in war with the warlike barbarians that bordered his province on the N. At length, in 315, he joined the league which Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander had formed against Antigonus; but he did not take any active part in the war for some time. In 306 he took the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander. In 302 Lysimachus crossed over into Asia Minor to oppose Antigonus, while Seleucus also advanced against the latter from the East. In 301 Lysimachus and Seleucus effected a junction, and gained a decisive victory at Ipsus over Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus fell on the field, and Demetrius became a fugitive. The conquerors divided between them the dominions of the vanquished; and Lysimachus obtained for his share all that part of Asia Minor extending from the Hellespont and the Aegaean to the heart of Phrygia. In 291 Lysimachus crossed the Danube and penetrated into the heart of the country of the Getae; but he was reduced to the greatest distress by want of provisions, and was ultimately compelled to surrender with his whole army. Dromichaetes, king of the Getae, treated him with the utmost generosity, and restored him to liberty. In 288 Lysimachus united with Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Pyrrhus, in a common league against Demetrius, who had for some years been in possession of Macedonia, and was now preparing to march into Asia. Next year, 287, Lysimachus and Pyrrhus invaded Macedonia. Demetrius was abandoned by his own troops, and was compelled to seek safety in flight. Pyrrhus for a time obtained possession of the Macedonian throne, but he was expelled by Lysimachus in 286. Lysimachus was now in possession of all the dominions in Europe that had formed part of the Macedonian monarchy, as well as of the greater part of Asia Minor. He remained in undisturbed possession of these vast dominions till shortly before his death. His downfall was occasioned by a dark domestic tragedy. His wife Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy Soter, had long hated her step-son Agathocles, and at length, by false accusations, induced Lysimachus to put his son to death. This bloody deed alienated the minds of his subjects; and many cities of Asia broke out into open revolt. Lysandra, the widow of Agathocles, fled with her children to the court of Seleucus, who forthwith invaded the dominions of Lysimachus. The two monarchs met in the plain of Corus (Corupedion); and Lysimachus fell in the battle that ensued, B.C. 281. He was in his 80th year at the time of his death. — Lysimachus founded Lysimachia, on the Hellespont, and also enlarged and rebuilt many other cities.

Lysimelīa (ἡ Λυσιμέλεια λίμνη), a marsh near Syracuse in Sicily, probably the same as the marsh more anciently called Syraco from which the town of Syracuse is said to have derived its name.

Lysĭnŏē (Λυσινόη: Agelan?), a town in Pisidia, S. of the lake Ascania.

Lysippus (Λύσιππος), of Sicyon, one of the most distinguished Greek statuaries, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. Originally a simple workman in bronze (faber aerarius), he rose to the eminence which he afterwards obtained by the direct study of nature. He rejected the last remains of the old conventional rules which the early artists followed. In his imitation of nature the ideal appears almost to have vanished, or perhaps it should rather be said that he aimed to idealize merely human beauty. He made statues of gods, it is true; but even in this field of art his favourite subject was the human hero Hercules; while his portraits seem to have been the chief foundation of his fame. The works of Lysippus are said to have amounted to the enormous number of 1500. They were almost all, if not all, in bronze; in consequence of which none of them are extant. He made statues of Alexander at all periods of life, and in many different positions. Alexander's edict is well known, that no one should paint him but Apelles, and no one make his statue but Lysippus. The most celebrated of these statues was that in which Alexander was represented with a lance, which was considered as a sort of companion to the picture of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt, by Apelles.

Lȳsis (Λῦσις), an eminent Pythagorean philosopher, who, driven out of Italy in the persecution of his sect, betook himself to Thebes, and became the teacher of Epaminondas, by whom he was held in the highest esteem.

Lysis, a river of Caria, only mentioned by Livy (xxxviii. 15).

Lysistrătus, of Sicyon, the brother of Lysippus, was a statuary, and devoted himself to the making of portraits. He was the first who took a cast of the human face in gypsum; and from this mould he produced copies by pouring into it melted wax.

Lystra (ἡ Λύστρα, τὰ Λύστρα: prob. Karadagh, Ru.), a city of Lycaonia, on the confines of Isauria, celebrated as one chief scene of the preaching of Paul and Barnabas. (Acts, xiv.)

M.

Măcae (Μάκαι). 1. A people on the E. coast of Arabia Felix, probably about Muscat. — 2. An inland people of Libya, in the Regio Syrtica, that is, the part of N. Africa between the Syrtes.

Macalla, a town on the E. coast of Bruttium, which was said to possess the tomb and a sanctuary of Philoctetes.

Măcăr or Măcăreus (Μάκαρ or Μακαρεύς). 1. Son of Helios (or Crinacus) and Rhodos, fled from Rhodes to Lesbos after the murder of Tenages. — 2. Son of Aeolus, who committed incest with his sister Canace. [Canace.] — 3. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Mermerus or Mormorus.

Macarĭa (Μακαρία), daughter of Hercules and Deïanīra.

Macarĭa (Μακαρία). 1. A poetical name of several islands, such as Lesbos, Rhodes, and Cyprus. — 2. An island in the S. part of the Sinus Arabicus (Red Sea), off the coast of the Troglodytae.

Maccabaei (Μακκαβαῖοι), the descendants of the family of the heroic Judas Maccabi or Maccabaeus, a surname which he obtained from his glorious victories. (From the Hebrew makkab, "a hammer.") They were also called Asamonaei (Ἀσαμωναῖοι), from Asamonaeus, or Chasmon, the great-grandfather of Mattathias, the father of Judas Maccabaeus, or, in a shorter form, Asmonaei or Hasmonaei. This family first obtained distinction from the attempts which were made by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, king of Syria, to root out the worship of Jehovah, and introduce the Greek religion among the inhabitants of Judaea. Antiochus published an edict, which enjoined uniformity of worship throughout his dominions. At Modin, a town not far from Lydda, lived Mattathias, a man of the priestly line and of deep religious feeling, who had 5 sons in the vigour of their days, John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. When the officer of the Syrian king visited Modin, to enforce obedience to the royal edict, Mattathias not only refused to desert the religion of his forefathers, but with his own hand struck dead the first renegade who attempted to offer sacrifice on the heathen altar. He then put to death the king's officer, and retired to the mountains with his 5 sons (b. c. 167). Their numbers daily increased; and as opportunities occurred, they issued from their mountain fastnesses, cut off detachments of the Syrian army, destroyed heathen altars, and restored in many places the synagogues and the open worship of the Jewish religion. Within a few months the insurrection at Modin had grown into a war for national independence. But the toils of such a war were too much for the aged frame of Mattathias, who died in the 1st year of the revolt, leaving the conduct of it to Judas, his 3rd son. 1. Judas, who assumed the surname of Maccabaeus, as has been mentioned above, carried on the war with the same prudence and energy with which it had been commenced. After meeting with great success, he at length fell in battle against the forces of Demetrius I Soter, 160. He was succeeded in the command by his brother, — 2. Jonathan, who maintained the cause of Jewish independence with equal vigour and success, and became recognised as high-priest of the Jews. He was put to death by Tryphon, the minister of Antiochus VI., who treacherously got him into his power, 144. Jonathan was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his brother, — 3. Simon, who was the most fortunate of the sons of Mattathias, and under whose government the country became virtually independent of Syria. He was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy, the governor of Jericho, together with 2 of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, 135. His other son Joannes Hyrcanus escaped, and succeeded his father. — 4. Joannes Hyrcanus I. was high-priest 135—106. He did not assume the title of king, but was to all intents and purposes an independent monarch. [Hyrcanus.] He was succeeded by his son Aristobulus I. — 5. Aristobulus I., was the first of the Maccabees who assumed the kingly title, which was henceforth borne by his successors. His reign lasted only a year 106—105. [Aristobulus.] He was succeeded by his brother, — 6. Alexander Jannaeus, who reigned 105—78. [Alexander, p. 35, a.] He was succeeded by his widow, — 7. Alexandra, who appointed her son Hyrcanus II. to the priesthood, and held the supreme power 78 —69. On her death in the latter year her son, — 8. Hyrcanus II., obtained the kingdom, 69, but was supplanted almost immediately afterwards by his brother, — 9. Aristobulus II., who obtained the throne 68. [Aristobulus.] For the remainder of the history of the house of the Maccabees see Hyrcanus II. and Herodes I.

Măcĕdŏnĭa (Μακεδονία: Μακεδόνες), a country in Europe, N. of Greece, which is said to have derived its name from an ancient king Macedon, a son of Zeus and Thyia, a daughter of Deucalion. The name first occurs in Herodotus, but its more ancient form appears to have been Macĕtia (Μακετία); and accordingly the Macedonians are sometimes called Macetae. The country is said to have been originally named Emathia. The boundaries of Macedonia differed at different periods. In the time of Herodotus the name Macedonis designated only the country to the S. and W. of the river Lydias. The boundaries of the ancient Macedonian monarchy, before the time of Philip, the father of Alexander, were on the S. Olympus and the Cambunian mountains, which separated it from Thessaly and Epirus, on the E. the river Strymon, which separated it from Thrace, and on the N. and W. Illyria and Paeonia, from which it was divided by no well defined limits. Macedonia was greatly enlarged by the conquests of Philip. He added to his kingdom Paeonia on the N., so that the mountains Scordus and Orbelus now separated it from Moesia; a part of Thrace on the E. as far as the river Nestus, which Thracian district was usually called Macedonia adjecta; the peninsula Chalcidice on the S.; and on the W. a part of Illyria, as far as the lake Lychnitis. On the conquest of the country by the Romans, B.C. 168, Macedonia was divided into 4 districts, which were quite independent of one another: — 1. The country between the Strymon and the Nestus, with a part of Thrace E. of the Nestus, as far as the Hebrus, and also including the territory of Heraclea Sintica and Bisaltice, W. of the Strymon; the capital of this district was Amphipolis. 2. The country between the Strymon and the Axius, exclusive of those parts already named, but including Chalcidice; the capital Thessalonica. 3. The country between the Axius and Peneus; the capital Pella. 4. The mountainous country in the W.; the capital Pelagonia. After the conquest of the Achaeans, in 146, Macedonia was formed into a Roman province, and Thessaly and Illyria were incorporated with it; but at the same time the district E. of the Nestus was again assigned to Thrace. The Roman province of Macedonia accordingly extended from the Aegaean to the Adriatic seas, and was bounded on the S. by the province of Achaia. It was originally governed by a proconsul; it was made by Tiberius one of the provinces of the Caesar; but it was restored to the senate by Claudius. — Macedonia may be described as a large plain, surrounded on 3 sides by lofty mountains. Through this plain, however, run many smaller ranges of mountains, between which are wide and fertile valleys, extending from the coast far into the interior. The chief mountains were SCORDUS, or SCARDUS, on the N.W. frontier, towards Illyria and Dardania; further E. ORBELUS and SCOMIUS, which separated it from Moesia; and RHODOPE, which extended from Scomius in a S.E. direction, forming the boundary between Macedonia and Thrace. On the S. frontier were the CAMBUNII MONTES and OLYMPUS. The chief rivers were in the direction of E. to W., the NESTUS, the STRYMON, the AXIUS, the largest of all, the LUDIAS or LYDIAS, and the HALIACMON. — The great bulk of the inhabitants of Macedonia consisted of Thracian and Illyrian tribes. At an early period some Greek tribes settled in the S. part of the country. They are said to have come from Argos, and to have been led by Gauanes, Aëropus, and Perdiccas, the 3 sons of Temenus, the Heraclid. Perdiccas, the youngest of the brothers, was looked upon as the founder of the Macedonian monarchy. A later tradition, however, regarded Caranus, who was also a Heraclid from Argos, as the founder of the monarchy. These Greek settlers intermarried with the original inhabitants of the country. The dialect which they spoke was akin to the Doric, but it contained many barbarous words and forms; and the Macedonians were accordingly never regarded by the other Greeks as genuine Hellenes. Moreover, it was only in the S. of Macedonia that the Greek language was spoken; in the N. and N.W. of the country the Illyrian tribes continued to speak their own language and to preserve their ancient habits and customs. Very little is known of the history of Macedonia till the reign of Amyntas I., who was a contemporary of Darius Hystaspis; but from that time their history is more or less intimately connected with that of Greece, till at length Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, became the virtual master of the whole of Greece. The conquests of Alexander extended the Macedonian supremacy over a great part of Asia; and the Macedonian kings continued to exercise their sovereignty over Greece, till the conquest of Perseus by the Romans, 168, brought the Macedonian monarchy to a close. The details of the Macedonian history are given in the lives of the separate kings.

Macella (Macellaro), a small fortified town in the W. of Sicily, S.E. of Segesta.

Măcer, Aemilĭus. 1. A Roman poet, a native of Verona, died in Asia, B.C. 16. He wrote a poem or poems upon birds, snakes, and medicinal plants, in imitation, it would appear, of the Theriaca of Nicander. (Ov. Trist. iv. 10. 44.) The work now extant, entitled "Aemilius Macer de Herbarum Virtutibus," belongs to the middle ages. — 2. We must carefully distinguish from Aemilius Macer of Verona, a poet Macer, who wrote on the Trojan war, and who must have been alive in A.D. 12, since he is addressed by Ovid in that year (ex Pont. ii. 10. 2.) — 3. A Roman jurist, who lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. He wrote several works, extracts from which are given in the Digest.

Măcer, Clōdĭus, was governor of Africa at Nero's death A.D. 68, when he laid claim to the throne. He was murdered at the instigation of Galba by the procurator, Trebonius Garucianus.

Măcer, Licinĭus. [LICINIUS.]

Macestus (Μάκηστος: Simaul-Su, and lower Susugherli), a considerable river of Mysia, rises in the N.W. of Phrygia, and flows N. through Mysia into the Rhyndacus. It is probably the same river which Polybius (v. 77) calls Megistus (Μέγιστος).

Machaerūs (Μαχαιροῦς: Μαχαιρίτης), a strong border fortress in the S. of Peraea, in Palestine, on the confines of the Nabathaei: a stronghold of the Sicarii in the Jewish war. A tradition made it the place where John the Baptist was beheaded.

Machanĭdas, tyrant of Lacedaemon, succeeded Lycurgus about B.C. 210. Like his predecessor, he had no hereditary title to the crown, but ruled by the swords of his mercenaries alone. He was defeated and slain in battle by Philopoemen, the general of the Achaean league in 207.

Măchāon (Μαχάων), son of Aesculapius, was married to Anticlea, the daughter of Diocles, by whom he became the father of Gorgasus, Nicomachus, Alexanor, Sphyrus, and Polemocrates. Together with his brother Podalirius he went to Troy with 30 ships, commanding the men who came from Tricca, Ithome, and Oechalia. In this war he acted as the surgeon of the Greeks, and also distinguished himself in battle. He was himself wounded by Paris, but was carried from the field by Nestor. Later writers mention him as one of the Greek heroes who were concealed in the wooden horse, and he is said to have cured Philoctetes. He was killed by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus, and he received divine honours at Gerenia, in Messenia.

Machlyes (Μάχλυες), a people of Libya, near the Lotophagi, on the W. side of the lake Triton, in what was afterwards called Africa Propria.

Machon (Μάχων), of Corinth or Sicyon, a comic poet, flourished at Alexandria, where he gave instructions respecting comedy to the grammarian Aristophanes of Byzantium.

Macistus or Macistum (Μάκιστος, Μάκιστον: Μακίστιος), an ancient town of Elis in Triphylia, N.E. of Lepreum, originally called Platanistus (Πλατανιστοῦς), and founded by the Caucones.

Macorăba (Μακοράβα: Mecca), a city in the W. of Arabia Felix; probably the sacred city of the Arabs, even before the time of Mohammed, and the seat of the worship of Alitat or Alitta under the emblem of a meteoric stone.

Macra (Magra), a small river rising in the Apennines and flowing into the Ligurian sea near Luna, which, from the time of Augustus, formed the boundary between Liguria and Etruria.

Macriănus, one of the 30 tyrants, a distinguished general, who accompanied Valerian in his expedition against the Persians, A. D. 260. On the capture of that monarch, Macrianus was proclaimed emperor, together with his 2 sons Macrianus and Quietus. He assigned the management of affairs in the East to Quietus, and set out with the younger Macrianus for Italy. They were encountered by Aureolus on the confines of Thrace and Illyria, defeated and slain, 262. Quietus was shortly afterwards slain in the East by Odenathus.

Macri Campi. [Campi Macri.]

Macrīnus, M. Opilius Sevērus, Roman emperor, April, A. D. 217—June, 218. He was born at Caesarea in Mauretania, of humble parents, A. D. 164, and rose at length to be praefect of the praetorians under Caracalla. He accompanied Caracalla in his expedition against the Parthians, and was proclaimed emperor after the death of Caracalla, whom he had caused to be assassinated. He conferred the title of Caesar upon his son Diadumenianus, and at the same time gained great popularity by repealing some obnoxious taxes. But in the course of the same year he was defeated with great loss by the Parthians, and was obliged to retire into Syria. While here his soldiers, with whom he had become unpopular by enforcing among them order and discipline, were easily seduced from their allegiance, and proclaimed Elagabalus as emperor. With the troops which remained faithful to him, Macrinus marched against the usurper, but was defeated, and fled in disguise. He was shortly afterwards seized in Chalcedon, and put to death, after a reign of 14 months.

Macro, Naevius Sertorius, a favourite of the emperor Tiberius, was employed to arrest the powerful Sejanus in A. D. 31. On the death of the latter he was made praefect of the praetorians, an office which he continued to hold for the remainder of Tiberius's reign and during the earlier part of Caligula's. Macro was as cruel as Sejanus. He laid informations; he presided at the rack; and he lent himself to the most savage caprices of Tiberius during the last and worst period of his government. During the lifetime of Tiberius he paid court to the young Caligula; and he promoted an intrigue between his wife Ennia and the young prince. It was rumoured that Macro shortened the last moments of Tiberius by stifling him with the bedding as he recovered unexpectedly from a swoon. But Caligula soon became jealous of Macro, and compelled him to kill himself with his wife and children, 38.

Macrŏbii (Μακρόβιοι, i. e. Long-lived), an Aethiopian people in Africa, placed by Herodotus (iii. 17) on the shores of the S. Ocean. It is in vain to attempt their accurate identification with any known people.

Macrobius, the grammarian, whose full name was Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius Macrobius. All we know about him is that he lived in the age of Honorius and Theodosius, that he was probably a Greek, and that he had a son named Eustathius. He states in the preface to his Saturnalia that Latin was to him a foreign tongue, and hence we may fairly conclude that he was a Greek by birth, more especially as we find numerous Greek idioms in his style. He was probably a pagan. His extant works are:—1. Saturnaliorum Conviviorum Libri VII., consisting of a series of dissertations on history, mythology, criticism, and various points of antiquarian research, supposed to have been delivered during the holidays of the Saturnalia at the house of Vettius Praetextatus, who was invested with the highest offices of state under Valentinian and Valens. The form of the work is avowedly copied from the dialogues of Plato, especially the Banquet: in substance it bears a strong resemblance to the Noctes Atticae of A. Gellius. The 1st book treats of the festivals of Saturnus and Janus, of the Roman calendar, &c. The 2nd book commences with a collection of bon mots, ascribed to the most celebrated wits of antiquity; to these are appended a series of essays on matters connected with the pleasures of the table. The 4 following books are devoted to criticisms on Virgil. The 7th book is of a more miscellaneous character than the preceding.—2. Commentarius ex Cicerone in Somnium Scipionis, a tract much studied during the middle ages. The Dream of Scipio, contained in the 6th book of Cicero's De Republica is taken as a text, which suggests a succession of discourses on the physical constitution of the universe, according to the views of the New Platonists, together with notices of some of their peculiar tenets on mind as well as matter.—3. De Differentiis et Societatibus Graeci Latinique Verbi, a treatise purely grammatical, of which only an abridgment is extant, compiled by a certain Joannes.—The best editions of the works of Macrobius are by Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1670, and by Zeunius, Lips. 1774.

Macrōnes (Μάκρωνες), a powerful and warlike Caucasian people on the N.E. shore of the Pontus Euxinus.

Mactōrium (Μακτώριον: Μακτωρῖνος), a town in the S. of Sicily, near Gela.

Macynia (Μακυνία: Μακυνεύς), a town in the S. of Aetolia, near the mountain Taphiassus, E. of Calydon and the Evenus.

Madianītae (Μαδιανῖται, Μαδιηναῖοι, Μαδιηνοί: O. T. Midianim), a powerful nomad people in the S. of Arabia Petraea, about the head of the Red Sea. They carried on a caravan trade between Arabia and Egypt, and were troublesome enemies of the Israelites until they were conquered by Gideon. They do not appear in history after the Babylonish captivity.

Madytus (Μάδυτος: Μαδύτιος: Maito), a seaport town on the Thracian Chersonesus.

Maeander (Μαίανδρος: Menderch or Meinder, or Boyuk-Mendereh, i. e. the Great Mendereh, in contradistinction to the Little Mendereh, the ancient Caÿster), has its source in the mountain called Aulocrenas, above Celaenae, in the S. of Phrygia, close to the source of the Marsyas, which immediately joins it. [CELAENAE.] It flows in a general W. direction, with various changes of direction, but on the whole with a slight inclination to the S. After leaving Phrygia, it flows parallel to Mt. Messogis, on its S. side, forming the boundary between Lydia and Caria, and at last falls into the Icarian Sea between Myus and Priene. Its whole length is above 170 geographical miles. The Maeander is deep, but narrow, and very turbid; and therefore not navigable far up. Its upper course lies chiefly through elevated plains, and partly in a deep rocky valley: its lower course, for the last 110 miles, is through a beautiful wide plain, through which it flows in those numerous windings that have made its name a descriptive verb (to meander), and which it often inundates. The alteration made in the coast about its mouth by its alluvial deposit was observed by the ancients, and it has been continually going on. [See LATMICUS SINUS and MILETUS.] The tributaries of the Maeander were, on the right or N. side, the Marsyas, Cludrus, Lethaeus, and Gaeson, and, on the left or S. side, the Obrimas, Lycus, Harpasus, and another Marsyas. — As a god Maeander is described as the father of the nymph Cyane, who was the mother of Caunus. Hence the latter is called by Ovid (Met. ix. 573) Maeandrius juvenis.

Maecēnas, C. Cilnĭus, was born some time between B. C. 73 and 63; and we learn from Horace (Carm. iv. 11) that his birth-day was the 13th of April. His family, though belonging wholly to the equestrian order, was of high antiquity and honour, and traced its descent from the Lucumones of Etruria. His paternal ancestors the Cilnii, are mentioned by Livy (x. 3, 5) as having attained great power and wealth at Arretium about B. C. 301. The maternal branch of the family was likewise of Etruscan origin, and it was from them that the name of Maecenas was derived, it being customary among the Etruscans to assume the mother's as well as the father's name. It is in allusion to this circumstance that Horace (Sat. i. 6. 3) mentions both his avus maternus atque paternus as having been distinguished by commanding numerous legions; a passage, by the way, from which we are not to infer that the ancestors of Maecenas had ever led the Roman legions. Although it is unknown where Maecenas received his education, it must doubtless have been a careful one. We learn from Horace that he was versed both in Greek and Roman literature; and his taste for literary pursuits was shown, not only by his patronage of the most eminent poets of his time, but also by several performances of his own, both in verse and prose. It has been conjectured that he became acquainted with Augustus at Apollonia before the death of Julius Caesar; but he is mentioned for the first time in B. C. 40, and from this year his name constantly occurs as one of the chief friends and ministers of Augustus. Thus we find him employed in B. C. 37, in negotiating with Antony; and it was probably on this occasion that Horace accompanied him to Brundisium, a journey which he has described in the 5th satire of the 1st book. During the war with Antony, which was brought to a close by the battle of Actium, Maecenas remained at Rome, being entrusted with the administration of the civil affairs of Italy. During this time he suppressed the conspiracy of the younger Lepidus. Maecenas was not present at the battle of Actium, as some critics have supposed; and the 1st epode of Horace probably does not relate at all to Actium, but to the Sicilian expedition against Sext. Pompeius. On the return of Augustus from Actium, Maecenas enjoyed a greater share of his favour than ever, and in conjunction with Agrippa, had the management of all public affairs. It is related that Augustus at this time took counsel with Agrippa and Maecenas respecting the expediency of restoring the republic; that Agrippa advised him to pursue that course, but that Maecenas strongly urged him to establish the empire. For many years Maecenas continued to preserve the uninterrupted favour of Augustus; but between B. C. 21 and 16, a coolness, to say the least, had sprung up between the emperor and his faithful minister, and after the latter year he retired entirely from public life. The cause of this estrangement is enveloped in doubt. Dion Cassius positively attributes it to an intrigue carried on by Augustus with Terentia, Maecenas's wife. Maecenas died B. C. 8, and was buried on the Esquiline. He left no children, and he bequeathed his property to Augustus. — Maecenas had amassed an enormous fortune. He had purchased a tract of ground on the Esquiline hill, which had formerly served as a burial-place for the lower orders. (Hor. Sat. i. 8. 7.) Here he had planted a garden, and built a house, remarkable for its loftiness, on account of a tower by which it was surmounted, and from the top of which Nero is said to have afterwards contemplated the burning of Rome. In this residence he seems to have passed the greater part of his time, and to have visited the country but seldom. His house was the rendezvous of all the wits of Rome; and whoever could contribute to the amusement of the company was always welcome to a seat at his table. But his really intimate friends consisted of the greatest geniuses and most learned men of Rome; and if it was from his universal inclination towards men of talent that he obtained the reputation of a literary patron, it was by his friendship for such poets as Virgil and Horace that he deserved it. Virgil was indebted to him for the recovery of his farm, which had been appropriated by the soldiery in the division of lands, in B. C. 41; and it was at the request of Maecenas that he undertook the Georgics, the most finished of all his poems. To Horace he was a still greater benefactor. He presented him with the means of comfortable subsistence, a farm in the Sabine country. If the estate was but a moderate one, we learn from Horace himself that the bounty of Maecenas was regulated by his own contented views, and not by his patron's want of generosity. (Carm. ii. 18. 14, Carm. iii. 16. 38.) — Of Maecenas's own literary productions only a few fragments exist. From these, however, and from the notices which we find of his writings in ancient authors, we are led to think that we have not suffered any great loss by their destruction; for, although a good judge of literary merit in others, he does not appear to have been an author of much taste himself. In his way of life Maecenas was addicted to every species of luxury. We find several allusions in the ancient authors to the effeminacy of his dress. He was fond of theatrical entertainments, especially pantomimes; as may be inferred from his patronage of Bathyllus, the celebrated dancer, who was a freedman of his. That moderation of character which led him to be content with his equestrian rank, probably arose from his love of ease and luxury, or it might have been the result of more prudent and political views. As a politician, the principal trait in his character was fidelity to his master, and the main end of all his cares was the consolidation of the empire. But at the same time he recommended Augustus to put no check on the free expression of public opinion; and above all to avoid that cruelty, which, for so many years, had stained the Roman annals with blood.

Maecĭus Tarpa. [TARPA.]

Maedĭca (Μαιδική), the country of the Maedi, a powerful people in the W. of Thrace, on the W. bank of the Strymon, and the S. slope of Mt. Scomius. They frequently made inroads into the country of the Macedonians, till at length they were conquered by the latter people, and their land incorporated with Macedonia, of which it formed the N.E. district.

Maelĭus, Sp., the richest of the plebeian knights, employed his fortune in buying up corn in Etruria in the great famine at Rome in B.C. 440. This corn he sold to the poor at a small price, or distributed it gratuitously. Such liberality gained him the favour of the plebeians, but at the same time exposed him to the hatred of the ruling class. Accordingly in the following year he was accused of having formed a conspiracy for the purpose of seizing the kingly power. Thereupon Cincinnatus was appointed dictator, and C. Servilius Ahala, the master of the horse. Maelius was summoned to appear before the tribunal of the dictator; but as he refused to go, Ahala, with an armed band of patrician youths, rushed into the crowd, and slew him. His property was confiscated, and his house pulled down; its vacant site, which was called the Aequimaelium, continued to subsequent ages a memorial of his fate. Later ages fully believed the story of Maelius's conspiracy, and Cicero repeatedly praises the glorious deed of Ahala. But his guilt is very doubtful. None of the alleged accomplices of Maelius were punished; and Ahala was brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile.

Maenăca (Μαινάκη), a town in the S. of Hispania Baetica on the coast, the most W.-ly colony of the Phocaeans.

Maenădes (Μαινάδες), a name of the Bacchantes, from μαίνομαι, "to be mad," because they were frenzied in the worship of Dionysus or Bacchus.

Maenălus (τὸ Μαίναλον or Μαινάλιον ὄρος: Roïnon), a mountain in Arcadia, which extended from Megalopolis to Tegea, was celebrated as the favourite haunt of the god Pan. From this mountain the surrounding country was called Maenălia (Μαιναλία); and on the mountain was a town Maenalus. The mountain was so celebrated that the Roman poets frequently use the adjectives Maenalius and Maenalis as equivalent to Arcadian.

Maenĭus. 1. C., consul, B.C. 338, with L. Furius Camillus. The 2 consuls completed the subjugation of Latium; they were both rewarded with a triumph; and equestrian statues were erected to their honour in the forum. The statue of Maenius was placed upon a column, which is spoken of by later writers, under the name of Columna Maenia, and which appears to have stood near the end of the forum, on the Capitoline. Maenius was dictator in 320, and censor in 318. In his censorship he allowed balconies to be added to the various buildings surrounding the forum, in order that the spectators might obtain more room for beholding the games which were exhibited in the forum; and these balconies were called after him Maeniana (sc. aedificia). — 2. The proposer of the law, about 286, which required the patres to give their sanction to the election of the magistrates before they had been elected, or in other words to confer, or agree to confer, the imperium on the person whom the comitia should elect. — 3. A contemporary of Lucilius, was a great spendthrift, who squandered all his property, and afterwards supported himself by playing the buffoon. He possessed a house in the forum, which Cato in his censorship (184) purchased of him, for the purpose of building the basilica Porcia. Some of the scholiasts on Horace ridiculously relate, that when Maenius sold his house, he reserved for himself one column, the Columna Maenia, from which he built a balcony, that he might thence witness the games. The true origin of the Columna Maenia, and of the balconies called Maeniana, has been explained above. (Hor. Sat. i. 1. 101, i. 3. 21, Epist. i. 15. 26.)

Maenŏba, a town in the S.E. of Hispania Baetica, near the coast, situated on a river of the same name, and 12 miles E. of Malaca.

Maeon (Μαίων). 1. Son of Haemon of Thebes. He and Lycophontes were the leaders of the band that lay in ambush against Tydeus, in the war of the Seven against Thebes. Maeon was the only one whose life was spared by Tydeus. Maeon in return buried Tydeus, when the latter was slain. — 2. Husband of Dindyme, the mother of Cybele.

Maeŏnĭa. [LYDIA.]

Maeŏnĭdes (Μαιονίδης), i.e. Homer, either because he was a son of Maeon, or because he was a native of Maeonia, the ancient name of Lydia. Hence he is also called Maeonius senex, and his poems the Maeoniae chartae, or Maeonium carmen. — Maeŏnis, also occurs as a surname of Omphale, and of Arachne, because both were Lydians.

Maeŏtae. [MAEOTIS PALUS.]

Maeōtis Pălus (ἡ Μαιῶτις λίμνη: Sea of Azov), an inland sea on the borders of Europe and Asia, N. of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), with which it communicates by the BOSPORUS CIMMERIUS. Its form may be described roughly as a triangle, with its vertex at its N.E. extremity, where it receives the waters of the great river Tanaïs (Don): it discharges its superfluous water by a constant current into the Euxine. The ancients had very vague notions of its true form and size: the earlier geographers thought that both it and the Caspian Sea were gulfs of the great N. Ocean. The Scythian tribes on its banks were called by the collective name of Maeŏtae or Maeŏtici (Μαιῶται, Μαιωτικοί). The sea had also the names of Cimmerium or Bosporicum Mare. Aeschylus (Prom. 731) applies the name of Maeotic Strait to the Cimmerian Bosporus (αὐλῶν' Μαιωτικόν).

Maera (Μαῖρα). 1. The dog of Icarius, the father of Erigone. [ICARIUS, No. 1.] — 2. Daughter of Proetus and Antea, a companion of Artemis, by whom she was killed, after she had become by Zeus the mother of Locrus. Others state that she died a virgin. — 3. Daughter of Atlas, was married to Tegeates, the son of Lycaon. Her tomb was shown both at Tegea and Mantinea in Arcadia.

Maesa, Julia, sister-in-law of Septimius Severus, aunt of Caracalla, and grandmother of Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. She was a native of Emesa in Syria, and seems, after the elevation of Septimius Severus, the husband of her sister Julia Domna, to have lived at the imperial court until the death of Caracalla, and to have accumulated great wealth. She contrived and executed the plot which transferred the supreme power from Macrinus to her grandson ELAGABALUS. When she foresaw the downfall of the latter, she prevailed on him to adopt his cousin ALEXANDER SEVERUS. By Severus she was always treated with the greatest respect; she enjoyed the title of Augusta during her life, and received divine honours after her death.

Maevĭus. [BAVIUS.]

Magăba, a mountain in Galatia, 10 Roman miles E. of Ancyra.

Magas (Μάγας), king of Cyrene, was a step-son of Ptolemy Soter, being the offspring of Berenice by a former marriage. He was a Macedonian by birth; and he seems to have accompanied his mother to Egypt, where he soon rose to a high place in the favour of Ptolemy. In B.C. 308 he was appointed by that monarch to the command of the expedition destined for the recovery of Cyrene after the death of Ophellas. The enterprise was completely successful, and Magas obtained from his step-father the government of the province. At first he ruled over the province only as a dependency of Egypt, but after the death of Ptolemy Soter he not only assumed the character of an independent monarch, but even made war on the king of Egypt. He married Apama, daughter of Antiochus Soter, by whom he had a daughter, Berenice, afterwards the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes. He died 258.

Magdŏlum (Μάγδολον, Μάγδωλον: O.T. Migdol), a city of Lower Egypt, near the N.E. frontier, about 12 miles S.W. of Pelusium: where Pharaoh Necho defeated the Syrians, according to Herodotus (ii. 159).

Magetobria (Moigte de Broie, on the Saone), a town on the W. frontiers of the Sequani, near which the Gauls were defeated by the Germans shortly before Caesar's arrival in Gaul.

Măgi (Μάγοι), the name of the order of priests and religious teachers among the Medes and Persians, is said to be derived from the Persian word mag, mog, or mugh, i.e. a priest. There is strong evidence that a class similar to the Magi, and in some cases bearing the same name, existed among other Eastern nations, especially the Chaldaeans of Babylon; nor is it at all probable that either the Magi, or their religion, were of strictly Median or Persian origin: but, in classical literature, they are presented to us almost exclusively in connection with Medo-Persian history. Herodotus represents them as one of the 6 tribes into which the Median people were divided. Under the Median empire, before the supremacy passed to the Persians, they were so closely connected with the throne, and had so great an influence in the state, that they evidently retained their position after the revolution; and they had power enough to be almost successful in the attempt they made to overthrow the Persian dynasty after the death of Cambyses, by putting forward one of their own number as a pretender to the throne, alleging that he was Smerdis, the son of Cyrus, who had been put to death by his brother Cambyses. It is clear that this was a plot to restore the Median supremacy; but whether it arose from mere ambition, or from any diminution of the power of the Magi under the vigorous government of Cyrus, cannot be said with certainty. The defeat of this Magian conspiracy by Darius the son of Hystaspes and the other Persian nobles was followed by a general massacre of the Magi, which was celebrated by an annual festival (τὰ Μαγοφόνια), during which no Magian was permitted to appear in public. Still their position as the only ministers of religion remained unaltered. The breaking up of the Persian empire must have greatly altered their condition; but they still continue to appear in history down to the time of the later Roman empire. The "wise men" who came from the East to Jerusalem at the time of our Saviour's birth were Magi (μάγοι is their name in the original, Matt. ii. 1). Simon, who had deceived the people of Samaria before Philip preached to them (Acts, viii.), and Elymas, who tried to hinder the conversion of Sergius Paulus at Cyprus (Acts, xiii.), are both called Magians; but in these cases the words μάγος and μαγεύων are used in a secondary sense, for a person who pretends to the wisdom, or practises the arts, of the Magi. This use of the name occurs very early among the Greeks, and from it we get our word magic (ἡ μαγική, i.e. the art or science of the Magi).—The constitution of the Magi as an order is ascribed by tradition to Zoroastres, or Zoroaster as the Greeks and Romans called him, the Zarathustra of the Zendavesta (the sacred books of the ancient Persians), and the Zerdusht of the modern Persians; but whether he was their founder, their reformer, or the mythical representative of their unknown origin, cannot be decided. He is said to have restored the true knowledge of the supreme good principle (Ormuzd), and to have taught his worship to the Magi, whom he divided into 3 classes, learners, masters, and perfect scholars. They alone could teach the truths and perform the ceremonies of religion, foretell the future, interpret dreams and omens, and ascertain the will of Ormuzd by the arts of divination. They had 3 chief methods of divination, by calling up the dead, by cups or dishes, and by waters. The forms of worship and divination were strictly defined, and were handed down among the Magi by tradition. Like all early priesthoods, they seem to have been the sole possessors of all the science of their age. To be instructed in their learning was esteemed the highest of privileges, and was permitted, with rare exceptions, to none but the princes of the royal family. Their learning became celebrated at an early period in Greece, by the name of μάγεια, and was made the subject of speculation by the philosophers, whose knowledge of it seems, however, to have been very limited; while their high pretensions, and the tricks by which their knowledge of science enabled them to impose upon the ignorant, soon attached to their name among the Greeks and Romans that bad meaning which is still commonly connected with the words derived from it. — Besides being priests and men of learning, the Magi appear to have discharged judicial functions.

Magna Graecĭa. [GRAECIA.]

Magna Mater. [RHEA.]

Magnentĭus, Roman emperor in the West, A.D. 350—353, whose full name was FLAVIUS POPILIUS MAGNENTIUS. He was a German by birth, and after serving as a common soldier was eventually intrusted by Constans, the son of Constantine the Great, with the command of the Jovian and Herculian battalions who had replaced the ancient praetorian guards when the empire was remodelled by Diocletian. He availed himself of his position to organise a conspiracy against the weak and profligate Constans, who was put to death by his emissaries. Magnentius thereupon was acknowledged as emperor in all the Western provinces, except Illyria, where Vetranio had assumed the purple. Constantius hurried from the frontier of Persia to crush the usurpers. Vetranio submitted to Constantius at Sardica in December, 350. Magnentius was first defeated by Constantius at the sanguinary battle of Mursa on the Drave, in the autumn of 351, and was obliged to fly into Gaul. He was defeated a second time in the passes of the Cottian Alps, and put an end to his own life about the middle of August, 353. Magnentius was a man of commanding stature and great bodily strength ; but not one spark of virtue relieved the blackness of his career as a sovereign. The power which he obtained by treachery and murder he maintained by extortion and cruelty.

Magnes (Μάγνης), one of the most important of the earlier Athenian comic poets of the old comedy, was a native of the demus of Icaria or Icarius, in Attica. He flourished B. C. 460, and onwards, and died at an advanced age, shortly before the representation of the Knights of Aristophanes, that is, in 423. (Aristoph. Equit. 524.) His plays contained a great deal of coarse buffoonery.

Magnēsĭa (Μαγνησία : Μάγνης, pl. Μάγνητες). 1. The most E.-ly district of Thessaly, was a long narrow slip of country, extending from the Peneus on the N. to the Pagasaean gulf on the S., and bounded on the W. by the great Thessalian plain. It was a mountainous country, as it comprehended the Mts. Ossa and Pelion. Its inhabitants, the Magnetes, are said to have founded the 2 cities in Asia mentioned below. — 2. M. ad Sipy̆lum (M. πρὸς Σιπύλῳ or ὑπὸ Σιπύλῳ: Manissa, Ru.), a city in the N.W. of Lydia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of the N.W. declivity of Mt. Sipylus, and on the S. bank of the Hermus, is famous in history as the scene of the victory gained by the 2 Scipios over Antiochus the Great, which secured to the Romans the empire of the East, B. C. 190. After the Mithridatic war, the Romans made it a libera civitas. It suffered, with other cities of Asia Minor, from the great earthquake in the reign of Tiberius ; but it was still a place of importance in the 5th century. — 3. M. ad Maeandrum (M. ἡ πρὸς Μαιάνδρῳ, M. ἐπὶ Μαιάνδρῳ : Inek-bazar, Ru.), a city in the S.W. of Lydia, in Asia Minor, was situated on the river Lethaeus, a N. tributary of the Maeander. It was destroyed by the Cimmerians (probably about B. C. 700) and rebuilt by colonists from Miletus, so that it became an Ionian city by race as well as position. It was one of the cities given to Themistocles by Artaxerxes. It was celebrated for its temple of Artemis Leucophryene, one of most beautiful in Asia Minor, the ruins of which still exist.

Magnŏpŏlis (Μαγνόπολις), or Eupatoria Magnopolis, a city of Pontus, in Asia Minor, near the confluence of the rivers Lycus and Iris, begun by Mithridates Eupator and finished by Pompey, but probably destroyed before very long.

Măgo (Μάγων). 1. A Carthaginian, said to have been the founder of the military power of that city, by introducing a regular discipline and organisation into her armies. He flourished from B. C. 550 to 500, and was probably the father of Hasdrubal, who was slain in the battle against Gelo at Himera [HAMILCAR, No. 1.] — 2. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet under Himilco in the war against Dionysius, 396. When Himilco returned to Africa after the disastrous termination of the expedition, Mago appears to have been invested with the chief command in Sicily. He carried on the war with Dionysius, but in 392 was compelled to conclude a treaty of peace, by which he abandoned his allies the Sicilians to the power of Dionysius. In 383 he again invaded Sicily, but was defeated by Dionysius and slain in the battle. — 3. Commander of the Carthaginian army in Sicily in 344. He assisted Hicetas in the war against Timoleon; but becoming apprehensive of treachery, he sailed away to Carthage. Here he put an end to his own life, to avoid a worse fate at the hands of his countrymen, who, nevertheless crucified his lifeless body. — 4. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and youngest brother of the famous Hannibal. He accompanied Hannibal to Italy, and after the battle of Cannae (216) carried the news of this great victory to Carthage. But instead of returning to Italy, he was sent into Spain with a considerable force to the support of his other brother Hasdrubal, who was hard pressed by the 2 Scipios (215). He continued in this country for many years ; and after his brother Hasdrubal quitted Spain in 208, in order to march to the assistance of Hannibal in Italy, the command in Spain devolved upon him and upon Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. After their decisive defeat by Scipio at Silpia in 206, Mago retired to Gades, and subsequently passed the winter in the lesser of the Balearic islands, where the memory of his sojourn is still preserved, in the name of the celebrated harbour, Portus Magonis, or Port Mahon. Early in the ensuing summer (205) Mago landed in Liguria, where he surprised the town of Genoa. Here he maintained himself for 2 years, but in 203 he was defeated with great loss in Cisalpine Gaul, by Quintilius Varus, and was himself severely wounded. Shortly afterwards he embarked his troops in order to return to Africa, but he died of his wound before reaching Africa. Cornelius Nepos, in opposition to all other authorities, represents Mago as surviving the battle of Zama, and says that he perished in a shipwreck, or was assassinated by his slaves. — 5. Surnamed the Samnite, was one of the chief officers of Hannibal in Italy, where he held for a considerable time the chief command in Bruttium. — 6. Commander of the garrison of New Carthage when that city was taken by Scipio Africanus, 209. Mago was sent a prisoner to Rome. — 7. A Carthaginian of uncertain date, who wrote a work upon agriculture in the Punic language, in 28 books. So great was the reputation of this work even at Rome, that after the destruction of Carthage, the senate ordered that it should be translated into Latin by competent persons, at the head of whom was D. Silanus. It was subsequently translated into Greek, though with some abridgment and alteration, by Cassius Dionysius of Utica. Mago's precepts on agricultural matters are continually cited by the Roman writers on those subjects in terms of the highest commendation.

Magōnis Portus. [MAGO, No. 4.]

Magontiăcum. [MOGONTIACUM.]

Maharbal (Μαάρβας), son of Himilco, and one of the most distinguished officers of Hannibal in the 2nd Punic war. He is first mentioned at the siege of Saguntum. After the battle of Cannae he urged Hannibal to push on at once with his cavalry upon Rome itself; and on the refusal of his commander, he is said to have observed, that Hannibal knew indeed how to gain victories, but not how to use them.

Maia (Μαῖα or Μαιάς), daughter of Atlas and Pleione, was the eldest of the Pleiades, and the most beautiful of the 7 sisters. In a grotto of Mt. Cyllene in Arcadia she became by Zeus the mother of Hermes. Arcas, the son of Zeus by Callisto, was given to her to be reared. [PLEIADES.]—Maia was likewise the name of a divinity worshipped at Rome, who was also called Majesta. She is mentioned in connection with Vulcan, and was regarded by some as the wife of that god, though it seems for no other reason but because a priest of Vulcan offered a sacrifice to her on the 1st of May. In the popular superstition of later times she was identified with Maia, the daughter of Atlas.

Mājōriānus, Jūlius Vălĕrius, Roman emperor in the West, A. D. 457—461, was raised to the empire by Ricimer. His reign was chiefly occupied in making preparations to invade the Vandals in Africa; but the immense fleet which he had collected for this purpose in the harbour of New Carthage in Spain was destroyed by the Vandals in 460. Thereupon he concluded a peace with Genseric. His activity and popularity excited the jealousy of Ricimer, who compelled him to abdicate and then put an end to his life.

Majūma. [CONSTANTIA, No. 3.]

Malăca (Malaga), an important town on the coast of Hispania Baetica, and on a river of the same name (Guadalmedina), was founded by the Phoenicians, and has always been a flourishing place of commerce from the earliest times to the present day.

Malalas. [MALELAS.]

Malanga (Μαλάγγα), a city of India, probably the modern Madras.

Malchus (Μάλχος), of Philadelphia in Syria, a Byzantine historian and rhetorician, wrote a history of the empire from A. D. 474 to 480, of which we have some extracts, published along with Dexippus by Bekker and Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829.

Malĕa (Μαλέα ἄκρα: C. Maria), the S. promontory of the island of Lesbos.

Malĕa (Μαλέα or Μαλέαι: C. St. Angelo or Malio di St. Angelo), a promontory on the S.E. of Laconia, separating the Argolic and Laconic gulfs; the passage round it was much dreaded by sailors. Here was a temple of Apollo, who hence bore the surname Maleātes.

Malĕlas, or Malălas, Joannes (Ἰωάννης ὁ Μαλέλα or Μαλάλα), a native of Antioch, and a Byzantine historian, lived shortly after Justinian the Great. The word Malalas signifies in Syriac an orator. He wrote a chronicle of universal history from the creation of the world to the reign of Justinian inclusive. Edited by Dindorf, Bonn, 1831.

Malēnē (Μαλήνη), a city of Mysia, only mentioned by Herodotus (vi. 29).

Maliăcus Sinus (Μαλιακὸς κόλπος: Bay of Zeitun), a narrow bay in the S. of Thessaly, running W. from the N.W. point of the island of Euboea. On one side of it is the pass of Thermopylae. It derived its name from the Malienses, who dwelt on its shores. It is sometimes called the Lamiacus Sinus, from the town of Lamia in its neighbourhood.

Mālis (Μαλὶς γῆ, Ionic and Att. Μηλὶς γῆ: Μαλιεύς or Μηλιεύς, Maliensis), a district in the S. of Thessaly, on the shores of the Maliacus Sinus, and opposite the N.W. point of the island of Euboea. It extended as far as the pass of Thermopylae. Its inhabitants, the Malians, were Dorians, and belonged to the Amphictyonic league.

Malli (Μαλλοί), an Indian people on both sides of the HYDRAOTES: their capital is supposed to have been on the site of the celebrated fortress of Mooltan.

Mallus (Μαλλός), a very ancient city of Cilicia, on a hill a little E. of the mouth of the river Pyramus, was said to have been founded at the time of the Trojan War by Mopsus and Amphilochus. It had a port called Magarsa.

Maluginensis, a celebrated patrician family of the Cornelia gens in the early ages of the republic, the members of which frequently held the consulship. It disappears from history before the time of the Samnite wars.

Malva. [MULUCHA.]

Mamaea, Julia, a native of Emesa in Syria, was daughter of Julia Maesa, and mother of Alexander Severus. She was a woman of integrity and virtue, and brought up her son with the utmost care. She was put to death by the soldiers along with her son, A. D. 235.

Māmercus. 1. Son of king Numa, according to one tradition, and son of Mars and Silvia, according to another.—2. Tyrant of Catana, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, B. C. 344. After his defeat by Timoleon he fled to Messana, and took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. But when Timoleon laid siege to Messana, Hippon took to flight, and Mamercus surrendered, stipulating only for a regular trial before the Syracusans. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly of the people there, he was condemned by acclamation, and executed like a common malefactor.

Mamercus or Mamercīnus, Aemĭlius, a distinguished patrician family which professed to derive its name from Mamercus in the reign of Numa. 1. L., thrice consul, namely, B. C. 484, 478, 473.—2. Tib., twice consul, 470 and 467.—3. Mam., thrice dictator, 437, 433, and 426. In his first dictatorship he carried on war against the Veientines and Fidenae. Lar Tolumnius, the king of Veii, is said to have been killed in single combat in this year by Cornelius Cossus. In his 2nd dictatorship Aemilius carried a law limiting to 18 months the duration of the censorship, which had formerly lasted for 5 years. This measure was received with great approbation by the people; but the censors then in office were so enraged at it, that they removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an aerarian.—4. L., a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, was twice consul 341 and 329, and once dictator 335. In his 2nd consulship he took Privernum, and hence received the surname of Privernas.

Mamers, the Oscan name of the god MARS.

Māmertīni. [MESSANA.]

Mamertĭum (Mamertini), a town in Bruttium, of uncertain site, founded by a band of Samnites, who had left their mother country under the protection of Mamers or Mars, to seek a new home.

Mamīlĭa Gens, plebeian, was originally a distinguished family in Tusculum. They traced their name and origin to Mamilia, the daughter of Telegonus, the founder of Tusculum, and the son of Ulysses and the goddess Circe. It was to a member of this family, Octavius Mamilius, that Tarquinius betrothed his daughter; and on his expulsion from Rome, he took refuge with his son-in-law, who, according to the beautiful lay preserved by Livy, roused the Latin people against the infant republic, and perished in the great battle at the lake Regillus. In B.C. 458, the Roman citizenship was given to L. Mamilius the dictator of Tusculum, because he had 2 years before marched to the assistance of the city when it was attacked by Herdonius. The gens was divided into 3 families, Limetanus, Turrinus, and Vitulus, but none of them became of much importance.

Mammŭla, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens, which never became of much importance in the state.

Māmurĭus Veturĭus. [VETURIUS.]

Māmurra, a Roman eques, born at Formiae, was the commander of the engineers (praefectus fabrum) in Julius Caesar's army in Gaul. He amassed great riches, the greater part of which, however, he owed to Caesar's liberality. He was the first person at Rome who covered all the walls of his house with layers of marble, and also the first, all of the columns in whose house were made of solid marble. He was violently attacked by Catullus in his poems, who called him decoctor Formianus. Mamurra seems to have been alive in the time of Horace, who calls Formiae, in ridicule, Mamurrarum urbs (Sat. i. 5. 37), from which we may infer that his name had become a byword of contempt.

Mancĭa, Helvĭus, a Roman orator, about B.C. 90, who was remarkably ugly, and whose name is recorded chiefly in consequence of a laugh being raised against him on account of his deformity by C. Julius Caesar Strabo, who was opposed to him on one occasion in some lawsuit.

Mancīnus, Hostilĭus. 1. A., was praetor urbanus B.C. 180, and consul 170, when he had the conduct of the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. He remained in Greece for part of the next year (169) as proconsul. — 2. L., was legate of the consul L. Calpurnius Piso (148) in the siege of Carthage, in the 3rd Punic war. He was consul 145. — 3. C., consul 137, had the conduct of the war against Numantia. He was defeated by the Numantines, and purchased the safety of the remainder of his army by making a peace with the Numantines. The senate refused to recognise it, and went through the hypocritical ceremony of delivering him over to the enemy, by means of the fetiales. This was done with the consent of Mancinus, but the enemy refused to accept him. On his return to Rome Mancinus took his seat in the senate, as heretofore, but was violently expelled from it by the tribune P. Rutilius, on the ground that he had lost his citizenship. As the enemy had not received him, it was a disputed question whether he was a citizen or not by the Jus Postliminii (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Postliminium), but the better opinion was that he had lost his civic rights, and they were accordingly restored to him by a lex.

Mandānē. [CYRUS.]

Mandōnĭus. [INDIBILIS.]

Mandrūpĭum, Mandropus, or Mandrūpŏlis (Μανδρουπολις), a town in the S. of Phrygia, on the lake Caralitis.

Mandubĭi, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, in the modern Burgundy, whose chief town was ALESIA.

Mandurĭa (Μανδύριον in Plut.: Casal Nuovo), a town in Calabria, on the road from Tarentum to Hydruntum, and near a small lake, which is said to have been always full to the edge, whatever water was added to or taken from it. Here Archidamus III., king of Sparta, was defeated and slain in battle by the Messapians and Lucanians, B.C. 338.

Mānēs, the general name by which the Romans designated the souls of the departed; but as it is a natural tendency to consider the souls of departed friends as blessed spirits, the Manes were regarded as gods, and were worshipped with divine honours. Hence on Roman sepulchres we find D. M. S., that is, Dîs Manibus Sacrum. [LARES.] At certain seasons, which were looked upon as sacred days (feriae denicales), sacrifices were offered to the spirits of the departed. An annual festival, which belonged to all the Manes in general, was celebrated on the 19th of February, under the name of Feralia or Parentalia, because it was the duty of children and heirs to offer sacrifices to the shades of their parents and benefactors.

Mănĕtho (Μανεθώς or Μανεθών), an Egyptian priest of the town of Sebennytus, who lived in the reign of the first Ptolemy. He was the first Egyptian who gave in the Greek language an account of the religion and history of his country. He based his information upon the ancient works of the Egyptians themselves, and more especially upon their sacred books. The work in which he gave an account of the theology of the Egyptians and of the origin of the gods and the world, bore the title of Τῶν Φυσικῶν Ἐπιτομή. His historical work was entitled a History of Egypt. It was divided into 3 parts or books. The first contained the history of the country previous to the 30 dynasties, or what may be termed the mythology of Egypt, and also of the first dynasties. The 2nd opened with the 11th, 12th, and concluded with the 19th dynasty. The 3rd gave the history of the remainining 11 dynasties, and concluded with an account of Nectanebus, the last of the native Egyptian kings. The work of Manetho is lost; but a list of the dynasties is preserved in Julius Africanus and Eusebius (most correct in the Armenian version), who, however, has introduced various interpolations. According to the calculation of Manetho, the 30 dynasties, beginning with Menes, filled a period of 3555 years. The lists of the Egyptian kings and the duration of their several reigns were undoubtedly derived by him from genuine documents, and their correctness, so far as they are not interpolated, is said to be confirmed by the hieroglyphic inscriptions on the monuments. There exists an astrological poem, entitled Ἀποτελεσματικά, in 6 books, which bears the name of Manetho; but this poem is spurious, and cannot have been written before the 5th century of our era. Edited by Axt and Rigler, Cologne, 1832.

Manĭa, a formidable Italian, probably Etruscan, divinity of the lower world, called the mother of the Manes or Lares. The festival of the Compitalia was celebrated as a propitiation to Mania in common with the Lares.

Mānīlĭa. 1. M., was consul B.C. 149, the first year of the 3rd Punic war, and carried on war against Carthage. He was celebrated as a jurist, and is one of the speakers in Cicero's De Re Publica (i. 12). — 2. C., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 66, proposed the law, granting to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates and Tigranes, and the government of the provinces of Asia, Cilicia, and Bithynia. This bill was warmly opposed by Q. Catulus, Q. Hortensius, and the leaders of the aristocratical party, but was supported by Cicero, in an oration which has come down to us. At the end of his year Manilius was brought to trial by the aristocratical party, and was condemned; but we do not know of what offence he was accused. — 3. Also called Manlius or Mallius, a Roman poet of uncertain age, but is conjectured to have lived in the time of Augustus. He is the author of an astrological poem in 5 books, entitled Astronomica. The style of this poem is extremely faulty, being harsh and obscure, and abounding in repetitions and in forced metaphors. But the author seems to have consulted the best authorities, and to have adopted their most sagacious views. The best edition is by Bentley, Lond. 1739.

Manliă Gens, an ancient and celebrated patrician gens at Rome. The chief families were those of ACIDINUS, TORQUATUS and VULSO.

Manliāna (Μανλίανα: Miliana, Ru.), a city of importance in Mauretania Caesariensis, where one of Pompey's sons died.

M. Manlĭus, consul B.C. 392, took refuge in the Capitol when Rome was taken by the Gauls in 390. One night, when the Gauls endeavoured to ascend the Capitol, Manlius was roused from his sleep by the cackling of the geese; collecting hastily a body of men, he succeeded in driving back the enemy, who had just reached the summit of the hill. From this heroic deed he is said to have received the surname of Capitolinus. In 385, he defended the cause of the plebeians, who were suffering severely from their debts and from the harsh and cruel treatment of their patrician creditors. The patricians accused him of aspiring to royal power, and he was thrown into prison by the dictator Cornelius Cossus. The plebeians put on mourning for their champion, and were ready to take up arms in his behalf. The patricians in alarm liberated Manlius; but this act of concession only made him bolder, and he now did not scruple to instigate the plebeians to open violence. In the following year the patricians charged him with high treason, and brought him before the people assembled in the campus Martius; but as the Capitol which had once been saved by him could be seen from this place, the court was removed to the Poetelinian grove outside the porta Nomentana. Here Manlius was condemned, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian rock. The members of the Manlia gens accordingly resolved that none of them should ever bear in future the praenomen of Marcus.

Mannus, a son of Tuisco, was regarded by the ancient Germans, along with his father, as the founders of their race. They further ascribed to Mannus 3 sons, from whom the 3 tribes of the Ingaevones, Hermiones, and Istaevones derived their names.

Mantiāna Palus. [ARSISSA PALUS.]

Mantinēa (Μαντίνεια: Μαντινεύς: Paleopoli), one of the most ancient and important towns in Arcadia, situated on the small river Ophis, near the centre of the E. frontier of the country. It is celebrated in history for the great battle fought under its walls between the Spartans and Thebans, in which Epaminondas fell, B.C. 362. According to tradition, Mantinea was founded by Mantineus, the son of Lycaon, but it was formed in reality out of the union of 4 or 5 hamlets. Till the foundation of Megalopolis, it was the largest city in Arcadia, and it long exercised a kind of supremacy over the other Arcadian towns; but in the Peloponnesian war the Spartans attacked the city, and destroyed it by turning the waters of the Ophis against its walls, which were built of bricks. After the battle of Leuctra the city recovered its independence. At a later period it joined the Achaean league, but notwithstanding formed a close connection with its old enemy Sparta, in consequence of which it was severely punished by Aratus, who put to death its leading citizens and sold the rest of its inhabitants as slaves. It never recovered the effects of this blow. Its name was now changed into Antigonīa, in honour of Antigonus Doson, who had assisted Aratus in his campaign against the town. The emperor Hadrian restored to the place its ancient appellation, and rebuilt part of it in honour of his favourite Antinous, the Bithynian, who derived his family from Mantinea.

Mantĭus (Μάντιος), son of Melampus, and brother of Antiphates. [MELAMPUS.]

Manto (Μαντώ, -οῦς). 1. Daughter of the Theban soothsayer Tiresias, was herself prophetess of the Ismenian Apollo at Thebes. After the capture of Thebes by the Epigoni, she was sent to Delphi with other captives, as an offering to Apollo, and there became the prophetess of this god. Apollo afterwards sent her and her companions to Asia, where they founded the sanctuary of Apollo near the place where the town of Colophon was afterwards built. Rhacius, a Cretan, who had settled there, married Manto, and became by her the father of Mopsus. According to Euripides, she had previously become the mother of Amphilochus and Tisiphone, by Alcmaeon, the leader of the Epigoni. Being a prophetess of Apollo, she is also called Daphne, i. e. the laurel virgin. — 2. Daughter of Hercules, was likewise a prophetess, and the person from whom the town of Mantua received its name. (Virg. Aen. x. 199.)

Mantŭa (Mantuānus: Mantua), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on an island in the river Mincius, was not a place of importance, but is celebrated because Virgil, who was born at the neighbouring village of Andes, regarded Mantua as his birthplace. It was originally an Etruscan city, and is said to have derived its name from Manto, the daughter of Hercules.

Maracanda (τὰ Μαράκανδα: Samarkand), the capital of the Persian province of Sogdiana, in the N. part of the country, was 70 stadia (7 geog. miles) in circuit. It was here that Alexander the Great killed his friend CLITUS.

Maraphĭi (Μαράφιοι), one of the 3 noblest tribes of the Persians, standing, with the Maspii, next in honour to the Pasargadae.

Marathēsĭum (Μαραθήσιον), a town on the coast of Ionia, between Ephesus and Neapolis: it belonged to the Samians, who exchanged it with the Ephesians for Neapolis, which lay nearer to their island. The modern Scala Nova marks the site of one of these towns, but it is doubtful which.

Marăthon (Μαραθών: Μαραθώνιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, was situated near a bay on the E. coast of Attica, 22 miles from Athens by one road, and 26 miles by another. It originally belonged to the Attic tetrapolis, and is said to have derived its name from the hero Marathon. This hero, according to one account, was the son of Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who having been expelled from Peloponnesus by the violence of his father, settled in Attica; while, according to another account, he was an Arcadian who took part in the expedition of the Tyndaridae against Attica, and devoted himself to death before the battle. The site of the ancient town of Marathon was probably not at the modern village of Marathon, but at a place called Vrana, a little to the S. of Marathon. Marathon was situated in a plain, which extends along the sea-shore, about 6 miles in length, and from 3 miles to one mile and a half in breadth. It is surrounded on the other three sides by rocky hills and rugged mountains. Two marshes bound the extremity of the plain; the northern is more than a square mile in extent, but the southern is much smaller, and is almost dry at the conclusion of the great heats. Through the centre of the plain runs a small brook. In this plain was fought the celebrated battle between the Persians and Athenians, B. C. 490. The Persians were drawn up on the plain, and the Athenians on some portion of the high ground above the plain; but the exact ground occupied by the 2 armies cannot be identified, notwithstanding the investigations of modern travellers. The tumulus, raised over the Athenians who fell in the battle, is still to be seen.

Marăthus (Μάραθος), an important city on the coast of Phoenicia, opposite to Aradus and near Antaradus: it was destroyed by the people of Aradus in the time of the Syrian king, Alexander Balas, a little before B. C. 150.

Marcella. 1. Daughter of C. Marcellus and Octavia, the sister of Augustus. She was thrice married: 1st to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, who separated from her in B. C. 21, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus; 2ndly to Julus Antonius, the son of the triumvir, by whom she had a son Lucius; 3rdly to Sext. Appuleius, consul A. D. 14, by whom she had a daughter, Appuleia Varilia. — 2. Wife of the poet Martial, to whom he has addressed 2 epigrams (xii. 21, 31). She was a native of Spain, and brought him as her dowry an estate. As Martial was married previously to Cleopatra, he espoused Marcella probably after his return to Spain about A. D. 96.

Marcellīnus, the author of the life of Thucydides. [THUCYDIDES.]

Marcellus, Claudĭus, an illustrious plebeian family. 1. M., celebrated as 5 times consul, and the conqueror of Syracuse. In his first consulship, B. C. 222, Marcellus and his colleague conquered the Insubrians in Cisalpine Gaul, and took their capital Mediolanum. Marcellus distinguished himself by slaying in battle with his own hand Britomartus or Viridomarus, the king of the enemy, whose spoils he afterwards dedicated as spolia opima in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. This was the 3rd and last instance in Roman history in which such an offering was made. — In 216 Marcellus was appointed praetor, and rendered important service to the Roman cause in the S. of Italy after the disastrous battle of Cannae. In 215 he remained in the S. of Italy, with the title of proconsul. In the course of the same year he was elected consul in the place of Postumius Albinus, who had been killed in Cisalpine Gaul; but as the senate declared that the omens were unfavourable, Marcellus resigned the consulship. In 214 Marcellus was consul a 3rd time, and still continued in the S. of Italy, where he carried on the war with ability, but without obtaining any decisive results. In the summer of this year he was sent into Sicily, since the party favourable to the Carthaginians had obtained the upper hand in many of the cities in the island. After taking Leontini, he proceeded to lay siege to Syracuse, both by sea and land. His attacks were vigorous and unremitting; but though he brought many powerful military engines against the walls, these were rendered wholly unavailing by the superior skill and science of Archimedes, who directed those of the besieged. Marcellus was at last compelled to give up all hopes of carrying the city by open force, and to turn the siege into a blockade. It was not till 212 that he obtained possession of the place. It was given up to plunder, and Archimedes was one of the inhabitants slain by the Roman soldiers. The booty found in the captured city was immense; and Marcellus also carried off many of the works of art with which the city had been adorned, to grace the temples at Rome. This was the first instance of a practice which afterwards became so general. In 210 he was consul a 4th time, and again had the conduct of the war against Hannibal. He fought a battle with the Carthaginian general near Numistro in Lucania, but without any decisive result. In 209 he retained the command of his army with the rank of proconsul. In 208 he was consul for the 5th time. He and his colleague were defeated by Hannibal near Venusia, and Marcellus himself was slain in the battle. He was buried with all due honours by order of Hannibal. — Marcellus appears to have been a rude stern soldier, brave and daring to excess, but harsh, unyielding, and cruel. The great praises bestowed upon Marcellus by the Roman historians are certainly undeserved, and probably found their way into history from his funeral oration by his son, which was used as an authority by some of the earlier annalists. — 2. M., son of the preceding, accompanied his father as military tribune, in 208, and was present with him at the time of his death. In 204 he was tribune of the people; in 200 curule aedile; in 198 praetor; and in 196 consul. In his consulship he carried on the war against the Insubrians and Boii in Cisalpine Gaul. He was censor in 189. — 3. M., consul 183, carried on the war against the Ligurians. — 4. M., son of No. 2, was thrice consul, 1st in 166, when he gained a victory over the Alpine tribes of the Gauls; 2ndly in 155, when he defeated the Ligurians; and 3rdly in 152, when he carried on the war against the Celtiberians in Spain. In 148 he was sent ambassador to Masinissa, king of Numidia, but was shipwrecked on the voyage, and perished. — 5. M., an intimate friend of Cicero, is first mentioned as curule aedile with P. Clodius in 56. He was consul in 51, and showed himself a bitter enemy to Caesar. Among other ways in which he displayed his enmity, he caused a citizen of Comum to be scourged, in order to show his contempt for the privileges lately bestowed by Caesar upon that colony. But the animosity of Marcellus did not blind him to the imprudence of forcing on a war for which his party was unprepared; and at the beginning of 49 he in vain suggested the necessity of making levies of troops, before any open steps were taken against Caesar. His advice was overruled, and he was among the first to fly from Rome and Italy. After the battle of Pharsalia (48) he abandoned all thoughts of prolonging the contest, and withdrew to Mytilene, where he gave himself up to the pursuits of rhetoric and philosophy. Marcellus himself was unwilling to sue to the conqueror for forgiveness, but his friends at Rome were not backward in their exertions for that purpose. At length, in 46, in a full assembly of the senate, C. Marcellus, the cousin of the exile, threw himself at Caesar's feet to implore the pardon of his kinsman, and his example was followed by the whole body of the assembly. Caesar yielded to this demonstration of opinion, and Marcellus was declared to be forgiven. Cicero thereupon returned thanks to Caesar, in the oration Pro Marcello, which has come down to us. Marcellus set out on his return; but he was murdered at the Piraeus, by one of his own attendants, P. Magius Chilo. — 6. C., brother of the preceding, was consul 49. He is constantly confounded with his cousin, C. Marcellus [No. 8], who was consul in 50. He accompanied his colleague, Lentulus, in his flight from Rome, and eventually crossed over to Greece. In the following year (48) he commanded part of Pompey's fleet; but this is the last we hear of him. — 7. C., uncle of the 2 preceding, was praetor in 80, and afterwards succeeded M. Lepidus in the government of Sicily. His administration of the province is frequently praised by Cicero in his speeches against Verres, as affording the most striking contrast to that of the accused. Marcellus himself was present on that occasion, as one of the judges of Verres. — 8. C., son of the preceding, and first cousin of M. Marcellus [No. 5], whom he succeeded in the consulship, 50. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero from an early age, and attached himself to the party of Pompey, notwithstanding his connection with Caesar by his marriage with Octavia. In his consulship he was the advocate of all the most violent measures against Caesar; but when the war actually broke out, he displayed the utmost timidity and helplessness. He could not make up his mind to join the Pompeian party in Greece; and after much hesitation he at length determined to remain in Italy. He readily obtained the forgiveness of Caesar, and thus was able to intercede with the dictator in favour of his cousin, M. Marcellus [No. 5]. He must have lived till near the close of 41, as his widow, Octavia, was pregnant by him when betrothed to Antony in the following year.—9. M., son of the preceding and of Octavia, the daughter of C. Octavius and sister of Augustus, was born in 43. As early as 39 he was betrothed in marriage to the daughter of Sex. Pompey; but the marrage never took place, as Pompey's death, in 35, removed the occasion for it. Augustus, who had probably destined the young Marcellus as his successor, adopted him as his son in 25, and at the same time gave him his daughter Julia in marriage. In 23 he was curule aedile, but in the autumn of the same year he was attacked by the disease of which he died shortly after at Baiae, notwithstanding all the skill and care of the celebrated physician Antonius Musa. He was in the 20th year of his age, and was thought to have given so much promise of future excellence, that his death was mourned as a public calamity; and the grief of Augustus, as well as that of his mother Octavia, was for a time unbounded. Augustus himself pronounced the funeral oration over his remains, which were deposited in the mausoleum lately erected for the Julian family. At a subsequent period (14) Augustus dedicated in his name the magnificent theatre near the Forum Olitorium, of which the remains are still visible. But the most durable monument to the memory of Marcellus is to be found in the well-known passage of Virgil (Aen. vi. 860—886), which must have been recited to Augustus and Octavia before the end of 22. —10. M., called by Cicero, for distinction's sake, the father of Aeserninus (Brut. 36), served under Marius in Gaul in 102, and as one of the lieutenants of L. Julius Caesar in the Marsic war, 90. — 11. M. Claudius Marcellus Aeserninus, son or grandson of No. 10, quaestor in Spain in 48, under Q. Cassius Longinus, took part in the mutiny of the soldiers against Cassius.— 12. P. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus, son of No. 10, must have been adopted by one of the Cornelii Lentuli. He was one of Pompey's lieutenants in the war against the pirates, B. C. 67. — 13. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus, son of the preceding, was praetor 59, after which he governed the province of Syria for nearly 2 years, and was consul 56, when he showed himself a friend of the aristocratical party, and opposed all the measures of the triumvirate.

Marcellus, Eprĭus, born of an obscure family at Capua, rose by his oratorical talents to distinction at Rome in the reigns of Claudius, Nero, and Vespasian. He was one of the principal delators under Nero, and accused many of the most distinguished men of his time. He was brought to trial in the reign of Vespasian, but was acquitted, and enjoyed the patronage and favour of this emperor as well. In A. D. 69, however, he was convicted of having taken part in the conspiracy of Alienus Caecina, and therefore put an end to his own life.

Marcellus, Nonĭus, a Latin grammarian, the author of an important treatise, entitled De Compendiosa Doctrina per Litteras ad Filium, sometimes but erroneously called De Proprietate Sermonis. He must have lived between the 2nd and 6th centuries of the Christian era. His work is divided into 18 chapters, but of these the first 12 are in reality separate treatises on different grammatical subjects. The last 6 are in the style of the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux, each containing a series of technical terms in some one department. The whole work contains numerous quotations from the earlier Latin writers. The best edition is by Gerlach and Roth, Basil. 1842.

Marcellus Sidētes, a native of Side in Pamphylia, lived in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, A. D. 117—161. He wrote a long medical poem in Greek hexameter verse, consisting of 42 books, of which 2 fragments remain.

Marcellus, Ulpĭus, a jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. He is often cited in the Digest.

Marcĭa. 1. Wife of M. Regulus, who was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians. — 2. Wife of M. Cato Uticensis, daughter of L. Marcius Philippus, consul B. C. 56. It was about 56 that Cato is related to have ceded her to his friend Q. Hortensius, with the approbation of her father. She continued to live with Hortensius till the death of the latter, in 50, after which she returned to Cato. — 3. Wife of Fabius Maximus, the friend of Augustus, learnt from her husband the secret visit of the emperor to his grandson Agrippa, and informed Livia of it, in consequence of which she became the cause of her husband's death, A. D. 13 or 14. She is mentioned on 2 or 3 occasions by Ovid. — 4. Daughter of Cremutius Cordus. [CORDUS.] — 5. The favourite concubine of Commodus, organised the plot by which the emperor perished. [COMMODUS.] She subsequently became the wife of Eclectus, his chamberlain, also a conspirator, and was eventually put to death by Julianus, along with Laetus, who also had been actively engaged in the plot.

Marcĭa Gens, claimed to be descended from Ancus Marcius, the 4th king of Rome. [ANCUS MARCIUS.] Hence one of its families subsequently assumed the name of Rex, and the heads of Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius were placed upon the coins of the Marcii. But notwithstanding these claims to such high antiquity, no patricians of this name, with the exception of Coriolanus, are mentioned in the early history of the republic [CORIOLANUS]; and it was not till after the enactment of the Licinian laws that any member of the gens obtained the consulship. The names of the most distinguished families are CENSORINUS, PHILIPPUS, REX, and RUTILUS.

Marciāna, the sister of Trajan, and mother of Matidia, who was the mother of Sabina, the wife of the emperor Hadrian.

Marciānopŏlis (Μαρκιανούπολις), an important city in the interior of Moesia Inferior, W. of Odessus, founded by Trajan, and named, after his sister Marciana. It was situated on the high road from Constantinople to the Danube. It subsequently became the capital of the Bulgarians, who called it Pristhlava (Πρισθλάβα), whence its modern name Presthlaw, but the Greeks still call it Marcenopoli.

Marciānus. 1. Emperor of the East A. D. 450—457, was a native of Thrace or Illyricum, and served for many years as a common soldier in the imperial army. Of his early history we have only a few particulars; but he had attained such distinction at the death of Theodosius II. in 450, that the widow of the latter, the celebrated Pulcheria, offered her hand and the imperial title to Marcian, who thus became emperor of the East. Marcian was a man of resolution and bravery; and when Attila sent to demand the tribute which the younger Theodosius had engaged to pay annually, the emperor sternly replied, "I have iron for Attila, but no gold." Attila swore vengeance; but he first invaded the Western Empire, and his death, 2 years afterwards, saved the East. In 451 Marcian assembled the council of Chalcedon, in which the doctrines of the Eutychians were condemned. He died in 457, and was succeeded by Leo. — 2. Of Heraclea in Pontus, a Greek geographer, of uncertain date, but who perhaps lived in the 5th century of the Christian era. He wrote a work in prose, entitled, "A Periplus of the External Sea, both eastern and western, and of the largest Islands in it." The External Sea he used in opposition to the Mediterranean. This work was in 2 books; of which the former, on the E. and S. seas, has come down to us entire; but of the latter, which treated of the W. and N. seas, we possess only the 3 last chapters on Africa, and a mutilated one on the distance from Rome to the principal cities in the world. In this work he chiefly follows Ptolemy. He also made an epitome of the Periplus of Artemiodorus of Ephesus [ARTEMIODORUS, No. 4], of which we possess the introduction, and the periplus of Pontus, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia. Marcianus likewise published an edition of Menippus with additions and corrections. [MENIPPUS.] The works of Marcianus are edited by Hudson, in the Geographi Graeci Minores, and separately by Hoffmann, Marciani Periplus, &c., Lips. 1841.

Marciānus, Aelĭus, a Roman jurist, who lived under Caracalla and Alexander Severus. His works are frequently cited in the Digest.

Marciānus Capella. [CAPELLA.]

Marcĭus, an Italian seer, whose prophetic verses (Carmina Marciana) were first discovered by M. Atilius, the praetor, in B. C. 213. They were written in Latin, and 2 extracts from them are given by Livy, one containing a prophecy of the defeat of the Romans at Cannae, and the 2nd, commanding the institution of the Ludi Apollinares. The Marcian prophecies were subsequently preserved in the Capitol with the Sibylline books. Some writers mention only one person of this name, but others speak of 2 brothers, the Marcii.

Marcĭus. [MARCIA GENS.]

Marcomanni, that is, men of the mark or border, a powerful German people of the Suevic race, originally dwelt in the S.W. of Germany, between the Rhine and the Danube, on the banks of the Main; but under the guidance of their chieftain Maroboduus, who had been brought up at the court of Augustus, they migrated into the land of the Boii, a Celtic race, who inhabited Bohemia and part of Bavaria. Here they settled after subduing the Boii, and founded a powerful kingdom, which extended S. as far as the Danube. [MAROBODUUS.] At a later time, the Marcomanni, in conjunction with the Quadi and other German tribes, carried on a long and bloody war with the emperor M. Aurelius, which lasted during the greater part of his reign, and was only brought to a conclusion by his son Commodus purchasing peace of the barbarians as soon as he ascended the throne, A. D. 180.

Mardēnē or Mardyēnē (Μαρδηνή, Μαρδυηνή), a district of Persis, extending N. from Taocene to the W. frontier and to the sea-coast. It seems to have taken its name from some branch of the great people called Mardi or Amardi, who are found in various parts of W. and central Asia; for example, in Armenia, Media, Margiana, and, under the same form of name as those in Persis, in Sogdiana.

Mardi. [AMARDI; MARDENE.]

Mardŏnĭus (Μαρδόνιος), a distinguished Persian, was the son of Gobryas, and the son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis. In B. C. 492 he was sent by Darius, with a large armament, to punish Eretria and Athens for the aid they had given to the Ionians. But his expedition was an entire failure. His fleet was destroyed by a storm off Mt. Athos, and the greater part of his land forces was destroyed on his passage through Macedonia, by the Brygians, a Thracian tribe. In consequence of his failure he was superseded in the command by Datis and Artaphernes, 490. On the accession of Xerxes, Mardonius was one of the chief instigators of the expedition against Greece, with the government of which he hoped to be invested after its conquest; and he was appointed one of the generals of the land army. After the battle of Salamis (480), he became alarmed for the consequences of the advice he had given, and persuaded Xerxes to return home with the rest of the army, leaving 300,000 men under his command for the subjugation of Greece. He was defeated in the following year (479), near Plataeae, by the combined Greek forces under the command of Pausanias, and was slain in the battle.

Mardyēne, Mardyēni. [MARDENE.]

Mărea, -ēa, -ĭa (Μαρέη, Μαρεία, Μαρία· Μαρεώτης, Mareōta: Mariouth, Ru.), a town of Lower Egypt, in the district of Mareotis, on the S. side of the lake Mareotis, at the mouth of a canal.

Mărēōtis (Μαρεῶτις). 1. Also called Μαρεώτης Νομός, a district of Lower Egypt, on the extreme N.W., on the borders of the Libyae Nomos: it produced good wine. — 2. A town in the interior of the Libyae Nomos, between the Oasis of Ammon and the Oasis Minor.

Marēōtis or Marēa or (-ia) Lacus (ἡ Μαρεῶτις, Μαρεία, Μαρία λίμνη: Birket-Mariouth, or El-Kreit), a considerable lake in the N.W. of Lower Egypt, separated from the Mediterranean by the neck of land on which Alexandria stood, and supplied with water by the Canopic branch of the Nile, and by canals. It was less than 300 stadia (30 geog. miles) long, and more than 150 wide. It was surrounded with vines, palms, and papyrus. It served as the port of Alexandria for vessels navigating the Nile.

Māres (Μᾶρες), a people of Asia, on the N. coast of the Euxine, who served in the army of Xerxes, being equipped with helmets of wicker-work, leathern shields, and javelins.

Marēsa, Marescha (Μαρησά, Μαρισά, Μαρισσά, Μαρεσχά: prob. Ru. S. E. of Beit Jibrin), an ancient fortress of Palestine, in the S. of Judaea, of some importance in the history of the early kings of Judah and of the Maccabees. The Parthians had destroyed it before the time of Eusebius; and it is probable that its ruins contributed to the erection of the city of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), which was afterwards built on the site of the ancient Baetogabra, 2 Roman miles N.W. of Maresa.

Marescha. [MARESA.]

Margiāna (ἡ Μαργιανή: the S. part of Khiva, S.W. part of Bokhara, and N.E. part of Khorassan), a province of the ancient Persian empire, and afterwards of the Greco-Syrian, Parthian, and Persian kingdoms, in Central Asia, N. of the mountains called Sariphi (Ghoor), a part of the chain of the Indian Caucasus, which divided it from Aria; and bounded on the E. by Bactriana, on the N.E. and N. by the river Oxus, which divided it from Sogdiana and Scythia, and on the W. by Hyrcania. It received its name from the river Margus (Moorghab), which flows through it, from S.E. to N.W., and is lost in the sands of the Desert of Khiva. On this river, near its termination, stood the capital of the district, Antiochia Margiana (Meru). With the exception of the districts round this and the minor rivers, which produced excellent wine, the country was for the most part a sandy desert. Its chief inhabitants were the Derbices, Parni, Tapuri, and branches of the great tribes of the Massagetae, Dahae, and Mardi. The country became known to the Greeks by the expeditions of Alexander and Antiochus I., the first of whom founded, and the second rebuilt, Antiochia; and the Romans of the age of Augustus obtained further information about it from the returned captives who had been taken by the Parthians and had resided at Antiochia.

Margītes. [HOMERUS, p. 328, a.]

Margum or Margus, a fortified place in Moesia Superior, W. of Viminacium, situated on the river Margus (Morava) at its confluence with the Danube. Here Diocletian gained a decisive victory over Carinus. The river Margus, which is one of the most important of the southern tributaries of the Danube, rises in Mt. Orbelus.

Margus. [MARGIANA.]

Maria. [MAREA, MAREOTIS.]

Mariāba. [SABA.]

Mariamma (Μαριάμμη, -ιάμη, -ιάμνη), a city of Coele-Syria, some miles W. of Emesa, assigned by Alexander the Great to the territory of Aradus.

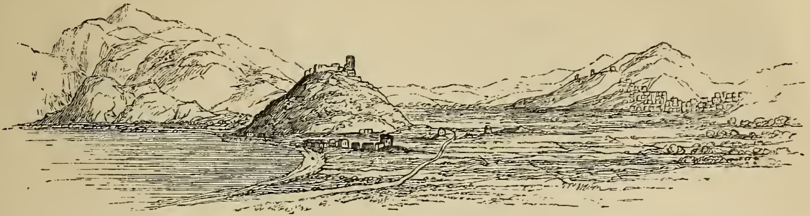
Mariamne. [HERODES.]

Mariamne Turris, a tower at Jerusalem, built by Herod the Great.

Mariānae Fossae. [FOSSA.]

Mariandȳni (Μαριανδυνοί), an ancient people of Asia Minor, on the N. coast, E. of the river Sangarius, in the N.E. part of Bithynia. With respect to their ethnical affinities, it seems doubtful whether they were connected with the Thracian tribes (the Thyni and Bithyni) on the W., or the Paphlagonians on the E.; but the latter appears the more probable.

Mariānus Mons (Sierra Morena), a mountain in Hispania Baetica, properly only a western offshoot of the Orospeda. The eastern part of it was called Saltus Castulonensis, and derived its name from the town of Castulo.



Marīca, a Latin nymph, the mother of Latinus by Faunus, was worshipped by the inhabitants of Minturnae in a grove on the river Liris. Hence the country round Minturnae is called by Horace (Carm. iii. 17. 7) Maricae litora.

Marīnus (Μαρῖνος) 1. Of Tyre, a Greek geographer, who lived in the middle of the 2nd century of the Christian era, and was the immediate predecessor of Ptolemy. Marinus was undoubtedly the founder of mathematical geography in antiquity; and Ptolemy based his whole work upon that of Marinus. [PTOLEMAEUS.] The chief merit of Marinus was, that he put an end to the uncertainty that had hitherto prevailed respecting the positions of places, by assigning to each its latitude and longitude. — 2. Of Flavia Neapolis, in Palestine, a philosopher and rhetorician, was the pupil and successor of Proclus, whose life he wrote, a work which is still extant, edited by Boissonade, Lips. 1814.

Marīsus (Marosch), called Maris (Μάρις) by Herodotus, a river of Dacia, which, according to the ancient writers, falls into the Danube, but which in reality falls into the Theiss, and, along with this river, into the Danube.

Maritīma, a sea-port town of the Avatici, and a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis.

Mărīus. 1. C., the celebrated Roman, who was 7 times consul, was born in B.C. 157, near Arpinum, of an obscure and humble family. His father's name was C. Marius, and his mother's Fulcinia; and his parents, as well as Marius himself, were clients of the noble plebeian house of the Herennii. So indigent, indeed, is the family represented to have been, that young Marius is said to have worked as a common peasant for wages, before he entered the ranks of the Roman army. (Comp. Juv. viii. 246.) The meanness of his origin has probably been somewhat exaggerated; and at all events he distinguished himself so much by his valour at the siege of Numantia in Spain (134), as to attract the notice of Scipio Africanus, who is said to have foretold his future greatness. His name does not occur again for 15 years; but in 119 he was elected tribune of the plebs, when he was 38 years of age. In this office he came forward as a popular leader, and proposed a law to give greater freedom to the people at the elections; and when the senate attempted to overawe him, he commanded one of his officers to carry the consul Metellus to prison. He now became a marked man, and the aristocracy opposed him with all their might. He lost his election to the aedileship, and with difficulty obtained the praetorship; but he acquired influence and importance by his marriage with Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar, who was the father of the future ruler of Rome. In 109 Marius crossed over into Africa as legate of the consul Q. Metellus. Here, in the war against Jugurtha, the military genius of Marius had ample opportunity of displaying itself, and he was soon regarded as the most distinguished officer in the army. He also ingratiated himself with the soldiers, who praised him in the highest terms in their letters to their friends at Rome. His popularity became so great that he resolved to return to Rome, and become at once a candidate for the consulship; but it was with great difficulty that he obtained from Metellus permission to leave Africa. On his arrival at Rome he was elected consul with an enthusiasm which bore down all opposition before it; and he received from the people the province of Numidia, and the conduct of the war against Jugurtha (107). On his return to Numidia he carried on the war with great vigour; and in the following year (106) Jugurtha was surrendered to him by the treachery of Bocchus, king of Mauretania. [JUGURTHA.] Marius sent his quaestor Sulla to receive the Numidian king from Bocchus. This circumstance sowed the seeds of the personal hatred which afterwards existed between Marius and Sulla, since the enemies of Marius claimed for Sulla the merit of bringing the war to a close by obtaining possession of the person of Jugurtha. Meantime Italy was threatened by a vast horde of barbarians, who had migrated from the N. of Germany. The 2 leading nations of which they consisted were called Cimbri and Teutoni, the former of whom are supposed to have been Celts, and the latter Gauls. To these two great races were added the Ambrones, and some of the Swiss tribes, such as the Tigurini. The whole host is said to have contained 300,000 fighting men, besides a much larger number of women and children. They had defeated one Roman army after another, and it appeared that nothing could check their progress. The utmost alarm prevailed throughout Italy; all party quarrels were hushed. Every one felt that Marius was the only man capable of saving the state, and he was accordingly elected consul a 2nd time during his absence in Africa. Marius entered Rome in triumph on the 1st of January, 104, the first day of his 2nd consulship. Meanwhile, the threatened danger was for a while averted. Instead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri marched into Spain, which they ravaged for the next 2 or 3 years. But as the return of the barbarians was constantly expected, Marius was elected consul a 3rd time in 103, and a 4th time in 102. In the latter of these years the Cimbri returned into Gaul. The barbarians now divided their forces. The Cimbri marched round the northern foot of the Alps, in order to enter Italy by the N. E., crossing the Tyrolese Alps by the defiles of Tridentum (Trent). The Teutoni and Ambrones, on the other hand, marched against Marius, who had taken up a position in a fortified camp on the Rhone. The decisive battle was fought near Aquae Sextiae (Aix). The carnage was dreadful. The whole nation was annihilated, for those who did not fall in the battle put an end to their own lives. The Cimbri, meantime, had forced their way into Italy. Marius was elected consul a 5th time (101), and joined the proconsul Catulus in the N. of Italy. The 2 generals gained a great victory over the enemy on a plain called the Campi Raudii, near Vercellae (Vercelli). The Cimbri met with the same fate as the Teutoni; the whole nation was destroyed. Marius was received at Rome with unprecedented honours. He was hailed as the saviour of the state; his name was coupled with the gods in the libations and at banquets, and he received the title of 3rd founder of Rome. Hitherto the career of Marius had been a glorious one; but the remainder of his life is full of horrors, and brings out the worst features of his character. In order to secure the consulship a 6th time, he entered into close connection with two of the worst demagogues that ever appeared at Rome, Saturninus and Glaucia. He gained his object, and was consul a 6th time in 100. In this year he drove into exile his old enemy Metellus; and shortly afterwards, when Saturninus and Glaucia took up arms against the state, Marius crushed the insurrection by command of the senate. [SATURNINUS.] His conduct in this affair was greatly blamed by the people, who looked upon him as a traitor to his former friends. For the next few years Marius took little part in public affairs. He possessed none of the qualifications which were necessary to maintain influence in the state during a time of peace, being an unlettered soldier, rude in manners, and arrogant in conduct. The Social war again called him into active service (90). He served as legate of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus; and after the latter had fallen in battle, he defeated the Marsi in 2 successive engagements. Marius was now 67, and his body had grown stout and unwieldy; but he was still as greedy of honour and distinction as he had ever been. He had set his heart upon obtaining the command of the war against Mithridates, which the senate had bestowed upon the consul Sulla at the end of the Social war (88). In order to gain his object, Marius allied himself to the tribune, P. Sulpicius Rufus, who brought forward a law for distributing the Italian allies, who had just obtained the Roman franchise, among all the Roman tribes. As those new citizens greatly exceeded the old citizens in number, they would of course be able to carry whatever they pleased in the comitia. The law was carried notwithstanding the violent opposition of the consuls; and the tribes, in which the new citizens now had the majority, appointed Marius to the command of the war against Mithridates. Sulla fled to his army, which was stationed at Nola; and when Marius sent thither 2 military tribunes, to take the command of the troops, Sulla not only refused to surrender the command, but marched upon Rome at the head of his army. Marius was now obliged to take to flight. After wandering along the coast of Latium, and encountering terrible sufferings and privations, which he bore with unflinching fortitude, he was at length taken prisoner in the marshes formed by the river Liris, near Minturnae. The magistrates of this place resolved to put him to death, in accordance with a command which Sulla had sent to all the towns in Italy. A Gallic or Cimbrian soldier undertook to carry their sentence into effect, and with a drawn sword entered the apartment where Marius was confined. The part of the room in which Marius lay was in the shade; and to the frightened barbarian the eyes of Marius seemed to dart out fire, and from the darkness a terrible voice exclaimed — "Man, durst thou murder C. Marius?" The barbarian immediately threw down his sword, and rushed out of the house. Straightway there was a revulsion of feeling among the inhabitants of Minturnae. They got ready a ship, and placed Marius on board. He reached Africa in safety, and landed at Carthage; but he had scarcely put his foot on shore before the Roman governor sent an officer to bid him leave the country. This last blow almost unmanned Marius: his only reply was—"Tell the praetor that you have seen C. Marius a fugitive sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Soon afterwards Marius was joined by his son, and they took refuge in the island of Cercina. During this time a revolution had taken place at Rome, in consequence of which Marius was enabled to return to Italy. The consul Cinna (87) who belonged to the Marian party, had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, and had subsequently been deprived by the senate of the consulate. Cinna collected an army, and resolved to recover his honours by force of arms. As soon as Marius heard of these changes he left Africa, and joined Cinna in Italy. Marius and Cinna now laid siege to Rome. The failure of provisions compelled the senate to yield, and Marius and Cinna entered Rome as conquerors. The most frightful scenes followed. The guards of Marius stabbed every one whom he did not salute, and the streets ran with the blood of the noblest of the Roman aristocracy. Among the victims of his vengeance, were the great orator M. Antonius and his former colleague Q. Catulus. Without going through the form of an election, Marius and Cinna named themselves consuls for the following year (86). But he did not long enjoy the honour: he was now in his 71st year; his body was worn out by the fatigues and sufferings he had recently undergone; and on the 18th day of his consulship he died of an attack of pleurisy, after 7 days' illness. — 2. C., the son of the preceding, but only by adoption. He followed in the footsteps of his father, and was equally distinguished by merciless severity against his enemies. He was consul in 82, when he was 27 years of age. In this year he was defeated by Sulla near Sacriportus on the frontiers of Latium, whereupon he took refuge in the strongly fortified town of Praeneste. Here he was besieged for some time; but after Sulla's great victory at the Colline gate of Rome over Pontius Telesinus, Marius put an end to his own life, after making an unsuccessful attempt to escape. — 3. The false Marius. [AMATIUS.] — 4. M. Aurelius Marius, one of the 30 tyrants, was the 4th of the usurpers who in succession ruled Gaul, in defiance of Gallienus. He reigned only 2 or 3 days, but there are coins of his extant. — 5. Marius Celsus. [CELSUS.] — 6. Marius Maximus, a Roman historian, who is repeatedly cited by the Augustan historians. He probably flourished under Alexander Severus, and appears to have written the biographies of the Roman emperors, beginning with Trajan and ending with Elagabalus. — 7. Marius Mercator, an ecclesiastical writer, distinguished as a zealous antagonist of the Pelagians and the Nestorians. He appears to have commenced his literary career during the pontificate of Zosimus, A. D. 418, at Rome, and he afterwards repaired to Constantinople. Mercator seems undoubtedly to have been a layman, but we are ignorant of every circumstance connected with his origin and personal history. The works of Mercator refer exclusively to the Pelagian and Nestorian heresies, and consist, for the most part, of passages extracted and translated from the chief Greek authorities. The best edition is by Baluze, Par. 1684.

Marmărĭca (ἡ Μαρμαρική· Μαρμαρίδαι: E. part of Tripoli and N. W. part of Egypt), a district of N. Africa, between Cyrenaica and Egypt, but by some ancient geographers reckoned as a part of Cyrenaica, and by others as a part of Egypt; while others, again, call only the W. part of it, from the borders of Cyrenaica to the Catabathmus Magnus, by the name of Marmarica, and the E. part, from the Catabathmus Magnus to the Sinus Plinthinetes, Libyae Nomos. Inland it extended as far as the Oasis of Ammon. It was, for the most part, a sandy desert, intersected with low ranges of hills. — Its inhabitants were called by the general name of Marmaridae. Their chief tribes were the Adyrmachidae and Giligammae, on the coast, and the Nasamones and Augilae, in the interior.

Marmarĭum (Μαρμάριον: Μαρμάριος: Marmari), a place on the S. W. coast of Euboea, with a temple of Apollo Marmarius, and celebrated marble quarries, which belonged to Carystus.

Măro, Virgilĭus. [VIRGILIUS.]

Marobodŭus, the Latinised form of the German Marbod, king of the Marcomanni, was a Suevian by birth, and was born about B. C. 18. He was sent in his boyhood with other hostages to Rome, where he attracted the notice of Augustus, and received a liberal education. After his return to his native country, he succeeded in establishing a powerful kingdom in central Germany, along the N. bank of the Danube, from Regensberg nearly to the borders of Hungary, and which stretched far into the interior. His power excited the jealousy of Augustus, who had determined to send a formidable army to invade his dominions; but the revolt of the Pannonians and Dalmatians (A. D. 6) prevented the emperor from carrying his design into effect. Maroboduus eventually became an object of suspicion to the other German tribes, and was at length expelled from his dominions by Catualda, a chief of the Gothones, about A. D. 19. He took refuge in Italy, where Tiberius allowed him to remain, and he passed the remainder of his life at Ravenna. He died in 35 at the age of 53 years.

Maron (Μάρων), son of Evanthes, and grandson of Dionysus and Ariadne, priest of Apollo at Maro-nea in Thrace. He was the hero of sweet wine, and is mentioned among the companions of Dionysus.

Marōnēa (Μαρώνεια: Μαρωνείτης: Marogna), a town on the S. coast of Thrace, situated on the N. bank of the lake Ismaris and on the river Sthenas, more anciently called Ortagurea. It belonged originally to the Cicones, but afterwards received colonists from Chios. It was celebrated for its excellent wine, which even Homer mentions.

Marpessa (Μάρπησσα), daughter of Evenus and Alcippe. For details see IDAS.

Marpessa (Μάρπησσα), a mountain in Paros, from which the celebrated Parian marble was obtained. Hence Virgil (Aen. vi. 471) speaks of Marpēsia cautes.

Marrucīni, a brave and warlike people in Italy of the Sabellian race, occupying a narrow slip of country along the right bank of the river Aternus, and bounded on the N. by the Vestini, on the W. by the Peligni and Marsi, on the S. by the Frentani, and on the E. by the Adriatic sea. Their chief town was TEATE, and at the mouth of the Aternus, they possessed, in common with the Vestini, the seaport ATERNUM. Along with the Marsi, Peligni, and the other Sabellian tribes they fought against Rome; and together with them they submitted to the Romans in B. C. 304, and concluded a peace with the republic.

Marrŭvium or Marŭvium. 1. (S. Benedetto), the chief town of the Marsi (who are therefore called gens Maruvia, Virg. Aen. vii. 750), situated on the E. bank of the lake Fucinus, and on the road between Corfinium and Alba Fucentia. — 2. (Morro), an ancient town of the Aborigines in the country of the Sabines, not to be confounded with the Marsic Marruvium.

Mars, an ancient Roman god, who was at an early period identified by the Romans with the Greek Ares, or the god delighting in bloody war. [ARES.] The name of the god in the Sabine and Oscan was Mamers; and Mars itself is a contraction of Mavers or Mavors. Next to Jupiter, Mars enjoyed the highest honours at Rome. He is frequently designated as father Mars, whence the forms Marspiter and Maspiter, analogous to Jupiter. Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus were the 3 tutelary divinities of Rome, to each of whom king Numa appointed a flamen. He was worshipped at Rome as the god of war, and war itself was frequently designated by the name of Mars. His priests, the Salii, danced in full armour, and the place dedicated to warlike exercises was called after his name (Campus Martius). But being the father of the Romans, Mars was also the protector of the most honourable pursuit, i. e. agriculture; and under the name of Silvanus, he was worshipped as the guardian of cattle. Mars was also identified with Quirinus, who was the deity watching over the Roman citizens in their civil capacity as Quirites. Thus Mars appears under 3 aspects. As the warlike god, he was called Gradivus; as the rustic god, he was called Silvanus; while, in his relation to the state, he bore the name of Quirinus. His wife was called Neria or Neriene, the feminine of Nero, which in the Sabine language signified "strong." The wolf and the woodpecker (picus) were sacred to Mars. Numerous temples were dedicated to him at Rome, the most important of which was that outside the Porta Capena, on the Appian road, and that of Mars Ultor, which was built by Augustus in the forum.

Marsi. 1. A brave and warlike people of the Sabellian race, dwelt in the centre of Italy, in the high land surrounded by the mountains of the Apennines, in which the lake Fucinus is situated. Along with their neighbours the Peligni, Marrucini, &c., they concluded a peace with Rome, B. C. 304. Their bravery was proverbial; and they were the prime movers of the celebrated war waged against Rome by the Socii or Italian allies in order to obtain the Roman franchise, and which is known by the name of the Marsic or Social war. Their chief town was MARRUVIUM.— The Marsi appear to have been acquainted with the medicinal properties of several of the plants growing upon their mountains, and to have employed them as remedies against the bites of serpents, and in other cases. Hence they were regarded as magicians, and were said to be descended from a son of Circe. Others again derived their origin from the Phrygian Marsyas, simply on account of the resemblance of the name. — 2. A people in Germany, appear to have dwelt originally on both banks of the Ems, and to have been only a tribe of the Cherusci, although Tacitus makes them one of the most ancient peoples in Germany. They joined the Cherusci in the war against the Romans, which terminated in the defeat of Varus, but they were subsequently driven into the interior of the country by Germanicus.

Marsigni, a people in the S. E. of Germany, of Suevic extraction.

Marsus, Domitĭus, a Roman poet of the Augustan age. He wrote poems of various kinds, but his epigrams were the most celebrated of his productions. Hence he is frequently mentioned by Martial, who speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration. He wrote a beautiful epitaph on Tibullus, which has come down to us.

Marsўas (Μαρσύας). 1. A mythological personage, connected with the earliest period of Greek music. He is variously called the son of Hyagnis, or of Oeagrus, or of Olympus. Some make him a satyr, others a peasant. All agree in placing him in Phrygia. The following is the outline of his story: — Athena having, while playing the flute, seen the reflection of herself in water, and observed the distortion of her features, threw away the instrument in disgust. It was picked up by Marsyas, who no sooner began to blow through it, than the flute, having once been inspired by the breath of a goddess, emitted of its own accord the most beautiful strains. Elated by his success, Marsyas was rash enough to challenge Apollo to a musical contest, the conditions of which were that the victor should do what he pleased with the vanquished. The Muses, or, according to others, the Nysaeans, were the umpires. Apollo played upon the cithara, and Marsyas upon the flute; and it was not till the former added his voice to the music of his lyre that the contest was decided in his favour. As a just punishment for the presumption of Marsyas, Apollo bound him to a tree, and flayed him alive. His blood was the source of the river Marsyas, and Apollo hung up his skin in the cave out of which that river flows. His flutes (for, according to some, the instrument on which he played was the double flute) were carried by the river Marsyas into the Maeander, and again emerging in the Asopus, were thrown on land by it in the Sicyonian territory, and were dedicated to Apollo in his temple at Sicyon. The fable evidently refers to the struggle between the citharoedic and auloedic styles of music, of which the former was connected with the worship of Apollo among the Dorians, and the latter with the orgiastic rites of Cybele in Phrygia. In the fora of ancient cities there was frequently placed a statue of Marsyas, which was probably intended to hold forth an example of the severe punishment of arrogant presumption. The statue of Marsyas in the forum of Rome is well known by the allusions of Horace (Sat. i. 6. 120), Juvenal (ix. 1, 2), and Martial (ii. 64. 7). — 2. A Greek historian, was the son of Periander, a native of Pella in Macedonia, a contemporary of Alexander, with whom he is said to have been educated. His principal work was a history of Macedonia, in 10 books, from the earliest times to the wars of Alexander. He also wrote other works, the titles of which are given by Suidas. — 3. Of Philippi, commonly called the Younger, to distinguish him from the preceding, was also a Greek historian. The period at which he flourished is uncertain: the earliest writers by whom he is cited are Pliny and Athenaeus.

Marsўas (Μαρσύας). 1. A small and rapid river of Phrygia, a tributary of the Maeander, took its rise, according to Xenophon, in the palace of the Persian kings at Celaenae, beneath the Acropolis, and fell into the Maeander, outside of the city. Pliny, however, states that its source was in the valley called Aulocrene, about 10 miles from Apamea Cibotus (which city was on or near the site of Celaenae), and that after a subterraneous course, it first came out to light at Apamea. Colonel Leake reconciles these statements by the natural explanation that the place where the river first broke forth from its subterraneous course, was regarded as its true origin. Tradition ascribed its name to the fable of Marsyas. — 2. (Chinar-Chai), a considerable river of Caria, having its source in the district called Idrias, flowing N.W. and N. through the middle of Caria, past Stratonicea and Alabanda, and falling into the S. side of the Maeander, nearly opposite to Tralles. — 3. In Syria, a small tributary of the Orontes, into which it falls on the E. side, near Apamea. — 4. A name given to the extensive plain in Syria, through which the upper course of the Orontes flows, lying between the ranges of Casius and Lebanon, and reaching from Apamea on the N. to Laodicea ad Libanum on the S.

Martĭālis. 1. M. Valērĭus, the epigrammatic poet, was born at Bilbilis in Spain, in the 3rd year of Claudius, A. D. 43. He came to Rome in the 13th year of Nero, 66; and after residing in the metropolis 35 years, he returned to the place of his birth, in the 3rd year of Trajan, 100. He lived there for upwards of 3 years at least, on the property of his wife, a lady named Marcella, whom he seems to have married after his return to Bilbilis. His death cannot have taken place before 104. His fame was extended and his books were eagerly sought for, not only in the city, but also in Gaul, Germany, and Britain; he secured the patronage of the emperors Titus and Domitian, obtained by his influence the freedom of the state for several of his friends, and received for himself, although apparently without family, the privileges accorded to those who were the fathers of three children (jus trium liberorum), together with the rank of tribunus and the rights of the equestrian order. His circumstances appear to have been easy during his residence at Rome, for he had a mansion in the city whose situation he describes, and a suburban villa near Nomentum, to which he frequently alludes with pride.—The extant works of Martial consist of a collection of short poems, all included under the general appellation Epigrammata, upwards of 1500 in number, divided into 14 books. Those which form the 2 last books, usually distinguished respectively as Xenia and Apophoreta, amounting to 350, consist of distichs, descriptive of a vast variety of small objects, chiefly articles of food or clothing, such as were usually sent as presents among friends during the Saturnalia, and on other festive occasions. In addition to the above, nearly all the printed copies include 33 epigrams, forming a book apart from the rest, which has been commonly known as Liber de Spectaculis, because the contents relate to the shows exhibited by Titus and Domitian, but there is no ancient authority for the title. The different books were collected and published by the author, sometimes singly and sometimes several at one time. The Liber de Spectaculis and the first 9 books of the regular series involve a great number of historical allusions, extending from the games of Titus (80) down to the return of Domitian from the Sarmatian expedition, in January, 94. All these books were composed at Rome, except the 3rd, which was written during a tour in Gallia Togata. The 10th book was published twice: the first edition was given hastily to the world; the second, that which we now read (x. 2), celebrates the arrival of Trajan at Rome, after his accession to the throne (99). The 11th book seems to have been published at Rome, early in 100, and at the close of the year he returned to Bilbilis. After keeping silence for 3 years (xii. prooem.), the 12th book was despatched from Bilbilis to Rome (xii. 3, 18), and must therefore be assigned to 104. Books xiii. and xiv., Xenia and Apophoreta, were written chiefly under Domitian, although the composition may have been spread over the holidays of many years. It is well known that the word Epigram, which originally denoted simply an inscription, was, in process of time, applied to any brief metrical effusion, whatever the subject might be, or whatever the form under which it was presented. Martial, however, first placed the epigram upon the narrow basis which it now occupies, and from his time the term has been in a great measure restricted to denote a short poem, in which all the thoughts and expressions converge to one sharp point, which forms the termination of the piece. Martial's epigrams are distinguished by singular fertility of imagination, prodigious flow of wit, and delicate felicity of language; and from no source do we derive more copious information on the national customs and social habits of the Romans during the first century of the empire. But, however much we may admire the genius of the author, we feel no respect for the character of the man. The servility of adulation with which he loads Domitian, proves that he was a courtier of the lowest class; and his works are defiled by the most cold-blooded filth, too clearly denoting habitual impurity of thought, combined with habitual impurity of expression. The best edition is by Schneidewinn, Grem. 1842. — 2. Gargilĭus, a Roman historian, and a contemporary of Alexander Severus, who is cited by Vopiscus. There is extant a short fragment on veterinary surgery, bearing the name of Gargilius Martialis; and Angelo Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the royal library at Naples, part of a work De Hortis, also ascribed to Gargilius Martialis. But whether Gargilius Martialis the historian, Gargilius Martialis the horticulturist, and Gargilius Martialis the veterinarian, are all, or any two of them, the same, or all different personages, cannot be determined.

Martiniānus, was elevated to the dignity of Caesar, by Licinius, when he was making preparations for the last struggle against Constantine. After the defeat of Licinius, Martinianus was put to death by Constantine, A. D. 323.

Martĭus Campus. [CAMPUS MARTIUS.]

Martyrŏpŏlis (Μαρτυρόπολις: Meia Farekin), a city of Sophene, in Armenia Major, on the river Nymphus, a tributary of the Tigris; under Justinian, a strong fortress, and the residence of the first Dux Armeniae.

Marullus, C. Epidĭus, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 44, removed, in conjunction with his colleague L. Caesetius Flavus, the diadem which had been placed upon the statue of C. Julius Caesar, and attempted to bring to trial the persons who had saluted the dictator as king. Caesar, in consequence, deprived him of the tribunate, and expelled him from the senate.

Marŭvĭum. [MARRUVIUM.]

Mascas (Μάσκας, Μασκᾶς: Wady-el-Seba), an E. tributary of the Euphrates, in Mesopotamia, mentioned only by Xenophon (Anab. i. 5), who describes it as surrounding the city of Corsote, and as being 35 parasangs from the Chaboras. It appears to be the same river as the Saocoras of Ptolemy.

Mases (Μάσης: Μασήτιος), a town on the S. coast of Argolis, the harbour of Hermione.

Măsĭnissa (Μασσανάσσης), king of the Numidians, was the son of Gala, king of the Massylians, the easternmost of the 2 great tribes into which the Numidians were at that time divided; but he was brought up at Carthage, where he appears to have received an education superior to that usual among his countrymen. In B. C. 213 the Carthaginians persuaded Gala to declare war against Syphax, king of the neighbouring tribe of the Massaesylians, who had lately entered into an alliance with Rome. Masinissa was appointed by his father to command the invading force, with which he attacked and totally defeated Syphax. In the next year (212) Masinissa crossed over into Spain, and supported the Carthaginian generals there with a large body of Numidian horse. He fought on the side of the Carthaginians for some years; but after their great defeat by Scipio in 206, he secretly promised the latter to support the Romans as soon as they should send an army into Africa. In his desertion of the Carthaginians he is said to have been also actuated by resentment against Hasdrubal, who had previously betrothed to him his beautiful daughter Sophonisba, but violated his engagement, in order to bestow her hand upon Syphax. — During the absence of Masinissa in Spain, his father Gala had died, and the throne had been seized by an usurper; but Masinissa on his return soon expelled the usurper and obtained possession of the kingdom. He was now attacked by Syphax and the Carthaginians, who were anxious to crush him before he could receive assistance from Rome. He was repeatedly defeated by Syphax and his generals, and with difficulty escaped falling into the hands of his enemies. But the arrival of Scipio in Africa (204) soon changed the posture of affairs. He instantly joined the Roman general, and rendered the most important services to him during the remainder of the war. He took a prominent part in the defeat of the combined forces of Syphax and Hasdrubal, and in conjunction with Laelius he reduced Cirta, the capital of Syphax. Among the captives that fell into their hands on this occasion was Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax, and the same who had been formerly promised in marriage to Masinissa himself. The story of his hasty marriage with her, and its tragical termination, is related elsewhere. [SOPHONISBA.] In the decisive battle of Zama (202), Masinissa commanded the cavalry of the right wing, and contributed in no small degree to the successful result of the day. On the conclusion of the final peace between Rome and Carthage, he was rewarded with the greater part of the territories which had belonged to Syphax, in addition to his hereditary dominions. For the next 50 years Masinissa reigned in peace, though constantly making aggressions upon the Carthaginian territory. At length in 150 he declared open war against Carthage, and these hostilities led to the outbreak of the 3rd Punic war. Masinissa died in the 2nd year of the war, 148. From this time till the commencement of the 3rd Punic war there elapsed an interval of more than 50 years, during the whole of which period Masinissa continued to reign with undisputed authority over the countries thus subjected to his rule. On his deathbed he had sent for Scipio Africanus the younger, at that time serving in Africa as a military tribune, but he expired before his arrival, leaving it to the young officer to settle the affairs of his kingdom. He died at the advanced age of 90, having retained in an extraordinary degree his bodily strength and activity to the last, so that in the war against the Carthaginians, only 2 years before, he not only commanded his army in person, but was able to go through all his military exercises with the agility and vigour of a young man. His character has been extolled by the Roman writers far beyond his true merits. He possessed indeed unconquerable energy and fortitude; but he was faithless to the Carthaginians as soon as fortune began to turn against them; and though he afterwards continued steady to the cause of the Romans, it was because he found it uniformly his interest to do so. He was the father of a very numerous family; but it appears that 3 only of his legitimate sons survived him, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa. Between these 3 the kingdom was portioned out by Scipio, according to the dying directions of the old king.

Masĭus Mons (τὸ Μάσιον ὄρος: Karajeh Dagh), a mountain chain in the N. of Mesopotamia, between the upper course of the Tigris and the Euphrates, running from the main chain of the Taurus S.E. along the border of Mygdonia.

Maso, C. Papīrĭus, consul B. C. 231, carried on war against the Corsicans, whom he subdued; and from the booty obtained in this war, he dedicated a temple to Fons. Maso was the maternal grandfather of Scipio Africanus the younger, his daughter Papiria marrying Aemilius Paulus.

Massa, Baebĭus, or Bebĭus, was accused by Pliny the younger and Herennius Senecio, of plundering the province of Baetica, of which he had been governor, A. D. 93. He was condemned, but escaped punishment by the favour of Domitian and from this time he became one of the informers and favourites of the tyrant.

Massaesÿli or -ĭi. [MAURETANIA: NUMIDIA.]

Massăga (τὰ Μάσσαγα), the capital city of the Indian people ASSACENI.

Massăgĕtae (Μασσαγέται), a wild and warlike people of Central Asia, in Scythia intra Imaüm, N. of the Jaxartes (the Araxes of Herodotus) and the Sea of Aral, and on the peninsula between this lake and the Caspian. Their country corresponds to that of the Kirghiz Tartars in the N. of Independent Tartary. Some of the ancient geographers give them a greater extent towards the S.E., and Herodotus appears to include under the name all the nomad tribes of Asia E. of the Caspian. They appear to have been of the Turkoman race; their manners and customs resembled those of the Scythians in general; but they had some peculiarities, such as the killing and eating of their aged people. Their chief appearance in ancient history is in connection with the expedition undertaken against them by Cyrus the Great, in which Cyrus was defeated and slain. [CYRUS.]

Massāni (Μασσανοί), a people of India intra Gangem, on the lower course of the Indus, near the Island of Pattalene.

Massĭcus Mons, a mountain in the N. W. of Campania near the frontiers of Latium, celebrated for its excellent wine, the produce of the vineyards on the southern slope of the mountain. The celebrated Falernian wine came from the eastern side of this mountain.

Massĭcÿtus or Massicÿtes (Μασικύτης), one of the principal mountain chains of LYCIA.

Massĭlĭa (Μασσαλία: Μασσαλιώτης, Massiliensis: Marseilles), a Greek city in Gallia Narbonensis, on the coast of the Mediterranean, in the country of the Salyes. It was situated on a promontory, which was connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, and was washed on 3 sides by the sea. Its excellent harbour, called Lacydon, was formed by a small inlet of the sea, about half a mile long, and a quarter of a mile broad. This harbour had only a narrow opening, and before it lay an island, where ships had good anchorage. Massilia was founded by the Phocaeans of Asia Minor about B. C. 600, and soon became a very flourishing city. It extended its dominion over the barbarous tribes in its neighbourhood, and planted several colonies on the coast of Gaul and Spain, such as ANTIPOLIS, NICAEA and EMPORIUM. Its naval power and commercial greatness soon excited the jealousy of the Carthaginians, who made war upon the city, but the Massilians not only maintained their independence, but defeated the Carthaginians in a sea-fight. At an early period they cultivated the friendship of the Romans, to whom they always continued faithful allies. Accordingly when the S. E. corner of Gaul was made a Roman province, the Romans allowed Massilia to retain its independence and its own constitution. This constitution was aristocratic. The city was governed by a senate of 600 persons called Timuchi. From these were selected 15 presidents, who formed a sort of committee for carrying on the ordinary business of the government, and 3 of these were intrusted with the executive power. The inhabitants retained the religious rites of their mother country, and they cultivated with especial reverence the worship of the Ephesian Artemis or Diana. Massilia was for many centuries one of the most important commercial cities in the ancient world. In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey (B. C. 49), it espoused the cause of the latter, but after a protracted siege, in which it lost its fleet, it was obliged to submit to Caesar. From the effects of this blow it never fully recovered. Its inhabitants had long paid attention to literature and philosophy; and under the early emperors it became one of the chief seats of learning, to which the sons of many illustrious Romans resorted to complete their studies. —The modern Marseilles occupies the site of the ancient town, but contains no remains of ancient buildings.

Massīva. 1. A Numidian, grandson of Gala, king of the Massylians, and nephew of Masinissa, whom he accompanied into Spain. — 2. Son of Gulussa, and grandson of Masinissa, was assassinated at Rome by order of Jugurtha, because he had put in his claim to the kingdom of Numidia.

Massūrius Sabīnus. [SABINUS.]

Massÿli or -ĭi. [MAURETANIA: NUMIDIA.]

Mastanăbal or Manastăbal, the youngest of the 3 legitimate sons of Masinissa, between whom the kingdom of Numidia was divided by Scipio after the death of the aged king (B. C. 148). He died before his brother Micipsa, and left 2 sons, Jugurtha and Gauda.

Mastaura (τὰ Μάσταυρα: Mastaura-Kalesi, Ru.), a city of Lydia on the borders of Caria, near Nysa.

Mastramēla, a town on the S. coast of Gallia Narbonensis, E. of the Rhone, and a lake of the same name, called by Mela Avaticorum stagnum.

Mastūsĭa. 1. The S. W. point of the Thracian Chersonesus, opposite Sigeum. — 2. A mountain of Lydia, on the S. slope of which Smyrna lay.

Maternus, Curiatĭus, a Roman rhetorician and tragic poet, one of the speakers in the Dialogus de Oratoribus ascribed to Tacitus.

Maternus Firmicus. [FIRMICUS.]

Mătho. 1. One of the leaders of the Carthaginian mercenaries in their war against Carthage, after the conclusion of the 1st Punic war, B. C. 241. He was eventually taken prisoner, and put to death. — 2. A pompous blustering advocate, ridiculed by Juvenal and Martial.

Mătho, Pompōnĭus. 1. M'., consul B. C. 233, carried on war against the Sardinians, whom he defeated. In 217 he was magister equitum; in 216 praetor; and in 215 propraetor in Cisalpine Gaul. — 2. M., brother of the preceding, consul 231, also carried on war against the Sardinians. He was likewise praetor in 217. He died in 204. — 3. M., probably son of No. 2., aedile 206, and praetor 204, with Sicily as his province.

Matiāna (Ματιανή, Ματιανοί, -ηνή, -ηνοί, Herod.), the S.W.-most district of Media Atropatene, along the mountains separating Media from Assyria, which were also called Matiani. The great salt lake of Spaura (Ματιανὴ λίμνη: Lake of Urmi) was in this district. Herodotus also mentions a people on the Halys in Asia Minor by the name of Matieni.

Matīnus, a mountain in Apulia, running out into the sea, was one of the offshoots of Mt. Garganus, and is frequently mentioned by Horace in consequence of his being a native of Apulia.

Matisco (Maçon), a town of the Aedui in Gallia Lugdunensis on the Arar, and on the road from Lugdunum to Augustodunum.

Matius Calvēna, C., a Roman eques, and a friend of Caesar and Cicero. After Caesar's death he espoused the side of Octavianus, with whom he became very intimate.

Matron (Μάτρων), of Pitana, a celebrated writer of parodies upon Homer, probably lived a little before the time of Philip of Macedon.

Matrōna (Marne), a river in Gaul, which formed the boundary between Gallia Lugdunensis and Belgica, and which falls into the Sequana, a little S. of Paris.

Mattiăci, a people in Germany, who dwelt on the E. bank of the Rhine, between the Main and the Lahn, and were a branch of the Chatti. They were subdued by the Romans, who, in the reign of Claudius, had fortresses and silver-mines in their country. After the death of Nero they revolted against the Romans and took part with the Chatti and other German tribes in the siege of Moguntiacum. From this time they disappear from history; and their country was subsequently inhabited by the Alemanni. Their chief towns were Aquae Mattiacae (Wiesbaden), and Mattiacum (Marburg), which must not be confounded with Mattium, the capital of the Chatti.

Mattĭum (Maden), the chief town of the Chatti, situated on the Adrana (Eder), was destroyed by Germanicus.

Matūta, commonly called Mater Matūta, is usually considered as the goddess of the dawn of morning, and her name is considered to be connected with maturus or matutinus. It seems, however, to be well attested that Matuta was only a surname of Juno; and it is probable that the name is connected with mater, so that Mater Matuta is an analogous expression with Hostus Hostilius, Faunus Fatuus, Aius Locutius, and others. Her festival, the Matralia, was celebrated on the 11th of June (Dict. of Ant. art. Matralia). The Romans identified Matuta with the Greek Leucothea. A temple was dedicated to Matuta at Rome by king Servius, and was restored by the dictator Camillus, after the taking of Veii. There was also a temple of Matuta at Satricum.

Maurētānĭa or Maurītānĭa (ἡ Μαυρουσία: Μαυρούσιοι, Μαῦροι, Mauri), the W.-most of the principal divisions of N. Africa, lay between the Atlantic on the W., the Mediterranean on the N., Numidia on the E., and Gaetulia on the S.; but the districts embraced under the names of Mauretania and Numidia respectively were of very different extent at different periods. The earliest known inhabitants of all N. Africa W. of the Syrtes were the Gaetulians, who were displaced and driven inland by peoples of Asiatic origin, who are found, in the earliest historical accounts, settled along the N. coast under various names; their chief tribes being the Mauri or Maurusii, W. of the river Malva or Malucha (Muluia or Mohalou); thence the Massaesylii to (or nearly to) the river Ampsaga (Wady-el-Kebir), and the Massylii between the Ampsaga and the Tusca (Wady-Zain), the W. boundary of the Carthaginian territory. Of these people, the Mauri, who possessed a greater breadth of fertile country between the Atlas and the coasts, seem to have applied themselves more to the settled pursuits of agriculture than their kindred neighbours on the E., whose unsettled warlike habits were moreover confirmed by their greater exposure to the intrusions of the Phoenician settlers. Hence arose a difference, which the Greeks marked by applying the general name of Νομάδες to the tribes between the Malva and the Tusca; whence came the Roman names of Numidia for the district, and Numidae for its people. [NUMIDIA.] Thus Mauretania was at first only the country W. of the Malva, and corresponded to the later district of Mauretania Tingitana, and to the modern empire of Marocco, except that the latter extends further S.; the ancient boundary on the S. was the Atlas. The Romans first became acquainted with the country during the war with Jugurtha, B.C. 106; of their relations with it, till it became a Roman province, about 33, an account is given under BOCCHUS. During this period the kingdom of Mauretania had been increased by the addition of the W. part of Numidia, as far as Saldae, which Julius Caesar bestowed on Bogud, as a reward for his services in the African war. A new arrangement was made about 25, when Augustus gave Mauretania to Juba II., in exchange for his paternal kingdom of Numidia. Upon the murder of Juba's son, Ptolemaeus, by Caligula (A.D. 40), Mauretania became finally a Roman province, and was formally constituted as such by Claudius, who added to it nearly half of what was still left of Numidia, namely, as far as the Ampsaga, and divided it into 2 parts, of which the W. was called Tingitana, from its capital Tingis (Tangier), and the E. Caesariensis from its capital Julia Caesarea (Zershell), the boundary between them being the river Malva, the old limit of the kingdom of Bocchus I. The latter corresponded to the W. and central part of the modern regency (and now French colony) of Algiers. These "Mauretaniae duae" were governed by an equestrian procurator. In the later division of the empire under Diocletian and Constantine, the E. part of M. Caesariensis, from Saldae to the Ampsaga, was erected into a new province, and called M. Sitifensis from the inland town of Sitifi (Setif); at the same time the W. province, M. Tingitana, seems to have been placed under the same government as Spain, so that we still find mention of the "Mauretaniae duae," meaning now, however, Caesariensis and Sitifensis. From A.D. 429 to 534 Mauretania was in the hands of the Vandals, and in 650 and the following years it was conquered by the Arabs. Its ancient inhabitants still exist as powerful tribes in Marocco and Algier, under the names of Berbers, Schillus, Kalyles, and Tuariks. Its chief physical features are described under AFRICA and ATLAS. Under the later Roman emperors it was remarkable for the great number of its episcopal sees.

Mauri. [MAURETANIA.]

Mauriciānus, Junĭus, a Roman jurist, lived under Antonius Pius (A.D. 138—161). His works are cited a few times in the Digest.

Maurĭcus, Junĭus, an intimate friend of Pliny, was banished by Domitian, but recalled from exile by Nerva.

Mauritania. [MAURETANIA.]

Maurus, Terentiānus. [TERENTIANUS.]

Maurusii. [MAURETANIA.]

Mausōlus (Μαύσωλος or Μαύσσωλος), king of Caria, was the eldest son of Hecatomnus, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty, B.C. 377. In 362 he took part in the general revolt of the satraps against Artaxerxes Mnemon, and availed himself of that opportunity to extend his dominions. In 358 he joined with the Rhodians and others in the war waged by them against the Athenians, known by the name of the Social war. He died in 353, leaving no children, and was succeeded by his wife and sister Artemisia. The extravagant grief of the latter for his death, and the honours she paid to his memory — especially by the erection of the costly monument, which was called from him the Mausoleum — are related elsewhere. [ARTEMISIA.]

Māvors. [MARS.]

Maxentĭus, Roman emperor A. D. 306—312, whose full name was M. Aurelius Valerius Maxentius. He was the son of Maximianus and Eutropia, and received in marriage the daughter of Galerius ; but he was passed over in the division of the empire which followed the abdication of his father and Diocletian in A. D. 305. Maxentius, however, did not tamely acquiesce in this arrangement, and, being supported by the praetorian troops, who had been recently deprived of their exclusive privileges, he was proclaimed emperor at Rome in 306. He summoned his father, Maximianus, from his retirement in Lucania, who again assumed the purple. The military abilities of Maximianus were of great service to his son, who was of indolent and dissolute habits. Maximianus compelled the Caesar Severus, who had marched upom Rome, to retreat in haste to Ravenna, and soon afterwards put the latter to death when he had treacherously got him into his power (307). The emperor Galerius now marched in person against Rome, but Maximianus compelled him likewise to retreat. Maxentius, relieved from these imminent dangers, proceeded to disentangle himself from the control which his father sought to exercise, and succeeded in driving him from his court. Soon afterwards Maxentius crossed over to Africa, which he ravaged with fire and sword, because it had submitted to the independent authority of a certain Alexander. Upon his return to Rome Maxentius openly aspired to dominion over all the Western provinces ; and soon afterwards declared war against Constantine, alleging, as a pretext, that the latter had put to death his father Maximianus. He began to make preparations to pass into Gaul ; but Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy. The struggle was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at Saxa Rubra near Rome, October 27th, 312. Maxentius tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. Maxentius is represented by all historians as a monster of rapacity, cruelty, and lust. The only favoured class was the military, upon whom he depended for safety ; and in order to secure their devotion and to gratify his own passions, all his other subjects were made the victims of the most revolting licentiousness, and ruined by the most grinding exactions.

Maxilŭa, a town in Hispania Baetica, where bricks were made so light as to swim upon water. See CALENTUM.

Maxĭma Caesariensis. [BRITANNIA, p. 126.]

Maximianopŏlis, previously called Porsulae, a town in Thrace on the Via Egnatia, E. of Abdera, probably the same place as the town called Mosynopolis (Μοσυνούπολις) by the Byzantine writers.

Maximiānŏpŏlis (Μαξιμιανούπολις: O. T. Hadad Rimmon), a city of Palestine, in the valley of Megiddo, a little to the S.W. of Megiddo.

Maximiānus. I. Roman emperor, A. D. 286—305, whose full name was M. Aurelius Valerius Maximianus. He was born of humble parents in Pannonia, and had acquired such fame by his services in the army, that Diocletian selected this rough soldier for his colleague, as one whose abilities were likely to prove valuable in the disturbed state of public affairs, and accordingly created him first Caesar (285), and then Augustus (286), conferring at the same time the honorary appellation of Herculius, while he himself assumed that of Jovius. The subsequent history of Maximian has been fully detailed in former articles. [DIOCLETIANUS: CONSTANTINUS I.: MAXENTIUS.] It is sufficient to relate here, that after having been reluctantly compelled to abdicate, at Milan (305), he was again invested with the imperial title by his son Maxentius, in the following year (306), to whom he rendered the most important services in the war with Severus and Galerius. Having been expelled from Rome shortly afterwards by his son, he took refuge in Gaul with Constantine, to whom he had previously given his daughter Fausta in marriage. Here he again attempted to resume the imperial throne, but was easily deposed by Constantine (308). Two years afterwards, he endeavoured to induce his daughter Fausta to destroy her husband, and was in consequence compelled by Constantine to put an end to his own life. — II., Roman emperor, A. D. 305—311, usually called Galerius. His full name was Galerius Valerius Maximianus. He was born near Sardica in Dacia, and was the son of a shepherd. He rose from the ranks to the highest commands in the army, and was appointed Caesar by Diocletian, along with Constantius Chlorus, in 292. At the same time he was adopted by Diocletian, whose daughter Valeria he received in marriage, and was entrusted with the command of Illyria and Thrace. In 297 he undertook an expedition against the Persian monarch Narses, in which he was unsuccessful, but in the following year (298) he defeated Narses with great slaughter, and compelled him to conclude a peace. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian (305), Galerius became Augustus or emperor. In 307 he made an unsuccessful attempt to recover Italy, which had owned the authority of the usurper Maxentius. [MAXENTIUS.] He died in 311, of the disgusting disease, known in modern times by the name of morbus pediculosus. He was a cruel persecutor of the Christians ; and it was at his instigation that Diocletian issued the fatal ordinance (303), which for so many years deluged the world with innocent blood.

Maximīnus. I., Roman emperor A. D. 235—238, whose full name was C. Julius Verus Maximinus. He was born in a village on the confines of Thrace, of barbarian parentage, his father being a Goth, and his mother a German from the tribe of the Alani. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimius Severus, by his gigantic stature and marvellous feats of strength, and was permitted to enter the army. He eventually rose to the highest rank in the service ; and on the murder of Alexander Severus by the mutinous troops in Gaul (235), he was proclaimed emperor. He immediately bestowed the title of Caesar on his son Maximus. During the 3 years of his reign he carried on war against the Germans with success ; but his government was characterised by a degree of oppression and sanguinary excess hitherto unexampled. The Roman world became at length tired of this monster. The senate and the provinces gladly acknowledged the 2 Gordiani, who had been proclaimed emperors in Africa; and after their death the senate itself proclaimed Maximus and Balbinus emperors (238). As soon as Maximinus heard of the elevation of the Gordians, he hastened from his winter-quarters as Sirmium. Having crossed the Alps he laid siege to Aquileia, and was there slain by his own soldiers along with his son Maximus, in April. The most extraordinary tales are related of the physical powers of Maximinus, which seem to have been almost incredible. His height exceeded 8 feet. The circumference of his thumb was equal to that of a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. It is said, that he was able single-handed to drag a loaded waggon, could with his fist knock out the grinders, and with a kick break the leg of a horse; while his appetite was such, that in one day he could eat 40 pounds of meat, and drink an amphora of wine. — II., Roman emperor 305—314, originally called Daza, and subsequently Galerius Valerius Maximinus. He was the nephew of Galerius by a sister, and in early life followed the occupation of a shepherd in his native Illyria. Having entered the army, he rose to the highest rank in the service; and upon the abdication of Diocletian in 305, he was adopted by Galerius and received the title of Caesar. In 308 Galerius gave him the title of Augustus; and on the death of the latter in 311, Maximinus and Licinius divided the East between them. In 313 Maximinus attacked the dominions of Licinius, who had gone to Milan, for the purpose of receiving in marriage the sister of Constantine. He was, however, defeated by Licinius near Heraclea, and fled to Tarsus, where he soon after died. Maximinus possessed no military talents. He owed his elevation to his family connection. He surpassed all his contemporaries in the profligacy of his private life, in the general cruelty of his administration, and in the furious hatred with which he persecuted the Christians.

Maxĭmus. 1. Of Ephesus or Smyrna, one of the teachers of the emperor Julian, to whom he was introduced by Aedesius. Maximus was a philosopher of the New Platonic school, and, like many others of that school, both believed in and practised magic. It is said that Julian through his persuasion was induced to abjure Christianity. On the accession of Julian, Maximus was held in high honour at the court, and accompanied the emperor on his fatal expedition against the Persians, which he had prophesied would be successful. In 364 he was accused of having caused by sorcery the illness of the emperors Valens and Valentinian, and was thrown into prison, where he was exposed to cruel tortures. He owed his liberation to the philosopher Themistius. In 371 Maximus was accused of taking part in a conspiracy against Valens, and was put to death. — 2. Of Epirus, or perhaps of Byzantium, was also an instructor of the emperor Julian in philosophy and heathen theology. He wrote in Greek, De insolubilibus Oppositionibus, published by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1554, appended to the edition of Dionysius Halicarnassus, as well as other works.

Maxĭmus, Fabĭus. — 1. Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, was the son of M. Fabius Ambustus, consul B. C. 360. Fabius was master of the horse to the dictator L. Papirius Cursor in 325, whose anger he incurred by giving battle to the Samnites during the dictator's absence, and contrary to his orders. Victory availed Fabius nothing in exculpation. A hasty flight to Rome, where the senate, the people, and his aged father interceded for him with Papirius, barely rescued his life, but could not avert his degradation from office. In 322 Fabius obtained his first consulship. It was the 2nd year of the 2nd Samnite war, and Fabius was the most eminent of the Roman generals in that long and arduous struggle for the empire of Italy. Yet nearly all authentic traces are lost of the seat and circumstances of his numerous campaigns. His defeats have been suppressed or extenuated; and the achievements of others ascribed to him alone. In 315 he was dictator, and was completely defeated by the Samnites at Lautulae. In 310 he was consul for the 2nd time, and carried on the war against the Etruscans. In 308 he was consul a 3rd time, and is said to have defeated the Samnites and Umbrians. He was censor in 304, when he seems to have confined the libertini to the 4 city tribes, and to have increased the political importance of the equites. In 297 he was consul for the 5th time, and in 296 for the 6th time. In the latter year he commanded at the great battle of Sentinum, when the combined armies of the Samnites, Gauls, Etruscans, and Umbrians, were defeated by the Romans. — 2. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges, or the Glutton, from the dissoluteness of his youth, son of the last. His mature manhood atoned for his early irregularities. He was consul 292, and was completely defeated by the Pentrian Samnites. He escaped degradation from the consulate, only through his father's offer to serve as his lieutenant for the remainder of the war. In a 2nd battle the consul retrieved his reputation, and was rewarded with a triumph of which the most remarkable feature was old Fabius riding beside his son's chariot. He was consul the 2nd time 276. Shortly afterwards he went as legatus from the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. He was consul a 3rd time, 265. — 3. Q. Fabius Maximus, with the agnomens Verrucosus, from a wart on his upper lip, Ovicula, or the Lamb, from the mildness or apathy of his temper, and Cunctator, from his caution in war, was grandson of Fabius Gurges. He was consul for the 1st time 233, when Liguria was his province; censor 230; consul a 2nd time 228; opposed the agrarian law of C. Flaminius 227; was dictator for holding the comitia in 221; and in 218 was legatus from the senate to Carthage, to demand reparation for the attack on Saguntum. In 217, immediately after the defeat at Thrasymenus, Fabius was appointed dictator. From this period, so long as the war with Hannibal was merely defensive, Fabius became the leading man at Rome. On taking the field he laid down a simple and immutable plan of action. He avoided all direct encounter with the enemy; moved his camp from highland to highland, where the Numidian horse and Spanish infantry could not follow him; watched Hannibal's movements with unrelaxing vigilance, and cut off his stragglers and foragers. His enclosure of Hannibal in one of the upland valleys between Cales and the Vulturnus, and the Carthaginian's adroit escape by driving oxen with blazing faggots fixed to their horns, up the hill-sides, are well-known facts. But at Rome and in his own camp the caution of Fabius was misinterpreted; and the people in consequence divided the command between him and M. Minucius Rufus, his master of the horse. Minucius was speedily entrapped, and would have been destroyed by Hannibal, had not Fabius generously hastened to his rescue. Fabius was consul for the 3rd time in 215, and for the 4th time in 214. In 213 he served as legatus to his own son, Q. Fabius, consul in that year, and an anecdote is preserved which exemplifies the strictness of the Roman discipline. On entering the camp at Suessula, Fabius advanced on horseback to greet his son. He was passing the lictors when the consul sternly bade him dismount. "My son," exclaimed the elder Fabius alighting, "I wished to see whether you would remember that you were consul." Fabius was consul for the 5th time in 209, in which year he retook Tarentum. In the closing years of the 2nd Punic war Fabius appears to less advantage. The war had become aggressive under a new race of generals. Fabius disapproved of the new tactics; he dreaded the political supremacy of Scipio, and was his uncompromising opponent in his scheme of invading Africa. He died in 203. — 4. Q. Fabius Maximus, elder son of the preceding, was praetor 214 and consul 213. He was legatus to the consul M. Livius Salinator 207. He died soon after this period, and his funeral oration was pronounced by his father. — 5. Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilianus, was by birth the eldest son of L. Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, and was adopted by No. 3. Fabius served under his father (Aemilius) in the Macedonian war, 168, and was despatched by him to Rome with the news of his victory at Pydna. He was praetor in Sicily 149—148, and consul in 145. Spain was his province, where he encountered, and at length defeated Viriathus. Fabius was the pupil and patron of the historian Polybius. — 6. Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus, son of the last. He was consul 121; and he derived his surname from the victory which he gained in this year over the Allobroges and their ally, Bituitus, king of the Arverni in Gaul. He was censor in 108. He was an orator and a man of letters. — 7. Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus, was adopted from the gens Servilia, by No. 5. He was uterine brother of Cn. Servilius Caepio, consul in 141. He himself was consul in 142, when he carried on war with Viriathus.

Maxĭmus, Magnus Clemens, Roman emperor, A. D. 383—388, in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, was a native of Spain. He was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Britain in 383, and forthwith crossed over to Gaul to oppose Gratian, who was defeated by Maximus, and was shortly afterwards put to death. Theodosius found it expedient to recognise Maximus as emperor of Gaul, Britain, and Spain, in order to secure Valentinian in the possession of Italy. Maximus however aspired to the undivided empire of the West, and accordingly in 387 he invaded Italy at the head of a formidable army. Valentinian was unable to resist him, and fled to Theodosius in the East. Theodosius forthwith prepared to avenge his colleague. In 388 he forced his way through the Noric Alps, which had been guarded by the troops of Maximus, and shortly afterwards took the city of Aquileia by storm and there put Maximus to death. Victor, the son of Maximus, was defeated and slain in Gaul by Arbogates, the general of Theodosius.

Maxĭmus, Petronĭus, Roman emperor, A. D. 455, belonged to a noble Roman family, and enjoyed some of the highest offices of state under Honorius and Valentinian III. In consequence of the violence offered to his wife by Valentinian, Maximus formed a conspiracy against this emperor, who was assassinated, and Maximus himself proclaimed emperor in his stead. His reign however lasted only 2 or 3 months. Having forced Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, to marry him, she resolved to avenge the death of her former husband, and accordingly Genseric was invited to invade Italy. When Genseric landed at the mouth of the Tiber, Maximus prepared to fly from Rome, but was slain by a band of Burgundian mercenaries, commanded by some old officers of Valentinian.

Maxĭmus Planūdes. [PLANUDES.]

Maxĭmus Tyrĭus, a native of Tyre, a Greek rhetorician and Platonic philosopher, lived during the reigns of the Antonines and of Commodus. Some writers suppose that he was one of the tutors of M. Aurelius; but it is more probable that he was a different person from Claudius Maximus, the Stoic, who was the tutor of this emperor. Maximus Tyrius appears to have spent the greater part of his life in Greece, but he visited Rome once or twice. There are extant 41 Dissertations (Διαλέξεις or Λόγοι) of Maximus Tyrius on theological, ethical, and other philosophical subjects, written in an easy and pleasing style, but not characterised by much depth of thought. The best edition is by Reiske, Lips. 1774—5, 2 vols. 8vo.

Maxĭmus, Valerĭus. [VALERIUS.]

Maxūla. [ADES.]

Maxyes (Μάξυες), a people of N. Africa, on the coast of the Lesser Syrtis, on the W. bank of the river Triton, who claimed descent from the Trojans. They allowed their hair to grow only on the left side of the head, and they painted their bodies with vermilion; customs still preserved by some tribes in the same regions.

Mazăca. [CAESAREA, No. 1.]

Mazara (Μαζάρα: Μαζαροαῖος: Mazzara), a town on the W. coast of Sicily, situated on a river of the same name, between Lilybaeum and Selinus, and founded by the latter city, was taken by the Romans in the 1st Punic war.

Mazĭces (Μάζικες), a people of N. Africa, in Mauretania Caesariensis, on the S. slope of M. Zalacus. They, as well as the MAXYES, are thought to be the ancestors of the Amazirghs.

Mecyberna (Μηκύβερνα: Μηκυβερναῖος: Molivo), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic gulf, E. of Olynthus, of which it was the seaport. From this town part of the Toronaic gulf was subsequently called Sinus Mecybernaeus.

Mēdăba (Μήδαβα), a city of Peraea in Palestine.

Mēdăma, Medma, or Mesma, a Greek town on the W. coast of Bruttium, founded by the Locrians, with a celebrated fountain and a harbour, called Emporium.

Mēdaura, Ad Medēra, or Amedēra (Ayedrah, Ru.), a flourishing city of N. Africa, on the borders of Numidia and Byzacena, between Lares and Theveste; a Roman colony; and the birthplace of Appuleius.

Mēdēa (Μήδεια), daughter of Aeëtes, king of Colchis, by the Oceanid Idyia, or, according to others, by Hecate, the daughter of Perses. She was celebrated for her skill in magic. The principal parts of her story are given under ABSYRTUS, ARGONAUTAE, and JASON. It is sufficient to state here that, when Jason came to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece, she fell in love with the hero, assisted him in accomplishing the object for which he had visited Colchis, and afterwards fled with him as his wife to Greece ; that having been deserted by Jason for the youthful daughter of Creon, king of Corinth, she took fearful vengeance upon her faithless spouse by murdering the two children which she had had by him, and by destroying his young wife by a poisoned garment ; and that she then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. So far her story has been related elsewhere. At Athens she is said to have married king Aegeus, or to have been beloved by Sisyphus. Zeus himself is said to have sued for her, but in vain, because Medea dreaded the anger of Hera ; and the latter rewarded her by promising immortality to her children. Her children are, according to some accounts, Mermerus, Pheres, or Thessalus, Alcimenes, and Tisander ; according to others, she had 7 sons and 7 daughters, while others mention only 2 children, Medus (some call him Polyxenus) and Eriopis, or one son Argus. Respecting her flight from Corinth, there are different traditions. Some say, as we remarked above, that she fled to Athens and married Aegeus, but when it was discovered that she had laid snares for Theseus, she escaped and went to Asia, the inhabitants of which were called after her Medes. Others relate that she first fled from Corinth to Hercules at Thebes, who had promised her his assistance while yet in Colchis, in case of Jason being unfaithful to her. She cured Hercules, who was seized with madness ; and as he could not afford her the assistance he had promised, she went to Athens. She is said to have given birth to her son Medus after her arrival in Asia, where she had married a king ; whereas others state that her son Medus accompanied her from Athens to Colchis, where her son slew Perses, and restored her father Aeëtes to his kingdom. The restoration of Aeëtes, however, is attributed by some to Jason, who accompanied Medea to Colchis. At length Medea is said to have become immortal, to have been honoured with divine worship, and to have married Achilles in Elysium.

Mĕdeōn (Μεδεών : Μεδεώνιος). 1. Or Medion (Katuna), a town in the interior of Acarnania, near the road which led from Limnaea to Stratos. — 2. A town on the coast of Phocis near Anticyra, destroyed in the sacred war, and never rebuilt. — 3. An ancient town in Boeotia, mentioned by Homer, situated at the foot of Mt. Phoenicus, near Onchestus and the lake Copais. — 4. A town of the Labeates in Dalmatia, near Scodra.

Mēdĭa (ἡ Μηδία : Μῆδος, Mēdus), an important country of W. Asia, occupying the extreme W. of the great table-land of Iran, and lying between Armenia on the N. and N.W., Assyria and Susiana on the W. and S.W., Persis on the S., the great desert of Aria on the E., and Parthia, Hyrcania, and the Caspian on the N.E. Its boundaries were, on the N. the Araxes, on the W. and S.W. the range of mountains called Zagros and Parachoatras (Mts. of Kurdistan and Louristan), which divided it from the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the E. the Desert, and on the N.E. the Caspii Montes (Elburz M.), the country between which and the Caspian, though reckoned as a part of Media, was possessed by the Gelae, Mardi, and other independent tribes. Media thus corresponded nearly to the modern province of Irak-Ajemi. It was for the most part a fertile country, producing wine, figs, oranges and citrons, and honey, and supporting an excellent breed of horses. It was well peopled, and was altogether one of the most important provinces of the ancient Persian empire. After the Macedonian conquest, it was divided into 2 parts, Great Media (ἡ μεγάλη Μηδία), and Atropatēne. [ATROPATENE.] The earliest history of Media is involved in much obscurity. Herodotus and Ctesias (in Diodorus) give different chronologies for its early kings. Ctesias makes ARBACES the founder of the monarchy, about B.C. 842, and reckons 8 kings from him to the overthrow of the kingdom by Cyrus. Herodotus reckons only 4 kings of Media, namely: 1. DEIOCES, B.C. 710—657 ; 2. PHRAORTES, 657—635 ; 3. CYAXARES, 635—595 ; 4. ASTYAGES, 595—560. The last king was dethroned by a revolution, which transferred the supremacy to the Persians, who had formerly been the subordinate people in the united Medo-Persian empire. [CYRUS.] The Medes made more than one attempt to regain their supremacy ; the usurpation of the Magian Pseudo-Smerdis was no doubt such an attempt [MAGI] ; and another occurred in the reign of Darius II., when the Medes revolted, but were soon subdued (B.C. 408). With the rest of the Persian Empire, Media fell under the power of Alexander ; it next formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae, from whom it was conquered by the Parthians, in the 2nd century B.C., from which time it belonged to the Parthian, and then to the later Persian empire. The people of Media were a branch of the Indo-Germanic family, and nearly allied to the Persians ; their language was a dialect of the Zend, and their religion the Magian. They called themselves Arii, which, like the native name of the Persians (Artaei) means noble. They were divided, according to Herodotus, into 6 tribes, the Buzae, Parataceni, Struchates, Arizanti, Budii, and Magi. In the early period of their history, they were eminent warriors, especially as horse-archers ; but the long prevalence of peace, wealth, and luxury reduced them to a by-word for effeminancy.—It is important to notice the use of the names Medus and Medi by the Roman poets, for the nations of Asia E. of the Tigris in general, and the Parthians in particular.

Mediae Murus (τὸ Μηδίας καλούμενον τεῖχος), an artificial wall, which ran from the Euphrates to the Tigris, at the point where they approach nearest, a little above 33° N. lat. and divided Mesopotamia from Babylonia. It is described by Xenophon (Anab. ii. 4), as being 20 parasangs long, 100 feet high, and 20 thick, and as built of baked bricks, cemented with asphalt. Its erection was ascribed to Semiramis, and hence it was also called τὸ Σεμιράμιδος διατείχισμα.

Mĕdĭŏlānum (Mediolanensis), more frequently called by Greek writers Mediolānium (Μεδιολάνιον), the name of several cities founded by the Celts. 1. (Milan), the capital of the Insubres in Gallia Transpadana, was situated in an extensive plain between the rivers Ticinus and Addua. It was taken by the Romans B.C. 222, and afterwards became both a municipium and a colony. On the new division of the empire made by Diocletian, it became the residence of his colleague Maximianus, and continued to be the usual residence of the emperors of the West, till the irruption of Attila, who took and plundered the town, induced them to transfer the seat of government to the more strongly fortified town of Ravenna. Mediolanum was at this time one of the first cities of the empire; it possessed an imperial mint, and was the seat of an archbishopric. It is celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the see of St. Ambrose. On the fall of the Western empire, it became the residence of Theodoric the Great and the capital of the Ostrogothic kingdom, and surpassed even Rome itself in populousness and prosperity. It received a fearful blow in A. D. 539, when, in consequence of having sided with Belisarius, it was taken by the Goths under Vitiges, a great part of it destroyed, and its inhabitants put to the sword. It however gradually recovered from the effects of this blow, and was a place of importance under the Lombards, whose capital, however, was Pavia. The modern Milan contains no remains of antiquity, with the exception of 16 handsome fluted pillars near the church of S. Lorenzo. — 2. (Saintes), a town of the Santones in Aquitania, N.E. of the mouth of the Garumna; subsequently called Santones after the people, whence its modern name. — 3. (Château Meillan), a town of the Bituriges Cubi in Aquitania, N.E. of the town last mentioned. — 4. (Evreux), a town of the Aulerci Eburovices in the N. of Gallia Lugdunensis, S. of the Sequana, on the road from Rotomagus to Lutetia Parisiorum; subsequently called Civitas Ebroicorum, whence its modern name. — 5. A town of the Segusiani in the S. of Gallia Lugdunensis. — 6. A town in Gallia Belgica, on the road from Colonia Trajana to Colonia Agrippina.

Mediomatrĭci, a people in the S.E. of Gallia Belgica on the Mosella, S. of the Treviri. Their territory originally extended to the Rhine, but in the time of Augustus they had been driven from the banks of this river by the Vangiones, Nemetes, and other German tribes. Their chief town was Divodūrum (Metz).

Mediterrānĕum Mare. [INTERNUM MARE.]

Meditrīna, a Roman divinity of the art of healing, in whose honour the festival of the Meditrinalia was celebrated in the month of October. (Dict. of Ant. art. Meditrinalia.)

Medma. [MEDAMA.]

Medŏăcus or Medŭăcus, a river in Venetia in the N. of Italy, formed by the union of 2 rivers, the Medoacus Major (Brenta) and Medoacus Minor (Bacchiglione), which falls into the Adriatic sea near Edron, the harbour of Patavium.

Medobriga (Marvao, on the frontiers of Portugal), a town in Lusitania, on the road from Emerita to Scalabis.

Mēdŏcus. [AMADOCUS.]

Mĕdōn (Μέδων). 1. Son of Oileus, and brother of the lesser Ajax, fought against Troy, and was slain by Aeneas. — 2. Son of Codrus. [CODRUS.]

Mĕdŭli, a people in Aquitania on the coast of the Ocean, S. of the mouth of the Garumna, in the modern Medoc. There were excellent oysters found on their shores.

Medulli, a people on the E. frontier of Gallia Narbonensis and in the Maritime Alps, in whose country the Druentia (Durance) and Duria (Doria Minor) took their rise.

Medullĭa (Medullīnus: St. Angelo), a colony of Alba, in the land of the Sabines, was situated between the Tiber and the Anio, in the neighbourhood of Corniculum and Ameriola. Tarquinius Priscus incorporated their territory with the Roman state.

Medullīnus, Furĭus, an ancient patrician family at Rome, the members of which held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic.

Medullus, a mountain in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Minius.

Mēdus, a son of Medea. [MEDEA.]

Mēdus (Μῆδος), a small river of Persis, flowing from the confines of Media, and falling into the Araxes (Bend-Emir) near Persepolis.

Medūsa. [GORGONES.]

Megabāzus or Megabȳzus. 1. One of the 7 Persian nobles who conspired against the Magian Smerdis, B.C. 521. Darius left him behind with an army in Europe, when he himself recrossed the Hellespont, on his return from Scythia, 506. Megabazus subdued Perinthus and the other cities on the Hellespont and along the coast of Thrace. — 2. Son of Zopyrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the commanders in the army of Xerxes, 480. He afterwards commanded the army sent against the Athenians in Egypt, 458.

Megăcles (Μεγακλῆς). 1. A name borne by several of the Athenian family of the Alcmaeonidae. The most important of these was the Megacles who put to death Cylon and his adherents, after they had taken refuge at the altar of Athena, B. C. 612. [CYLON.] — 2. A Syracusan, brother of Dion, and brother-in-law of the elder Dionysius. He accompanied Dion in his flight from Syracuse, 358, and afterwards returned with him to Sicily.

Mĕgaera. [EUMENIDES.]

Mĕgālĭa or Megăris, a small island in the Tyrrhene sea, opposite Neapolis.

Megalŏpŏlis (ἡ Μεγάλη πόλις, Μεγαλόπολις: Μεγαλοπολίτης). 1. (Sinano or Sinanu), the most recent, but the most important of the cities of Arcadia, was founded on the advice of Epaminondas, after the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371, and was formed out of the inhabitants of 38 villages. It was situated in the district Maenalia, near the frontiers of Messenia, on the river Helisson, which flowed through the city, dividing it into nearly 2 equal parts. It stood on the site of the ancient town Orestion or Orestia; was 50 stadia (6 miles) in circumference; and contained, when it was besieged by Polysperchon, about 15,000 men capable of bearing arms, which would give us a population of about 70,000 inhabitants. Megalopolis was for a time subject to the Macedonians; but soon after the death of Alexander the Great, it was governed by a series of native tyrants, the last of whom, Lydiades, voluntarily resigned the government, and united the city to the Achaean league, B. C. 234. It became in consequence opposed to Sparta, and was taken and plundered by Cleomenes, who either killed or drove into banishment all its inhabitants, and destroyed a great part of the city, 222. After the battle of Sellasia in the following year, it was restored by Philopoemen, who again collected its inhabitants; but it never recovered its former prosperity, and gradually sunk into insignificance. Philopoemen and the historian Polybius were natives of Megalopolis. The ruins of its theatre, once the largest in Greece, are the only remains of the ancient town to be seen in the village of Sinano. — 2. A town in Caria. [APHRODISIAS.] — 3. A town in Pontus. [SEBASTIA.] — 4. A town in the N. of Africa, was a Carthaginian city in the interior of Byzacena, in a beautiful situation; it was taken and destroyed by the troops of Agathocles.

Meganīra (Μεγάνειρα), wife of Celeus, usually called Metanira.

Megapenthes (Μεγαπένθης). 1. Son of Proetus, father of Anaxagoras and Iphianira, and king of Argos. He exchanged his dominion for that of Perseus, so that the latter received Tiryns instead of Argos.—2. Son of Menelaus by an Aetolian slave, Pieris or Teridaë. Menelaus brought about a marriage between Megapenthes and a daughter of Alector. According to a Rhodian tradition, Megapenthes, after the death of his father, expelled Helen from Argos, who thereupon fled to Polyxo at Rhodes.

Megăra (Μεγάρα), daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, and wife of Hercules. See p. 308.

Mĕgăra (τὰ Μέγαρα, in Lat. Megara, -ae, and pl. Megara, -orum: Μεγαρεύς, Megarensis). 1. (Megara), the capital of Megaris, was situated 8 stadia (1 mile) from the sea opposite the island Salamis, about 26 miles from Athens and 31 miles from Corinth. It consisted of 3 parts: 1. The ancient Pelasgian citadel, called Caria, said to have been built by Car, the son of Phoroneus, which was situated on a hill N.W. of the later city. This citadel contained the ancient and celebrated Megaron (μέγαρον) or temple of Demeter, from which the town is supposed to have derived its name. 2. The modern citadel, situated on a lower hill to the S.W. of the preceding, and called Alcathous, from its reputed founder Alcathous, son of Pelops. 3. The town properly so called, situated at the foot of the two citadels, said to have been founded by the Pelopidae under Alcathous, and subsequently enlarged by a Doric colony under Alethes and Athemenes at the time of Codrus. It appears to have been originally called Polichne (Πολίχνη). The town contained many public buildings which are described at length by Pausanias. Its seaport was Nisaea (Νίσαια), which was connected with Megara by 2 walls, 8 stadia in length, built by the Athenians when they had possession of Megara, B.C. 461—445. Nisaea is said to have been built by Nisus, the son of Pandion; and the inhabitants of Megara are sometimes called Nisaean Megarians (οἱ Νισαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) to distinguish them from the Hyblaean Megarians (οἱ Ὑβλαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) in Sicily. In front of Nisaea lay the small island Minoa (Μίνωα), which added greatly to the security of the harbour.—In the most ancient times Megara and the surrounding country was inhabited by Leleges. It subsequently became annexed to Attica; and Megaris formed one of the 4 ancient divisions of Attica. It was next conquered by the Dorians, and was for a time subject to Corinth; but it finally asserted its independence, and rapidly became a wealthy and powerful city. To none of these events can any date be assigned with certainty. Its power at an early period is attested by the flourishing colonies which it founded, of which Selymbria, Chalcedon, and Byzantium, and the Hyblaean Megara in Sicily, were the most important. Its navy was a match for that of Athens, with which it contested the island of Salamis; and it was not till after a long struggle that the Athenians succeeded in obtaining possession of this island. The government was originally an aristocracy as in most of the Doric cities; but Theagenes, who put himself at the head of the popular party, obtained the supreme power about B.C. 620. Theagenes was afterwards expelled; and a democratical form of government established. After the Persian wars, Megara was for some time at war with Corinth, and was thus led to form an alliance with Athens, and to receive an Athenian garrison into the city, 461; but the oligarchical party having got the upper hand the Athenians were expelled, 441. Megara is not often mentioned after this period. It was taken and its walls destroyed by Demetrius Poliorcetes; it was taken again by the Romans under Q. Metellus; and in the time of Augustus it had ceased to be a place of importance.—Megara is celebrated in the history of philosophy, as the seat of a philosophical school, usually called the Megarian, which was founded by Euclid, a native of the city, and a disciple of Socrates. [Euclides, No. 2.]—There are no remains of any importance of the ancient city of Megara.—2. A town in Sicily on the E. coast, N. of Syracuse, founded by Dorians from Megara in Greece, B.C. 728, on the site of a small town Hybla, and hence called Megara Hyblaea, and its inhabitants Megarenses Hyblaei (Μεγαρεῖς Ὑβλαῖοι). From the time of Gelon it belonged to Syracuse. It was taken and plundered by the Romans in the 2nd Punic war, and from that time sunk into insignificance, but it is still mentioned by Cicero under the name of Megaris.

Megăreus (Μεγαρεύς), son of Onchestus, also called a son of Poseidon and Oenope, of Hippomenes, of Apollo, or of Aegeus. He was a brother of Abrote, the wife of Nisus, king of Megara, and the father of Evippus, Timalcus, Hippomenes, and Evaechme. Megara is said to have derived its name from him.

Mĕgăris (ἡ Μεγαρίς or ἡ Μεγαρική, sc. γῆ), a small district in Greece between the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, originally reckoned part of Hellas proper, but subsequently included in the Peloponnesus It was bounded on the N. by Boeotia, on the E. and N.E. by Attica, and on the S. by the territory of Corinth. It contained about 143 square miles. The country was very mountainous; and its only plain was the one in which the city of Megara was situated. It was separated from Boeotia by Mt. Cithaeron, and from Attica by the mountains called the Horns (τὰ κέρατα) on account of their 2 projecting summits. The Geranean mountains extended through the greater part of the country, and formed its S. boundary towards Corinth. There were 2 roads through these mountains from Corinth, one called the Scironian pass, which ran along the Saronic gulf, passed by Crommyon and Megara, and was the direct road from Corinth to Athens; the other ran along the Corinthian gulf, passed by Geranēa and Pegae, and was the road from Corinth into Boeotia. The only town of importance in Megaris was its capital Megara. [Megara.]

Megasthĕnes (Μεγασθένης), a Greek writer, who was sent by Seleucus Nicator as ambassador to Sandracottus, king of the Prasii, where he resided some time. He wrote a work on India, in 4 books, entitled Indica (τὰ Ἰνδικά), to which later Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of the country.

Megēs (Μέγης), son of Phyleus, and grandson of Augeas, was one of the suitors of Helen, and led his bands from Dulichium and the Echinades against Troy.

Megiddo (Μαγεδδώ, Μαγεδώ: Lejjun ?), a considerable city of Palestine, on the river Kishon, in a valley of the same name, which formed a part of the great plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon, on the confines of Galilee and Samaria. It was a residence of the Canaanitish kings before the conquest of Palestine by the Jews. It was fortified by Solomon. It was probably the same place which was called Legio under the Romans.

Megistāni, a people of Armenia, in the district of Sophene, near the Euphrates.

Mēla, river. [MELLA.]

Mela, Fabĭus, a Roman jurist, who is often cited in the Digest, probably lived in the time of Antoninus Pius.

Mela, or Mella, M. Annaeus, the youngest son of M. Annaeus Seneca, the rhetorician, and brother of L. Seneca the philosopher, and Gallio. By his wife Acilia he had at least one son, the celebrated Lucan. After Lucan's death, A.D. 65, Mela laid claim to his property; and as he was rich, he was accused of being privy to Piso's conspiracy, and anticipated a certain sentence by suicide.

Mela, Pomponĭus, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise upon Geography, was a native of Spain, and probably flourished under the emperor Claudius. His work is entitled De Situ Orbis Libri III. It contains a brief description of the whole world as known to the Romans. The text is often corrupt, but the style is simple, and the Latinity is pure; and although every thing is compressed within the narrowest limits, we find the monotony of the catalogue occasionally diversified by animated and pleasing pictures. The best edition is by Tzschuckius, 7 parts, 8vo. Lips. 1807.

Melaena Acra (ἡ Μέλαινα ἄκρα). 1. (Kara Burnu, which means the same as the Greek name, i. e. the Black Cape), the N.W. promontory of the great peninsula of Ionia: formed by Mt. Mimas; celebrated for the millstones hewn from it. — 2. (C. St. Nicolo), the N.W. promontory of the island of Chios. — 3. (Kara Burnu) a promontory of Bithynia, a little E. of the Bosporus, between the rivers Rhebas and Artanes; also called Καλίνακρον and Βιθυνίας ἄκρον.

Mĕlaenae (Μελαιναί: Μελαινεύς). 1. Or Melaenēae (Μελαινεαί), a town in the W. of Arcadia on the Alpheus, N.W. of Buphagium, and S.E. of Heraea. — 2. A demus in Attica, on the frontiers of Boeotia, belonging to the tribe Antiochis.

Mĕlambĭum (Μελάμβιον), a town of Thessaly in Pelasgiotis, belonging to the territory of Scotussa.

Mĕlampus (Μελάμπους). 1. Son of Amythaon by Idomene, or, according to others, by Aglaia or Rhodope, and a brother of Bias. He was looked upon by the ancients as the first mortal who had been endowed with prophetic powers, as the person who first practised the medical art, and who established the worship of Dionysus in Greece. He is said to have been married to Iphianassa (others call her Iphianira or Cyrianassa), by whom he became the father of Mantius and Antiphates. Abas, Bias, Manto, and Pronoe are also named by some writers as his children. Before his house there stood an oak tree containing a serpent's nest. The old serpents were killed by his servants, but Melampus took care of the young ones and fed them carefully. One day, when he was asleep, they cleaned his ears with their tongues. On his waking he perceived, to his astonishment, that he now understood the language of birds, and that with their assistance he could foretell the future. In addition to this he acquired the power of prophesying from the victims that were offered to the gods; and, after having an interview with Apollo on the banks of the Alpheus, he became a most renowned soothsayer. During his residence at Pylos his brother Bias was one of the suitors for the hand of Pero, the daughter of Neleus. The latter promised his daughter to the man who should bring him the oxen of Iphiclus, which were guarded by a dog whom neither man nor animal could approach. Melampus undertook the task of procuring the oxen for his brother, although he knew that the thief would be caught and kept in imprisonment for a year, after which he was to come into possession of the oxen. Things turned out as he had said; Melampus was thrown into prison, and in his captivity he learned from the wood-worms that the building in which he was imprisoned would soon break down. He accordingly demanded to be let out, and as Phylacus and Iphiclus thus became acquainted with his prophetic powers, they asked him in what manner Iphiclus, who had no children, was to become father. Melampus, on the suggestion of a vulture, advised Iphiclus to take the rust from the knife with which Phylacus had once cut his son, and drink it in water during ten days. This was done, and Iphiclus became the father of Podarces. Melampus now received the oxen as a reward for his good services, drove them to Pylos, and thus gained Pero for his brother. Afterwards Melampus obtained possession of a third of the kingdom of Argos in the following manner: — In the reign of Anaxagoras, king of Argos, the women of the kingdom were seized with madness, and roamed about the country in a frantic state. Melampus cured them of their frenzy, on condition that he and his brother Bias should receive an equal share with Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos. Melampus and Bias married the two daughters of Proetus, and ruled over two-thirds of Argos. — 2. The author of 2 little Greek works still extant, entitled Divinatio ex Palpitatione and De Naevis Oleaceis in Corpore. He lived probably in the 3rd century B.C. at Alexandria. Both the works are full of superstitions and absurdities. Edited by Franz, in his Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, Altenburg, 1780.

Melanchlaeni (Μελάγχλαινοι), a people in the N. of Sarmatia Asiatica, about the upper course of the river Tanaïs (Don), resembling the Scythians in manners, though of a different race. Their Greek name was derived from their dark clothing.

Mĕlănippē (Μελανίππη), daughter of Chiron, also called Evippe. Being with child by Aeolus, she fled to mount Pelion; and in order that her condition might not become known, she prayed to be metamorphosed into a mare. Artemis granted her prayer, and in the form of a horse she was placed among the stars. Another account describes her metamorphosis as a punishment for having despised Artemis or for having divulged the counsels of the gods.

Mĕlănippĭdes (Μελανιππίδης), of Melos, a celebrated lyric poet in the department of the dithyramb. He flourished about B.C. 440, and lived for some time at the court of Perdiccas, of Macedonia, and there died. His high reputation as a poet is intimated by Xenophon, who makes Aristodemus give him the first place among dithyrambic poets, by the side of Homer, Sophocles, Polycletus, and Zeuxis, as the chief masters in their respective arts; and by Plutarch, who mentions him, with Simonides and Euripides, as among the most distinguished masters of music. Several verses of his poetry are still preserved. See Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Graec. pp. 847—850. Some writers, following the authority of Suidas, make 2 poets of this name.

Mĕlănippus (Μελάνιππος), son of Astacus of Thebes, who, in the attack of the Seven on his native city, slew Tydeus and Mecisteus. His tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of Thebes on the road to Chalcis.

Melanogaetūli. [Gaetulia.]

Mĕlanthĭus (Μελάνθιος). 1. Also called Melantheus, son of Dolius, was a goat-herd of Ulysses, who sided with the suitors of Penelope, and was killed by Ulysses.—2. An Athenian tragic poet, of whom little is known beyond the attacks made on him by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. The most important passage respecting him is in the Peace of Aristophanes (796, &c.). He was celebrated for his wit, of which several specimens are preserved by Plutarch.—3. Or Melanthus, an eminent Greek painter of the Sicyonian school, was contemporary with Apelles (B. C. 332), with whom he studied under Pamphilus. He was one of the best colourist of all the Greek painters.

Mĕlanthĭus (Μελάνθιος, prob. Melet-Irma), a river of Pontus, in Asia Minor, E. of the Prom. Jasonium; the boundary between Pontus Polemoniacus and Pontus Cappadocius.

Mĕlanthus or Mĕlanthĭus (Μέλανθος), one of the Nelidae, and king of Messenia, whence he was driven out by the Heraclidae, on their conquest of the Peloponnesus; and, following the instructions of the Delphic oracle, took refuge in Attica. In a war between the Athenians and Boeotians, Xanthus, the Boeotian king, challenged Thymoetes, king of Athens and the last of the Thesidae, to single combat. Thymoetes declined the challenge on the ground of age and infirmity. So ran the story, which strove afterwards to disguise the violent change of dynasty; and Melanthus undertook it on condition of being rewarded with the throne in the event of success. He slew Xanthus, and became king, to the exclusion of the Thesidae. According to Pausanias, the conqueror of Xanthus was Andropompus, the father of Melanthus; according to Aristotle, it was Codrus, his son.

Mĕlas (Μέλας), the name of several rivers, whose waters were of a dark colour. 1. (Mauro Nero or Mauro Potamo), a small river in Boeotia, which rises 7 stadia N. of Orchomenus, becomes navigable almost from its source, flows between Orchomenus and Aspledon, and loses the greater part of its waters in the marshes connected with lake Copais. A small portion of its waters fell in ancient times into the river Cephissus.—2. A river of Thessaly in the district Malis, flows near Heraclea and Trachis, and falls into the Maliac gulf.—3. A river of Thessaly in Phthiotis, falls into the Apidanus.—4. A river of Thrace, flows first S.W., then N.W., and falls N. of Cardia into the Melas Sinus.—5. A river in the N.E. of Sicily, which flows into the sea between Mylae and Naulochus, through excellent meadows, in which the oxen of the sun are said to have fed.—6. (Manaugat-Su), a navigable river, 50 stadia (5 geog. miles) E. of Side, was the boundary between Pamphylia and Cilicia.—7. (Kara-Su, i. e. the Black River), in Cappadocia, rises in M. Argaeus, flows past Mazaca, and, after forming a succession of morasses, falls into the Halys, and not (as Strabo says) into the Euphrates.

Mĕlas Sinus (Μέλας κόλπος: Gulf of Saros), a gulf of the Aegaean sea, between the coast of Thrace on the N.W. and the Thracian Chersonesus on the S.E., into which the river Melas flows.

Meldi or Meldae, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis on the borders of Belgica, and upon the river Sequana (Seine), in whose territory Caesar built 40 ships for his expedition against Britain.

Mĕlĕāger (Μελέαγρος). 1. Son of Oeneus and Althaea, the daughter of Thestius, husband of Cleopatra, and father of Polydora. Others call him a son of Ares and Althaea. He was one of the most famous Aetolian heroes of Calydon, and distinguished himself by his skill in throwing the javelin. He took part in the Argonautic expedition. On his return home, the fields of Calydon were laid waste by a monstrous boar, which Artemis had sent against the country as a punishment, because Oeneus, the king of the place, once neglected to offer up a sacrifice to the goddess. No one dared encounter the terrible animal, till at length Meleager, with a band of other heroes, went out to hunt the boar. He slew the animal; but the Calydonians and Curetes quarrelled about the head and hide, and at length waged open war against each other. The Calydonians were always victorious, so long as Meleager went out with them. But when his mother Althaea pronounced a curse upon him, enraged at the death of her brother who had fallen in the fight, Meleager stayed at home with his wife Cleopatra. The Curetes now began to press Calydon very hard. It was in vain that the old men of the town made him the most brilliant promises if he would again join in the fight, and that his father, his sisters, and his mother supplicated him. At length, however, he yielded to the prayers of his wife, Cleopatra: he put the Curetes to flight, but he never returned home, for the Erinnys, who had heard the curse of his mother, overtook him. Such is the more ancient form of the legend, as we find it in Homer. (Il. ix. 527, seq.) In the later traditions Meleager collects the heroes from all parts of Greece to join him in the hunt. Among others was the fair maiden Atalanta; but the heroes refused to hunt with her, until Meleager, who was in love with her, overcame their opposition. Atalanta gave the animal the first wound, which was at length slain by Meleager. He presented the hide to Atalanta, but the sons of Thestius took it from her, whereupon Meleager in a rage slew them. This, however, was the cause of his own death which came to pass in the following way. When he was 7 days old the Moerae appeared, declaring that the boy would die as soon as the piece of wood which was burning on the hearth should be consumed. Althaea, upon hearing this, extinguished the firebrand, and concealed it in a chest. Meleager himself became invulnerable; but after he had killed the brothers of his mother, she lighted the piece of wood, and Meleager died. Althaea, too late repenting of what she had done, put an end to her life; and Cleopatra died of grief. The sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Artemis changed them into guinea-hens (μελεαγρίδες), which were transferred to the island of Leros. Even in this condition they mourned during a certain part of the year for their brother. Two of them, Gorge and Deïanira, through the mediation of Dionysus, were not metamorphosed. — 2. Son of Neoptolemus, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great. After the death of Alexander the Great (B.C. 323) Meleager resisted the claims of Perdiccas to the regency, and was eventually associated with the latter in this office. Shortly afterwards, however, he was put to death by order of Perdiccas. — 3. Son of Eucrates, the celebrated writer and collector of epigrams, was a native of Gadara in Palestine, and lived about B. C. 60. There are 131 of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology, written in a good Greek style, though somewhat affected, and distinguished by sophistic acumen and amatory fancy. An account of his collection of epigrams is given under PLANUDES.

Mĕlētus or Melitus (Μέλητος: Μέλιτος), an obscure tragic poet, but notorious as one of the accusers of Socrates, was an Athenian, of the Pitthean demus. He is represented by Plato and Aristophanes and their scholiasts as a frigid and licentious poet, and a worthless and profligate man. In the accusation of Socrates it was Meletus who laid the indictment before the Archon Basileus; but in reality he was the most insignificant of the accusers; and according to one account he was bribed by Anytus and Lycon to take part in the affair. Soon after the death of Socrates, the Athenians repented of their injustice, and Meletus was stoned to death as one of the authors of their folly.

Mĕlĭa (Μελία), a nymph, daughter of Oceanus, became by Inachus the mother of Phoroneus and Aegialeus or Pegeus; and by Silenus the mother of the centaur, Pholus; and by Poseidon of Amycus. She was carried off by Apollo, and became by him the mother of Ismenius, and of the seer Tenerus. She was worshipped in the Ismenium, the sanctuary of Apollo, near Thebes. In the plural form, the Meliae or Meliades (Μελίαι, Μελιάδες) are the nymphs, who, along with the Gigantes and Erinnyes, sprang from the drops of blood that fell from Uranus and were received by Gaea. The nymphs that nursed Zeus are likewise called Meliae.

Mĕlĭboea (Μελίβοια: Μελιβοεύς). 1. A town on the coast of Thessaly in Magnesia, between Mt. Ossa and Mt. Pelion, is said to have been built by Magnes, and to have been named Meliboea in honour of his wife. It is mentioned by Homer as belonging to the dominions of Philoctetes, who is hence called by Virgil (Aen. iii. 401) dux Meliboeus. It was celebrated for its purple dye. (Lucret. ii. 499; Virg. Aen. v. 251.) — 2. A small island at the mouth of the river Orontes in Syria.

Mĕlĭcertes. [PALAEMON.]

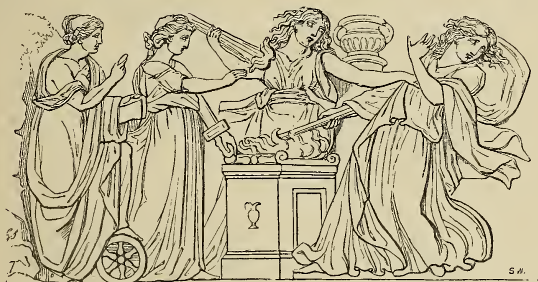
Mĕlissa (Μέλισσα). 1. A nymph said to have discovered the use of honey, and from whom bees were believed to have received their name (μέλισσαι). There can be no doubt, however, that the name really came from μέλι, honey, and was hence given to nymphs. According to some traditions bees were nymphs metamorphosed. Hence the nymphs who fed the infant Zeus with honey are called Melissae. — 2. The name of priestesses in general, but more especially of the priestesses of Demeter, Persephone, Apollo, and Artemis. — 3. Wife of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, and daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, was slain by her husband. [PERIANDER.]

Mĕlissus (Μέλισσος). 1. Of Samos, a Greek philosopher, the son of Ithagenes, was, according to the common account, the commander of the fleet opposed to Pericles, B.C. 440. But he is not mentioned by Thucydides, and ought probably to be placed much earlier, as he is said to have been connected with Heraclitus, and to have been a disciple of Parmenides. It appears from the fragments of his work, which was written in prose, and in the Ionic dialect, that he adopted the doctrines of the Eleatics. — 2. A Latin grammarian and a comic poet, was a freedman of Maecenas, and was entrusted by Augustus with the arrangement of the library in the portico of Octavia.

Mĕlĭta or Mĕlĭte (Μελίτη: Μελιταῖος, Melitensis). 1. (Malta), an island in the Mediterranean sea, situated 58 miles from the nearest point of Sicily, and 179 miles from the nearest point of Africa. Its greatest length is 17¼ miles, and its greatest breadth 9¼ miles. The island was first colonised by the Phoenicians, who used it as a place of refuge for their ships, on account of its excellent harbours. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, but was taken possession of by the Romans in the 2nd Punic war, and annexed to the province of Sicily. The Romans however appear to have neglected the island, and it is mentioned by Cicero as a frequent resort of pirates. It contained a town of the same name founded by the Carthaginians, and 2 celebrated temples, one of Juno on a promontory near the town, and another of Hercules in the S. E. of the island. It is celebrated in sacred history as the island on which the Apostle Paul was shipwrecked; though some writers erroneously suppose that the apostle was shipwrecked on the island of the same name off the Illyrian coast. The inhabitants manufactured fine cloth, which was in much request at Rome. They also exported a considerable quantity of honey; and from this island, according to some authorities, came the catuli Melitaei, the favourite lapdogs of the Roman ladies, though other writers make them come from the island off the Illyrian coast. — 2. (Meleda), a small island in the Adriatic sea off the coast of Illyria (Dalmatia), N. W. of Epidaurus. — 3. A demus in Attica, which also formed part of the city of Athens, was situated S. of the inner Ceramicus, and probably included the hill of the Museum. It was said to have derived its name from a nymph Melite, with whom Hercules was in love, and it therefore contained a temple of this god. One of the gates of Athens was called the Melitian gate, because it led to this demus. [See p. 103, a.] — 4. A lake in Aetolia near the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to the territory of the town Oeniadae.

Melitaea, Melitēa or Melitĭa (Μελιταία, Μελίτεια, Μελιτία: Μελιταιεύς), a town of Thessaly in Phthiotis, on the N. slope of Mt. Othrys, and near the river Enipeus. It is said to have been called Pyrrha in more ancient times, and the sepulchre of Hellen was shown in its market-place.

Mĕlĭtē (Μελίτη), a nymph, one of the Nereides, a daughter of Nereus and Doris.



Mĕlĭtēnē (Μελιτηνή), a district of Armenia Minor, between the Anti-Taurus and the Euphrates, celebrated for its fertility, and especially for its fruit-trees, oil, and wine. It possessed no great town until the 1st century of our era, when a city, also called Melitene (now Malatiyah) was built on a tributary of the Euphrates, and near that river itself, probably on the site of a very ancient fort. This became a place of considerable importance; the centre of several roads; the station, under Titus, of the 12th legion; and, in the later division of the provinces, the capital of Armenia Secunda. In A.D. 577, it was the scene of a victory gained by the Romans over the Persians under Chosroes I.

Mĕlĭto (Μελίτων), a Christian writer of considerable eminence, was bishop of Sardes in the reign of M. Aurelius, to whom he presented an Apology for the Christians. Of his numerous works only fragments are extant.

Mella or Mela (Mella), a river in Gallia Transpadana, which flows by Brixia and falls into the Ollius (Oglio).

Mellarĭa. 1. A town of the Basturi in Hispania Baetica between Belon and Calpe, on the road from Gades to Malaca. — 2. A town in the same province, considerably N. of the former, on the road from Corduba to Emerita.

Melodūnum (Melun), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island of the Sequana (Seine), and on the road from Agendicum to Lutetia Parisiorum.

Mēlos (Μῆλος: Μήλιος: Milo), an island in the Aegaean sea, and the most W.-ly of the group of the Cyclades, whence it was called Zephyria by Aristotle. It is about 70 miles N. of the coast of Crete, and 65 E. of the coast of Peloponnesus. Its length is about 14 miles from E. to W., and its breadth about 8 miles. It contains on the N. a deep bay, which forms an excellent harbour, and on which was situated a town, bearing the same name as the island. The island is of volcanic origin; it contains hot springs, and mines of sulphur and alum. Its soil is very fertile, and it produced in antiquity, as it does at present, abundance of corn, oil, wine, &c. It was first colonised by the Phoenicians, who are said to have called it Byblus or Byblis, after the Phoenician town Byblus. It was afterwards colonised by Lacedaemonians, or at least by Dorians; and consequently in the Peloponnesian war it embraced the side of Sparta. In B.C. 426 the Athenians made an unsuccessful attack upon the island; but in 416 they obtained possession of the town after a siege of several months, whereupon they killed all the adult males, sold the women and children as slaves, and peopled the island by an Athenian colony.—Melos was the birthplace of Diagoras, the atheist, whence Aristophanes calls Socrates also the Melian.

Melpŏmĕnē (Μελπομένη), i. e. the singing goddess, one of the 9 Muses, who presided over Tragedy. See MUSAE.

Memĭni, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, on the W. bank of the Durentia, whose chief town was Carpentoracte (Carpentras).

Memmĭa Gens, a plebeian house at Rome, whose members do not occur in history before B.C. 173, but who pretended to be descended from the Trojan Mnestheus. (Virg. Aen. v. 117.)

Memmĭus. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 111, was an ardent opponent of the oligarchical party at Rome during the Jugurthine war. Among the nobles impeached by Memmius were L. Calpurnius Bestia and M. Aemilius Scaurus. Memmius was slain by the mob of Saturninus and Glaucia, while a candidate for the consulship in 100. — 2. C. Memmius Gemellus, tribune of the plebs 66, curule aedile 60, and praetor 58. He belonged at that time to the Senatorian party, since he impeached P. Vatinius, opposed P. Clodius, and was vehement in his invectives against Julius Caesar. But before he competed for the consulship, 54, he had been reconciled to Caesar, who supported him with all his interest. Memmius, however, again offended Caesar by revealing a certain coalition with his opponents at the comitia. He was impeached for ambitus, and, receiving no aid from Caesar, withdrew from Rome to Mytilene, where he was living in the year of Cicero's proconsulate. Memmius married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced after having by her at least one son C. Memmius. [No. 3.] He was eminent both in literature and in eloquence. Lucretius dedicated his poem, De Rerum Natura, to him. He was a man of profligate character, and wrote indecent poems. — 3. C. Memmius, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs 54, when he prosecuted A. Gabinius for malversation in his province of Syria, and Domitius Calvinus for ambitus at his consular comitia. Memmius was stepson of T. Annius Milo who married his mother Fausta after her divorce. He was consul suffectus 34. — 4. P. Memmius Regulus, consul suffectus A. D. 31, afterwards praefect of Macedonia and Achaia. He was the husband of Lollia Paulina, and was compelled by Caligula to divorce her.

Memnon (Μέμνων). 1. The beautiful son of Tithonus and Eos (Aurora), and brother of Emathion. He is rarely mentioned by Homer, and must be regarded essentially as a post-Homeric hero. According to these later traditions, he was a prince of the Ethiopians, who came to the assistance of his uncle Priam, for Tithonus and Priam were half-brothers, being both sons of Laomedon by different mothers. Respecting his expedition to Troy there are different legends. According to some Memnon the Ethiopian first went to Egypt, thence to Susa, and thence to Troy. At Susa, which had been founded by Tithonus, Memnon built the acropolis, which was called after him the Memnonium. According to others Tithonus was the governor of a Persian province, and the favourite of Teutamus; and Memnon obtained the command of a large host of Ethiopians and Susans to succour Priam. Memnon came to the war in armour made for him by Hephaestus. He slew Antilochus, the son of Nestor, but was himself slain by Achilles, after a long and fierce combat. While the two heroes were fighting, Zeus weighed their fates, and the scale containing Memnon's sank. His mother was inconsolable at his death. She wept for him every morning; and the dew-drops of the morning are the tears of Eos. To soothe the grief of his mother, Zeus caused a number of birds to issue out of the funeral pile, on which the body of Memnon was burning, which, after flying thrice around the burning pile, divided into two separate bodies, which fought so fiercely, that half of them fell down upon the ashes of the hero, and thus formed a funeral sacrifice for him. These birds were called Memnonides, and according to a story current on the Hellespont, they visited every year the tomb of the hero. At the entreaties of Eos, Zeus conferred immortality upon Memnon. At a comparatively late period, the Greeks gave the name of Memnon to the colossal statue in the neighbourhood of Thebes, which was said to give forth a sound like the snapping asunder of a chord, when it was struck by the first rays of the rising sun. Although the Greeks gave this name to the statue, they were well aware that the Egyptians did not call the statue Memnon, but Amenophis. This figure was made of black stone, in a sitting posture, with its feet close together, and the hands leaning on the seat. Several very ingenious conjectures have been propounded respecting the alleged meaning of the so-called statue of Memnon. Some have asserted that it served for astronomical purposes, and others that it had reference to the mystic worship of the sun and light, but there can be little doubt that the statue represented nothing else than the Egyptian king Amenophis. — 2. A native of Rhodes, joined Artabazus, satrap of Lower Phrygia, who had married his sister, in his revolt against Darius Ochus. When fortune deserted the insurgents they fled to the court of Philip. Mentor, the brother of Memnon, being high in favour with Darius, interceded on behalf of Artabazus and Memnon, who were pardoned and again received into favour. On the death of Mentor, Memnon, who possessed great military skill and experience, succeeded him in his authority, which extended over all the W. coast of Asia Minor (about B.C. 336). When Alexander invaded Asia, Memnon defended Halicarnassus against Alexander, until it was no longer possible to hold out. He then collected an army and a fleet, with the design of carrying the war into Greece, but died at Mytilene in 333, before he could carry his plan into execution. His death was an irreparable loss to the Persian cause; for several Greek states were prepared to join him, had he carried the war into Greece. — 3. A native of Heraclea Pontica, wrote a large work on the history of that city. Of how many books it consisted we do not know. Photius had read from the 9th to the 16th inclusive, of which portion he has made a tolerably copious abstract. The first 8 books he had not read, and he speaks of other books after the 16th. The 9th book began with an account of the tyrant Clearchus, the disciple of Plato and Isocrates, and the 16th book came down to the time of Julius Caesar, after the latter had obtained the supreme power. The work was probably written in the time of Augustus, and certainly not later than the time of Hadrian or the Antonines. The Excerpta of Photius are published separately, by Orelli, Lips. 1816.

Memnŏnĭum and -ia (Μεμνόνειον, Μεμνόνεια), were names applied by the Greeks to certain very ancient buildings and monuments in Egypt and Asia, which they supposed to have been erected by or in honour of MEMNON. 1. The most celebrated of these was a great temple at Thebes, described by Strabo, and commonly identified by modern travellers with the magnificent ruins of the temple of Remeses the Great, at W. Thebes, or, as it is usually called, the tomb of Osymandyas, from its agreement with the description of that monument given by Diodorus. There are, however, strong grounds for supposing that the true Memnonium, described by Strabo, stood behind the 2 colossal sitting statues on the plain of Thebes, one of which is clearly the celebrated vocal statue of Memnon, and that it has entirely disappeared. — 2. [ABYDOS, No. 2.] — 3. The citadel of Susa was so called, and its erection was ascribed to the Memnon who appears in the legends of the Trojan war; but there is no reason to suppose that this connection of Memnon with the Persian capital existed before the Persian conquest of Egypt.

Memphis (Μέμφις, Μενφ: O. T. Moph: Μεμφίτης, Memphītes: Menf and Metrahenny, Ru.), a great city of Egypt, second in importance only to Thebes, after the fall of which it became the capital of the whole country, a position which it had previously shared with Thebes. It was of unknown antiquity, its foundation being ascribed to Menes. It stood on the left (W.) bank of the Nile, about 10 miles above the pyramids of Jizeh, near the N. limit of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, a nome of which (Μεμφίτης) was named after the city. It was connected by canals with the lakes of Moeris and Mareotis, and was the great centre of the commerce of Egypt until the Persian conquest (B.C. 524), when Cambyses partially destroyed the city. After the foundation of Alexandria, it sank into insignificance, and was finally destroyed at the Arab conquest in the 7th century. In the time of its splendour it is said to have been 150 stadia in circumference, and half a day's journey in every direction. Of the splendid buildings with which it was adorned, the chief were the palace of the Pharaohs; the temple-palace of the god-bull Apis; the temple of Serapis, with its avenue of sphinxes, now covered by the sand of the desert; and the temple of Hephaestus, the Egyptian Phtha, of whose worship Memphis was the chief seat. The ruins of this temple, and of other buildings, still cover a large portion of the plain between the Nile and the W. range of hills which skirt its valley.

Menaenum or Menae (Menenius Cic., Menaninus Plin., but on coins Menaenus: Mineo), a town on the E. coast of Sicily, S. of Hybla, the birthplace and residence of the Sicel chief Ducetius, who was long a formidable enemy of the Greek cities in Sicily. [DUCETIUS.] On his fall the town lost all its importance.

Mĕnălippus. [MELANIPPUS.]

Mĕnander (Μένανδρος), of Athens, the most distinguished poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Diopithes and Hegesistrate, and flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. He was born B.C. 342. His father, Diopithes, commanded the Athenian forces on the Hellespont in the year of his son's birth. Alexis, the comic poet, was the uncle of Menander, on the father's side; and we may naturally suppose that the young Menander derived from his uncle his taste for the comic drama, and was instructed by him in its rules of composition. His character must have been greatly influenced by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicurus, of whom the former was his teacher and the latter his intimate friend. His taste and sympathies were altogether with the philosophy of Epicurus; and in an epigram he declared that "as Themistocles rescued Greece from slavery, so Epicurus from unreason." From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Characteres of the philosopher, and which formed the great charm of the comedies of Menander. His master's attention to external elegance and comfort he not only imitated, but, as was natural in a man of an elegant person, a joyous spirit, and a serene and easy temper, he carried it to the extreme of luxury and effeminacy. The moral character of Menander is defended by modern writers against the aspersions of Suidas and others. Thus much is certain, that his comedies contain nothing offensive, at least to the taste of his own and the following ages, none of the purest, it must be admitted, as they were frequently acted at private banquets. Of the actual events of his life we know but little. He enjoyed the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus, whose attention was first drawn to him by admiration of his works. Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, was also one of his admirers; and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandria; but Menander seems to have declined the proffered honour. He died at Athens B.C. 291, at the age of 52, and is said to have been drowned while swimming in the harbour of Piraeus. Notwithstanding Menander's fame as a poet, his public dramatic career was not eminently successful; for, though he composed upwards of 100 comedies, he only gained the prize 8 times. His preference for elegant exhibitions of character above coarse jesting may have been the reason why he was not so great a favourite with the common people as his principal rival, Philemon, who is said, moreover, to have used unfair means of gaining popularity. Menander appears to have borne the popular neglect very lightly, in the consciousness of his superiority; and once, when he happened to meet Philemon, he is said to have asked him, "Pray, Philemon, do not you blush when you gain a victory over me?" The neglect of Menander's contemporaries has been amply compensated by his posthumous fame. His comedies retained their place on the stage down to the time of Plutarch, and the unanimous consent of antiquity placed him at the head of the New Comedy, and on an equality with the great masters of the various kinds of poetry. His comedies were imitated by the Roman dramatists, particularly by Terence, who was little more than a translator of Menander. But we cannot form, from any one play of Terence, a fair notion of the corresponding play of Menander, as the Roman poet frequently compressed two of Menander's plays into one. It was this mixing up of different plays that Caesar pointed to by the phrase O dimidiate Menander, in the epigram which he wrote upon Terence. Of Menander's comedies only fragments are extant. The best edition of them is by Meineke, in his Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, Berol. 1841.

Menapĭa (Μεναπία), a city of Bactriana, on the river Zariaspis.

Menapĭi, a powerful people in the N. of Gallia Belgica, originally dwelt on both banks of the Rhine, but were afterwards driven out of their possessions on the right bank by the Usipetes and Tenchteri, and inhabited only the left bank near its mouth, and W. of the Mosa. Their country was covered with forests and swamps. They had a fortress on the Mosa called Castellum Menapiorum (Kessel).

Mēnas (Μηνᾶς), also called Menŏdōrus (Μηνόδωρος) by Appian, a freedman of Pompey the Great, was one of the principal commanders of the fleet of Sext. Pompey in his war against Octavian and Antony, B.C. 40. In 39 he tried in vain to dissuade his master from concluding a peace with Octavian and Antony; and, at an entertainment given to them by Sextus on board his ship at Misenum, Menas suggested to him to cut the cables of the vessel, and, running it out to sea, despatch both his rivals. The treacherous proposal, however, was rejected by Pompey. On the breaking out of the war again in 38, Menas deserted Pompey and went over to Octavian. In 36 he returned to his old master's service; but in the course of the same year he again played the deserter, and joined Octavian. In 35 he accompanied Octavian, in the Pannonian campaign, and was slain at the siege of Siscia. According to the old scholiasts, this Menas is the person so vehemently attacked by Horace in his 4th epode. This statement has been called in question by many modern commentators; but their arguments are far from satisfactory.

Mendē or Mendae (Μένδη, Μενδαῖος), a town on the W. coast of the Macedonian peninsula Pellene and on the Thermaic gulf, was a colony of the Eretrians, and was celebrated for its wine. It was for some time a place of considerable importance, but was ruined by the foundation of Cassandrea.

Mendes (Μένδης: Μενδήσιος: Ru. near Matarieh), a considerable city of the Delta of Egypt, on the S. side of the lake of Tanis (Menzaleh), and on the bank of one of the lesser arms of the Nile, named after it Μενδήσιον στόμα: the chief seat of the worship of MENDES.

Mĕnĕcles (Μενεκλῆς). 1. Of Barce in Cyrene, an historian of uncertain date.— 2. Of Alabanda, a celebrated rhetorician. He and his brother Hierocles taught rhetoric at Rhodes, where the orator M. Antonius heard them, about B.C. 94.

Mĕnĕcrătes (Μενεκράτης). 1. A Syracusan physician at the court of Philip, king of Macedon, B.C. 359—336. He made himself ridiculous by calling himself "Jupiter," and assuming divine honours. There is a tale that he was invited one day by Philip to a magnificent entertainment, where the other guests were sumptuously fed, while he himself had nothing but incense and libations, as not being subject to the human infirmity of hunger. He was at first pleased with his reception, but afterwards perceiving the joke, and finding that no more substantial food was offered him, he left the party in disgust.— 2. Tiberius Claudius Menecrates, a physician mentioned by Galen, composed more than 150 medical works, of which only a few fragments remain.

Mĕnĕdēmus (Μενέδημος), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Eretria, and though of noble birth was poor, and worked for a livelihood either as a builder or as a tent-maker. According to one story he seized the opportunity afforded by his being sent on some military service to Megara to hear Plato, and abandoned the army to addict himself to philosophy; but it may be questioned whether he was old enough to have heard Plato before the death of the latter. According to another story, he and his friend Asclepiades got their livelihood as millers, working during the night, that they might have leisure for philosophy in the day. The 2 friends afterwards became disciples of Stilpo at Megara. From Megara they went to Elis, and placed themselves under the instruction of some disciples of Phaedo. On his return to Eretria Menedemus established a school of philosophy, which was called the Eretrian. He did not, however, confine himself to philosophical pursuits, but took an active part in the political affairs of his native city, and came to be the leading man in the state. He went on various embassies to Lysimachus, Demetrius, and others; but being suspected of the treacherous intention of betraying Eretria into the power of Antigonus, he quitted his native city secretly, and took refuge with Antigonus in Asia. Here he starved himself to death in the 74th year of his age, probably about B.C. 277. Of the philosophy of Menedemus little is known, except that it closely resembled that of the Megarian school. [EUCLIDES, No. 2.]

Mĕnĕlāi, or -us, Portus (Μενελάϊος λίμην, Μενέλαος: Marsa-Toubrouk, or Ras-el-Milhr ?), an ancient city on the coast of Marmarica, in N. Africa, founded, according to tradition, by Menelaus. It is remarkable in history as the place where Agesilaus died.

Mĕnĕlāïum (Μενελάϊον), a mountain in Laconia, S. E. of Sparta near Therapne, on which the heroum of Menelaus was situated, the foundations of which temple were discovered in the year 1834.

Mĕnĕlāus (Μενέλαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλας). 1. Son of Plisthenes or Atreus, and younger brother of Agamemnon. His early life is related under AGAMEMNON. He was king of Lacedaemon, and married to the beautiful Helen, by whom he became the father of Hermione. When Helen had been carried off by Paris, Menelaus and Ulysses sailed to Troy in order to demand her restitution. Menelaus was hospitably treated by Antenor, but the journey was of no avail; and the Trojan Antimachus even advised his fellow-citizens to kill Menelaus and Ulysses. Thereupon Menelaus and his brother Agamemnon resolved to march against Troy with all the forces that Greece could muster. Agamemnon was chosen the commander-in-chief. In the Trojan war Menelaus was under the special protection of Hera and Athena, and distinguished himself by his bravery in battle. He killed many illustrious Trojans, and would have slain Paris also in single combat, had not the latter been carried off by Aphrodite in a cloud. Menelaus was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse; and as soon as Troy was taken he and Ulysses hastened to the house of Deiphobus, who had married Helen after the death of Paris, and put him to death in a barbarous manner. Menelaus is said to have been secretly introduced into the chamber of Deiphobus by Helen, who thus became reconciled to her former husband. He was among the first that sailed away from Troy, accompanied by his wife Helen and Nestor; but he was 8 years wandering about the shores of the Mediterranean, before he reached home. He arrived at Sparta on the very day on which Orestes was engaged in burying Clytaemnestra and Aegisthus. Henceforward he lived with Helen at Sparta in peace and wealth, and his palace shone in its splendour like the sun or the moon. When Telemachus visited Sparta to inquire after his father, Menelaus was solemnising the marriage of his daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus, and of his son Megapenthes with a daughter of Alector. In the Homeric poems Menelaus is described as a man of an athletic figure; he spoke little, but what he said was always impressive; he was brave and courageous, but milder than Agamemnon, intelligent and hospitable. According to the prophecy of Proteus in the Odyssey, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium. According to a later tradition, he and Helen went to the Taurians, where they were sacrificed by Iphigenia to Artemis. Menelaus was worshipped as a hero at Therapne, where his tomb and that of Helen were shown. Respecting the tale that Helen never went to Troy, but was detained in Egypt, see HELENA. — 2. Son of Lagus, and brother of Ptolemy Soter, held possession of Cyprus for his brother, but was defeated and driven out of the island by Demetrius Poliorcetes, B. C. 306. — 3. A Greek mathematician, a native of Alexandria, the author of an extant treatise in 3 books, on the Sphere. He made some astronomical observations at Rome in the 1st year of the emperor Trajan, A. D. 98.

Mĕnĕlāus (Μενέλαος), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Canopic branch of the Nile, named after the brother of Ptolemy the son of Lagus. It was made the capital of the district between the lakes of Moeris and Mareotis (νομὸς Μενελαΐτης).

Mĕnēnĭus Lanātus. 1. Agrippa, consul, B. C. 503, conquered the Sabines. It was owing to his mediation that the first great rupture between the patricians and plebeians, when the latter seceded to the Sacred Mount, was brought to a happy and peaceful termination in 493; and it was upon this occasion he is said to have related to the plebeians his well-known fable of the belly and its members. — 2. T., consul 477, was defeated by the Etruscans. He had previously allowed the Fabii to be destroyed by the Etruscans, although he might have assisted them with his army. For this act of treachery he was brought to trial by the tribunes and condemned to pay a fine. He took his punishment so much to heart, that he shut himself up in his house and died of grief.

Mēnes (Μήνης), first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of the Egyptians themselves. Herodotus records of him that he built Memphis on a piece of ground which he had rescued from the river by turning it from its former course, and erected therein a magnificent temple to Hephaestus (Pthah). Diodorus tells us that he introduced into Egypt the worship of the gods and the practice of sacrifices, as well as a more elegant and luxurious style of living. That he was a conqueror, like other founders of kingdoms, we learn from an extract from Manetho preserved by Eusebius. By Marsham and others he has been identified with the Mizraim of Scripture. According to some accounts he was killed by a hippopotamus.

Menesthĕi Portus (Puerto de S. Maria), a harbour in Hispania Baetica, not far from Gades, with an oracle of Menestheus, who is said in some legends to have settled in Spain.

Mĕnestheus (Μενεσθεύς). 1. Son of Peteus, an Athenian king, who led the Athenians against Troy, and surpassed all other mortals in arranging the war-steeds and men for battle. With the assistance of the Tyndarids, he is said to have driven Theseus from his kingdom. — 2. Son of Iphicrates, the famous Athenian general, by the daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace. He married the daughter of Timotheus; and in 356 was chosen commander in the Social war, his father and his father-in-law being appointed to aid him with their counsel and experience. They were all three impeached by their colleague, CHARES, for alleged misconduct and treachery in the campaign; but Iphicrates and Menestheus were acquitted.

Mēninx or Lotophagītis, aft. Girba (Μῆνιγξ, Λωτοφαγῖτις, Λωτοφάγων νῆσος: Jerbah), a considerable island, close to the coast of Africa Propria, at the S.E. extremity of the Lesser Syrtis, with 2 cities, Meninx (Menaz) on the N.E., and Girba, or Gerra, on the S.W. It was the birthplace of the emperors Vibius Gallus and Volusianus.

Mĕnippē (Μενίππη), daughter of Orion and sister of Metioche. These 2 sisters put themselves to death of their own accord in order to propitiate the 2 Erinnyes, who had visited Aonia with a plague. They were metamorphosed by Persephone and Hades into comets, and the Aonians erected to them a sanctuary near Orchomenos.

Mĕnippus (Μένιππος), a cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Coele-Syria. He seems to have been a hearer of Diogenes, and flourished about B. C. 60. He amassed great wealth as a usurer (ἡμεροδανειστής), but was cheated out of it all, and committed suicide. We are told that he wrote nothing serious, but that his books were full of jests; whence it would appear that he was one of those cynic philosophers who threw all their teaching into a satirical form. In this character he is several times introduced by Lucian. His works are now entirely lost; but we have considerable fragments of Varro's Saturae Menippeae, written in imitation of Menippus.

Mennis, a city of Adiabene, in Assyria, only mentioned by Curtius (v. 1).

Menŏdŏtus (Μηνόδοτος), a physician of Nicomedia in Bithynia, who was a pupil of Antiochus, of Laodicea, and tutor to Herodotus of Tarsus; he belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and lived probably about the beginning of the 2nd century after Christ.

Mĕnoeceus (Μενοικεύς). 1. A Theban, grandson of Pentheus, and father of Hipponome, Jocasta, and Creon. — 2. Grandson of the former, and son of Creon. He put an end to his life because Tiresias had declared that his death would bring victory to his country, when the 7 Argive heroes marched against Thebes. His tomb was shown at Thebes near the Neitian gate.

Menoetĭus (Μενοίτιος). 1. Son of Iapetus and Clymene or Asia, and brother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. He was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, in the battle with the Titans, and was hurled into Tartarus. — 2. Son of Actor and Aegina, husband of Polymele or Sthenele, and father of Patroclus, who is hence called Menoetiades. After Patroclus had slain the son of Amphidamas, Menoetius fled with him to Peleus in Phthia, and had him educated there.

Mĕnon (Μένων), a Thessalian adventurer, was one of the generals of the Greek mercenaries in the army of Cyrus the Younger when the latter marched into Upper Asia against his brother Artaxerxes, B. C. 401. After the death of Cyrus he was apprehended along with the other Greek generals by Tissaphernes, and was put to death by lingering tortures, which lasted for a whole year. His character is drawn in the blackest colours by Xenophon. He is the same as the Menon introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name.

Mens, a personification of mind, worshipped by the Romans. She had a sanctuary on the Capitol; and the object of her worship was, that the citizens might always be guided by a right spirit.

Mentĕsa (Mentesānus). 1. Surnamed Bastia, a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Castulo to Carthago Nova. — 2. A small town of the Bastuli in the S. of Hispania Baetica.

Mentor (Μέντωρ). 1. Son of Alcimus and a faithful friend of Ulysses, frequently mentioned in the Odyssey. — 2. A Greek of Rhodes, who, with his brother Memnon, rendered active assistance to Artabazus. When the latter found himself compelled to take refuge at the court of Philip, Mentor entered the service of Nectanabis, king of Egypt. He was sent to the assistance of Tennes, king of Sidon, in his revolt against Darius Ochus; and when Tennes went over to the Persians, Mentor was taken into the service of Darius. He rose rapidly in the favour of Darius, and eventually received a satrapy, including all the western coast of Asia Minor. His influence with Darius enabled him to procure the pardon of his brother Memnon. He died in possession of his satrapy, and was succeeded by his brother Memnon. [MEMNON.] — 3. The most celebrated silver-chaser among the Greeks, who must have flourished before B. C. 356. His works were vases and cups, which were most highly prized by the Romans.

Mercurĭi Promontorĭum. [HERMAEUM.]

Mercŭrĭus, a Roman divinity of commerce and gain. The character of the god is clear from his name, which is connected with merx and mercari. A temple was built to him as early as B. C. 495 near the Circus Maximus; an altar of the god existed near the Porta Capena, by the side of a well; and in later times a temple seems to have been built on the same spot. Under the name of the ill-willed (malevolus), he had a statue in what was called the vicus sobrius, or the sober street, in which no shops were allowed to be kept, and milk was offered to him there instead of wine. This statue had a purse in its hand, to indicate his functions. His festival was celebrated on the 25th of May, and chiefly by merchants, who also visited the well near the Porta Capena, to which magic powers were ascribed; and with water from that well they used to sprinkle themselves and their merchandise, that they might be purified, and yield a large profit. The Romans of later times identified Mercurius, the patron of merchants and tradespeople, with the Greek Hermes, and transferred all the attributes and myths of the latter to the former. The Fetiales, however, never recognised the identity; and instead of the caduceus used a sacred branch as the emblem of peace. The resemblance between Mercurius and Hermes is indeed very slight; and their identification is a proof of the thoughtless manner in which the Romans acted in this respect. [HERMES.]

Mercurĭus Trismegistus. [HERMES TRISMEGISTUS.]

Mērĭŏnes (Μηριόνης), a Cretan hero, son of Molus, who, conjointly with Idomeneus, led the Cretans in 80 ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and usually acted together with his friend Idomeneus. Later traditions relate, that on his way homeward he was thrown on the coast of Sicily, where he was received by the Cretans who had settled there; whereas, according to others, he returned safely to Crete, and was buried and worshipped as a hero, together with Idomeneus, at Cnossus.

Mermĕrus (Μέρμερος). 1. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Macareus or Mormorus, was murdered, together with his brother Pheres, by his mother at Corinth. — 2. Son of Pheres, and grandson of Jason and Medea.

Mermessus or Myrmessus (Μερμησσός, Μυρμησσός), also written Marmessus and Marpessus, a town of Mysia, in the territory of Lampsacus, not far from Polichna; the native place of a sibyl.

Merobaudes, Flavĭus, a general and a poet, whose merits are recorded in an inscription on the base of a statue dug up in the Ulpian forum at Rome in the year 1812 or 1813. We learn from the inscription that the statue was erected in A. D. 435. Some fragments of the poems of Merobaudes were discovered by Niebuhr upon a palimpsest belonging to the monastery of St. Gall, and were published by him at Bonn, 1823.

Mĕrŏē (Μερόη: pts. of Nubia and Sennar), the island, so-called, and almost an island in reality, formed by the rivers Astapus (Blue Nile) and Astaboras (Atbarah), and the portion of the Nile between their mouths, was a district of Ethiopia. Its capital, also called Meroë, stood near the N. point of the island, on the E. bank of the Nile, below the modern Shendy, where the plain, near the village of Assour, is covered with ruins of temples, pyramids, and other works, in a style closely resembling the Egyptian. Standing in a fertile district, rich in timber and minerals, at the foot of the highlands of Abyssinia, and at the junction of 2 great rivers, Meroë became at a very early period a chief emporium for the trade between Egypt, N. Africa, Ethiopia, Arabia, and India, and the capital of a powerful state. The government was a hierarchical monarchy, entirely in the hands of a ruling caste of priests, who chose a king from among themselves, bound him to govern according to their laws, and put him to death when they chose; until king Ergamenes (about B. C. 300) threw off the yoke of the priests, whom he massacred, and converted his kingdom into an absolute monarchy. The priests of Meroë were closely connected in origin and customs with those of Egypt; and, according to some traditions, the latter sprang from the former, and they from India; but the settlement of this point involves an important ethnical question, which lies beyond the limits of this book. For further details respecting the kingdom of Meroë, see AETHIOPIA. Meroë had a celebrated oracle of Ammon.

Merom Lacus. [SEMECHONITIS.]

Mĕrŏpē (Μερόπη). 1. One of the Heliades or sisters of Phaëthon. — 2. Daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and wife of Sisyphus of Corinth, by whom she became the mother of Glaucus. In the constellation of the Pleiades she is the 7th and the least visible star, because she is ashamed of having had intercourse with a mortal man. — 3. Daughter of Cypselus, wife of Cresphontes, and mother of Aepytus. For details, see AEPYTUS.

Mĕrops (Μέροψ). 1. King of the island of Cos, husband of the nymph Ethemea, and father of Eumelus. His wife was killed by Artemis, because she had neglected to worship that goddess. Merops, in order to rejoin his wife, wished to make away with himself, but Hera changed him into an eagle, whom she placed among the stars. — 2. King of the Ethiopians, by whose wife, Clymene, Helios became the father of Phaëthon. — 3. King of Rhyndacus, on the Hellespont, also called Macar or Macareus, was a celebrated soothsayer, and father of Clite, Arisbe, Amphius, and Adrastus.

Merŭla, L. Cornēlĭus, was flamen dialis, and, on the deposition of L. Cinna in B. C. 87, was elected consul in his place. On the capture of Rome by Marius and Cinna at the close of the same year, Merula put an end to his own life, in order to escape the hands of the executioner.

Mesambrĭa (Μεσαμβρίη: Bushehr), a peninsula on the coast of Persis, near the river Padargus.

Meschĕla (Μεσχέλα: prob. near Bonah), a large city on the coast of N. Africa, said to have been founded by Greeks returning from the Trojan war. It was taken by Eumachus, the lieutenant of Agathocles.

Mesembrĭa (Μεσημβρία, Herod. Μεσαμβρίη: Μεσημβριανός). 1. (Missivria or Messuri), a celebrated town of Thrace on the Pontus Euxinus, and at the foot of Mt. Haemus, founded by the inhabitants of Chalcedon and Byzantium in the time of Darius Hystaspis, and hence called a colony of Megara, since those 2 towns were founded by the Megarians. — 2. A town in Thrace, but of much less importance, on the coast of the Aegaean sea, and in the territory of the Cicones, near the mouth of the Lissus, and the most W.-ly of the Samothracian settlements on the mainland.

Mĕsēnē (Μεσηνή, i. e. Midland), a name given to that part of Babylonia which consisted of the great island formed by the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Royal Canal; and contained, therefore, the greater part of Babylonia.

Mesŏa or Messŏa. [SPARTA.]

Mesŏgis. [MESSOGIS.]

Mesŏmēdes (Μεσομήδης), a lyric and epigrammatic poet under Hadrian and the Antonines, was a native of Crete, and a freedman of Hadrian, whose favourite Antinous he celebrated in a poem. A salary, which he had received from Hadrian, was diminished by Antoninus Pius. Three poems of his are preserved in the Greek Anthology.

Mĕsŏpŏtămĭa (Μεσοποταμία, Μέση τῶν ποταμῶν: O. T. Aram Naharaim, i. e. Syria between the Rivers: LXX. Μεσοποταμία Συρίας: Al-Jesira, i.e. The Island), a district of W. Asia, named from its position between the Euphrates and the Tigris, of which rivers the former divided it from Syria and Arabia on the W., the latter from Assyria on the E.: on the N. it was separated from Armenia by a branch of the Taurus, called Masius, and on the S. from Babylonia, by the Median Wall. The name was first used by the Greeks in the time of the Seleucidae. In earlier times the country was reckoned a part, sometimes of Syria, and sometimes of Assyria. Nor in the division of the Persian empire was it recognised as a distinct country, but it belonged to the satrapy of Babylonia. Excepting the mountainous region on the N. and N.E. formed by the chain of MASIUS, and its prolongation parallel to the Tigris, the country formed a vast plain, broken by few hills, well watered by rivers and canals, and very fertile, except in the S. part, which was more like the Arabian Desert, on the opposite side of the Euphrates. Besides corn, and fruits, and spices (e. g. the amomum), it produced fine timber, and supported large herds of cattle; in the S., or desert part, there were numerous wild animals, such as wild asses, gazelles, ostriches, and lions. Its chief mineral products were naphtha and jet. The N. part of Mesopotamia was divided into the districts of MYGDONIA and OSROËNE. It belonged successively to the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Macedonian, Syro-Grecian, Parthian, and later Persian empires. In a wider sense, the name is sometimes applied to the whole country between the Euphrates and the Tigris.

Mespĭla (ἡ Μέσπιλα: Ru. at Kouyounjik, opp. to Mosul, Layard: others give different sites for it), a city of Assyria, on the E. side of the Tigris, which Xenophon (Anab. iii. 4) mentions as having been formerly a great city, inhabited by Medes, but in his time fallen to decay. It had a wall 6 parasangs in circuit, composed of 2 parts; namely, a base 50 feet thick and 50 high, of polished stone full of shells (the limestone of the country), upon which was built a brick wall 50 feet thick and 100 high. It had served, according to tradition, as the refuge for the Median queen, when the Persians overthrew the empire of the Medes, and it resisted all the efforts of the Persian king to take it, until a thunder storm frightened the inhabitants into a surrender.

Messa (Μέσσα, Μέσση: Mezapo), a town and harbour in Laconia near C. Taenarum.

Messăbătēnē or -ĭcē (Μεσσαβατηνή, Μεσσαβατική: Μεσσαβάται), a small district on the S.E. margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the borders of Media, Persis, and Susiana, reckoned sometimes to Persis and sometimes to Susiana. The name seems to be derived from the mountain passes in the district.

Messāla or Messalla, the name of a distinguished family of the Valeria gens at Rome. They appear for the first time on the consular Fasti in B. C. 263, and for the last in A. D. 506. — 1. M'. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messala, was consul B. C. 263, and, in conjunction with his colleague M. Otacilius, carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians in Sicily. The 2 consuls concluded a peace with Hieron. In consequence of his relieving Messana he obtained the cognomen of Messala. His triumph was distinguished by two remarkable monuments of his victory — by a pictorial representation of a battle with the Sicilian and Punic armies, which he placed in the Curia Hostilia, and by a sun-dial (Horologium), from the booty of Catana, which was set up on a column behind the rostra, in the forum. Messala was censor in 252. — 2. M. Valerius Messala, consul 226. — 3. M. Valerius Messala, praetor peregrinus 194, and consul 188, when he had the province of Liguria. — 4. M. Valerius Messala, consul 161, and censor 154. — 5. M. Valerius Messala Niger, praetor 63; consul 61; and censor 55. He belonged to the aristocratical party. He married a sister of the orator Q. Hortensius, by whom he had at least one son. — 6. M. Valerius Messala, son of the preceding; consul 53; belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party; but in consequence probably of his enmity to Pompey, he joined Caesar in the civil war, and served under him in Africa. He was in high repute for his skill in augury, on which science he wrote. — 7. M. Valerius Messala Corvinus, son of the preceding, was partly educated at Athens, where probably began his intimacy with Horace and L. Bibulus. After Caesar's death (44) he joined the republican party, and attached himself especially to Cassius, whom, long after, when he had become the friend of Augustus, he was accustomed to call "my general." Messala was proscribed; but since his kinsmen proved his absence from Rome at the time of Caesar's assassination, the triumvirs erased his name from the list, and offered him security for his person and property. Messala, however, rejected their offers, followed Cassius into Asia, and at Philippi, in the first day's battle, turned Augustus's flank, stormed his camp, and narrowly missed taking him prisoner. After the death of Brutus and Cassius, Messala, with a numerous body of fugitives, took refuge in the island of Thasos. His followers, though defeated, were not disorganised, and offered him the command. But he induced them to accept honourable terms from Antony, to whom he attached himself until Cleopatra's influence made his ruin certain and easy to be foreseen. Messala then again changed his party, and served Augustus effectively in Sicily, 36; against the Salassians, a mountain tribe lying between the Graian and the Pennine Alps, 34; and at Actium, 31. A decree of the senate had abrogated Antony's consulship for 31, and Messala was appointed to the vacant place. He was proconsul of Aquitania in 28—27, and obtained a triumph for his reduction of that province. Shortly before or immediately after his administration of Aquitania, Messala held a prefecture in Asia Minor. He was deputed by the senate, probably in 30, to greet Augustus with the title of "Pater Patriae;" and the opening of his address on that occasion is preserved by Suetonius. During the disturbances at the comitia in 27, Augustus nominated Messala to the revived office of warden of the city; but he resigned it in a few days. Messala soon afterwards withdrew from all public employments except his augurship, to which Augustus had specially appointed him, although, at the time of his admission, there was no vacancy in the augural college. About 2 years before his death, which happened about the middle of Augustus's reign, B. C. 3—A. D. 3, Messala's memory failed him, and he often could not recall his own name. His tomb was of remarkable splendour. Messala was as much distinguished in the literary as in the political world of Rome. He was a patron of learning and the arts, and was himself an historian, a poet, a grammarian, and an orator. He wrote commentaries on the civil wars after Caesar's death, and a genealogical work, De Romanis Familiis. The treatise, however, De Progenie Augusti, which sometimes accompanies Eutropius and the minor Roman historians, is the forgery of a much later age. Messala's poems were of a satirical or even licentious character. His writings as a grammarian were numerous and minute, comprising treatises on collocation and lexicography, and on the powers and uses of single letters. His eloquence reflected the character of his age. More smooth and correct than vigorous or original, he persuaded rather than convinced, and conciliated rather than persuaded. His health was feeble, and the prooemia of his speeches generally pleaded indisposition and solicited indulgence. He mostly took the defendant's side, and was frequently associated in causes with C. Asinius Pollio. He recommended and practised translation from the Greek orators; and his version of the Phryne of Hyperides was thought to exhibit remarkable skill in either language. His political eminence, the wealth he inherited or acquired in the civil wars, and the favour of Antony and Augustus, rendered Messala one of the principal persons of his age, and an effective patron of its literature. His friendship for Horace and his intimacy with Tibullus are well known. In the elegies of the latter poet, the name of Messala is continually introduced. The dedication of the Ciris, a doubtful work, is not sufficient proof of his friendship with Virgil; but the companion of "Plotius and Varius, of Maecenas and Octavius" (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 81), cannot well have been unknown to the author of the Eclogues and Georgics. He directed Ovid's early studies (ex Pont. iv. 16), and Tiberius sought his acquaintance in early manhood, and took him for his model in eloquence. — 8. M. Valerius Messala Barbatus Appianus, was consul B.C. 12. and died in his year of office. He was the father (or grandfather) of the empress Messalina. — 9. L. Valerius Messala Volesus, consul A.D. 5, and afterwards proconsul of Asia, where his cruelties drew on him the anger of Augustus and a condemnatory decree from the senate. — 10. L. Vipstanus Messala, legionary tribune in Vespasian's army, A.D. 70, was brother of Aquilius Regulus, the notorious delator in Domitian's reign. He is one of Tacitus' authorities for the history of the civil wars after Galba's death, and a principal interlocutor in the dialogue De Oratoribus, ascribed to Tacitus.

Messālīna. 1. Statilĭa, granddaughter of T. Statilius Taurus, cos. A.D. 11, was the 3rd wife of the emperor Nero, who married her in A.D. 66. She had previously espoused Atticus Vestinus, whom Nero put to death without accusation or trial, merely that he might marry Messalina. — 2. Valerĭa, daughter of M. Valerius Messala Barbatus and of Domitia Lepida, was the 3rd wife of the emperor Claudius. She married Claudius, to whom she was previously related, before his accession to the empire. Her profligacy and licentiousness were notorious; and the absence of virtue was not concealed by a lingering sense of shame or even by a specious veil of decorum. She was as cruel as she was profligate; and many members of the most illustrious families of Rome were sacrificed to her fears or her hatred. She long exercised an unbounded empire over her weak husband, who alone was ignorant of her infidelities. For some time she was supported in her career of crime by the freedmen of Claudius; but when Narcissus, the most powerful of the emperor's freedmen, perceived that he should probably fall a victim to Messalina's intrigues, he determined to get rid of her. The insane folly of Messalina furnished the means of her own destruction. Having conceived a violent passion for a handsome Roman youth, C. Silius, she publicly married him with all the rites of a legal connubium during the absence of Claudius at Ostia, A.D. 48. Narcissus persuaded the emperor that Silius and Messalina would not have dared such an outrage had they not determined also to deprive him of empire and life. Claudius wavered long, and at length Narcissus himself issued Messalina's death-warrant. She was put to death by a tribune of the guards in the gardens of Lucullus.

Messāna (Μεσσάνα Dor., Μεσσήνη: Μεσσάνιος: Messina), a celebrated town on the N. E. coast of Sicily, on the straits separating Italy from this island, which are here about 4 miles broad. The Romans called the town Messana, according to its Doric pronunciation, but Messene was its more usual name among the Greeks. It was originally a town of the Siceli, and was called Zancle (Ζάγκλη), or a sickle, on account of the shape of its harbour, which is formed by a singular curve of sand and shells. The first Greek colonists were, according to Thucydides, pirates from the Chalcidian town of Cumae in Italy, who were joined by Chalcidians from Euboea, and, according to Strabo, by Naxians; but these 2 accounts are not contradictory, for since Naxos in Sicily was also a colony from Chalcis, we may easily suppose that the Naxians joined the other Chalcidians in the foundation of the town. Zancle soon became so powerful that it founded the town of Himera, about B.C. 648. After the capture of Miletus by the Persians, the inhabitants of Zancle invited the Ionians, who had been expelled from their native country, to settle on their "beautiful coast" (καλὴ ἀκτή, Herod. vi. 22.); and a number of Samians and other Ionic Greeks accepted their offer. On landing in the S. of Italy, they were persuaded by Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, to take possession of Zancle during the absence of Scythes, the tyrant of the city, who was engaged in the siege of some other Sicilian town. But their treachery was soon punished; for Anaxilas himself shortly afterwards drove the Samians out of Zancle, and made himself master of the town, the name of which he changed into Messana or Messene, both because he was himself a Messenian, and because he transferred to the place a body of Messenians from Rhegium. Anaxilas died 476; and about 10 years afterwards (466) his sons were driven out of Messana and Rhegium, and republican governments established in these cities. Messana now enjoyed great prosperity for several years, and in consequence of its excellent harbour and advantageous position, it became a place of great commercial importance. But in 396 it was taken by the Carthaginians, who destroyed the town because they saw that they should be unable to maintain so distant a possession against the power of Dionysius of Syracuse. Dionysius began to rebuild it in the same year, and besides collecting the remains of the former population, he added a number of Locrians, Messenians, and others, so that its inhabitants were of a very mixed kind. After the banishment of the younger Dionysius, Messana was for a short time free, but it fell into the power of Agathocles about 312. Among the mercenaries of this tyrant were a number of Mamertini, an Oscan people from Campania, who had been sent from home under the protection of the god Mamers or Mars to seek their fortune in other lands. These Mamertini were quartered in Messana; and after the death of Agathocles (282) they made themselves masters of the town, killed the male inhabitants, and took possession of their wives, their children, and their property. The town was now called Mamertīna, and the inhabitants Mamertīni; but its ancient name of Messana continued to be in more general use. The new inhabitants could not lay aside their old predatory habits, and in consequence became involved in a war with Hieron of Syracuse, who defeated them in several battles, and would probably have conquered the town, had not the Carthaginians come in to the aid of the Mamertini, and, under the pretext of assisting them, taken possession of their citadel. The Mamertini had at the same time applied to the Romans for help, who gladly availed themselves of the opportunity to obtain a footing in Sicily. Thus Messana was the immediate cause of the 1st Punic war, 264. The Mamertini expelled the Carthaginian garrison, and received the Romans, in whose power Messana remained till the latest times. There are scarcely any remains of the ancient city at Messina.

Messāpĭa (Μεσσαπία). 1. The Greek name of CALABRIA. — 2. (Messagna), a town in Calabria, between Uria and Brundusium.

Messāpĭum (τὸ Μεσσάπιον ὄρος), a mountain in Boeotia on the E. coast, near the town Anthedon, from which Messapus is said to have sailed to the S. of Italy.

Messāpus (Μέσσαπος), a Boeotian, from whom Messapia in the S. of Italy was believed to have derived its name.

Messēnē (Μεσσήνη), daughter of Triopas, and wife of Polycaon, whom she induced to take possession of the country which was called after her, Messenia. She is also said to have introduced there the worship of Zeus and the mysteries of the great goddess of Eleusis.

Messēnē (Μεσσήνη: Μεσσήνιος). 1. (Mavromati), the later capital of Messenia, was founded by Epaminondas B. C. 369, and completed and fortified within the space of 85 days. It was situated at the foot of the steep hill of Ithome, which was so celebrated as a fortress in the history of the Messenian wars, and which now formed the acropolis of the new city. Messene was one of the most strongly fortified cities of Greece. It was surrounded by massive walls built entirely of stone and flanked with numerous towers. There are still considerable remains of some of these towers, as well as the foundations of the walls, and of several public buildings. They are described by a modern traveller as "built of the most regular kind of masonry, and formed of large stones fitted together with great accuracy." The northern gate of the city is also extant, and opens into a circular court, 62 feet in diameter. The city was supplied with water from a fountain called Clepsydra, which is still a fine spring, from which the modern village of Mavromati derives its name, meaning Black Spring, or literally, Black Eye.—2. See MESSANA.

Messēnĭa (Μεσσηνία: Μεσσήνιος), a country in Peloponnesus, bounded on the E. by Laconia, on the N. by Elis and Arcadia, and on the S. and W. by the sea. It was separated from Laconia by Mt. Taygetus; but part of the W. slope of Taygetus belonged to Laconia; and it is difficult to determine the exact boundaries between the 2 countries, as they were different at different periods. In the most ancient times the river Nedon formed the boundary between Messenia and Laconia towards the sea; but Pausanias places the frontier line further E. at a woody hollow called Choerius, 20 stadia S. of Abia. The river Neda formed the N. frontier between Messenia and Elis. The area of Messenia is about 1162 square miles. It was for the most part a mountainous country, and contained only 2 plains of any extent, in the N. the plain of Stenyclerus, and in the S. a still larger plain, through which the Pamisus flowed, and which was called Macaria or the Blessed, on account of its great fertility. There were, however, many smaller valleys among the mountains; and the country was much less rugged and far more productive than the neighbouring Laconia. Hence Messenia is described by Pausanias as the most fertile country in Peloponnesus; and it is praised by Euripides on account of its climate, which was neither too cold in winter nor too hot in summer. The most ancient inhabitants of Messenia were Leleges, intermingled with Argives. According to tradition Polycaon, the younger son of Lelex, married the Argive Messene, a daughter of Triopas, and named the country Messene in honour of his wife. This is the name by which it is called in Homer, who does not use the form Messenia. Five generations afterwards Aeolians settled in the country, under the guidance of Perieres, a son of Aeolus. His son Aphareus gave a home to Neleus, who had been driven out of Thessaly, and who founded the town of Pylos, which became the capital of an independent sovereignty. For a long time there was properly no Messenian kingdom. The western part of the land belonged to the dominions of the Neleid princes of Pylos, of whom Nestor was the most celebrated, and the eastern to the Lacedaemonian monarchy. Thus it appears to have remained till the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, when Messenia fell to the share of Cresphontes, who destroyed the kingdom of Pylos, and united the whole country under his sway. The ruling class were now Dorians, and they continued to speak the purest Doric down to the latest times. The Spartans soon coveted the more fertile territory of their brother Dorians; and after many disputes between the 2 nations, and various inroads into each other's territories, open war at length broke out. This war, called the 1st Messenian war, lasted 20 years, B. C. 743—723; and notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the Messenian king, Aristodemus, the Messenians were obliged to submit to the Spartans after the capture of their fortress Ithome, and to become their subjects. [ARISTODEMUS.] After bearing the yoke 38 years, the Messenians again took up arms under their heroic leader Aristomenes. [ARISTOMENES.] The 2nd Messenian war lasted 17 years, B. C. 685—668, and terminated with the conquest of Ira and the complete subjugation of the country. Most of the Messenians emigrated to foreign countries, and those who remained behind were reduced to the condition of Helots or serfs. In this state they remained till 464, when the Messenians and other Helots took advantage of the devastation occasioned by the great earthquake at Sparta, to rise against their oppressors. This 3rd Messenian war lasted 10 years, 464—455, and ended by the Messenians surrendering Ithome to the Spartans on condition of their being allowed a free departure from Peloponnesus. They settled at Naupactus on the Corinthian gulf opposite Peloponnesus, which town the Athenians had lately taken from the Locri Ozolae, and gladly granted to such deadly enemies of Sparta. At the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war (404), the unfortunate Messenians were obliged to leave Naupactus and take refuge in Italy, Sicily, and other countries; but when the supremacy of Sparta was overthrown by the battle of Leuctra, Epaminondas resolved to restore the independence of Messenia. He accordingly gathered together the Messenian exiles from the various lands in which they were scattered; and in the summer of 369 he founded the town of Messene at the foot of Mt. Ithome. [MESSENE.] Messenia was never again subdued by the Spartans, and it maintained its independence till the conquest of the Achaeans and the rest of Greece by the Romans, 146.

Mestlēta (Μεστλῆτα), a city of Iberia, in Asia, probably on the river Cyrus.

Mestra (Μήστρα), daughter of Erysichthon, and granddaughter of Triopas, whence she is called Triopeïs by Ovid. She was sold by her hungry father, that he might obtain the means of satisfying his hunger. In order to escape from slavery, she prayed to Poseidon, who loved her, and who conferred upon her the power of metamorphosing herself whenever she was sold.

Mesyla, a town of Pontus, in Asia Minor, on the road from Tavium to Comana.

Metagōnītis (Μεταγωνῖτις: Μεταγωνῖται, Metagonītae), a name applied to the N. coast of Mauretania Tingitana (Marocco), between the Fretum Gaditanum and the river Mulucha; derived probably from the Carthaginian colonies (μεταγώνια) settled along it. There was at some point of this coast a promontory called Metagonium or Metagonites, probably the same as Russadir (Ras-ud-Dir, or C. Tres Forcas).

Metagōnīum. [METAGONITIS.]

Metallīnum or Metellīnum (Metallinensis: Medellin), a Roman colony in Lusitania on the Anas, not far from Augusta Emerita.

Mĕtānīra (Μετάνειρα), wife of Celeus, and mother of Triptolemus, received Demeter on her arrival in Attica. Pausanias calls her Meganaera. For details see CELEUS.

Mĕtaphrastes, Symēon (Συμεὼν ὁ Μεταφράστης), a celebrated Byzantine writer, lived in the 9th and 10th centuries, and held many high offices at the Byzantine court. His surname Metaphrastes was given to him on account of his having composed a celebrated paraphrase of the lives of the saints. Besides his other works, he wrote a Byzantine history, entitled Annales, beginning with the emperor Leo Armenus, A. D. 813, and finishing with Romanus, the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, 963. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1838.

Metapontīum called Metapontum by the Romans (Μεταπόντιον: Μεταπόντιος, Metapontīnus: Torre di Mare), a celebrated Greek city in the S. of Italy, on the Tarentine gulf, and on the E. coast of Lucania, is said to have been originally called Metabum (Μέταβον). There were various traditions respecting its foundation, all of which point to its high antiquity, but from which we cannot gather any certain information on the subject. It is said to have been afterwards destroyed by the Samnites, and to have been repeopled by a colony of Achaeans, who had been invited for that purpose by the inhabitants of Sybaris. Hence it is called by Livy an Achaean town, and is regarded by some writers as a colony from Sybaris. It fell into the hands of the Romans with the other Greek cities in the S. of Italy in the war against Pyrrhus; but it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannae. From the time of the 2nd Punic war it disappears from history, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias.

Mĕtaurus. 1. (Metaro), a small river in Umbria, flowing into the Adriatic sea, but rendered memorable by the defeat and death of Hasdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, on its banks, B. C. 207. — 2. (Marro), a river on the E. coast of Bruttium, at whose mouth was the town of Metaurum.

Mĕtella. [CAECILIA.]

Mĕtellus, a distinguished plebeian family of the Caecilia gens at Rome. 1. L. Caecilius Metellus, consul B. C. 251, carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians. In the following year he gained a great victory over Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general. The elephants which he took in this battle were exhibited in his triumph at Rome. Metellus was consul a 2nd time in 249, and was elected pontifex maximus in 243, and held this dignity for 22 years. He must, therefore, have died shortly before the commencement of the 2nd Punic war. In 241 he rescued the Palladium when the temple of Vesta was on fire, but lost his sight in consequence. He was dictator in 224, for the purpose of holding the comitia. — 2. Q. Caecilius Metellus, son of the preceding, was plebeian aedile 209; curule aedile 208; served in the army of the consul Claudius Nero 207, and was one of the legates sent to Rome to convey the joyful news of the defeat and death of Hasdrubal; and was consul with L. Veturius Philo, 206. In his consulship he and his colleague carried on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium, where he remained as proconsul during the following year. In 205 he was dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia. Metellus survived the 2nd Punic war many years, and was employed in several public commissions. — 3. Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus, son of the last, was praetor 148, and carried on war in Macedonia against the usurper Andriscus, whom he defeated and took prisoner. He next turned his arms against the Achaeans, whom he defeated at the beginning of 146. On his return to Rome in 146, he triumphed, and received the surname of Macedonicus. Metellus was consul in 143, and received the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on the war with success for 2 years against the Celtiberi. He was succeeded by Q. Pompeius in 141. Metellus was censor 131. He died 115, full of years and honours. He is frequently quoted by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of human felicity. He had filled all the highest offices of the state with reputation and glory, and was carried to the funeral pile by 4 sons, 3 of whom had obtained the consulship in his lifetime, while the 4th was a candidate for the office at the time of his death. — 4. L. Caecilius Metellus Calvus, brother of the last, consul 142. — 5. Q. Caecilius Metellus Balearicus, eldest son of No. 3, was consul 123, when he subdued the inhabitants of the Balearic islands, and received in consequence the surname of Balearicus. He was censor 120. — 6. L. Caecilius Metellus Diadematus, 2nd son of No. 3, has been frequently confounded with Metellus Dalmaticus, consul 119 [No. 9.]. Metellus Diadematus received the latter surname from his wearing for a long time a bandage round his forehead, in consequence of an ulcer. He was consul 117. — 7. M. Caecilius Metellus, 3rd son of No. 3, was consul 115, the year in which his father died. In 114 he was sent into Sardinia as proconsul, and suppressed an insurrection in the island, in consequence of which he obtained a triumph in 113 on the same day as his brother Caprarius. — 8. C. Caecilius Metellus Caprarius, 4th son of No. 3. The origin of his surname is quite uncertain. He was consul 113, and carried on war in Macedonia against the Thracians, whom he subdued. He obtained a triumph in consequence in the same year and on the same day with his brother Marcus. He was censor 102 with his cousin Metellus Numidicus.— 9. L. Caecilius Metellus Dalmaticus, elder son of No. 4, and frequently confounded, as has been already remarked, with Diadematus [No. 5], was consul 119, when he subdued the Dalmatians, and obtained in consequence the surname Dalmaticus. He was censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus in 115; and he was also pontifex maximus. He was alive in 100, when he is mentioned as one of the senators of high rank, who took up arms against Saturninus. — 10. Q. Caecilius Metellus Numidicus, younger son of No. 4, was one of the most distinguished members of his family. The character of Metellus stood very high among his contemporaries; in an age of growing corruption his personal integrity remained unsullied; and he was distinguished for his abilities in war and peace. He was one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party at Rome. He was consul 109, and carried on the war against Jugurtha in Numidia with great success. [JUGURTHA.] He remained in Numidia during the following year as proconsul; but as he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion, his legate C. Marius industriously circulated reports in the camp and the city that Metellus designedly protracted the war, for the purpose of continuing in the command. These rumours had the desired effect. Marius was raised to the consulship, Numidia was assigned to him as his province, and Metellus saw the honour of finishing the war snatched from his grasp. [MARIUS.] On his return to Rome in 107 he was received with the greatest honour. He celebrated a splendid triumph, and received the surname of Numidicus. In 102 he was censor with his cousin Metellus Caprarius. In 100 the tribune Saturninus and Marius resolved to ruin Metellus. Saturninus proposed an agrarian law, to which he added the clause, that the senate should swear obedience to it within 5 days after its enactment, and that whosoever should refuse to do so should be expelled the senate, and pay a heavy fine. Metellus refused to take the oath, and was therefore expelled the senate; but Saturninus, not content with this, brought forward a bill to punish him with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms in his defence; but Metellus quitted the city, and retired to Rhodes, where he bore his misfortune with great calmness. He was however recalled to Rome in the following year (99) on the proposition of the tribune Q. Calidius. The orations of Metellus are spoken of with praise by Cicero, and they continued to be read with admiration in the time of Fronto. — 11. Q. Caecilius Metellus Nepos, son of Balearicus [No. 5], and grandson of Macedonicus [No. 3], appears to have received the surname of Nepos, because he was the eldest grandson of the latter. Metellus Nepos exerted himself in obtaining the recall of his kinsman Metellus Numidicus from banishment in 99, and was consul in 98, with T. Didius. In this year the 2 consuls carried the lex Caecilia Didia. — 12. Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius, son of Numidicus [No. 10], received the surname of Pius on account of the love which he displayed for his father when he besought the people to recall him from banishment in 99. He was praetor 89, and was one of the commanders in the Marsic or Social war. He was still in arms in 87, prosecuting the war against the Samnites, when Marius landed in Italy and joined the consul Cinna. The senate, in alarm, summoned Metellus to Rome; but as he was unable to defend the city against Marius and Cinna, he crossed over to Africa. After remaining in Africa 3 years he returned to Italy, and joined Sulla, who also returned to Italy in 83. In the war which followed against the Marian party, Metellus was one of the most successful of Sulla's generals, and gained several important victories both in Umbria, and in Cisalpine Gaul. In 80, Metellus was consul with Sulla himself; and in the following year (79), he went as proconsul into Spain, in order to prosecute the war against Sertorius, who adhered to the Marian party. Here he remained for the next 8 years, and found it so difficult to obtain any advantages over Sertorius, that the senate sent Pompey to his assistance with proconsular power and another army. Sertorius, however, was a match for them both, and would probably have continued to defy all the efforts of Metellus and Pompey, if he had not been murdered by Perperna and his friends in 72. [SERTORIUS.] Metellus was pontifex maximus, and, as he was succeeded in this dignity by Julius Caesar in 63, he must have died either in this year or at the end of the preceding. — 13. Q. Caecilius Metellus Celer, elder son of Nepos [No. 11.]. In 66 he served as legate in the army of Pompey in Asia; and was praetor in 63, the year in which Cicero was consul. During his year of office he afforded warm and efficient support to the aristocratical party. He prevented the condemnation of C. Rabirius by removing the military flag from the Janiculum. He co-operated with Cicero in opposing the schemes of Catiline; and, when the latter left the city to make war upon the republic, Metellus had the charge of the Picentine and Senonian districts. By blocking up the passes he prevented Catiline from crossing the Apennines and penetrating into Gaul, and thus compelled him to turn round and face Antonius, who was marching against him from Etruria. In the following year, 62, Metellus went with the title of proconsul into the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which Cicero had relinquished because he was unwilling to leave the city. In 60, Metellus was consul with L. Afranius, and opposed all the efforts of his colleague to obtain the ratification of Pompey's acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands for his soldiers. He died in 59, and it was suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Clodia, with whom he lived on the most unhappy terms, and who was a woman of the utmost profligacy. — 14. Q. Caecilius Metellus Nepos, younger son of the elder Nepos [No. 11.]. He served as legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates and in Asia from 67 to 64. He returned to Rome in 63 in order to become a candidate for the tribunate, that he might thereby favour the views of Pompey. His election was opposed by the aristocracy, but without success. His year of office was a stormy one. One of his first acts in entering upon his office on the 10th of December, 63, was a violent attack upon Cicero. He maintained that the man who had condemned Roman citizens without a hearing ought not to be heard himself, and accordingly prevented Cicero from addressing the people on the last day of his consulship, and only allowed him to take the usual oath, whereupon Cicero swore that he had saved the state. In the following year (62) Metellus brought forward a bill to summon Pompey, with his army, to Rome, in order to restore peace, but on the day on which the bill was to be read, the two parties came to open blows; and Metellus was obliged to take to flight. He repaired to Pompey, with whom he returned to Rome in 61. He was praetor in 60, and consul in 57 with P. Lentulus Spinther. Notwithstanding his previous enmity with Cicero, he did not oppose his recall from exile. In 56 Metellus administered the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on war against the Vaccaei. He died in 55. Metellus did not adhere strictly to the political principles of his family. He did not support the aristocracy, like his brother; nor, on the other hand, can he be said to have been a leader of the democracy. He was in fact little more than a servant of Pompey, and according to his bidding at one time opposed, and at another supported Cicero. — 15. Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius Scipio, the adopted son of Metellus Pius [No. 12.]. He was the son of P. Scipio Nasica, praetor 94. Hence his name is given in various forms. Sometimes he is called P. Scipio Nasica, sometimes Q. Metellus Scipio, and sometimes simply Scipio or Metellus. He was tribune of the plebs in 59, and was a candidate for the consulship along with Plautius Hypsaeus and Milo in 53. He was supported by the Clodian mob, since he was opposed to Milo, but in consequence of the disturbances in the city, the comitia could not be held for the election of consuls. After the murder of Clodius at the beginning of 52, Pompey was elected sole consul. In the course of the same year Pompey married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, and on the 1st of August he made his father-in-law his colleague in the consulship. Scipio showed his gratitude by using every effort to destroy the power of Caesar and strengthen that of Pompey. He took an active part in all the proceedings, which led to the breaking out of the civil war in 49; and in the division of the provinces, made among the Pompeian party, he obtained Syria to which he hastened without delay. After plundering the province in the most unmerciful manner, he crossed over into Greece in 48 to join Pompey. He commanded the centre of the Pompeian army at the battle of Pharsalia. After the loss of the battle he fled, first to Corcyra and then to Africa, where he received the chief command of the Pompeian troops. He was defeated by Caesar at the decisive battle of Thapsus in 46. He attempted to escape by sea, but his squadron having been overpowered by P. Sittius, he put an end to his own life. Metellus Scipio never exhibited any proofs of striking abilities either in war or in peace. In public, he showed himself cruel, vindictive, and oppressive; in private, he was mean, avaricious, and licentious, even beyond most of his contemporaries. — 16. Q. Caecilius Metellus Creticus, was consul 69, and carried on war against Crete, which he subdued in the course of 3 years. He returned to Rome in 66, but was unable to obtain a triumph in consequence of the opposition of Pompey, to whom he had refused to surrender his command in Crete, which Pompey had claimed in virtue of the Gabinian law, which had given him the supreme command in the whole of the Mediterranean. Metellus, however, would not relinquish his claim to a triumph, and accordingly resolved to wait in the neighbourhood of the city till more favourable circumstances. He was still before the city in 63, when the conspiracy of Catiline broke out. He was sent into Apulia to prevent an apprehended rising of the slaves; and in the following year, 62, after the death of Catiline, he was at length permitted to make his triumphal entrance into Rome, and received the surname of Creticus. Metellus, as was to be expected, joined the aristocracy in their opposition to Pompey, and succeeded in preventing the latter from obtaining the ratification of his acts in Asia. —17. L. Caecilius Metellus, brother of the last, was praetor 71, and as propraetor succeeded Verres in the government of Sicily in 70. He defeated the pirates, and compelled them to leave the island. His administration is praised by Cicero; but he nevertheless attempted, in conjunction with his brothers, to shield Verres from justice. He was consul 68 with Q. Marcius Rex, but died at the beginning of the year.—18. M. Caecilius Metellus, brother of the 2 last, was praetor 69, in the same year that his eldest brother was consul. The lot gave him the presidency in the court de pecuniis repetundis, and Verres was very anxious that his trial should come on before Metellus. — 19. L. Caecilius Metellus Creticus, was tribune of the plebs, 49, and a warm supporter of the aristocracy. He did not fly from Rome with Pompey and the rest of his party; and he attempted to prevent Caesar from taking possession of the sacred treasury, and only gave way upon being threatened with death.

Metharme (Μεθάρμη), daughter of king Pygmalion, and wife of Cinyras. See Cinyras.

Methōnē (Μεθώνη: Μεθωναῖος). 1. Or Mothōne (Μοθώνη: Modon), a town at the S. W. corner of Messenia, with an excellent harbour, protected from the sea by a reef of rocks, of which the largest was called Mothon. The ancients regarded Methone as the Pedasus of Homer. After the conquest of Messenia, it became one of the Lacedaemonian harbours, and is mentioned as such in the Peloponnesian war. The emperor Trajan conferred several privileges upon the city. — 2. (Eleutherokhori), a Greek town in Macedonia on the Thermaic gulf, 40 stadia N. E. of Pydna, was founded by the Eretrians, and is celebrated from Philip having lost an eye at the siege of the place. After its capture by Philip it was destroyed, but was subsequently rebuilt, and is mentioned by Strabo as one of the towns of Macedonia. — 3. A town in Thessaly mentioned by Homer, but does not occur in historical times. The ancients placed it in Magnesia. — 4. Or Methāna (Μέθανα: Methana or Mitone), an ancient town in Argolis, situated on a peninsula of the same name, opposite the island of Aegina. The peninsula runs a considerable way into the sea, and is connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, lying between the towns of Troezen and Epidaurus. The town of Methana lay at the foot of a mountain of volcanic origin.

Mĕthŏra (Μέθορα, Μόδουρα ἡ τῶν Θεῶν: Matra, the sacred city of Krishna), a city of India intra Gangem, on the river Jomanes (Jumna), was a great seat of the worship of the Indian god whom the Greeks identified with Hercules.

Methўdrĭum, (Μεθύδριον: Μεθυδριεύς), a town in central Arcadia, 170 stadia N. of Megalopolis.

Methymna (ἡ Μηθυμνα, Μεθυμνα, the former generally in the best writers; also on coins the Aeolic form Μάθυμνα: Μηθυμναῖος, Μεθυμναῖος: Molivo), the second city of Lesbos, stood at the north extremity of the island, and had a good harbour. It was the birthplace of the musician and dithyrambic poet Arion, and of the historian Hellanicus. The celebrated Lesbian wine grew in its neighbourhood. In the Peloponnesian war it remained faithful to Athens, even during the great Lesbian revolt [Mytilene]: afterwards it was sacked by the Spartans (b. c. 406) and never quite recovered its prosperity.

Mētĭon (Μητίων), son of Erechtheus and Praxithea, and husband of Alcippe. His sons, the Metionidae, expelled their cousin Pandion from his kingdom of Athens, but were themselves afterwards expelled by the sons of Pandion.

Mētis (Μῆτις), the personification of prudence, is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and the 1st wife of Zeus. Afraid lest she should give birth to a child wiser and more powerful than himself, Zeus devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Afterwards he gave birth to Athena, who sprang from his head. [See p. 101, a.]

Mētĭus. [Mettius.]

Mĕton (Μέτων), an astronomer of Athens, who, in conjunction with Euctemon, introduced the cycle of 19 years, by which he adjusted the course of the sun and moon, since he had observed that 235 lunar months correspond very nearly to 19 solar years. The commencement of this cycle has been placed B.C. 432. We have no details of Meton's life, with the exception that his father's name was Pausanias, and that he feigned insanity to avoid sailing for Sicily in the ill-fated expedition of which he is stated to have had an evil presentiment.

Metrŏdōrus (Μητρόδωρος). 1. Of Cos, son of Epicharmus, and grandson of Thyrsus. Like several of that family, he addicted himself partly to the study of the Pythagorean philosophy, partly to the science of medicine. He wrote a treatise upon the works of Epicharmus. He flourished about B.C. 460. — 2. Of Lampsacus, a contemporary and friend of Anaxagoras. He wrote on Homer, the leading feature of his system of interpretation being that the deities and stories in Homer were to be understood as allegorical modes of representing physical powers and phenomena. He died 464. — 3. Of Chios, a disciple of Democritus, or, according to other accounts, of Nessus of Chios, flourished about 330. He was a philosopher of considerable reputation, and professed the doctrine of the sceptics in their fullest sense. He also studied, if he did not practise, medicine, on which he wrote a good deal. He was the instructor of Hippocrates and Anaxarchus. — 4. A native of Lampsacus or Athens, was the most distinguished of the disciples of Epicurus, with whom he lived on terms of the closest friendship. He died 277, in the 53rd year of his age, 7 years before Epicurus, who would have appointed him his successor had he survived him. The philosophy of Metrodorus appears to have been of a more grossly sensual kind than that of Epicurus. Perfect happiness, according to Cicero's account, he made to consist in having a well-constituted body. He found fault with his brother Timocrates for not admitting that the belly was the test and measure of every thing that pertained to a happy life. He was the author of several works, quoted by the ancient writers. — 5. Of Scepsis, a philosopher, who was raised to a position of great influence and trust by Mithridates Eupator, being appointed supreme judge without appeal even to the king. Subsequently he was led to desert his allegiance, when sent by Mithridates on an embassy to Tigranes, king of Armenia. Tigranes sent him back to Mithridates, but he died on the road. According to some accounts he was despatched by order of the king; according to others he died of disease. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero; he seems to have been particularly celebrated for his powers of memory. In consequence of his hostility to the Romans he was surnamed the Roman-hater. — 6. Of Stratonice in Caria, was at first a disciple of the school of Epicurus, but afterwards attached himself to Carneades. He flourished about 110.

Mētrŏpŏlis (Μητρόπολις). 1. The most ancient capital of Phrygia, but in historical times an inconsiderable place. Its position is doubtful. Some identify it with Afioum-Kara-Hisar near the centre of Great Phrygia, which agrees well enough with the position of the Campus Metropolitanus of Livy (xxxviii. 15), while others find it in the ruins at Pismesh-Kalessi in the N. of Phrygia, and suppose a second Metropolis in the S., as that to which the Campus Metropolitanus belonged. — 2. In Lydia (Turbali, Ru.), a city in the plain of the Caÿster, between Ephesus and Smyrna, 120 stadia from the former and 200 from the latter.—There were other cities of Asia so called; but they are either unimportant, or better known by other names, such as Ancyra, Bostra, Caesarea in Palestine, Edessa, and others. — 3. (Kastri), a town of Thessaly in Histiaeotis, near the Peneus, and between Gomphi and Pharsalus, formed by the union of several small towns, to which Ithome also belonged. — 4. A town of Acarnania in the district Amphilochia, between the Ambracian gulf and the river Achelous.

Mētrōŭm aft. Aulia (Μητρῷον, on coins Μῆτρος, Αὐλία, Αὐλαία), a city of Bithynia.

Mettĭus or Metĭus. 1. Curtĭus. [Curtius.] — 2. Fuffetĭus, dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome. After the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii had determined the supremacy of the Romans, Mettius was summoned to aid them in a war with Fidenae and the Veientines. On the field of battle Mettius drew off his Albans to the hills, and awaited the issue of the battle. On the following day the Albans were all deprived of their arms, and Mettius himself, as the punishment of his treachery, was torn asunder by chariots driven in opposite directions.

Metŭlum, the chief town of the Iapydes in Illyricum, was near the frontiers of Liburnia, and was situated on 2 peaks of a steep mountain. Augustus nearly lost his life in reducing this place, the inhabitants of which fought against him with the most desperate courage.

Mevānĭa (Mevānas, ātis: Beragna), an ancient city in the interior of Umbria on the river Tinea, was situated on the road from Rome to Ancona in a very fertile country, and was celebrated for its breed of beautiful white oxen. It was a strongly fortified place, though its walls were built only of brick. According to some accounts Propertius was a native of this place.

Mezentĭus (Μεσέντιος), king of the Tyrrhenians or Etruscans, at Caere or Agylla, was expelled by his subjects on account of his cruelty, and took refuge with Turnus, king of the Rutulians, whom he assisted in the war against Aeneas and the Trojans. Mezentius and his son Lausus were slain in battle by Aeneas. This is the account of Virgil. Livy and Dionysius, however, say nothing about the expulsion of Mezentius from Caere, but represent him as an ally of Turnus, and relate that Aeneas disappeared during the battle against the Rutulians and Etruscans at Lanuvium. Dionysius adds, that Ascanius was besieged by Mezentius and Lausus; that the besieged in a sally by night slew Lausus, and then concluded a peace with Mezentius, who from henceforth continued to be their ally.

Micipsa (Μικίψας), king of Numidia, the eldest of the sons of Masinissa. After the death of the latter (B. C. 148), the sovereign power was divided by Scipio between Micipsa and his two brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal, in such a manner that the possession of Cirta, the capital of Numidia, together with the financial administration of the kingdom, fell to the share of Micipsa. It was not long, however, before the death of both his brothers left him in possession of the undivided sovereignty of Numidia, which he held from that time without interruption till his death. He died in 118, leaving the kingdom to his 2 sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal, and their adopted brother JUGURTHA.

Micon (Μίκων), of Athens, son of Phanochus, was a very distinguished painter and statuary, contemporary with Polygnotus, about B. C. 460.

Midaēum (Μιδάειον), a city of Phrygia Epictetus, between Dorylaeum and Pessinus; the place where Sextus Pompeius was captured by the troops of Antony, B. C. 35.

Mīdas (Μίδας), son of Gordius and Cybele, is said to have been a wealthy but effeminate king of Phrygia, a pupil of Orpheus, and a great patron of the worship of Dionysus. His wealth is alluded to in a story connected with his childhood, for it is said that while a child, ants carried grains of wheat into his mouth, to indicate that one day he should be the richest of all mortals. Midas was introduced into the Satyric drama of the Greeks, and was represented with the ears of a satyr, which were afterwards lengthened into the ears of an ass. He is said to have built the town of Ancyra, and as king of Phrygia he is called Berecynthius heros (Ov. Met. xi. 106). There are several stories connected with Midas, of which the following are the most celebrated. 1. Silenus, the companion and teacher of Dionysus, had gone astray in a state of intoxication, and was caught by country people in the rose gardens of Midas. He was bound with wreaths of flowers and led before the king. These gardens were in Macedonia, near Mount Bermion or Bromion, where Midas was king of the Briges, with whom he afterwards emigrated to Asia, where their name was changed into Phryges. Midas received Silenus kindly; and, after treating him with hospitality, he led him back to Dionysus, who allowed Midas to ask a favour of him. Midas in his folly desired that all things which he touched should be changed into gold. The request was granted; but as even the food which he touched became gold, he implored the god to take his favour back. Dionysus accordingly ordered him to bathe in the source of Pactolus near Mount Tmolus. This bath saved Midas, but the river from that time had an abundance of gold in its sand.—2. Midas, who was himself related to the race of Satyrs, once had a visit from a Satyr, who indulged in all kinds of jokes at the king's expence. Thereupon Midas mixed wine in a well; and when the Satyr had drunk of it, he fell asleep and was caught. This well of Midas was at different times assigned to different localities. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2. § 13) places it in the neighbourhood of Thymbrium and Tyraeum, and Pausanias at Ancyra.—3. Once when Pan and Apollo were engaged in a musical contest on the flute and lyre, Midas was chosen to decide between them. The king decided in favour of Pan, whereupon Apollo changed his ears into those of an ass. Midas contrived to conceal them under his Phrygian cap, but the servant who used to cut his hair discovered them. The secret so much harassed this man, that as he could not betray it to a human being, he dug a hole in the earth, and whispered into it, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled the hole up again, and his heart was released. But on the same spot a reed grew up, which in its whispers betrayed the secret. Midas is said to have killed himself by drinking the blood of an ox.

Midēa or Midēa (Μίδεια, Μιδέα: Μιδεάτης), a town in Argolis, of uncertain site, is said to have been originally called Persepolis, because it had been fortified by Perseus. It was destroyed by the Argives.

Midianītae. [MADIANITAE].

Mīdīas (Μειδίας), an Athenian of wealth and influence, was a violent enemy of Demosthenes, the orator. In B. C. 354 Midias assaulted Demosthenes when he was discharging the duties of Choregus, during the celebration of the great Dionysia. Demosthenes brought an accusation against Midias; but the speech, which he wrote for the occasion, and which is extant, was never published, since Demosthenes dropped the accusation, in consequence of his receiving the sum of 30 minae.

Mieza (Μίεζα: Μιεζεύς), a town of Macedonia in Emathia, S.W. of Pella, and not far from the frontiers of Thessaly.

Mīlănīon (Μειλανίων), son of Amphidamas, and husband of Atalanta. For details, see ATALANTA.

Milētŏpŏlis (Μιλητόπολις: Muhalich, or Hamamli? Ru.), a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, at the confluence of the river Rhyndacus and Macestus, and somewhat E. of the lake which was named after it, Lacus Miletopolitis (Μιλητοπολῖτις λίμνη: Lake of Maniyas). This lake, which was also called Artynia, lies some miles W. of the larger lake of Apollonia (Abullionte).

Miletopolis. [BORYSTHENES].

Mīlētus (Μίλητος), son of Apollo and Arīa of Crete. Being beloved by Minos and Sarpedon, he attached himself to the latter, and fled from Minos to Asia, where he built the city of Miletus. Ovid (Met. ix. 442) calls him a son of Apollo and Deïone, and hence Deïonides.

Mīlētus (Μίλητος, Dor. Μίλατος: Μιλήσιος, and on inscriptions, Μειλήσιος: Milēsius), one of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, belonged territorially to Caria and politically to Ionia, being the S.-most of the 12 cities of the Ionian confederacy. It is mentioned by Homer as a Carian city; and one of its early names, Lelegeïs, is a sign that the Leleges also formed a part of its population. Its first Greek colonists were said to have been Cretans who were expelled by Minos; the next were led to it by Neleus at the time of the so-called Ionic migration. Its name was derived from the mythical leader of the Cretan colonists, Miletus: it was also called Pityusa (Πιτυοῦσα), and Anactoria (Ἀνακτορία). The city stood upon the S. headland of the Sinus Latmicus, opposite to the mouth of the Maeander, and possessed 4 distinct harbours, protected by a group of islets, called Lade, Dromiscus, and Perne. The city wall enclosed two distinct towns, called the outer and the inner; the latter, which was also called Old Miletus, stood upon an eminence overhanging the sea, and was of great strength. Its territory extended on both sides of the Maeander, as far apparently as the promontories of Mycale on the N. and Posidium on the S. It was rich in flocks; and the city was celebrated for its woollen fabrics, the Milesia vellera. At a very early period it became a great maritime state, extending its commerce throughout the Mediterranean, and even beyond the Pillars of Hercules, but more especially in the direction of the Euxine, along the shore of which the Milesians planted several important colonies, such as Cyzicus, Sinope, Abydos, Istropolis, Tomi, Olbia or Borysthenes, Apollonia, Odessus, and Panticapaeum. Naucratis in Egypt was also a colony of Miletus. It also occupies a high place in the early history of Greek literature, as the birthplace of the philosophers Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, and of the historians Cadmus and Hecataeus. After the rise of the Lydian monarchy, Miletus, by its naval strength, resisted the attacks of Alyattes and Sadyattes for 11 years, but fell before Croesus, whose success may perhaps be ascribed to the intestine factions which for a long period weakened the city. With the rest of Ionia, it was conquered by Harpagus, the general of Cyrus, in B. C. 557 ; and under the dominion of the Persians it still retained its prosperity till the great Ionian revolt, of which Miletus was the centre [ARISTAGORAS, HISTIAEUS], and after the suppression of which it was destroyed by the Persians (B. C. 494). It recovered sufficient importance to oppose a vain resistance to Alexander the Great, which brought upon it a second ruin. Under the Roman empire it still appears as a place of some consequence, until its final destruction by the Turks. — Its ruins are difficult to discover, on account of the great change made in the coast by the river Maeander. [MAEANDER.] They are usually supposed to be those at the wretched village of Palatia, on the S. bank of the Mendereh, a little above its present mouth ; but Forbiger has shown that these are more probably the ruins of MYUS, and that those of Miletus are buried in a lake formed by the Mendereh at the foot of Mt. Latmus.

Mīlĭchus, a Phoenician god, represented as the son of a satyr and of the nymph Myrīce, and with horns on his head. (Sil. Ital. iii. 103.)

Mīlĭchus (Μείλιχος), a small river in Achaia, which flowed by the town of Patrae, and is said to have been originally called Amilichus (Ἀμείλιχος) on account of the human victims sacrificed on its banks to Artemis.

Mĭlo or Milon (Μίλων). 1. Of Crotona, son of Diotimus, an athlete, famous for his extraordinary bodily strength. He was 6 times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games, and as often at the Pythian ; but having entered the lists at Olympia a 7th time, he was worsted by the superior agility of his adversary. By these successes he obtained great distinction among his countrymen, so that he was even appointed to command the army which defeated the Sybarites, B. C. 511. Many stories are related by ancient writers of Milo's extraordinary feats of strength ; such as his carrying a heifer of four years old on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, and afterwards eating the whole of it in a single day. The mode of his death is thus related : as he was passing through a forest when enfeebled by age, he saw the trunk of a tree which had been partially split open by woodcutters, and attempted to rend it further, but the wood closed upon his hands, and thus held him fast, in which state he was attacked and devoured by wolves. — 2. A general in the service of Pyrrhus king of Epirus, who sent him forward with a body of troops to garrison the citadel of Tarentum, previous to his own arrival in Italy. When Pyrrhus finally quitted that country and withdrew into Epirus, he still left Milo in charge of the citadel of Tarentum, together with his son Helenus. — 3. T. Annĭus Milo Papiniānus, was the son of C. Papius Celsus and Annia, and was adopted by his maternal grandfather T. Annius Luscus. He was born at Lanuvium, of which place he was in B. C. 53 dictator or chief magistrate. Milo was a man of a daring and unscrupulous character ; and as he was deeply in debt, he resolved to obtain a wealthy province. For this purpose he connected himself with the aristocracy. As tribune of the plebs, B. C. 57, he took an active part in obtaining Cicero's recall from exile, and from this time he carried on a fierce and memorable contest with P. Clodius. In 53 Milo was candidate for the consulship, and Clodius for the praetorship of the ensuing year. Each of the candidates kept a gang of gladiators, and there were frequent combats between the rival ruffians in the streets of Rome. At length, on the 20th of January, 52, Milo and Clodius met apparently by accident at Bovillae on the Appian road. An affray ensued between their followers, in which Clodius was slain. At Rome such tumults followed upon the burial of Clodius, that Pompey was appointed sole consul in order to restore order to the state. Pompey immediately brought forward various laws in connection with the late disturbances. As soon as these were passed, Milo was formally accused. All Pompey's influence was directed against him ; but Milo was not without hope, since the higher aristocracy, from jealousy of Pompey, supported him, and Cicero undertook his defence. His trial opened on the 4th of April, 52. He was impeached on 3 counts — de Vi, de Ambitu, or bribery, and de Sodalitiis, or illegal interference with the freedom of elections. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a consular, was appointed quaesitor by a special law of Pompey's, and all Rome and thousands of spectators from Italy thronged the forum and its avenues. But Milo's chances of acquittal were wholly marred by the virulence of his adversaries, who insulted and obstructed the witnesses, the process, and the conductors of the defence. Pompey availed himself of these disorders to line the forum and its encompassing hills with soldiers. Cicero was intimidated, and Milo was condemned. Had he even been acquitted on the 1st count, de Vi, the two other charges of bribery and conspiracy awaited him. He therefore went into exile. Cicero, who could not deliver, re-wrote and expanded the defence of Milo — the extant oration — and sent it to him at Marseilles. Milo remarked, " I am glad this was not spoken, since I must have been acquitted, and then had never known the delicate flavour of these Marseilles-mullets." Caesar refused to recall Milo from exile in 49, when he permitted many of the other exiles to return. In the following year (48) M. Caelius, the praetor, had, during Caesar's absence, promulgated a bill for the adjustment of debts. Needing desperate allies, Caelius accordingly invited Milo to Italy, as the fittest tool for his purposes. At the head of a band of criminals and run-away slaves, Milo appeared in the S. of Italy, but was opposed by the praetor Q. Pedius, and slain under the walls of an obscure fort in the district of Thurii. Milo, in 57, married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla. She proved a faithless wife, and Sallust, the historian, was soundly scourged by Milo for an intrigue with her.

Miltĭădes (Μιλτιάδης). 1. Son of Cypselus, was a man of considerable distinction in Athens in the time of Pisistratus. The Doloncians, a Thracian tribe dwelling in the Chersonesus, being hard pressed in war by the Absinthians, applied to the Delphic oracle for advice, and were directed to admit a colony led by the man who should be the first to entertain them after they left the temple. This was Miltiades, who, eager to escape from the rule of Pisistratus, gladly took the lead of a colony under the sanction of the oracle, and became tyrant of the Chersonesus, which he fortified by a wall built across its isthmus. In a war with the people of Lampsacus he was taken prisoner, but was set at liberty on the demand of Croesus. He died without leaving any children, and his sovereignty passed into the hands of Stesagoras, the son of his half-brother Cimon. Sacrifices and games were instituted in his honour, in which no Lampsacene was suffered to take part. — 2. Son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, became tyrant of the Chersonesus on the death of the latter, being sent out by Pisistratus from Athens to take possession of the vacant inheritance. By a stratagem he got the chief men of the Chersonesus into his power and threw them into prison, and took a force of mercenaries into his pay. In order to strengthen his position still more, he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of a Thracian prince named Olorus. He joined Darius Hystaspis on his expedition against the Scythians, and was left with the other Greeks in charge of the bridge over the Danube. When the appointed time had expired, and Darius had not returned, Miltiades recommended the Greeks to destroy the bridge and leave Darius to his fate. Some time after the expedition of Darius an inroad of the Scythians drove Miltiades from his possessions; but after the enemy had retired the Doloncians brought him back. It appears to have been between this period and his withdrawal to Athens, that Miltiades conquered and expelled the Pelasgian inhabitants of Lemnos and Imbros and subjected the islands to the dominion of Attica. Lemnos and Imbros belonged to the Persian dominions; and it is probable that this encroachment on the Persian possessions was the cause which drew upon Miltiades the hostility of Darius, and led him to fly from the Chersonesus, when the Phoenician fleet approached, after the subjugation of Ionia. Miltiades reached Athens in safety, but his eldest son Metiochus fell into the hands of the Persians. At Athens Miltiades was arraigned, as being amenable to the penalties enacted against tyranny, but was acquitted. When Attica was threatened with invasion by the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals. Miltiades by his arguments induced the polemarch Callimachus to give the casting vote in favour of risking a battle with the enemy, the opinions of the ten generals being equally divided. Miltiades waited till his turn came, and then drew his army up in battle array on the ever memorable field of Marathon. [MARATHON.] After the defeat of the Persians Miltiades endeavoured to urge the Athenians to measures of retaliation, and induced them to entrust to him an armament of 70 ships, without knowing the purpose for which they were designed. He proceeded to attack the island of Paros, for the purpose of gratifying a private enmity. His attacks, however, were unsuccessful; and after receiving a dangerous hurt in the leg, while penetrating into a sacred enclosure on some superstitious errand, he was compelled to raise the siege and return to Athens, where he was impeached by Xanthippus for having deceived the people. His wound had turned into a gangrene, and being unable to plead his cause in person, he was brought into court on a couch, his brother Tisagoras conducting his defence for him. He was condemned; but on the ground of his services to the state the penalty was commuted to a fine of 50 talents, the cost of the equipment of the armament. Being unable to pay this, he was thrown into prison, where he not long after died of his wound. The fine was subsequently paid by his son Cimon.

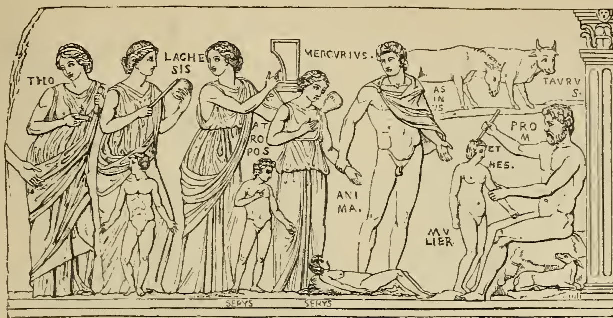
Milўas (ἡ Μιλυάς: Μιλύαι, Milyae), was originally the name of all Lycia; but it was afterwards applied to the high table land in the N. of Lycia, between the Cadmus and the Taurus, and extending considerably into Pisidia. Its people seem to have been the descendants of the original inhabitants of Lycia. It contained a city of the same name. After the defeat of Antiochus the Great, the Romans gave it to Eumenes, king of Pergamus, but its real government seems to have been in the hands of Pisidian princes.



Mimallon (Μιμαλλών), the Macedonian name of the Bacchantes, or, according to others, of Bacchic Amazons. Ovid (Ars Am. i. 541) uses the form Mimallonides.

Mĭmas (Μίμας), a giant, said to have been killed by Ares, or by Zeus, with a flash of lightning. The island of Prochyte, near Sicily, was believed to rest upon his body.

Mimnermus (Μίμνερμος), a celebrated elegiac poet, was generally called a Colophonian, but was properly a native of Smyrna, and was descended from those Colophonians who reconquered Smyrna from the Aeolians. He flourished from about B.C. 634 to 600. He was a contemporary of Solon, who, in an extant fragment of one of his poems, addresses him as still living. Only a few fragments of the compositions of Mimnermus have come down to us. They belong chiefly to a poem entitled Nanno, and are addressed to the flute-player of that name. The compositions of Mimnermus form an epoch in the history of elegiac poetry. Before his time the elegy had been devoted chiefly either to warlike or national, or to convivial and joyous subjects. Archilochus had, indeed, occasionally employed the elegy for strains of lamentation, but Mimnermus was the first who systematically made it the vehicle for plaintive, mournful, and erotic strains. The instability of human happiness, the helplessness of man, the cares and miseries to which life is exposed, the brief season that man has to enjoy himself in, the wretchedness of old age, are plaintively dwelt upon by him, while love is held up as the only consolation that men possess, life not being worth having when it can no longer be enjoyed. The latter topic was most frequently dwelt upon, and as an erotic poet he was held in high estimation in antiquity. (Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 100.) The fragments are published separately by Bach, Lips. 1826.

Mĭnerva, called Athena by the Greeks. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. [ATHENA.] Minerva was one of the great Roman divinities. Her name seems to be of the same root as mens; and she is accordingly the thinking, calculating, and inventive power personified. Jupiter was the 1st, Juno the 2nd, and Minerva the 3rd in the number of the Capitoline divinities. Tarquin, the son of Demaratus, was believed to have united the 3 divinities in one common temple, and hence, when repasts were prepared for the gods, these 3 always went together. She was the daughter of Jupiter, and is said to have sometimes wielded the thunderbolts of her father. As Minerva was a virgin divinity, and her father the supreme god, the Romans easily identified her with the Greek Athena, and accordingly all the attributes of Athena were gradually transferred to the Roman Minerva. But we confine ourselves at present to those which were peculiar to the Roman goddess. Being a maiden goddess, her sacrifices consisted of calves which had not borne the yoke. She is said to have invented numbers; and it is added that the law respecting the driving in of the annual nail was for this reason attached to the temple of Minerva. She was worshipped as the patroness of all the arts and trades, and at her festival she was particularly invoked by all who desired to distinguish themselves in any art or craft, such as painting, poetry, the art of teaching, medicine, dyeing, spinning, weaving, and the like. This character of the goddess may be perceived also from the proverbs "to do a thing pingui Minerva," i. e. to do a thing in an awkward or clumsy manner; and sus Minervam, of a stupid person who presumed to set right an intelligent one. Minerva, however, was the patroness, not only of females, on whom she conferred skill in sewing, spinning, weaving, &c., but she also guided men in the dangers of war, where victory is gained by cunning, prudence, courage, and perseverance. Hence she was represented with a helmet, shield, and a coat of mail; and the booty made in war was frequently dedicated to her. Minerva was further believed to be the inventor of musical instruments, especially wind instruments, the use of which was very important in religious worship, and which were accordingly subjected to a sort of purification every year on the last day of the festival of Minerva. This festival lasted 5 days, from the 19th to the 23rd of March, and was called Quinquatrus, because it began on the 5th day after the ides of the month. This number of days was not accidental, for we are told that the number 5 was sacred to Minerva. The most ancient temple of Minerva at Rome was probably that on the Capitol; another existed on the Aventine; and she had a chapel at the foot of the Caelian hill, where she bore the surname of Capta.

Mĭnervae Arx or Minervĭum (Castro), a hill on the coast of Calabria, where Aeneas is said to have landed.

Mĭnervae Promontōrĭum (Punta della Campanella or della Minerva), a rocky promontory in Campania, running out a long way into the sea, 6 miles S.E. of Surrentum, on whose summit was a temple of Minerva, which was said to have been built by Ulysses, and which was still standing in the time of Seneca. Here the Sirens are reported to have dwelt. The Greeks regarded it as the N.W. boundary of Oenotria.

Mĭnĭo (Mignone), a small river in Etruria, which rises near Satrium, and falls into the Tyrrhene sea between Graviscae and Centum Cellae.

Mĭnĭus (Minho), a river in the N.W. of Spain, rises in the Cantabrian mountains in the N. of Gallaecia, and falls into the ocean. It was also called Baenis, and derived its name of Minius from the minium or vermilion carried down by its waters.

Mĭnōa (Μινώα). 1. A small island in the Saronic gulf, off the coast of Megaris, and opposite a promontory of the same name, was united to the mainland by a bridge, and formed, with the promontory, the harbour of Nisaea. [See p. 429.] — 2. A town on the E. coast of Laconia, and on a promontory of the same name, N.E. of Epidaurus Limera. — 3. A town on the W. part of the N. coast of Crete, between the promontories Drepanum and Psacum. — 4. A town on the E. part of the N. coast of Crete, belonging to the territory of Lyctus, and situated on the narrowest part of the island. — 5. A town in Sicily. See HERACLEA MINOA.

Mīnos (Μίνως). 1. Son of Zeus and Europa, brother of Rhadamanthus, was the king and legislator of Crete. After his death he became one of the judges of the shades in Hades. He was the father of Deucalion and Ariadne; and, according to Apollodorus, the brother of Sarpedon. Some traditions relate that Minos married Itone, daughter of Lyctius, by whom he had a son, Lycastus, and that the latter became, by Ida, the daughter of Corybas, the father of another Minos. But it should be observed, that Homer and Hesiod know only of one Minos, the ruler of Cnossus, and the son and friend of Zeus; and that they relate nearly the same things about him which later traditions assign to a second Minos, the grandson of the former. In this case, as in many other mythical traditions, a rationalistic criticism attempted to solve contradictions and difficulties in the stories about a person, by assuming that the contradictory accounts must refer to two different personages. — 2. Grandson of the former, and a son of Lycastus and Ida, was likewise a king and lawgiver of Crete. He is described as the husband of Pasiphaë, a daughter of Helios; and as the father of Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Androgeus, Acalle, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phaedra. After the death of Asterius, Minos aimed at the supremacy of Crete, and declared that it was destined to him by the gods; in proof of which, he asserted that the gods always answered his prayers. Accordingly, as he was offering up a sacrifice to Poseidon, he prayed that a bull might come forth from the sea, and promised to sacrifice the animal. The bull appeared, and Minos became king of Crete. (Others say that Minos disputed the government with his brother, Sarpedon, and conquered.) But Minos, who admired the beauty of the bull, did not sacrifice him, and substituted another in his place. Poseidon therefore rendered the bull furious, and made Pasiphaë conceive a passion for the animal. Daedalus enabled Pasiphaë to gratify her passion, and she became by the bull the mother of the Minotaurus, a monster with a human body and a bull's head, or, according to others, with a bull's body and a human head. The monster was kept in the labyrinth at Cnossus, constructed by Daedalus. Daedalus fled from Crete to escape the wrath of Minos and took refuge in Sicily. Minos followed him to Sicily, and was there slain by Cocalus and his daughters. —Minos is further said to have divided Crete into 3 parts, and to have ruled 9 years. The Cretans traced their legal and political institutions to Minos. He is said to have been instructed in the art of lawgiving by Zeus himself; and the Spartan, Lycurgus, was believed to have taken the legislation of Minos as his model. In his time Crete was a powerful maritime state; and Minos not only checked the piratical pursuits of his contemporaries, but made himself master of the Greek islands of the Aegean. The most ancient legends describe Minos as a just and wise law-giver, whereas the later accounts represent him as an unjust and cruel tyrant. In order to avenge the wrong done to his son Androgeus [ANDROGEUS] at Athens, he made war against the Athenians and Megarians. He subdued Megara, and compelled the Athenians either every year or every 9 years, to send him as a tribute 7 youths and 7 maidens, who were devoured in the labyrinth by the Minotaurus. The monster was slain by Theseus.

Mintha (Μίνθη), a daughter of Cocytus, beloved by Hades, was metamorphosed by Demeter or Persephone into a plant called after her mintha, or mint. In the neighbourhood of Pylos there was a hill called after her, and at its foot there was a temple of Pluto, and a grove of Demeter.

Minthē (Μίνθη: Vunuka), a mountain of Elis in Triphylia, near Pylos.

Minturnae (Minturnensis: Trajetta), an important town in Latium, on the frontiers of Campania, was situated on the Appia Via, and on both banks of the Liris, and near the mouth of this river. It was an ancient town of the Ausones or Aurunci, but surrendered to the Romans of its own accord, and received a Roman colony B. C. 296. It was subsequently recolonised by Julius Caesar. In its neighbourhood was a grove sacred to the nymph Marica, and also extensive marshes (Paludes Minturnenses), formed by the overflowing of the river Liris, in which Marius was taken prisoner. [See p. 418, a.] The neighbourhood of Minturnae produced good wine. There are the ruins of an amphitheatre and of an aqueduct at the modern Trajetta.

Minuciānus (Μινουκιανός). 1. A Greek rhetorician, was a contemporary of the celebrated rhetorician Hermogenes of Tarsus (fl. A. D. 170), with whom he was at variance. — 2. An Athenian, the son of Nicagoras, was also a Greek rhetorician, and lived in the reign of Gallienus (A. D. 260—268). He was the author of several rhetorical works, and a portion of his Τέχνη ῥητορική is extant, and is published in the 9th volume of Walz's Rhetores Graeci.

Mĭnūcĭus Basilus. [BASILUS.]

Mĭnūcĭus Rufus. 1. M., consul B. C. 221, when he carried on war against the Istrians. In 217 he was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus. The cautious policy of Fabius displeased Minucius; and accordingly when Fabius was called away to Rome, Minucius disobeyed the positive commands of the dictator, and risked a battle with a portion of Hannibal's troops. He was fortunate enough to gain a victory; in consequence of which he became so popular at Rome, that a bill was passed, giving him equal military power with the dictator. The Roman army was now divided, and each portion encamped separately under its own general. Anxious for distinction, Minucius eagerly accepted a battle which was offered him by Hannibal, but was defeated, and his troops were only saved from total destruction by the timely arrival of Fabius, with all his forces. Thereupon Minucius generously acknowledged his error, gave up his separate command, and placed himself again under the authority of the dictator. He fell at the battle of Cannae in the following year. — 2. Q., plebeian aedile 201, praetor 200, and consul 197, when he carried on war against the Boii with success. In 189 he was one of the 10 commissioners sent into Asia after the conquest of Antiochus the Great; and in 183 he was one of the 3 ambassadors sent into Gaul. — 3. M., praetor 197. — 4. M., tribune of the plebs 121, brought forward a bill to repeal the laws of C. Gracchus. This Marcus Minucius and his brother Quintus are mentioned as arbiters between the inhabitants of Genua and the Viturii, in a very interesting inscription, which was discovered in the year 1506, about 10 miles from the modern city of Genoa. — 5. Q., consul 110, obtained Macedonia as his province, carried on war with success against the barbarians in Thrace, and triumphed on his return to Rome. He perpetuated the memory of his triumph by building the Porticus Minucia, near the Circus Flaminius.

Mĭnūcĭus Felix. [FELIX.]

Mĭnyae (Μινύαι), an ancient Greek race, who originally dwelt in Thessaly. Iolcos, in Thessaly, was one of their most ancient seats. Their ancestral hero, Minyas, is said to have migrated from Thessaly into the N. of Boeotia, and there to have established the empire of the Minyae, with the capital of Orchomenos. [ORCHOMENOS.] As the greater part of the Argonauts were descended from the Minyae, they are themselves called Minyae. The descendants of the Argonauts founded a colony in Lemnos, called Minyae. Thence they proceeded to Elis Triphylia, and to the island of Thera.

Mĭnyas (Μινύας), son of Chryses, and the ancestral hero of the race of the Minyae. The accounts of his genealogy vary very much in the different traditions, for some call him a son of Orchomenus or Eteocles, others of Poseidon, Aleus, Ares, Sisyphus, or Halmus. He is further called the husband of Tritogenia, Clytodora, or Phanosyra. Orchomenus, Presbon, Athamas, Diochthondas, Eteoclymene, Periclymene, Leucippe, Arsinoë, and Alcathoë or Alcithoë, are mentioned as his children. His tomb was shown at Orchomenos in Boeotia. A daughter of Minyas was called Minyeïas (-ădis) or Mĭnēïs (-ĭdis). (See Ov. Met. iv. 1. 32.)

Mirobrīga. 1. A town of the Celtici in Lusitania, on the coast of the ocean. — 2. A Roman municipium in the territory of the Turduli, in Hispania Baetica, on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta.

Misēnum (Punta di Miseno), a promontory in Campania, S. of Cumae, said to have derived its name from Misenus, the companion and trumpeter of Aeneas, who was drowned and buried here. The bay formed by this promontory was converted by Augustus into an excellent harbour, and was made the principal station of the Roman fleet on the Tyrrhene sea. A town sprung up around the harbour, and here the admiral of the fleet usually resided. The inhabitants were called Misenates and Misenenses. The Roman nobles had previously built villas on the coast. Here was the villa of C. Marius, which was purchased by Lucullus, and which afterwards passed into the hands of the emperor Tiberius, who died at this place.

Misitheus, the father-in-law of the emperor Gordian III., who married his daughter Sabinia Tranquillina in A. D. 241. Misitheus was a man of learning, virtue, and ability. He was appointed by his son-in-law praefect of the praetorians, and effected many important reforms in the royal household. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition against the Persians, whom he defeated; but in the course of this war he was cut off either by disease, or by the treachery of his successor Philippus, 243.

Mithras (Μίθρας), the god of the sun among the Persians. About the time of the Roman emperors his worship was introduced at Rome, and thence spread over all parts of the empire. The god is commonly represented as a handsome youth, wearing the Phrygian cap and attire, and kneeling on a bull which is thrown on the ground, and whose throat he is cutting. The bull is at the same time attacked by a dog, a serpent, and a scorpion. This group appears frequently among ancient works of art, and a fine specimen is preserved in the British Museum.

Mithridātes or Mithradātes (Μιθριδάτης or Μιθραδάτης), a common name among the Medes and Persians, derived from Mitra or Mithra, the Persian name for the sun, and the root da, signifying "to give." Mithridates would therefore mean, "given by the sun." 1. I. King, or, more properly, satrap of Pontus, was son of Ariobarzanes I., and was succeeded by Ariobarzanes II., about B. C. 363. The kings of Pontus claimed to be lineally descended from one of the 7 Persians who had conspired against the Magi, and who was subsequently established by Darius Hystaspis in the government of the countries bordering on the Euxine sea. Very little is known of their history until after the fall of the Persian empire. — 2. II. King of Pontus (337—302), succeeded his father Ariobarzanes II., and was the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus. After the death of Alexander the Great, he was for a time subject to Antigonus; but during the war between the successors of Alexander, he succeeded in establishing his independence. He died at the age of 84. — 3. III. King of Pontus (302—266), son and successor of the preceding. He enlarged his paternal dominions by the acquisition of great part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. He was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes III. — 4. IV. King of Pontus (about 240—190), son and successor of Ariobarzanes III. He gave his daughter Laodice in marriage to Antiochus III. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces I. — 5. V. King of Pontus (about 156—120), surnamed Euergetes, son and successor of Pharnaces I. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made an alliance with the Romans, whom he assisted in the 3rd Punic war and in the war against Aristonicus (131—129). He was assassinated at Sinope by a conspiracy among his own immediate attendants. — 6. VI. King of Pontus (120—63), surnamed Eupator, also Dionysus, but more commonly the Great, was the son and successor of the preceding, and was only 11 years old at the period of his accession. We have very imperfect information concerning the earlier years of his reign, and much of what has been transmitted to us wears a very suspicious aspect. We are told that immediately on ascending the throne he found himself assailed by the designs of his guardians, but that he succeeded in eluding all their machinations, partly by displaying a courage and address in warlike exercises beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. In order to evade the designs formed against his life, he also devoted much of his time to hunting, and took refuge in the remotest and most unfrequented regions, under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase. Whatever truth there may be in these accounts, it is certain that when he attained to manhood, he was not only endowed with consummate skill in all martial exercises, and possessed of a bodily frame inured to all hardships, as well as a spirit to brave every danger, but his naturally vigorous intellect had been improved by careful culture. As a boy he had been brought up at Sinope, where he had probably received the elements of a Greek education; and so powerful was his memory, that he is said to have learnt not less than 25 languages, and to have been able in the days of his greatest power to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own peculiar dialect. The first steps of his career were marked by blood. He is said to have murdered his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithridates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother. In the early part of his reign he subdued the barbarian tribes between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia, and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus. He assisted Parisades, king of the Bosporus, against the Sarmatians and Roxolani, and rendered the whole of the Tauric Chersonese tributary to his kingdom. After the death of Parisades, the kingdom of Bosporus itself was incorporated with his dominions. He was now in possession of such great power, that he began to deem himself equal to a contest with Rome itself. Many causes of dissension had already arisen between them, but Mithridates had hitherto submitted to the mandates of Rome. Even after expelling Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia, and Nicomedes from Bithynia in 90, he offered no resistance to the Romans when they restored these monarchs to their kingdom. But when Nicomedes, urged by the Roman legates, invaded the territories of Mithridates, the latter made preparations for immediate hostilities. His success was rapid and striking. In 88, he drove Ariobarzanes out of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes out of Bithynia, defeated the Roman generals who had supported the latter, made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, and at last of the Roman province of Asia. During the winter he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to put to death, on the same day, all the Roman and Italian citizens who were to be found within their walls. So hateful had the Romans rendered themselves, that these commands were obeyed with alacrity by almost all the cities of Asia, and 80,000 Romans and Italians are said to have perished in this fearful massacre. Meantime Sulla had received the command of the war against Mithridates, and crossed over into Greece in 87. Mithridates, however, had resolved not to await the Romans in Asia, but had already sent his general Archelaus into Greece, at the head of a powerful army. The war proved unfavourable to the king. Archelaus was twice defeated by Sulla with immense loss, near Chaeronea and Orchomenos in Boeotia (86). About the same time Mithridates was himself defeated in Asia by Fimbria. [FIMBRIA.] These disasters led him to sue for peace, which Sulla was willing to grant, because he was anxious to return to Italy, which was entirely in the hands of his enemies. Mithridates consented to abandon all his conquests in Asia, to pay a sum of 2000 talents, and to surrender to the Romans a fleet of 70 ships. Thus terminated the 1st Mithridatic war (84). — Shortly afterwards Murena, who had been left in command of Asia by Sulla, invaded the dominions of Mithridates (83), under the flimsy pretext that the king had not yet evacuated the whole of Cappadocia. In the following year (82) Murena renewed his hostile incursions, but was defeated by Mithridates on the banks of the river Halys. But shortly afterwards Murena received peremptory orders from Sulla to desist from hostilities; in consequence of which peace was again restored. This is usually called the 2nd Mithridatic war. — Mithridates, however, was well aware that the peace between him and Rome was in fact a mere suspension of hostilities; and that the republic would never suffer the massacre of her citizens in Asia to remain ultimately unpunished. No formal treaty was ever concluded between Mithridates and the Roman senate; and the king had in vain endeavoured to obtain the ratification of the terms agreed on between him and Sulla. The death of Nicomedes III., king of Bithynia, at the beginning of 74, brought matters to a crisis. That monarch left his dominions by will to the Roman people; and Bithynia was accordingly declared a Roman province: but Mithridates asserted that the late king had left a legitimate son by his wife Nysa, whose pretensions he immediately prepared to support by his arms. He had employed the last few years in forming a powerful army, armed and disciplined in the Roman manner; and he now took the field with 120,000 foot soldiers, 16,000 horse, and a vast number of barbarian auxiliaries. This was the commencement of the 3rd Mithridatic war. The two Roman consuls, Lucullus and Cotta, were unable to oppose his first irruption. He traversed Bithynia without encountering any resistance; and when at length Cotta ventured to give him battle under the walls of Chalcedon, the consul was totally defeated both by sea and land. Mithridates then proceeded to lay siege to Cyzicus both by sea and land. Lucullus marched to the relief of the city, cut off the king's supplies, and eventually compelled him to raise the siege, early in 73. On his retreat Mithridates suffered great loss, and eventually took refuge in Pontus. Hither Lucullus followed him in the next year. The new army, which the king had collected, was entirely defeated by the Roman general; and Mithridates, despairing of opposing the farther progress of Lucullus, took refuge in the dominions of his son-in-law Tigranes, the king of Armenia. Tigranes at first showed no disposition to attempt the restoration of his father-in-law; but being offended at the haughty conduct of Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent to demand the surrender of Mithridates, the Armenian king not only refused this request, but determined to prepare for war with the Romans. Accordingly in 69 Lucullus marched into Armenia, defeated Tigranes and Mithridates near Tigranocerta, and in the next year (68) again defeated the allied monarchs near Artaxata. The Roman general then turned aside into Mesopotamia, and laid siege to Nisibis. Here the Roman soldiers broke out into open mutiny, and demanded to be led home; and Lucullus was obliged to raise the siege, and return to Asia Minor. Meanwhile Mithridates had taken advantage of the absence of Lucullus to invade Pontus at the head of a large army. He defeated Fabius and Triarius, to whom the defence of Pontus had been committed; and when Lucullus returned to Pontus, he was unable to resume the offensive in consequence of the mutinous spirit of his own soldiers. Mithridates was thus able before the close of 67 to regain possession of the greater part of his hereditary dominions. In the following year (66) the conduct of the war was entrusted to Pompey. Hostilities were resumed with greater vigour than ever. Mithridates was obliged to retire before the Romans, but was surprised and defeated by Pompey; and as Tigranes now refused to admit him into his dominions, he resolved to plunge with his small army into the heart of Colchis, and thence make his way to the Palus Maeotis and the Cimmerian Bosporus. Arduous as this enterprise appeared it was successfully accomplished; and he at length established himself without opposition at Panticapaeum, the capital of Bosporus. He had now nothing to fear from the pursuit of Pompey, who turned his arms first against Tigranes, and afterwards against Syria. Unable to obtain peace from Pompey, except he would come in person to make his submission, Mithridates conceived the daring project of marching round the N. and W. coasts of the Euxine, through the wild tribes of the Sarmatians and Getae, and having gathered round his standard all these barbarian nations, to penetrate into Italy itself. But meanwhile disaffection had made rapid progress among his followers. His son Pharnaces at length openly rebelled against him. He was joined both by the whole army and the citizens of Panticapaeum, who unanimously proclaimed him king; and Mithridates, who had taken refuge in a strong tower, saw that no choice remained to him but death or captivity. Hereupon he took poison, which he constantly carried with him; but his constitution had been so long inured to antidotes, that it did not produce the desired effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of his Gaulish mercenaries to despatch him with his sword. He died in 63. His body was sent by Pharnaces to Pompey at Amisus, as a token of his submission ; but the conqueror caused it to be interred with regal honours in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Sinope. He was 68 or 69 years old at the time of his death, and had reigned 57 years, of which 25 had been occupied, with only a few brief intervals, in one continued struggle against the Roman power. The estimation in which he was held by his adversaries is the strongest testimony to his great abilities: Cicero calls him the greatest of all kings after Alexander, and in another passage says that he was a more formidable opponent than any other monarch whom the Roman arms had yet encountered.—7. Kings of Parthia. [ARSACES, 6, 9, 13.]—8. Of Pergamus, son of Menodotus ; but his mother having had an amour with Mithridates the Great, he was generally looked upon as in reality the son of that monarch. The king himself bestowed great care on his education ; and he appears as early as 64 to have exercised the chief control over the affairs of his native city. At a subsequent period he served under Julius Caesar in the Alexandrian war (48) ; and after the defeat of Pharnaces in the following year (47), Caesar bestowed upon Mithridates the kingdom of the Bosporus, and also the tetrarchy of the Galatians. But the kingdom of the Bosporus still remained to be won, for Asander, who had revolted against Pharnaces, was in fact master of the whole country, and Mithridates having attempted to expel Asander, was defeated and slain.

Mithrĭdātis Rĕgĭo (Μιθριδάτου χώρα), a district of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the W. side of the river Rha (Wolga), so called because it was the place of refuge of the last Mithridates, in the reign of Claudius.

Mĭtўlēnē. [MYTILENE.]

Mnasēas (Μνασέας), of Patara in Lycia, not of Patrae in Achaia, was a pupil of Eratosthenes, and a grammarian of considerable celebrity. He wrote 2 works, one of a chorographical description, entitled Periplus (Περίπλους), and the other a collection of oracles given at Delphi.

Mnēmē (Μνήμη), i. e. memory, one of the 3 Muses who were in early times worshipped at Ascra in Boeotia. There seems to have been also a tradition that Mneme was the mother of the Muses, for Ovid (Met. v. 268) calls them Mnemonides ; unless this be only an abridged form for the daughters of Mnemosyne. [MUSAE.]

Mnēmŏsўnē (Μνημοσύνη), i. e. memory, daughter of Uranus, and one of the Titanides, became by Zeus the mother of the Muses.

Mnesarchus (Μνήσαρχος). 1. Son of Euphron or Euthyphron, and father of Pythagoras. He was generally believed not to have been of purely Greek origin. According to some accounts, he belonged to the Tyrrhenians of Lemnos and Imbros, and is said to have been an engraver of rings. According to other accounts, the name of the father of Pythagoras was Marmacus, whose father Hippasus came from Phlius.—2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of Pythagoras and Theano. According to some accounts he succeeded Aristaeus as president of the Pythagorean school.—3. A Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panaetius, flourished about B. C. 110, and taught at Athens. Among his pupils was Antiochus of Ascalon.

Mnesĭcles (Μνησικλῆς), one of the great Athenian artists of the age of Pericles, was the architect of the Propylaea of the Acropolis, the building of which occupied 5 years, B. C. 437—433. It is said that, during the progress of the work, he fell from the summit of the building, and was supposed to be mortally injured, but was cured by a herb which Athena showed to Pericles in a dream.

Mnesithēus (Μνησίθεος), a physician, was a native of Athens, and lived probably in the 4th century B. C., as he is quoted by the comic poet Alexis. He enjoyed a great reputation, and is frequently mentioned by Galen, and others.

Mnester (Μνήστηρ), a celebrated pantomime actor in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, was also one of the lovers of the empress Messalina, and was put to death upon the ruin of the latter.

Mnestheus, a Trojan, who accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and is said to have been the ancestral hero of the Memmii.

Mōābītis (Μωαβῖτις, Μώβα: Μωαβῖται, Moabītae: O. T. Moab, for both country and people), a district of Arabia Petraea, E. of the Dead Sea, from the river Arnon (Wady-el-Mojib, the boundary between Palestine and Arabia) on the N., to Zoar, near the S. end of the Dead Sea, on the S., between the Amorites on the N., the Midianites on the E., and the Edomites on the S., that is, before the Israelitish conquest of Canaan. At an earlier period, the country of Moab had extended N.-wards, beyond the N. end of the Dead Sea, and along the E. bank of the Jordan, as far as the river Jabbok, but it had been wrested from them by the Amorites. The plains E. of the Jordan were, however, still called the plains of Moab. The Moabites were left undisturbed by the Israelites on their march to Canaan ; but Balak, king of Moab, through fear of the Israelites, did what he could to harm them, first by his vain attempt to induce the prophet Balaam to curse the people whom a divine impulse forced him to bless, and then by seducing them to worship Baal-peor. Hence the hereditary enmity between the Israelites and Moabites, and the threatenings denounced against Moab by the Hebrew prophets. In the time of the Judges they subdued the S. part of the Jewish territory, with the assistance of the Ammonites and Amalekites, and held it for 18 years (Judges iii. 12 foll.). They were conquered by David, after the partition of whose kingdom they belonged to the kingdom of Israel. They revolted after the death of Ahab (B. C. 896) and appear to have become virtually independent ; and after the 10 tribes had been carried into captivity, the Moabites seem to have recovered the N. part of their original territory. They were subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, with other nations bordering on Palestine, very soon after the Babylonian conquest of Judaea, after which they scarcely appear as a distinct nation, but, after a few references to them, they disappear in the general name of the Arabians. The name Moabitis, however, was still applied to the district of Arabia, between the Arnon (the S. frontier of Peraea, or Palestine E. of the Jordan), and the Nabathaei, in the mountains of Seir. The Moabites were a kindred race with the Hebrews, being descended from Moab, the son of Lot. They worshipped Baal-Peor and Chemosh with most licentious rites, and they sometimes offered human sacrifices. Their government was monarchical. They were originally a pastoral people ; but the excessive fertility of their country, which is a mountainous tract intersected with rich valleys and numerous streams, led them to diligence and success in agriculture. The frequent ruins of towns and traces of paved roads, which still cover the face of the country, show how populous and prosperous it was. The chief city, Ar or Rabbath-Moab, aft. Areopolis (Rabba, Ru.), was about 25 miles S. of the Arnon.

Modestīnus, Herennĭus, a Roman jurist, and a pupil of Ulpian, flourished in the reigns of Alexander Severus, Maximinus and the Gordians, A. D. 222—244. He taught law to the younger Maximinus. Though Modestinus is the latest of the great Roman jurists, he ranks among the most distinguished. There are 345 excerpts in the Digest from his writings, the titles of which show the extent and variety of his labours.

Mŏdestus, a military writer, the author of a Libellus de Vocabulis Rei Militaris, addressed to the emperor Tacitus, A. D. 275. It is very brief, and presents no features of interest. Printed in all the chief collections of Scriptores de Re Militari.

Modicĭa (Monza), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on the river Lambrus, N. of Mediolanum (Milan), where Theodoric built a palace, and Theodolinda, queen of the Langobards, a splendid church, which still contains many of the precious gifts of this queen.

Mōdin (Μοδεΐν, -εεΐν, or ιεΐμ), a little village on a mountain N. of Lydda or Diospolis, on the extreme N.W. of Judaea, celebrated as the native place of the Maccabaean family. Its exact site is uncertain.

Moenus, Moenis, Maenus, or Menus (Main), a river in Germany, which rises in the Sudeti Montes, flows through the territory of the Hermunduri and the Agri decumates of the Romans, and falls into the Rhine opposite Mogontiacum.

Moeris or Myris (Μοῖρις, Μύρις), a king of Egypt, who, Herodotus tells us, reigned some 900 years before his own visit to that country, which seems to have been about B. C. 450. We hear of Moeris that he formed the lake known by his name, and joined it by a canal to the Nile, in order to receive the waters of the river when they were superabundant, and to supply the defect when they did not rise sufficiently. In the lake he built 2 pyramids on each of which was a stone statue, seated on a throne, and intended to represent himself and his wife.

Moeris (Μοῖρις), commonly called Moeris Atticista, a distinguished grammarian, the author of a work still extant, entitled Λέξεις Ἀττικαί, though the title varies somewhat in different manuscripts. Of the personal history of the author nothing is known. He is conjectured to have lived about the end of the 2nd century after Christ. His treatise is a sort of comparison of the Attic with other Greek dialects; consisting of a list of Attic words and expressions, which are illustrated by those of other dialects, especially the common Greek. Edited by Pierson, Lugd. Bat. 1759.

Moeris Lacus (Μοίριος or Μοίριδος λίμνη: Birket-el-Keroun), a great lake on the W. side of the Nile, in Middle Egypt, used for the reception and subsequent distribution of a part of the overflow of the Nile. It was believed by the ancients to have been dug by king Moeris; but it is really a natural, and not an artificial lake.

Moero (Μοιρώ), or Myro (Μυρώ), a poetess of Byzantium, wife of Andromachus surnamed Philologus, and mother of the grammarian and tragic poet Homerus, lived about B. C. 300. She wrote epic, elegiac, and lyric poems.

Moerocles (Μοιροκλῆς), an Athenian orator, a native of Salamis, was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and like him an opponent of Philip and Alexander.

Moesĭa, called by the Greeks Mysĭa (Μυσία, also M. ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ, to distinguish it from Mysia in Asia), a country of Europe, was bounded on the S. by M. Haemus, which separated it from Thrace, and by M. Orbelus and Scordus, which separated it from Macedonia, on the W. by M. Scordus and the rivers Drinus and Savus, which separated it from Illyricum and Pannonia, on the N. by the Danube, which separated it from Dacia, and on the E. by the Pontus Euxinus, thus corresponding to the present Servia and Bulgaria. This country was subdued in the reign of Augustus, but does not appear to have been formally constituted a Roman province till the commencement of the reign of Tiberius. It was originally only one province, but was afterwards formed into 2 provinces (probably after the conquest of Dacia by Trajan), called Moesia Superior and Moesia Inferior, the former being the western, and the latter the eastern half of the country, and separated from each other by the river Cebrus or Ciabrus, a tributary of the Danube. When Aurelian surrendered Dacia to the barbarians, and removed the inhabitants of that province to the S. of the Danube, the middle part of Moesia was called Dacia Aureliani; and this new province was divided into Dacia Ripensis, the district along the Danube, and Dacia Interior, the district S. of the latter as far as the frontiers of Macedonia. In the reign of Valens, some of the Goths crossed the Danube and settled in Moesia. These Goths are sometimes called Moeso-Goths, and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the Scriptures into Gothic about the middle of the 4th century. The original inhabitants of the country, called Moesi by the Romans, and Mysi (Μυσοί) by the Greeks, were a Thracian race, and were divided into several tribes, such as the TRIBALLI, PEUCINI, &c.

Mogontiăcum, Moguntiăcum or Magontiăcum (Mainz or Mayence), a town on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite the mouth of the river Moenus (Main), was situated in the territory of the Vangiones, and was subsequently the capital of the province of Germania Prima. It was a Roman municipium, and was founded, or at least enlarged and fortified, by Drusus. It was always occupied by a strong Roman garrison, and continued to the downfall of the empire to be one of the chief Roman fortresses on the Rhine.

Moirae (Μοῖραι) called Parcae by the Romans, the Fates. Moira properly signifies "a share," and as a personification "the deity who assigns to every man his fate or his share." Homer usually speaks of one Moira, and only once mentions the Moirae in the plural. (Il. xxiv. 29.) In his poems Moira is fate personified, which, at the birth of man, spins out the thread of his future life, follows his steps, and directs the consequences of his actions according to the counsel of the gods. But the personification of his Moira is not complete; for he mentions no particular appearance of the goddess, no attributes, and no parentage. His Moira is therefore quite synonymous with Aisa (Αἶσα).—In Hesiod the personification of the Moirae is complete. He calls them daughters of Zeus and Themis, and makes them 3 in number, viz. Clotho, or the spinning fate; Lachesis, or the one who assigns to man his fate; and Atropos, or the fate that cannot be avoided. Later writers differ in their genealogy of the Moirae from that of Hesiod; thus they are called children of Erebus and Night, of Cronos and Night, of Ge and Oceanus, or lastly of Ananke or Necessity.—The character and nature of the Moirae are differently described at different times and by different authors. Sometimes they appear as divinities of fate in the strict sense of the term, and sometimes only as allegorical divinities of the duration of human life.—In the former character they take care that the fate assigned to every being by eternal laws may take its course without obstruction; and Zeus, as well as the other gods and men, must submit to them. They assign to the Erinnyes, who inflict the punishment for evil deeds, their proper functions; and with them they direct fate according to the laws of necessity, whence they are sometimes called the sisters of the Erinnyes. These grave and mighty goddesses were represented by the earliest artists with staffs or sceptres, the symbol of dominion.—The Moirae, as the divinities of the duration of human life, which is determined by the two points of birth and of death, are conceived either as goddesses of birth or as goddesses of death, and hence their number was 2, as at Delphi, and was subsequently increased to 3. The distribution of the functions among the 3 was not strictly observed, for we sometimes find all 3 described as spinning, although this should be the function of Clotho alone, who is moreover often mentioned alone as the representative of all. As goddesses of birth, who spin the thread of the beginning of life, and even prophesy the fate of the newly born, they are mentioned along with Ilithyia, who is called their companion. The symbol with which they, or rather Clotho alone, are represented to indicate this function, is a spindle, and the idea implied in it was carried out so far, that sometimes we read of their breaking or cutting off the thread when life is to end. Being goddesses of fate, they must necessarily know the future, which at times they reveal, and thus become prophetic divinities. As goddesses of death, they appear together with the Keres and the infernal Erinnyes, with whom they are even confounded. For the same reason they, along with the Charites, lead Persephone out of the lower world into the regions of light. The various epithets which poets apply to the Moirae generally refer to the severity, inflexibility, and sternness of fate. They had sanctuaries in many parts of Greece. The poets sometimes describe them as aged and hideous women, and even as lame, to indicate the slow march of fate; but in works of art they are represented as grave maidens, with different attributes, viz., Clotho with a spindle or a roll (the book of fate); Lachesis pointing with a staff to the globe; and Atropos with a pair of scales, or a sun-dial, or a cutting instrument.

Moliŏne. [Moliones.]

Moliŏnes or Moliŏnĭdae (Μολίονες, Μολίονε, Μολιονίδαι), that is, Eurytus and Cteatus, so called after their mother Molione. They are also called Actoridae or Actoriōne (Ἀκτορίωνε) after their reputed father Actor, the husband of Molione, though they were generally regarded as the sons of Poseidon. According to a late tradition, they were born out of an egg; and it is further stated, that their bodies grew together, so that they had only one body, but 2 heads, 4 arms, and 4 legs. Homer mentions none of these extraordinary circumstances; and, according to him, the Moliones, when yet boys, took part in an expedition of the Epeans against Neleus and the Pylians. They are represented as nephews of Augeas, king of the Epeans. When Hercules marched against Augeas, the latter entrusted the conduct of the war to the Moliones; but as Hercules was taken ill, he concluded peace with Augeas, whereupon his army was attacked and defeated by the Molionidae. In order to take vengeance, he afterwards slew them near Cleonae, on the frontiers of Argolis, when they had been sent from Elis to sacrifice at the Isthmian games, on behalf of the town.—The Moliones are mentioned as conquerors of Nestor in the chariot race, and as having taken part in the Calydonian hunt. Cteatus was the father of Amphimachus by Theronice; and Eurytus, of Thalpius by Theraphone. Their sons Amphimachus and Thalpius led the Epeans to Troy.

Molo, surname of Apollonius, the rhetorician of Rhodes. [Apollonius, No. 2.]

Molochath. [Mulucha.]

Mŏlossi (Μολοσσοί), a people in Epirus, who inhabited a narrow slip of country, called after them Molossia (Μολοσσία) or Molossis, which extended from the Aous, along the W. bank of the Arachthus, as far as the Ambracian gulf. The Molossi were a Greek people, who claimed descent from Molossus, the son of Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus) and Andromache, and are said to have emigrated from Thessaly into Epirus, under the guidance of Pyrrhus himself. In their new abodes they intermingled with the original inhabitants of the land and with the neighbouring Illyrian tribes, in consequence of which they were regarded by the other Greeks as half barbarians. They were, however, by far the most powerful people in Epirus, and their kings gradually extended their dominion over the whole of the country. The first of their kings, who took the title of king of Epirus, was Alexander, who perished in Italy B.C. 326. [Epirus.] The ancient capital of the Molossi was Passaron, but Ambracia afterwards became their chief town, and the residence of their kings. The Molossian hounds were celebrated in antiquity, and were much prized for hunting.

Molycrīum (Μολύκρειον, also Μολύκρεια, Μολυκρία: Μολύκριος, Μολυκριεύς, Μολυκραῖος), a town in the most S.-ly part of Aetolia, at the entrance of the Corinthian gulf, gave the name of Rhium Molycrium (Ῥίον Μολύκριον) to the neighbouring promontory of Antirrhium. It was founded by the Corinthians, but was afterwards taken possession of by the Aetolians.

Mōmemphis (Μώμεμφις: Panouf-Khet, or Manouf-el-Seffli, i. e. Lower Memphis), the capital of the Nomos Momemphites in Lower Egypt, stood on the E. side of the lake Mareotis.

Mōmus (Μῶμος), the god of mockery and censure, is not mentioned by Homer, but is called in Hesiod the son of night. Thus he is said to have censured in the man formed by Hephaestus, that a little door had not been left in his breast, so as to enable one to look into his secret thoughts.

Mona (Anglesey), an island off the coast of the Ordovices in Britain, was one of the chief seats of the Druids. It was invaded by Suetonius Paulinus A. D. 61, and was conquered by Agricola, 78. Caesar (B. G. v. 13), erroneously describes this island as half way between Britannia and Hibernia. Hence it has been supposed by some critics that the Mona of Caesar is the Isle of Man; but it is more probable that he received a false report respecting the real position of Mona, especially since all other ancient writers give the name of Mona to the Isle of Anglesey, and the name of the latter island is likely to have been mentioned to Caesar on account of its celebrity in connection with the Druids.

Mŏnaeses. 1. A Parthian general mentioned by Horace (Carm. iii. 6. 9) is probably the same as Surenas, the general of Orodes, who defeated Crassus. — 2. A Parthian noble, who deserted to Antony and urged him to invade Parthia, but soon afterwards returned to the Parthian king Phraates. — 3. A general of the Parthian king, Vologeses I., in the reign of Nero.

Monapĭa or Monarīna (Isle of Man), an island between Britannia and Hibernia.

Monda or Munda (Mondego), a river on the W. coast of Spain, which flows into the ocean between the Tagus and Durius.

Mŏnēta, a surname of Juno among the Romans, by which she was characterised as the protectress of money. Under this name she had a temple on the Capitoline, in which there was at the same time the mint, just as the public treasury was in the temple of Saturn. The temple had been vowed by the dictator L. Furius in a battle against the Aurunci, and was erected on the spot where the house of M. Manlius Capitolinus had stood. Moneta signifies the mint; but some writers found such a meaning too plain. Thus Livius Andronicus used Moneta as a translation of Mnemosyne (Μνημοσύνη), and thus made her the mother of the Muses or Camenae. Cicero relates, that during an earthquake, a voice was heard issuing from the temple of Juno on the Capitol, and admonishing (monens) that a pregnant sow should be sacrificed. A somewhat more probable reason for the name is given by Suidas, though he assigns it to too late a time. In the war with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, he says, the Romans being in want of money, prayed to Juno, and were told by the goddess, that money would not be wanting to them, so long as they would fight with the arms of justice. As the Romans by experience found the truth of the words of Juno, they called her Juno Moneta. Her festival was celebrated on the 1st of June.

Monīma (Μονίμη), a Greek woman, either of Stratonicea, in Ionia, or of Miletus, was the wife of Mithridates, but was put to death by order of this monarch, when he fled into Armenia, B. C. 72.

Monoeci Portus, also Herculis Monoeci Portus (Monaco), a port-town on the coast of Liguria, between Nicaea and Albium Intemelium, founded by the Massilians, was situated on a promontory (hence the arx Monoeci of Virg. Aen. vi. 801), and possessed a temple of Hercules Monoecus, from whom the place derived its name. The harbour, though small and exposed to the S.E. wind, was of importance, as it was the only one on this part of the coast of Liguria.

Montānus, Curtĭus, was exiled by Nero, A. D. 67; but was soon afterwards recalled at his father's petition. On the accession of Vespasian, he vehemently attacked in the senate the notorious delator, Aquilius Regulus. If the same person with the Curtius Montanus satirised by Juvenal (iv. 107, 131, xi. 34), Montanus in later life sullied the fair reputation he enjoyed in youth; for Juvenal describes him as a corpulent epicure, a parasite of Domitian, and a hackneyed declaimer.

Montānus, Voltiēnus, an orator and declaimer in the reign of Tiberius. From his propensity to refine upon thought and diction, he was named the "Ovid" of the rhetorical schools. He was convicted on a charge of majestas, and died an exile in the Balearic islands, A. D. 25.

Mopsia or Mopsopia, an ancient name of Pamphylia, derived from Mopsus, the mythical leader of certain Greeks who were supposed to have settled in Pamphylia, as also in Cilicia and Syria, after the Trojan war, and whose name appears more than once in the geographical names in Cilicia. (See e. g. MOPSUCRENE, MOPSUESTIA.)

Mopsĭum (Μόψιον: Μόψιος), a town of Thessaly in Pelasgiotis, situated on a hill of the same name between Tempe and Larissa.

Mopsucrēnē (Μόψου κρήνη or κρῆναι, i. e. the Spring of Mopsus), a city of Cilicia Campestris, on the S. slope of the Taurus, and 12 Roman miles from Tarsus, was the place where the emperor Constantius died, A. D. 364.

Mopsuestĭa, (Μόψου ἑστία, Μοψουεστία, i. e. the Hearth of Mopsus, also Μόψου πόλις and Μόψος: Μοψεάτης: Mamistra, in the Middle Ages: Messis), an important city of Cilicia Campestris, on both banks of the river Pyramus, 12 Roman miles from its mouth, on the road from Tarsus to Issus, in the beautiful plain called τὸ Ἀλήϊον πεδίον, was a civitas libera under the Romans. The 2 parts of the city were connected by a handsome bridge built by Constantius over the Pyramus. In ecclesiastical history, it is notable as the birthplace of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

Mopsus (Μόψος). 1. Son of Ampyx or Ampycus by the nymph Chloris. Being a seer, he was also called a son of Apollo by Himantis. He was one of the Lapithae of Oechalia or Titaeron (Thessaly), and took part in the combat at the wedding of Pirithous. He was one of the Calydonian hunters, and also one of the Argonauts, and was a famous prophet among the Argonauts. He died in Libya of the bite of a snake, and was buried there by the Argonauts. He was afterwards worshipped as an oracular hero.—2. Son of Apollo and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, and also a celebrated seer. He contended in prophecy with Calchas at Colophon, and showed himself superior to the latter in prophetic power. [CALCHAS.] He was believed to have founded Mallos in Cilicia, in conjunction with the seer Amphilochus. A dispute arose between the two seers respecting the possession of the town, and both fell in combat by each other's hand. Mopsus had an oracle at Mallos, which existed as late as the time of Strabo.

Morgantĭum, Morgantīna, Murgantĭa, Morgentĭa (Μοργάντιον, Μοργαντίνη: Μοργαντῖνος, Murgentinus), a town in Sicily founded by the Morgetes, after they had been driven out of Italy by the Oenotrians. According to Livy (xxiv. 27) this city was situated on the E. coast, probably at the mouth of the Symaethus; but according to other writers it was situated in the interior of the island, S. E. of Agyrium, and near the Symaethus. The neighbouring country produced good wine.

Morgĕtes (Μόργητες), an ancient people in the S. of Italy. According to Strabo they dwelt in the neighbourhood of Rhegium, but being driven out of Italy by the Oenotrians crossed over to Sicily and there founded the town of Morgantium. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Morges was the successor of the Oenotrian king Italus, and hospitably received Siculus, who had been driven out of Latium by the Aborigines, in consequence of which the earlier Oenotrians were called Italietes, Morgetes and Siculi: according to this account, the Morgetes ought to be regarded as a branch of the Oenotrians.

Moria or Morija (Μώριον ὄρος), a mountain of Judaea, within the city of Jerusalem, on the summit of which the temple was built. [JERUSALEM.]

Morimĕnē (Μοριμενή), the N.W. district of Cappadocia, on the banks of the Halys, assigned under the Romans to Galatia. Its meadows were entirely devoted to the feeding of cattle.

Mŏrīni, a people in Gallia Belgica, W. of the Nervii and Menapii, and the most N.-ly people in all Gaul, whence Virgil calls them extremi hominum (Aen. viii. 727). They dwelt on the coast, opposite Britain, and at the narrowest part of the channel between Gaul and Britain, which is hence sometimes called Fretum Morinorum or Morinum. They were a brave and warlike people. Their country was covered with woods and marshes. Their principal town was GESORIACUM.

Morīus (Μώριος), a small river in Boeotia, a S. tributary of the Cephissus, at the foot of Mt. Thurion near Chaeronēa.

Mormo (Μορμώ, also Μορμολύκη, Μορμολυκεῖον), a female spectre, with which the Greeks used to frighten children.

Morpheus (Μορφεύς,), the son of Sleep, and the god of dreams. The name signifies the fashioner or moulder, because he shaped or formed the dreams which appeared to the sleeper.

Mors, called Thanătos (Θάνατος) by the Greeks, the god of death. In the Homeric poems Death does not appear as a distinct divinity, though he is described as the brother of Sleep, together with whom he carries the body of Sarpedon from the field of battle to the country of the Lycians. In Hesiod he is a son of Night and a brother of Ker and Sleep, and Death and Sleep reside in the lower world. In the Alcestis of Euripides, where Death comes upon the stage, he appears as an austere priest of Hades in a dark robe and with the sacrificial sword, with which he cuts off a lock of a dying person, and devotes it to the lower world. On the whole, later poets describe Death as a sad or terrific being (Horat. Carm. i. 4. 13 ; Sat. ii. 1. 57) ; but the best artists of the Greeks, avoiding any thing that might be displeasing, abandoned the idea suggested to them by the poets, and represented Death under a more pleasing aspect. On the chest of Cypselus, Night was represented with two boys, one black and the other white ; and at Sparta there were statues of both Death and Sleep. Both were usually represented as slumbering youths, or as genii with torches turned upside down. There are traces of sacrifices having been offered to Death, but no temples are mentioned anywhere.

Morȳchus (Μόρυχος), a tragic poet, a contemporary of Aristophanes, noted especially for his gluttony and effeminacy.

Mŏsa (Maas or Meuse), a river in Gallia Belgica, rises in Mt. Vogesus, in the territory of the Lingones, flows first N.E. and then N.W , and falls into the Vahalis or W. branch of the Rhine.

Moscha (Μόσχα: Muscat), an important seaport on the N. E. coast of Arabia Felix, N.W. of Syagrus, the E.-most promontory of the peninsula (Ras el-Had); a chief emporium for the trade between India and Arabia.

Moschi (Μόσχοι), a people of Asia, whose territory (ἡ Μοσχική, Moschorum Tractus) formed originally the S. part of Colchis, but, at the time of Augustus, was divided between Colchis, Iberia, and Armenia.

Moschĭci Montes, or -ĭcus Mons (τὰ Μοσχικὰ ὄρη: Mesjidi), a range of mountains extending S. and S.W. from the main chain of the Caucasus to that of the Anti-Taurus, and forming the boundary between Colchis and Iberia: named after the MOSCHI, who dwelt among them. Though lofty, they were well wooded to the summit, and their lower slopes were planted with vines.

Moschion (Μοσχίων), a Greek physician, the author of a short Greek treatise "On Female Diseases," is supposed to have lived in the beginning of the 2nd century after Christ. The work is edited by Dewez, Vienn. 1793.

Moschus (Μόσχος), of Syracuse, a grammarian and bucolic poet, lived about B. C. 250. Suidas says that he was acquainted with Aristarchus. According to this statement his date ought to be placed later ; but he calls himself a pupil of Bion, in the idyl in which he bewails the death of the latter [BION]. There are 4 of his idyls extant. He writes with elegance and liveliness ; but he is inferior to Bion, and comes still further behind Theocritus. His style labours under an excess of polish and ornament. For editions see BION.

Mŏsella (Mosel or Moselle), a river in Gallia Belgica, rises in Mt. Vogesus, flows N.E. through the territories of the Treviri, and falls into the Rhine at Confluentes (Coblenz). This river forms the subject of a descriptive poem by Ausonius.

Mostēni (Μοστηνοί, Μόστινα, Μουστήνη, Μυστήνη), a city of Lydia, in the Hyrcanian plain, S.E. of Thyatira, was one of the cities of Asia Minor destroyed by the great earthquake of A. D. 17. Its coins are numerous.

Mosychlus. [LEMNOS.]

Mosynoeci (Μοσύνοικοι, Μοσσύνοικοι), or Mosyni or Mossyni (Μοσυνοί, Μοσσυνοί), a people on the N. coast of Asia Minor, in Pontus, E. of the Chalybes and the city of Cerasus, celebrated for their warlike spirit and savage customs, which are described by Xenophon (Anab. iv. 4, v. 4). Their name was derived from the conical wooden houses in which they dwelt. Their government was very curious: a king chosen by them was strictly guarded in a house higher than the rest, and maintained at the public cost ; but as soon as he displeased the commons, they literally stopped the supplies, and starved him to death.

Mothōnē. [METHONE.]

Motūca (Μότουκα: Mutycensis: Modica), a town in the S. of Sicily, W. of the promontory Pachynus and near the sources of the river Motychanus (Fiume di Ragusa). Since both Cicero and Pliny call the inhabitants Mutycenses, it is probable that Mutyca is the more correct form of the name. This town must not be confounded with the more celebrated Motya.

Motўa (Μοτύη: Μοτυαῖος), an ancient town in the N.W. of Sicily, situated on a small island (Isola di Mezzo) only 6 stadia from the coast, with which it was connected by a mole. It was founded by the Phoenicians in the territory of the Elymi. It possessed a good harbour, and was in early times one of the most flourishing cities of Sicily. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, was taken from them by Dionysius of Syracuse, and was finally captured by the Carthaginian general Himilco, who transplanted all its inhabitants to the town of Lilybaeum, which he had founded in its neighbourhood, B. C. 397. From this time it disappears from history.

Motychānus. [Motuca.]

Mūcĭa, daughter of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, consul B. C. 95, married Cn. Pompey, by whom she had 2 sons, Cneius and Sextus, and a daughter, Pompeia. She was divorced by Pompey in 62. She next married M. Aemilius Scaurus, a step-son of the dictator Sulla. In 39, Mucia went to Sicily to mediate between her son Sex. Pompey and Augustus. She was living at the time of the battle of Actium, 31. Augustus treated her with great respect.

Muciānus. 1. P. Licinĭus Crassus Dives Mucianus, was the son of P. Mucius Scaevola, and was adopted by P. Licinius Crassus Dives. He was consul B. C. 131, and carried on the war against Aristonicus in Asia, but was defeated by the latter. He succeeded Scipio Nasica as pontifex maximus. He was distinguished both as an orator and a lawyer. — 2. Licinĭus Muciānus, three times consul in A. D. 52, 70, and 75. On Nero's death in 68, Mucianus had the command of the province of Syria; and he rendered efficient aid to Vespasian, when the latter resolved to seize the imperial throne. As soon as Vespasian was proclaimed emperor, Mucianus set out for Europe to oppose Vitellius; but the Vitellians were entirely defeated by Antonius Primus [Primus], before Mucianus entered Italy. Antonius however had to surrender all power into the hands of Mucianus, upon the arrival of the latter at Rome. Mucianus was an orator and an historian. His powers of oratory are greatly praised by Tacitus. He made a collection of the speeches of the republican period, which he published in 11 books of Acta and 3 of Epistolae. The subject of his history is not mentioned; but it appears to have treated chiefly of the East.

Mucĭus Scaevŏla. [Scaevola.]

Mugilla (Mugillanus), a town in Latium near Corioli, from which a family of the Papirii probably derived their name Mugillanus.

Mulcĭber, a surname of Vulcan, which seems to have been given to him as an euphemism, that he might not consume the habitations and property of men, but might kindly aid them in their pursuits. It occurs frequently in the Latin poets.

Mulŭcha, Malva, or Molŏchath (Μόλοχαθ: Wad el Mulwia or Mohalou, or Sourb-ou-Herb), the largest river of Mauretania, rising in the Atlas, and flowing N. by E. into the Gulf of Melillah, has been successively the boundary between the Mauri and the Massaesylii, Mauretania and Numidia, Mauretania Tingitana and Mauretania Caesariensis, Marocco and Algier. [Comp. Mauretania.]

Mummĭus. 1. L., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 187, and praetor 177.—2. L., surnamed Achaicus, son of the last, was praetor 154, when he carried on the war successfully in further Spain, against the Lusitanians. He was consul in 146, when he won for himself the surname of Achaicus, by the conquest of Greece, and the establishment of the Roman province of Achaia. After defeating the army of the Achaean league at the Isthmus of Corinth, he entered Corinth without opposition. The city was burnt, rased, and abandoned to pillage: the native Corinthians were sold for slaves, and the rarest specimens of Grecian art were given up to the rapacity of an ignorant conqueror. Polybius the historian saw Roman soldiers playing at draughts upon the far-famed picture of Dionysus by Aristides; and Mummius himself was so unconscious of the real value of his prize, that he sold the rarer works of painting, sculpture, and carving, to the king of Pergamus, and exacted securities from the masters of vessels who conveyed the remainder to Italy, to replace by equivalents any picture or statue lost or injured in the passage. He remained in Greece during the greater part of 145 with the title of proconsul. He arranged the fiscal and municipal constitution of the newly acquired province, and won the confidence and esteem of the provincials by his integrity, justice, and equanimity. He triumphed in 145. He was censor in 142 with Scipio Africanus the younger. The political opinions of Mummius inclined to the popular side. — 3. Sp., brother of the preceding, and his legatus at Corinth in 146—145, was an intimate friend of the younger Scipio Africanus. In political opinions Spurius was opposed to his brother Lucius, and was a high aristocrat. He composed ethical and satirical epistles, which were extant in Cicero's age, and were probably in the style which Horace afterwards cultivated so successfully.

Munātĭus Plancus. [Plancus.]

Munda. 1. A Roman colony and an important town in Hispania Baetica, situated on a small river, and celebrated on account of 2 battles fought in its neighbourhood, the victory of Cn. Scipio over the Carthaginians in B. C. 216, and the important victory of Julius Caesar over the sons of Pompey in 45. The town had fallen into decay as early as the time of Pliny. The site of the ancient town is usually supposed to be the modern village of Monda, S.W. of Malaga; but Munda was more probably in the neighbourhood of Cordova, and there are ruins of ancient walls, and towers between Martos, Alcandete, Espejo and Baena, which are conjectured to be the remains of Munda. — 2. A river. See Monda.

Mūnўchĭa (Μουνυχία), a hill in the peninsula of Piraeus, which formed the citadel of the ports of Athens. It was strongly fortified, and is frequently mentioned in Athenian history. At its foot lay the harbour of Munychia, one of the 3 harbours in the peninsula of Piraeus, fortified by Themistocles. The names of these 3 harbours were Piraeus, Zea, and Munychia. The last was the smallest and the most E.-ly of the 3, and is called at the present day Phanari: Zea was situated between Piraeus and Munychia. Most topographers have erroneously supposed Phanari to be Phaleron, and Zea to be Munychia. The entrance to the harbour of Munychia was very narrow, and could be closed by a chain. The hill of Munychia contained several public buildings. Of these the most important were: —(1) a temple of Artemis Munychia, in which persons accused of crimes against the state took refuge: (2) The Bendideum, the sanctuary of the Thracian Artemis Bendis, in whose honour the festival of the Bendidea was celebrated: (3) The theatre on the N.W. slope of the hill, in which the assemblies of the people were sometimes held.

Murcĭa, Murtēa, or Murtĭa, a surname of Venus at Rome, where she had a chapel in the circus, with a statue. This surname, which is said to be the same as Myrtea (from myrtus, a myrtle), was believed to indicate the fondness of the goddess for the myrtle tree. In ancient times there is said to have been a myrtle grove in the front of her chapel at the foot of the Aventine.

Murcus, L. Statĭus, was Caesar's legatus, B.C. 48, and praetor 45. He went into Syria after his year of office expired; and after Caesar's death became an active supporter of the republican party. Cassius appointed him prefect of the fleet. After the ruin of the republican party at Philippi, in 42, Murcus went over to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. Here he was assassinated by Pompey's order at the instigation of his freedman Menas, to whom Murcus had borne himself loftily.

Murēna, Licinĭus. The name Murena, which is the proper way of writing the word, not Muraena, is said to have been given in consequence of one of the family having a great liking for the lamprey (murena), and building tanks (vivaria) for them. — 1. P., a man of some literary knowledge, lost his life in the wars of Marius and Sulla, B. C. 82. — 2. L., brother of the preceding, served under Sulla in Greece, in the Mithridatic war. After Sulla had made peace with Mithridates (84), Murena was left as propraetor in Asia. Anxious for distinction, Murena sought a quarrel with Mithridates; and after carrying on the war for 2 years, was at length compelled by the strict orders of Sulla to stop hostilities. [See p. 452, a.] Murena returned to Rome, and had a triumph in 81. He probably died soon after. — 3. L., son of the last, served under his father in the 2nd Mithridatic war, and also under Lucullus in the 3rd Mithridatic war. In 65 he was praetor, in 64 propraetor of Gallia Cisalpina, and in 63 was elected consul with D. Junius Silanus. Serv. Sulpicius, an unsuccessful candidate, instituted a prosecution against Murena for bribery (ambitus), and he was supported in the matter by M. Porcius Cato, Cn. Postumius, and Serv. Sulpicius the younger. Murena was defended by Q. Hortensius, M. Tullius Cicero, who was then consul, and M. Licinius Crassus. The speech of Cicero, which is extant, was delivered in the latter part of November. The orator handled his subject skilfully, by making merry with the formulae and the practice of the lawyers, to which class Sulpicius belonged, and with the paradoxes of the Stoics, to which sect Cato had attached himself. Murena was acquitted, and was consul in the following year, 62. — 4. A. Terentius Varro Murena, probably the son of the preceding, was adopted by A. Terentius Varro, whose name he took, according to the custom in such cases. In the civil wars he is said to have lost his property, and C. Proculeius, a Roman eques, is said to have given him a share of his own property. This Proculeius is called the brother of Varro, but, if we take the words of Horace literally (Carm. ii. 2), Proculeius had more than one brother. It is conjectured that this Proculeius was a son of the brother of No. 3, who had been adopted by one Proculeius. This would make Proculeius the cousin of Varro. It was common enough among the Romans to call cousins by the name of brothers (frater patruelis and frater). In 25 Murena subdued the Salassi in the Alps, and founded the town of Augusta (Aosta) in their territory. He was consul suffectus in 23. In 22 he was involved in the conspiracy of Fannius Caepio, and was condemned to death and executed, notwithstanding the intercession of Proculeius and Terentia, the sister of Murena. Horace (Carm. ii. 10) addresses Murena by the name of Licinius, and probably intended to give him some advice as to being more cautious in his speech and conduct.

Murgantĭa. 1. See MORGANTIUM. — 2. A town in Samnium of uncertain site.

Murgis, a town in Hispania Baetica, on the frontiers of Tarraconensis, and on the road from Acci to Malaga.

Muridūnum or Moridūnum (Dorchester), called Dunium by Ptolemy, the capital of the Durotriges in the S. of Britain. At Dorchester there are remains of the walls and the amphitheatre of the ancient town.

Mursa or Mursĭa (Esseck, capital of Slavonia), an important town in Pannonia Inferior, situated on the Dravus, not far from its junction with the Danube, was a Roman colony founded by the emperor Hadrian, and was the residence of the governor of Lower Pannonia. Here Magnentius was defeated by Constantius II., A.D. 351.

Mursella, or Mursa Minor, a town in Pannonia Inferior, only 10 miles W. of the great Mursa.

Mus, Dĕcius. [DECIUS.]

Mūsa, Antōnĭus, a celebrated physician at Rome about the beginning of the Christian era. He was brother to Euphorbus, the physician to king Juba, and was himself the physician to the emperor Augustus. He had been originally a slave. When the emperor was seriously ill, and had been made worse by a hot regimen and treatment, B. C. 23, Antonius Musa succeeded in restoring him to health by means of cold bathing and cooling drinks, for which service he received from Augustus and the senate a large sum of money and the permission to wear a gold ring, and also had a statue erected in his honour near that of Aesculapius by public subscription. He seems to have been attached to this mode of treatment, to which Horace alludes (Epist. i. 15. 3), but failed when he applied it to the case of M. Marcellus, who died under his care a few months after the recovery of Augustus, 23. He wrote several pharmaceutical works, which are frequently quoted by Galen, but of which nothing except a few fragments remain. There are, however, 2 short Latin medical works ascribed to Antonius Musa, but these are universally considered to be spurious.

Mūsa or Mūza (Μοῦσα, Μοῦζα: prob. Moushid, N. of Mokha), a celebrated port of Arabia Felix, on the W. coast, near its S. extremity, or in other words on the E. shore of the Red Sea, near the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb.

Mūsae (Μοῦσαι), the Muses, were, according to the earliest writers, the inspiring goddesses of song, and, according to later notions, divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the arts and sciences. They were originally regarded as the nymphs of inspiring wells, near which they were worshipped, and they bore different names in different places, until the Thraco-Boeotian worship of the nine Muses spread from Boeotia over other parts of Greece, and ultimately became generally established. — 1. Genealogy of the Muses. The most common notion was that they were the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and born in Pieria, at the foot of Mt. Olympus. Some call them the daughters of Uranus and Gaea, and others daughters of Pierus and Antiope, or of Apollo, or of Zeus and Plusia, or of Zeus and Moneta, probably a mere translation of Mnemosyne or Mneme, whence they are called Mnemonides, or of Zeus and Minerva, or, lastly, of Aether and Gaea. — 2. Number of the Muses. Originally there were 3 Muses worshipped on Mt. Helicon in Boeotia, namely, Melete (meditation), Mneme (memory), and Aoide (song). Three Muses also were recognised at Sicyon and at Delphi. As daughters of Zeus and Plusia we find mention of 4 Muses, viz. Thelxinoe (the heart delighting), Aoide (song), Arche (beginning), and Melete. Some accounts, in which they are called daughters of Pierus, mention 7 Muses, viz. Nilo, Tritone, Asopo, Heptapora, Achelois, Tipoplo, and Rhodia; and others, lastly, mention 8, which is also said to have been the number recognised at Athens. At length, however, the number 9 became established throughout all Greece. Homer sometimes mentions Musa only in the singular, and sometimes Musae in the plural, and once only he speaks of 9 Muses, though without mentioning any of their names. Hesiod is the first who states the names of all the 9, and these 9 names became the usual ones. They are Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia or Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope. — 3. Nature and character of the Muses. In Homer's poems, they are the goddesses of song and poetry, and live in Olympus. There they sing the festive songs at the repasts of the immortals. They bring before the mind of the mortal poet the events which he has to relate, and confer upon him the gift of song. The earliest poets in their invocation of the Muse or Muses were perfectly sincere, and actually believed in their being inspired by the goddesses; but in later times the invocation of the Muses was a mere formal imitation of the early poets. Thamyris, who presumed to excel the Muses, was deprived by them of the gift they had bestowed on him, and punished with blindness. The Sirens, who likewise ventured upon a contest with them, were deprived of the feathers of their wings, and the Muses put them on their own persons as ornaments. The 9 daughters of Pierus, who presumed to rival the Muses, were metamorphosed into birds. Since poets and bards derived their power from the Muses, they are frequently called either their disciples or sons. Thus Linus is called a son of Amphimarus and Urania, or of Apollo and Calliope, or Terpsichore; Hyacinthus a son of Pierus and Clio; Orpheus a son of Calliope or Clio, and Thamyris a son of Erato. These and a few others are the cases in which the Muses are described as mothers; but the more general idea was, that, like other nymphs, they were virgin divinities. Being goddesses of song, they were naturally connected with Apollo, the god of the lyre, who like them instructs the bards, and is mentioned along with them even by Homer. In later times Apollo is placed in very close connection with the Muses, for he is described as the leader of the choir of the Muses by the surname Musagetes (Μουσαγέτης). A further feature in the character of the Muses is their prophetic power, which belongs to them, partly because they were regarded as inspiring nymphs, and partly because of their connection with the prophetic god of Delphi. Hence, they instructed, for example, Aristaeus in the art of prophecy. As the Muses loved to dwell on Mt. Helicon, they were naturally associated with Dionysus and dramatic poetry, and hence they are described as the companions, playmates, or nurses of Dionysus. The worship of the Muses points originally to Thrace and Pieria about Mt. Olympus, whence it was introduced into Boeotia; and the names of mountains, grottoes, and wells, connected with their worship in the N., were likewise transferred to the S. Near Mt. Helicon, Ephialtes and Otus are said to have offered the first sacrifices to them. In the same place there was a sanctuary with their statues, the sacred wells Aganippe and Hippocrene, and on Mt. Libethrion, which is connected with Helicon, there was a sacred grotto of the Muses. Pierus, a Macedonian, is said to have been the first who introduced the worship of the nine Muses, from Thrace to Thespiae, at the foot of Mt. Helicon. There they had a temple and statues, and the Thespians celebrated a solemn festival of the Muses on Mt. Helicon, called Musea. Mt. Parnassus was likewise sacred to them, with the Castalian spring, near which they had a temple. The sacrifices offered to the Muses consisted of libations of water or milk, and of honey. The various surnames by which they are designated by the poets are for the most part derived from the places which were sacred to them or in which they were worshipped, while some are descriptive of the sweetness of their songs. — 4. Representations of the Muses in works of art. In the most ancient works of art we find only 3 Muses, and their attributes are musical instruments, such as the flute, the lyre, or the barbiton. Later artists gave to each of the 9 sisters different attributes as well as different attitudes. 1. Calliŏpe, the Muse of epic poetry, appears with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper; 2. Clio, the Muse of history, appears in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books; 3. Euterpe, the Muse of lyric poetry, with a flute; 4. Melpomĕne, the Muse of tragedy, with a tragic mask, the club of Hercules, or a sword, her head is surrounded with vine leaves, and she wears the cothurnus; 5. Terpsichŏre, the Muse of choral dance and song, appears with the lyre and the plectrum; 6. Ĕrăto, the Muse of erotic poetry and mimic imitation, sometimes also has the lyre; 7. Polymnĭa, or Polyhymnĭa, the Muse of the sublime hymn, usually appears without any attribute, in a pensive or meditating attitude; 8. Uranĭa, the Muse of astronomy, with a staff pointing to a globe; 9. Thalīa, the Muse of comedy and of merry or idyllic poetry, appears with a comic mask, a shepherd's staff, or a wreath of ivy. Sometimes the Muses are seen with feathers on their heads, alluding to their contest with the Sirens.

Mūsaeus (Μουσαῖος). 1. A semi-mythological personage, to be classed with Olen, Orpheus, and Pamphus. He was regarded as the author of various poetical compositions, especially as connected with the mystic rites of Demeter at Eleusis, over which the legend represented him as presiding in the time of Hercules. He was reputed to belong to the family of the Eumolpidae, being the son of Eumolpus and Selene. In other variations of the myth he was less definitely called a Thracian. According to other legends he was the son of Orpheus, of whom he was generally considered as the imitator and disciple. Some accounts gave him a wife Deioce and a son Eumolpus. There was a tradition that the Museum in Piraeus bore that name from having been the place where Musaeus was buried. Among the numerous compositions attributed to him by the ancients the most celebrated were his Oracles. Onomacritus, in the time of the Pisistratidae, made it his business to collect and arrange the oracles that passed under the name of Musaeus, and was banished by Hipparchus for interpolating in the collection oracles of his own making. — 2. A grammarian, the author of the celebrated poem on the loves of Hero and Leander. Nothing is known of the personal history of the writer; but it is certain that the poem is a late production. Some critics suppose that the author did not live earlier than the 5th century of our era. Edited by Passow, Lips. 1810; and by Schaefer, Lips. 1825.

Mūsagētes. [Musae.]

C. Mūsōnius Rufus, a celebrated Stoic philosopher, was the son of a Roman eques, and was banished by Nero to the island of Gyaros, in A. D. 66, under the pretext of his having been privy to the conspiracy of Piso. He returned from exile on the accession of Galba, and seems to have been held in high estimation by Vespasian, as he was allowed to remain at Rome when the other philosophers were banished from the city. Musonius wrote various philosophical works, all of which have perished.

Musti (Μούστη), a town in the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), near the river Bagradas, on the road from Carthage to Sicca Veneria. Here Regulus killed an enormous serpent.

Muthul, a river of Numidia, the boundary between the kingdoms of Jugurtha and Adherbal. It is probably the same as the Rubricatus.

Mutĭlus, C. Papĭus, one of the principal Samnite generals in the Marsic war, B. C. 90—89.

Mutĭna (Mutinensis: Modena), an important town in Gallia Cispadana, on the high road from Mediolanum to the S. of Italy, was originally a Celtic town, and was the first place which the Romans took away from the Boii. It is mentioned at the beginning of the 2nd Punic war (B. C. 218) under the name of Motina, as a fortified place inhabited by the Romans; but it was not till 183 that it was made a Roman colony. Mutina is celebrated in the history of the civil war after Caesar's death. Decimus Brutus was besieged here by M. Antonius from December, 44, to April, 43; and under its walls the battles were fought, in which the consuls Hirtius and Pansa perished. Hence this war was called the Bellum Mutinense. The best wool in all Italy came from the neighbourhood of Mutina.

Mutunus or Mutinus, was among the Romans the same as the phallus, or Priapus, among the Greeks, and was believed to be the most powerful averter of demons, and of all evil that resulted from pride, boastfulness, and the like.

Mўcăle (Μυκάλη: Samsun), a mountain in the S. of Ionia in Asia Minor, N. of the mouth of the Maeander. It forms the W. extremity of M. Messogis, and runs far out into the sea, opposite to Samos, forming a sharp promontory, which was called Mycale or Trogilium (Τρωγίλιον, Τρωγύλιον: C. S. Maria). This cape and the S. E. promontory of Samos (Posidonium) overlap one another, and the 2 tongues of land are separated by a strait only 7 stadia (little more than 3-4ths of a mile) in width, which is renowned in Greek history as the scene of the victory gained over the Persian fleet by Leotychides and Xanthippus, B. C. 479. There seems to have been a city of the same name on or near the promontory. On the N. side of the promontory, near Priene, was the great temple of Poseidon, which was the place of meeting for the Panionic festival and Amphictyony.

Mycalessus (Μυκαλησσός: Μυκαλήσσιος), an ancient and important city in Boeotia, mentioned by Homer, was situated on the road from Aulis to Thebes. In B. C. 413 some Thracian mercenaries in the pay of Athens surprised and sacked the town, and butchered the inhabitants. From this blow it never recovered, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It possessed a celebrated temple of Demeter, who was hence surnamed Mycalessia.

Mycēnae sometimes Mycēne (Μυκῆναι, Μυκήνη: Μυκηναῖος: Karvata), an ancient town in Argolis, about 6 miles N. E. of Argos, is situated on a hill at the head of a narrow valley, and is hence described by Homer as "in a recess (μυχῷ) of the Argive land": hence the etymology of the name. Mycenae is said to have been founded by Perseus, and was subsequently the favourite residence of the Pelopidae. During the reign of Agamemnon it was regarded as the first city in all Greece; but after the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, it ceased to be a place of importance. It still, however, continued an independent town till B. C. 468, when it was attacked by the Argives, whose hatred the Mycenaeans are said to have incurred by the part they took in the Persian war in favour of the Greek cause. The massive walls of Mycenae resisted all the attacks of the Argives; but the inhabitants were at length compelled by famine to abandon their town. They effected their escape without a surrender, and took refuge, some at Cleonae, some in Achaia, and others in Macedonia. Mycenae was now destroyed by the Argives and was never rebuilt; but there are still numerous remains of the ancient city, which on account of their antiquity and grandeur are some of the most interesting in all Greece. Of these the most remarkable are the subterranean vault, commonly called the "Treasury of Athens," but which was more probably a sepulchre, and the Gate of Lions, so called from 2 lions sculptured over the gate.

Mycēnē (Μυκήνη), daughter of Inachus and wife of Arestor, from whom the town of Mycenae was believed to have derived its name: the true etymology of the name is given above.

Mycerīnus, or Mecherīnus (Μυκερῖνος, Μεχερῖνος), son of Cheops, king of Egypt, succeeded his uncle Chephren on the throne. His conduct formed a strong contrast to that of his father and uncle, being as mild and just as theirs had been tyrannical. On the death of his daughter, he placed her corpse within the hollow body of a wooden cow, which was covered with gold. Herodotus tells us that it was still to be seen at Saïs in his time. We further hear of Mycerinus that, being warned by an oracle that he should die at the end of 6 years, because he had been a gentle ruler and had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to revelry, and strove to double his allotted time by turning night into day. He began to build a pyramid, but died before it was finished. It was smaller than those of Cheops and Chephren, and, according to Herodotus, was wrongly ascribed by some to the Greek hetaera Rhodopis.

Myconus (Μύκονος: Μυκόνιος: Mycono), a small island in the Aegaean sea, one of the Cyclades, S.E. of Tenos and E. of Delos, never attained any importance in history, but is celebrated in mythology as one of the places where the giants were defeated by Hercules. The island was poor and unproductive, and its inhabitants were rapacious. It contained 2 towns, a promontory, called Phorbia, and a mountain named Dimastus. The large number of bald persons in this island was considered worthy of record by several ancient writers.

Mygdon (Μύγδων), son of Acmon, a Phrygian king, who fought with Otreus and Priam against the Amazons, and from whom some of the Phrygians are said to have been called Mygdonians. He had a son Coroebus, who is hence called Mygdonides.

Mygdonia (Μυγδονία: Μύγδονες). 1. A district in the E. of Macedonia, bordering on the Thermaic Gulf and the Chalcidic peninsula. Its people were of Thracian origin. — 2. A district in the N. of Asia Minor, between M. Olympus and the coast, in the E. of Mysia and the W. of Bithynia, named after the Thracian people, Mygdones, who formed a settlement here, but were afterwards subdued by the Bithyni. — 3. The N.E. district of Mesopotamia, between M. Masius and the Chaboras, which divided it from Osroëne. From its great fertility, it was also called Anthemusia (Ἀνθεμουσία). The name of Mygdonia was first introduced after the Macedonian conquests: in the passage of Xenophon (Anab. iv. 3), sometimes cited to prove the contrary, the true reading is Μαρδόνιοι, not Μυγδόνιοι.

Myia (Μυῖα), daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, and wife of Milon of Crotona. A letter, addressed to a certain Phyllis, is extant under her name.

Mylae (Μυλαί: Μυλαῖος, Μυλαΐτης). 1. (Melazzo), a town on the E. part of the N. coast of Sicily, situated on a promontory running out far into the sea, with a harbour and a citadel. It was founded by Zancle (Messana), and continued subject to the latter city. It was off Mylae that Agrippa defeated the fleet of Sex. Pompeius, B. C. 36. — 2. A town of Thessaly in Magnesia, of uncertain site.

Mylasa or Mylassa (τὰ Μύλασα, Μύλασσα: Μυλασεύς: Melasso, Ru.), a very ancient and flourishing inland city of Caria, lay 80 stadia (8 geog. miles) from the coast at the Gulf of Iassus, in a fertile plain, on and at the foot of an isolated rock of beautiful white marble, which furnished the material for the splendid temples and other public buildings of the city. The most important of these buildings was the great national temple of Zeus Carius or Osagon. [CARIA.] Mylasa was the birthplace and capital of HECATOMNUS. Under the Romans it was made a free city. In the civil wars, it was taken and partly destroyed by Labienus. Its remains are very extensive, and the ruins of the temple of Zeus are supposed to have been found on the rock which formed the Acropolis of the ancient city.

Myndus (Μύνδος: Μύνδιος: prob. Port Gumishlu, Ru.), a Dorian colony on the coast of Caria, in Asia Minor, founded by settlers from Troezene, probably on the site of an old town of the Leleges, which continued to exist under the name of Palaemyndus. Myndus stood at the W. extremity of the same peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. It was not one of the cities of the Dorian Hexapolis, but never became a place of much importance.

Myon or Myonia (Μύων, Μυονία: Μυονεύς), a town of the Locri Ozolae, situated on a considerable height 30 stadia from Amphissa, and in one of the passes which led from Aetolia into Phocis.

Myonnesus (Μυόννησος: C. Hypsili) a promontory of Ionia, with a town and a little island of the same name, S. of Teos and W. of Lebedus, and forming the N. headland of the Gulf of Ephesus. Here the Romans, under the praetor L. Aemilius, gained a great naval victory over Antiochus the Great, B. C. 190.

Myos Hormos (ὁ Μυὸς ὅρμος, i. e. Muscle-port, rather than Mouse-port, for μῦς is the Greek for muscle, and this shell-fish is very common on the W. coast of the Red Sea), aft. Veneris Portus (Ἀφροδίτης ὅρμος), an important sea-port town of Upper Egypt, built by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus on a promontory of the same name, 6 or 7 days' journey from Coptos. Some of the best modern geographers identify the port with Kosseir (lat. 26° 10′), which is still an important port of the Red Sea, and the place of embarkation for the caravan to Mecca. Kosseir lies due E. of Coptos, and is connected with it by a valley, which contains traces of an ancient road, and which still forms the route of the Mecca caravan. At the village of Abu-Shaar, near Cosseir, are extensive ruins, which are supposed to be the remains of the town of Myos Hormos. Others, however, place it a degree further N., in lat. 26° 10, opposite the Jaffatine islands.

Myra or Myron (τὰ and ἡ Μύρα, ἡ Μύρων: Μυρεύς: Myra, Grk., Dembre, Turk., Ru.), one of the chief cities of Lycia, and, under the later Roman empire, the capital of the province, was built on a rock 20 stadia (2 geog. miles) from the sea, and had a port called Andriaca (Ἀνδριακή). St. Paul touched here on his voyage as a prisoner to Rome, and the passage where this is mentioned (Acts, xxvii. 5, 6), affords incidental proof that the place was then an important sea-port. There are still magnificent ruins of the city, in great part hewn out of the rock.

Myriandrus (Μυρίανδρος), a Phoenician colony in Syria, on the E. side of the Gulf of Issus, a day's journey from the Cilician Gates. It probably stood a little S. of Alexandria, at a spot where there are ruins. Herodotus calls the Gulf of Issus ὁ Μαριανδικός κόλπος, a name evidently derived from this place, with a slight variation of form.

Myricus (Μυρικοῦς), a city on the coast of Troas, opposite to Tenedos.

Myrina (ἡ Μυρίνα, or Μύρινα, Μύριννα, Μυρίνη: Μυριναῖος). 1. (Sandarlik?), a very ancient and strongly fortified city on the W. coast of Mysia, founded, according to mythical tradition, by Myrinus or by the Amazon Myrina, and colonized by the Aeolians, of whose confederacy it formed a member. It was also called Smyrna, and, under the Roman empire, Sebastopolis: it was made by the Romans a civitas libera. It was destroyed by earthquakes under Tiberius and Trajan, but each time rebuilt. It was the birthplace of the epigrammatic poet Agathias. — 2. [See Lemnos.]

Myrlēa (Μύρλεια: Μυρλεανός: Amapoli, Ru., a little distance inland from Mudanieh), a city of Bithynia, not far from Prusa, founded by the Colophonians, and almost rebuilt by Prusias I., who called it Apamea after his wife. The Romans colonized it under Julius Caesar and Augustus.

Myrmēcĭdes (Μυρμηκίδης), a sculptor and engraver, of Miletus or Athens, is generally mentioned in connection with Callicrates, like whom he was celebrated for the minuteness of his works. [Callicrates.] His works in ivory were so small that they could scarcely be seen without placing them on black hair.

Myrmēcĭum (Μυρμήκιον), a Scythian or Cimmerian town of the Chersonesus Taurica, situated on a promontory of the same name at the narrowest part of the Bosporus, opposite the Achilleum in Asia.

Myrmĭdon (Μυρμιδών), son of Zeus and Eurymedusa, daughter of Clitos, whom Zeus deceived in the disguise of an ant. Her son was for this reason called Myrmidon (from μύρμηξ, an ant), and was regarded as the ancestor of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was married to Pisidice, by whom he became the father of Antiphus and Actor.

Myrmĭdŏnes (Μυρμιδόνες), an Achaean race in Phthiotis in Thessaly, whom Achilles ruled over and who accompanied this hero to Troy. They are said to have inhabited originally the island of Aegina, and to have emigrated with Peleus into Thessaly; but modern critics on the contrary suppose that a colony of them emigrated from Thessaly into Aegina. The Myrmidones disappear from history at a later period. The ancients derived their name either from a mythical ancestor Myrmidon, or from the ants (μύρμηκες) in Aegina, which were supposed to have been metamorphosed into men in the time of Aeacus. [Aeacus.]

Mȳrōn (Μύρων). 1. Tyrant of Sicyon, the father of Aristonymus, and grandfather of Clisthenes. He gained the victory at Olympia in the chariot-race in B. C. 648. — 2. One of the most celebrated of the Greek statuaries, and also a sculptor and engraver, was born at Eleutherae, in Boeotia, about 480. He is also called an Athenian, because Eleutherae had been admitted to the Athenian franchise. He was the disciple of Ageladas, the fellow-disciple of Polycletus, and a younger contemporary of Phidias. He flourished about 431, the time of the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. The chief characteristic of Myron seems to have been his power of expressing a great variety of forms. Not content with the human figure in its most difficult and momentary attitudes, he directed his art towards various other animals, and he seems to have been the first great artist who did so. His great works were nearly all in bronze. The most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. Of his Discobolus there are several marble copies in existence. It is true that we cannot prove by testimony that any of these alleged copies were really taken from Myron's work, or from imitations of it; but the resemblance between them, the fame of the original, and the well-known frequency of the practice of making such marble copies of celebrated bronzes, all concur to put the question beyond reasonable doubt. Of these copies we possess one in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum, which was found in the grounds of Hadrian's Tiburtine Villa, in 1791. The Cow of Myron appears to have been a perfect work of its kind. It was celebrated in many popular verses, and the Greek Anthology still contains no less than 36 epigrams upon it. The Cow was represented as lowing, and the statue was placed on a marble base, in the centre of the largest open place in Athens, where it still stood in the time of Cicero. In the time of Pausanias it was no longer there; it must have been removed to Rome, where it was still to be seen in the temple of Peace, in the time of Procopius. — 3. Of Priene, the author of an historical account of the first Messenian war, probably lived not earlier than the 3rd century B. C.

Myrōnĭdes (Μυρωνίδης), a skilful and successful Athenian general. In B. C. 457, he defeated the Corinthians, who had invaded Megara; and in 456 he defeated the Boeotians at Oenophyta.

Myrrha (Μύῤῥα) or Smyrna, daughter of Cinyras and mother of Adonis. For details see Adonis.

Myrrhinūs (Μυῤῥινοῦς: Μυῤῥινούσιος), a demus on the E. coast of Attica, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, a little S. of the promontory Cynosura. It is said to have been built by a hero Colaenus, and it contained a temple of Artemis Colaenis.

Myrsĭlus (Μύρσιλος). 1. [Candaules.] — 2. A Greek historical writer of uncertain date, a native of Lesbos, from whom Dionysius of Halicarnassus borrowed a part of his account of the Pelasgians.

Myrsĭnus. [Myrtuntium.]

Myrtĭlis, a town of the Turdetani on the Anas in Lusitania, possessing the Jus Latii.

Myrtĭlus (Μυρτίλος), son of Hermes by Cleobule, Clytia, Phaetusa or Myrto. He was the charioteer of Oenomaus king of Elis, whom he betrayed, when Pelops contended with his master in the chariot-race. He was afterwards thrown into the sea by Pelops near Geraestus in Euboea; and that part of the Aegean is said to have thenceforth been called after him the Myrtoan sea. [Oenomaus; Pelops.] At the moment he expired, he pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops, which was henceforward tormented by the Erinnyes.. His father placed him among the stars as auriga.

Myrtis (Μύρτις), a lyric poetess, a native of Anthedon, in Boeotia. She was reported to have been the instructress of Pindar, and to have contended with him for the palm of superiority. This is alluded to in an extant fragment of Corinna. There were statues in honour of her in various parts of Greece.

Myrtōum Mare (τὸ Μυρτῷον πέλαγος), the part of the Aegaean sea, S. of Euboea, Attica and Argolis, which derived its name from the small island Myrtus, though others suppose it to come from Myrtilus, whom Pelops threw into this sea, or from the maiden Myrto.

Myrtuntĭum (Μυρτούντιον: Μυρτούσιος), called Myrsĭnus (Μύρσινος) in Homer, a town of the Epeans in Elis, on the road from Elis to Dyme.

Myrtus. [Myrtoum Mare.]

Mȳs (Μῦς), an artist in the toreutic department, engraved the battle of the Lapithae and the Centaurs and other figures on the shield of Phidias's colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachos, in the Acropolis of Athens. He is mentioned as one of the most distinguished engravers by several ancient writers.

Myscĕlus (Μύσκελος, or Μύσκελλος), a native of Achaia, and, according to Ovid (Metam. xv. 1), an Heraclid, and the son of an Argive named Alemon. He founded Croton in Italy, B.C. 710, in accordance with the Delphic oracle. The oracle had commanded him to build a city, where he should find rain with fine weather. For a long time he thought it impossible to fulfil the command of the oracle, till at length he found in Italy a beautiful woman in tears; whereupon he perceived that the oracle was accomplished, and straightway founded Croton on the spot.

Mȳsi (Μυσοί), one of the Thracian peoples, who seem to have crossed over from Europe into Asia Minor before recorded history begins. They appear to be the same people as the Moesi (in Greek also Μυσοί), on the banks of the Danube. [MOESIA.] They stand in close connection with the Teucri. These 2 peoples appear to have moved from the banks of the Strymon to the S.E. of Thrace, forcing the Bithyni over the Thracian Bosporus into Asia, and then to have crossed over into Asia themselves, by way of the Thracian Bosporus, and to have settled on the S.E. shore of the Propontis, as far W. as the river Rhyndacus (the rest of the Asiatic coast of the Propontis and the Hellespont being occupied by Phrygians), and also in the E. and S. parts of the district afterwards called MYSIA, in the mountains called Olympus and Temnus, and on the S. side of Ida. The Teucrians obtained a permanent footing also on the N. side of Ida, in the Troad. Being afterwards driven W.-ward over the Rhyndacus by the Bithynians, and hemmed in on the W. and N. by the Aeolian colonies, the Mysians may be regarded as about shut up within the ranges of Ida and Olympus on the N. and N.E. and Temnus on the S. They were a simple pastoral people, low in the scale of civilization. Their language and religion bore a strong resemblance to those of their neighbours, the Phrygians and Lydians, who were of the same Thracian origin as themselves; and hence arose the error, which is found in Herodotus, of deriving them directly from the Lydians.

Mȳsĭa (ἡ Μυσία, poet. Μυσὶς αἶα: Μυσός, Mysus and Mysius: Chan Karasi, the N.W. district of Anadoli), a district of Asia Minor, called also the Asiatic Mysia (Μυσία ἡ Ἀσιανή), in contradistinction to Moesia on the banks of the Danube. Originally it meant of course the territory of the Mysi, but in the usual division of Asia Minor, as settled under Augustus, it occupied the whole of the N.W. corner of the peninsula, between the Hellespont on the N.W.; the Propontis on the N.; the river Rhyndacus and M. Olympus on the E., which divided it from Bithynia and Phrygia; M. Temnus, and an imaginary line drawn from Temnus to the S. side of the Elaïtic Gulf, on the S., where it bordered upon Lydia; and the Aegean Sea on the W. It was subdivided into 5 parts: (1.) Mysia Minor (M. ἡ μικρά), along the N. coast. (2.) Mysia Major (M. ἡ μεγάλη), the S.E. inland region, with a small portion of the coast between the Troad and the Aeolic settlements about the Elaïtic Gulf. (3.) Troas (ἡ Τρωάς), the N.W. angle, between the Aegean and Hellespont and the S. coast along the foot of Ida. (4.) Aeolis or Aeolia (ἡ Αἰολίς or Αἰολία), the S. part of the W. coast, around the Elaïtic Gulf, where the chief cities of the Aeolian confederacy were planted; but applied in a wider sense to the W. coast in general; and (5.) Teuthrania (ἡ Τευθρανία), the S.W. angle, between Temnus and the borders of Lydia, where, in very early times, Teuthras was said to have established a Mysian kingdom, which was early subdued by the kings of Lydia; this part was also called Pergamene, from the celebrated city of PERGAMUS, which stood in it. This account applies to the time of the early Roman empire; the extent of Mysia, and its subdivisions, varied greatly at other times. In the heroic ages we find the great Teucrian monarchy of Troy in the N.W. of the country, and the Phrygians along the Hellespont: as to the Mysians, who appear as allies of the Trojans, it is not clear whether they are Europeans or Asiatics. The Mysia of the legends respecting Telephus is the Teuthranian kingdom in the S., only with a wider extent than the later Teuthrania. Under the Persian empire, the N.W. portion, which was still occupied in part by Phrygians, but chiefly by Aeolian settlements, was called Phrygia Minor, and by the Greeks HELLESPONTUS. Mysia was the region S. of the chain of Ida; and both formed, with Lydia, the second satrapy. In the division of the empire of Alexander the Great, Mysia fell, with Thrace, to the share of Lysimachus, B.C. 311, after whose defeat and death, in 281, it became a part of the Greco-Syrian kingdom, with the exception of the S.W. portion, where Philetaerus founded the kingdom of PERGAMUS (280), to which kingdom the whole of Mysia was assigned, together with Lydia, Phrygia, Caria, Lycia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia, after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans in 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamus, Mysia fell to the Romans in 133, by the bequest of Attalus III., and formed part of the province of Asia. Under the later empire, Mysia formed a separate proconsular province, under the name of Hellespontus. The country was for the most part mountainous; its chief chains being those of IDA, OLYMPUS, and TEMNUS, which are terminal branches of the N.W. part of the Taurus chain, and the union of which forms the elevated land of S.E. Mysia. Their prolongations into the sea form several important bays and capes; namely, among the former, the great gulf of Adramyttium (Adramytti), which cuts off Lesbos from the continent, and the Sinus Elaïticus (G. of Chandeli); and, among the latter, Sigeum (C. Yenicheri) and Lectum (C. Baba), at the N.W. and S.W. extremities of the Troad, and Cane (C. Coloni) and Hydria (Fokia), the N. and S. headlands of the Elaïtic Gulf. Its rivers are numerous; some of them considerable, in proportion to the size of the country; and some of first-rate importance in history and poetry: the chief of them, beginning on the E., were RHYNDACUS and MACESTUS, TARSIUS, AESEPUS, GRANICUS, RHODIUS, SIMOIS and SCAMANDER, SATNOÏS, EVENUS, and CAÏCUS. The peoples of the country, besides the general appellations mentioned above, were known by the following distinctive names: the Olympiēni or Olympēni (Ὀλυμπιηνοί, Ὀλυμπηνοί), in the district of Olympēne at the foot of M. Olympus; next to them, on the S. and W., and occupying the greater part of Mysia Proper, the Abrettēni, who had a native divinity called by the Greeks Ζεὺς Ἀβρεττηνός ; the Trimenthurītae, the Pentademītae, and the Mysomacedŏnes, all in the region of M. Temnus.

Mȳsĭus (Bergama), a tributary of the river Caïcus in Mysia, or rather the upper part of the Caïcus itself, had its source in M. Temnus.

Myson (Μύσων), of Chenae, a village either in Laconia or on Mt. Oeta, is enumerated by Plato as one of the 7 sages, in place of Periander.

Mystĭa, a town in the S.E. of Bruttium, a little above the Prom. Cocintum.

Mўtĭlēnē or Mĭtȳlēnē (Μυτιλήνη, Μιτυλήνη: the former is the ancient form, and the one usually found on coins and inscriptions; the latter is sometimes found on inscriptions, and is the commoner form in MSS.: Μυτιληναῖος, Mitylenaeus: Mytilene or Metelin), the chief city of Lesbos, stood on the E. side of the island opposite the coast of Asia, upon a promontory which was once an island, and both sides of which formed excellent harbours. Its first foundation is ascribed to Carians and Pelasgians. It was early colonized by the Aeolians. [Lesbos.] Important hints respecting its political history are furnished by the fragments of the poetry of Alcaeus, whence (and from other sources) it seems that, after the rule and overthrow of a series of tyrants, the city was nearly ruined by the bitter hatred and conflicts of the factions of the nobles and the people, till Pittacus was appointed to a sort of dictatorship, and the nobles were expelled. [Alcaeus; Pittacus.] Meanwhile, the city had grown to great importance as a naval power, and had founded colonies on the coasts of Mysia and Thrace. At the beginning of the 7th century B. C., the possession of one of these colonies, Sigeum at the mouth of the Hellespont, was disputed in war between the Mytilenaeans and Athenians, and assigned to the latter by the award of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. Among the other colonies of Mytilene were Achilleum, Assos, Antandrus, &c. Mytilene submitted to the Persians after the conquest of Ionia and Aeolis, and furnished contingents to the expeditions of Cambyses against Egypt and of Darius against Scythia. It was active in the Ionian revolt, after the failure of which it again became subject to Persia, and took part in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. After the Persian war, it formed an alliance with Athens, and remained one of the most important members of the Athenian confederacy, retaining its independence till the 4th year of the Peloponnesian War, B. C. 428, when it headed a revolt of the greater part of Lesbos, the progress and suppression of which forms one of the most interesting episodes in the history of the Peloponnesian War. (See the Histories of Greece.) This event destroyed the power of Mytilene. Its subsequent fortunes cannot be related in detail here. It fell under the power of the Romans after the Mithridatic War. Respecting its important position in Greek literary history, see Lesbos.

Myttistratum. [Amestratus.]

Myus (Μυοῦς: Μυούσιος: Palatia, Ru.), the least city of the Ionian confederacy, stood in Caria, on the S. side of the Maeander, 30 stadia from its mouth, and very near Miletus. Its original site was probably at the mouth of the river; but its site gradually became an unhealthy marsh; and by the time of Augustus it was so deserted by its inhabitants that the few who remained were reckoned as citizens of Miletus.

N.

Naarda (Ναάρδα), a town of Babylonia, chiefly inhabited by Jews, and with a Jewish academy.

Naarmalcha or Nahrmalcha (Νααρμάλχας, Ναρμάλχας, i. e. the King's Canal: ὁ βασίλειος ποταμός, ἡ βασιλικὴ διώρυξ, flumen regium: Nahr-al-Malk or Ne Gruel Melek), the greatest of the canals connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris, was situated near the N. limit of Babylonia, a little S. of the Median Wall, in lat. 33° 5′ about. Its formation was ascribed to a governor named Gobares. It was repaired upon the building of Seleucia at its junction with the Tigris by Seleucus Nicator, and again under the Roman emperors, Trajan, Severus, and Julian.

Nabalĭa. [Navalia.]

Nabarzānes (Ναβαρζάνης), a Persian, conspired along with Bessus, against Darius, the last king of Persia. He was pardoned by Alexander.

Năbătaei, Năbăthae (Ναβαταῖοι, Ναβάται: O. T. Nebaioth), an Arabian people, descended from the eldest son of Ishmaël, had their original abodes in the N.W. part of the Arabian peninsula, E. and S.E. of the Moabites and Edomites, who dwelt on the E. of the Dead Sea and in the mountains reaching from it to the Persian Gulf. In the changes effected among the peoples of these regions by the Babylonian conquest of Judaea, the Nabathaeans extended W. into the Sinaïtic peninsula and the territory of the Edomites, while the latter took possession of the S. of Judaea [Idumaei]; and hence the Nabathaeans of Greek and Roman history occupied nearly the whole of Arabia Petraea, along the N.E. coast of the Red Sea, on both sides of the Aelanitic Gulf, and in the Idumaean mountains (M. of Seir), where they had their celebrated rock-hewn capital, Petra. At first they were a roving pastoral people; but, as their position gave them the command of the trade between Arabia and the W., they prosecuted that trade with great energy, establishing regular caravans between Leuce Come, a port of the Red Sea, in the N.W. part of Arabia, and the port of Rhinocolura (El-Arish) on the Mediterranean, upon the frontiers of Palestine and Egypt. Sustained by this traffic a powerful monarchy grew up, which resisted all the attacks of the Greek kings of Syria, and which, sometimes at least, extended its power as far N. as Syria. Thus, in the reign of Caligula, even after the Nabathaeans had nominally submitted to Rome, we find even Damascus in possession of an ethnarch of "Aretas the king," i. e. of the Nabathaean Arabs: the usual names of these kings were Aretas and Obodas. Under Augustus the Nabathaeans are found, as nominal subjects of the Roman empire, assisting Aelius Gallus in his expedition into Arabia Felix, through which, and through the journey of Athenodorus to Petra, Strabo derived important information. Under Trajan the Nabathaeans were conquered by A. Cornelius Palma, and Arabia Petraea became a Roman province, A. D. 105—107. In the 4th century it was considered a part of Palestine, and formed the diocese of a metropolitan, whose see was at Petra. The Mohamedan conquest finally overthrew the power of the Nabathaeans, which had been long declining: their country soon became a haunt of the wandering Arabs of the Desert; and their very name disappeared.

Nabis (Νάβις), succeeded in making himself tyrant of Lacedaemon on the death of Machanidas, B.C. 207. He carried the licence of tyranny to the furthest possible extent. All persons possessed of property were subjected to incessant exactions, and the most cruel tortures if they did not succeed in satisfying his rapacity. One of his engines of torture resembled the maiden of more recent times; it was a figure resembling his wife Apega, so constructed as to clasp the victim and pierce him to death with the nails with which the arms and bosom of the figure were studded. The money which he got by these means and by the plunder of the temples enabled him to raise a large body of mercenaries, whom he selected from among the most abandoned and reckless villains. With these forces he was able to extend his sway over a considerable part of Peloponnesus; but his further progress was checked by Flaminius, who after a short campaign compelled him to sue for peace (195). The tyrant, however, was allowed to retain the sovereignty of Sparta, and soon after the departure of Flamininus from Greece, he resumed hostilities. He was opposed by Philopoemen, the general of the Achaean league; and though Nabis met at first with some success, he was eventually defeated by Philopoemen, and was soon afterwards assassinated by some Aetolians who had been sent to his assistance (192).

Nabonassar (Ναβονάσαρος), king of Babylon, whose accession to the throne was fixed upon by the Babylonian astronomers as the era from which they began their calculations. This era is called the Era of Nabonassar. It commenced on the 26th of February, B.C. 747.

Nabrissa or Nebrissa, surnamed Veneria, a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, near the mouth of the Baetis.

Nacolīa (Νακόλεια, or -ία, or Νακώλεια: Sidighasi), a town of Phrygia Epictetus, on the W. bank of the river Thymbrius, between Dorylaeum and Cotyaeum, was the place where the emperor Valens defeated his rival Procopius, A. D. 366.

Naenĭa, i. e. a dirge or lamentation, chaunted at funerals, was personified at Rome and worshipped as a goddess. She had a chapel outside the walls of the city, near the porta Viminalis.

Naevĭus, Cn., an ancient Roman poet, of whose life few particulars have been recorded. He was probably a native of Campania, and was born somewhere between B.C. 274 and 264. He appears to have come to Rome early, and he produced his first play in 235. He was attached to the plebeian party; and, with the licence of the old Attic comedy, he made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. He attacked Scipio and the Metelli; but he was indicted by Q. Metellus and thrown into prison, to which circumstance Plautus alludes in his Miles Gloriosus (ii. 2. 56). Whilst in prison he composed two plays, the Hariolus and Leon, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offence by exile. He retired to Utica; and it was here, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war; and here it is certain that he died, either in 204 or 202. Naevius was both an epic and a dramatic poet. Of his epic poem on the first Punic war a few fragments are still extant. It was written in the old Saturnian metre; for Ennius, who introduced the hexameter among the Romans, was not brought to Rome till after the banishment of Naevius. The poem appears to have opened with the story of Aeneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history both of Carthage and of Rome. It was extensively copied both by Ennius and Virgil. The latter author took many passages from it; particularly the description of the storm in the first Aeneïd, the speech with which Aeneas consoles his companions, and the address of Venus to Jupiter. His dramatic writings comprised both tragedies and comedies, most of which were taken from the Greek. Even in the Augustan age Naevius was still a favourite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry; and the lines of Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 53) show that his works, if not so much read as formerly, were still fresh in the memories of men. The best edition of the fragments of Naevius is by Klussman, 8vo. Jena, 1843.

Naevĭus Sertorĭus Macro. [MACRO.]

Naharvăli, a tribe of the Lygii in Germany, probably dwelt on the banks of the Vistula. In their country was a grove sacred to the worship of 2 divinities called Alces, whom Tacitus compares with Castor and Pollux.

Nahrmalcha [NAARMALCHA].

Nāïădes. [NYMPHAE.]

Nain (Ναΐν: Nain), a city of Galilee, S. of M. Tabor. (Luke, vii. 11.)

Naisus, Naissus, or Naesus (Ναϊσός, Ναϊσσός, Ναῖσσος: Nissa), an important town of Upper Moesia, situated on an E. tributary of the Margus, and celebrated as the birthplace of Constantine the Great. It was enlarged and beautified by Constantine, was destroyed by Attila, but was rebuilt and fortified by Justinian.

Namnētae or Namnētes, a people on the W. coast of Gallia Lugdunensis, on the N. bank of the Liger, which separated them from Aquitania. Their chief town was Condivincum, afterwards Namnetes (Nantes).

Namūsa, Aufidĭus, a Roman jurist, one of the numerous pupils of Serv. Sulpicius.

Nantuātae or Nantuātes, a people in the S.E. of Gallia Belgica between the Rhodanus and the Rhenus, and at the E. extremity of the Lacus Lemanus.

Napaeae. [NYMPHAE.]

Napăris, a northern tributary of the Danube: its modern name is uncertain.

Napăta (Νάπατα: prob. El-Kab, Ru., at the great bend of the Nile to the S.W., between the 4th and 5th cataracts), the capital of an Aethiopian kingdom N. of that of Meroë, was the S.-most point reached by Petronius, under Augustus. Its sovereigns were females, bearing the title of Candace; and through a minister of one of them Christianity was introduced into Aethiopia in the apostolic age (Acts viii. 27). This custom of female government has been continued to our own times in the neighbouring kingdom of Shendy. In the reign of Nero, Napata was only a small town.

Napŏca or Napŭca (Napocensis or Napucensis), a Roman colony in Dacia, on the high road leading through the country, between Patavissa and Optatiana.

Năr (Nera), a river in central Italy, rises in M. Fiscellus, on the frontiers of Umbria and Picenum, flows in a S.W.-ly direction, forming the boundary between Umbria and the land of the Sabini, and after receiving the Velinus (Velino) and Tolenus (Turano), and passing by Interamna and Narnia, falls into the Tiber, not far from Ocriculum. It was celebrated for its sulphureous waters and white colour (sulphurea Nar albus aqua, Virg. Aen. vii. 517).

Naraggăra (Ναράγαρα: Kassir Jebir, Ru.) one of the most important inland cities of Numidia, between Thagura and Sicca Venena, was the scene of Scipio's celebrated interview with Hannibal before the battle of Zama.

Narbo Martĭus, at a later time Narbona (Narbonensis: Narbonne), a town in the S. of Gaul and the capital of the Roman province of Gallia Narbonensis, was situated on the river Atax (Aude), also called Narbo, and at the head of the lake Rubresus or Rubrensis (also called Narbonitis), which was connected with the sea by a canal. By this means the town, which was 12 miles from the coast, was made a sea-port. It was a very ancient place, and is supposed to have been originally called Atax. It was made a Roman colony by the consul Q. Marcius or Martius, B. C. 118, and hence received the surname Martius; and it was the first colony founded by the Romans in Gaul. Julius Caesar also settled here the veterans of his 10th legion, whence it received the name of Colonia Decumanorum. It was a handsome and populous town; the residence of the Roman governor of the province; and a place of great commercial importance. The coast was celebrated for its excellent oysters. There are scarcely any vestiges of the ancient town; but there are still remains of the canal.

Narbonensis Gallĭa. [GALLIA.]

Narcissus (Νάρκισσος). 1. A beautiful youth, son of the river god Cephissus and the nymph Liriope of Thespiae. He was wholly inaccessible to the feeling of love; and the nymph Echo, who was enamoured of him, died of grief. [ECHO.] One of his rejected lovers, however, prayed to Nemesis to punish him for his unfeeling heart. Nemesis accordingly caused Narcissus to see his own image reflected in a fountain, and to become enamoured of it. But as he could not approach this object, he gradually pined away, and his corpse was metamorphosed into the flower which bears his name. — 2. A freedman and secretary of the emperor Claudius, over whom he possessed unbounded influence. He long connived at the irregularities of Messalina; but fearing that the empress meditated his death, he betrayed to Claudius her marriage with C. Silius, and obtained the order for her execution, A. D. 48. After the murder of Claudius, Narcissus was put to death by command of Agrippina, 54. He had amassed an enormous fortune, amounting, it is said, to 400,000,000 sesterces, equivalent to 3,125,000*l.* of our money. — 3. A celebrated athlete, who strangled the emperor Commodus, 192. He was afterwards exposed to the lions by the emperor Severus.

Narisci, a small but brave people in the S. of Germany, of the Suevic race, dwelt W. of the Marcomanni and E. of the Hermunduri, and extended from the Sudeti Montes on the N. to the Danube on the S., thus inhabiting part of the Upper Palatinate and the country of the Fichtelgebirge.

Narmalcha. [NAARMALCHA.]

Narnĭa (Narniensis: Narni), a town in Umbria, situated on a lofty hill, on the S. bank of the river Nar, originally called Nequinum, was made a Roman colony B. C. 299, when its name was changed into Narnia, after the river. This town was strongly fortified by nature, being accessible only on the E. and W. sides. On the W. side it could only be approached by a very lofty bridge which Augustus built over the river.

Naro, sometimes Nar (Narenta), a river in Dalmatia, which rises in M. Albius, and falls into the Adriatic sea.

Narōna, a Roman colony in Dalmatia, situated on the river Naro, some miles from the sea, and on the road to Dyrrhachium.

Narses, king of Persia. [SASSANIDAE.]

Narses (Ναρσῆς), a celebrated general and statesman in the reign of Justinian, was an eunuch. He put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy by two brilliant campaigns, A. D. 552, 553, and annexed Italy again to the Byzantine empire. He was rewarded by Justinian with the government of the country, which he held for many years. He was deprived of this office by Justin, the successor of Justinian, whereupon he invited the Langobards to invade Italy. His invitation was eagerly accepted by their king Alboin; but it is said that Narses soon after repented of his conduct, and died of grief at Rome shortly after the Langobards had crossed the Alps (568). Narses was 95 years of age at the time of his death.

Narthacĭum (Ναρθάκιον), a town in Thessaly, on M. Narthacius, S.W. of Pharsalus.

Naryx, also Narўcus or Narўcĭum (Νάρυξ, Νάρυκος, Ναρύκιον: Ναρύκιος, Ναρυκαῖος: Talanda or Talanti), a town of the Locri Opuntii on the Euboean sea, the reputed birthplace of Ajax, son of Oileus, who is hence called Narycius heros. Since Locri Epizephyrii in the S. of Italy claimed to be a colony from Naryx in Greece, we find the town of Locri called Narycia by the poets, and the pitch of Bruttium also named Narycia.

Năsămōnes (Νασαμῶνες), a powerful but savage Libyan people, who dwelt originally on the shores of the Great Syrtis, but were driven inland by the Greek settlers of Cyrenaica, and afterwards by the Romans. An interesting account of their manners and customs is given by Herodotus (iv. 172), who also tells (ii. 32) a curious story respecting an expedition beyond the Libyan Desert, undertaken by 5 Nasamonian youths, the result of which was certain important information concerning the interior of Africa. [NIGEIR.]

Nasīca, Scipĭo. [SCIPIO.]

Nāsĭdĭēnus, a wealthy (beatus) Roman, who gave a supper to Maecenas, which Horace ridicules in the 8th satire of his 2nd book. It appears from v. 58, that Rufus was the cognomen of Nasidienus.

Nāsĭdĭus, Q. or L., was sent by Pompey, in B. C. 49, with a fleet of 16 ships to relieve Massilia, when it was besieged by D. Brutus. He was defeated by Brutus, and fled to Africa, where he had the command of the Pompeian fleet. He served in Sicily under Sex. Pompey, whom he deserted in 35. He joined Antony, and commanded part of his fleet in the war with Octavian, 31.

Nāso, Ovidĭus. [OVIDIUS.]

Nasus or Nesus. [OENIADAE.]

Natĭso (Natisone), a small river in Venetia in the N. of Italy, which flows by Aquileia, and falls into the Sinus Tergestinus.

Natta or Nacca, "a fuller," the name of an ancient family of the Pinaria gens. The Natta satirised by Horace (Sat. i. 6. 124) for his dirty meanness, was probably a member of the noble Pinarian family, and therefore attacked by the poet for such conduct.

Naucrătes (Ναυκράτης), of Erythrae, a Greek rhetorician, and a disciple of Isocrates, is mentioned among the orators who competed (B.C. 352) for the prize offered by Artemisia for the best funeral oration delivered over Mausolus.

Naucrătis (Ναύκρατις: Ναυκρατίτης: Sa-el-Hadjar, Ru.), a city in the Delta of Egypt, in the Nomus of Saïs, on the E. bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, which was hence called also Naucraticum Ostium. It was a colony of the Milesians, founded probably in the reign of Amasis, about B.C. 550, and remained a pure Greek city. It was the only place in Egypt, where Greeks were permitted to settle and trade. After the Greek and Roman conquests it continued a place of great prosperity and luxury, and was celebrated for its worship of Aphrodite. It was the birthplace of Athenaeus, Lyceas, Phylarchus, Polycharmus, and Julius Pollux.

Naucȳdes (Ναυκύδης), an Argive statuary, son of Mothon, and brother and teacher of Polycletus II. of Argos, flourished B.C. 420.

Naulŏchus (Ναύλοχος), that is, a place where ships can anchor. 1. A naval station on the E. part of the N. coast of Sicily between Mylae and the promontory Pelorus.—2. A small island off Crete, near the promontory Sammonium.—3. A naval station belonging to Mesembria in Thrace.

Naumachĭus (Ναυμάχιος), a Gnomic poet, of uncertain age, some of whose verses are preserved by Stobaeus.

Naupactus (Ναύπακτος: Ναυπάκτιος: Lepanto), an ancient and strongly fortified town of the Locri Ozolae near the promontory Antirrhium, possessing the largest and best harbour on the whole of the N. coast of the Corinthian gulf. It is said to have derived its name from the Heraclidae having here built the fleet, with which they crossed over to the Peloponnesus. After the Persian wars it fell into the power of the Athenians, who settled here the Messenians who had been compelled to leave their country at the end of the 3rd Messenian war, B.C. 455; and during the Peloponnesian war it was the head-quarters of the Athenians in all their operations against the W. of Greece. At the end of the Peloponnesian war the Messenians were obliged to leave Naupactus, which passed into the hands first of the Locrians and afterwards of the Achaeans. It was given by Philip with the greater part of the Locrian territory to Aetolia, but it was again assigned to Locris by the Romans.

Nauplĭa (Ναυπλία: Ναυπλιεύς: Nauplia), the port of Argos, situated on the Saronic gulf, was never a place of importance in antiquity, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. The inhabitants had been expelled by the Argives as early as the 2nd Messenian war on suspicion of favouring the Spartans, who in consequence settled them at Methone in Messenia. At the present day Nauplia is one of the most important cities in Greece.

Nauplĭus (Ναύπλιος). 1. Of Argos, son of Poseidon and Amymone, a famous navigator, and the founder of the town of Nauplia.—2. Son of Clytoneus, was one of the Argonauts and a descendant of the preceding.—3. King of Euboea, and father of Palamedes, Oeax, and Nausimedon, by Clymene. Catreus had given his daughter Clymene and her sister Aërope to Nauplius, to be carried to a foreign land; but Nauplius married Clymene, and gave Aërope to Plisthenes, who became by her the father of Agamemnon and Menelaus. His son Palamedes had been condemned to death by the Greeks during the siege of Troy; and as Nauplius considered his condemnation to be an act of injustice, he watched for the return of the Greeks, and as they approached the coast of Euboea he lighted torches on the dangerous promontory of Caphareus. The sailors thus misguided suffered shipwreck, and perished in the waves or by the sword of Nauplius.

Nauportus (Ober or Upper Laibach), an ancient and important commercial town of the Taurisci, situated on the river Nauportus (Laibach), a tributary of the Savus, in Pannonia Superior. The town fell into decay after the foundation of Aemona (Laibach), which was only 15 miles from it. The name of Nauportus is said to have been derived from the Argonauts having sailed up the Danube and the Savus to this place and here built the town; and it is added that they afterwards carried their ships across the Alps to the Adriatic sea, where they again embarked. This legend, like many others, probably owes its origin to a piece of bad etymology.

Nausĭcăa (Ναυσικάα), daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians, and Arete, who conducted Ulysses to the court of her father, when he was shipwrecked on the coast.

Nausĭthŏus (Ναυσίθοος), son of Poseidon and Periboea, the daughter of Eurymedon, was the father of Alcinous and Rhexenor, and king of the Phaeacians, whom he led from Hyperia in Thrinacia to the island of Scheria, in order to escape from the Cyclopes.

Nautaca (Ναύτακα: Nakhsheb or Kesh), a city of Sogdiana, near the Oxus, towards the E. part of its course.

Nautes. [Nautia Gens.]

Nautĭa Gens, an ancient patrician gens, claimed to be descended from Nautes, one of the companions of Aeneas, who was said to have brought with him the Palladium from Troy, which was placed under the care of the Nautii at Rome. The Nautii, all of whom were surnamed Rutili, frequently held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic, but like many of the other ancient gentes they disappear from history about the time of the Samnite wars.

Nāva (Nahe), a W. tributary of the Rhine in Gaul, which falls into the Rhine at the modern Bingen.

Navalĭa or Nabalĭa, a river on the N. coast of Germany, mentioned by Tacitus, probably the E. arm of the Rhine.

Navĭus, Attus, a renowned augur in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. This king proposed to double the number of the equestrian centuries, and to name the three new ones after himself and two of his friends, but was opposed by Navius, because Romulus had originally arranged the equites under the sanction of the auspices, and consequently no alteration could be made in them without the same sanction. The tale then goes on to say that Tarquinius thereupon commanded him to divine whether what he was thinking of in his mind could be done, and that when Navius, after consulting the heavens, declared that it could, the king held out a whetstone and a razor to cut it with. Navius immediately cut it. His statue was placed in the comitium, on the steps of the senate-house, the place where the miracle had been wrought, and beside the statue the whetstone was preserved. Attus Navius seems to be the best orthography, making Attus an old praenomen, though we frequently find the name written Attius.

Naxos (Νάξος: Νάξιος). 1. (Naxia), an island in the Aegaean sea, and the largest of the Cyclades, is situated nearly half way between the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor. It is about 18 miles in length and 12 in breadth. It was very fertile in antiquity, as it is in the present day, producing an abundance of corn, wine, oil, and fruit. It was especially celebrated for its wine, and hence plays a prominent part in the legends about Dionysus. Here the god is said to have found Ariadne after she had been deserted by Theseus. The marble of the island was also much prized, and was considered equal to the Parian. — Naxos is frequently called Dia (Δία) by the poets, which was one of its ancient names. It was likewise called Strongyle (Στρογγύλη) on account of its round shape, and Dionysias (Διονυσιάς) from its connection with the worship of Dionysus. It is said to have been originally inhabited by Thracians and then by Carians, and to have derived its name from a Carian chief, Naxos. In the historical age it was inhabited by Ionians, who had emigrated from Athens. Naxos was conquered by Pisistratus, who established Lygdamis as tyrant of the island about B.C. 540. The Persians in 501 attempted, at the suggestion of Aristagoras, to subdue Naxos; and upon the failure of their attempt, Aristagoras, fearing punishment, induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia. In 490 the Persians, under Datis and Artaphernes, conquered Naxos, and reduced the inhabitants to slavery. The Naxians recovered their independence after the battle of Salamis (480). They were the first of the allied states whom the Athenians reduced to subjection (471), after which time they are rarely mentioned in history. The chief town of the island was also called Naxos; and we also have mention of the small towns of Tragaea and Lestadae. — 2. A Greek city on the E. coast of Sicily, S. of Mt. Taurus, was founded B.C. 735 by the Chalcidians of Euboea, and was the first Greek colony established in the island. It grew so rapidly in power that in only 5 or 6 years after its foundation it sent colonies to Catana and Leontini. It was for a time subject to Hieronymus, tyrant of Gela; but it soon recovered its independence, carried on a successful war against Messana, and was subsequently an ally of the Athenians against Syracuse. In 403 the town was taken by Dionysius of Syracuse and destroyed. Nearly 50 years afterwards (358) the remains of the Naxians scattered over Sicily were collected by Andromachus, and a new city was founded on Mt. Taurus, to which the name of Tauromenium was given. [TAUROMENIUM.]

Naxuāna (Ναξουάνα: Nakshivan), a city of Armenia Major, on the Araxes, near the confines of Media.

Nāzărĕth, Nāzără (Ναζαρέθ, or -έτ, or -ά: Ναζαραῖος, Ναζωραῖος, Nazarēnus, Nazarēus: en-Nasirah), a city of Palestine, in Galilee, S. of Cana, on a hill in the midst of the range of mountains N. of the plain of Esdraēlon.

Nazianzus (Ναζιανζός: Ναζιανζηνός), a city of Cappadocia, on the road from Archelaïs to Tyana, celebrated as the diocese of the Father of the Church, Gregory Nazianzen. Its site is doubtful.

Neaera (Νέαιρα), the name of several nymphs, and also of several maidens mentioned by the poets.

Neaethus (Νέαιθος: Nieto), a river in Bruttium in the S. of Italy, falling into the Tarentine gulf a little N. of Croton. Here the captive Trojan women are said to have burnt the ships of the Greeks.

Nealces (Νεάλκης), a painter who flourished in the time of Aratus, B.C. 245.

Neandrīa (Νεάνδρεια: Νεανδρεῖς, pl.), a town of the Troad, upon the Hellespont, probably an Aeolian colony. By the time of Augustus it had disappeared.

Neanthes (Νεάνθης), of Cyzicum, lived about B.C. 241, and was a disciple of the Milesian Philiscus, who himself had been a disciple of Isocrates. He was a voluminous writer, principally of history.

Neăpŏlis (Νεάπολις: Νεαπολίτης, Neapolitanus). I. In Europe. 1. (Napoli or Naples), a city in Campania in Italy, on the W. slope of Mt. Vesuvius and on the river Sebethus, was founded by the Chalcidians of Cumae, on the site of an ancient place called Parthĕnŏpē (Παρθενόπη), after the Siren of that name. Hence we find the town called Parthenope by Virgil and Ovid. The year of the foundation of Neapolis is not recorded. It was called the "New City," because it was regarded simply as a new quarter of the neighbouring city of Cumae. When the town is first mentioned in Roman history, it consisted of 2 parts, divided from each other by a wall, and called respectively Palaeopolis and Neapolis. This division probably arose after the capture of Cumae by the Samnites, when a large number of the Cumaeans took refuge in the city they had founded; whereupon the old quarter was called Palaeopolis, and the new quarter, built to accommodate the new inhabitants, was named Neapolis. There has been a dispute respecting the site of these 2 quarters; but it is probable that Palaeopolis was situated on the W. side near the harbour, and Neapolis on the E. side near the river Sebethus. In B.C. 327 the town was taken by the Samnites, and in 290 it passed into the hands of the Romans, who allowed it however to retain its Greek constitution. At a later period it became a municipium, and finally a Roman colony. Under the Romans the 2 quarters of the city were united, and the name of Palaeopolis disappeared. It continued to be a prosperous and flourishing place till the time of the empire; and its beautiful scenery, and the luxurious life of its Greek population, made it a favourite residence with many of the Romans. In the reign of Titus the city was destroyed by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by this emperor in the Roman style. The modern city of Naples does not stand on exactly the same site as Neapolis. The ancient city extended further E. than the modern city, since the former was situated on the Sebethus, whereas the latter does not reach so far as the Fiume della Madalena; but the modern city on the other hand extends further N. and W. than the ancient one, since the island of Megaris, on which the Castel del Ovo now stands, was situated in ancient times between Pausilypum and Neapolis. In the neighbourhood of Neapolis there were warm baths, the celebrated villa of Lucullus, and the villa Pausilypi or Pausilypum, bequeathed by Ve-dius Pollio to Augustus, and which has given its name to the celebrated grotto of Posilippo between Naples and Puzzuoli, at the entrance of which the tomb of Virgil is still shown. — 2. A part of Syracuse. [SYRACUSAE.] — 3. (Napoli), a town on the W. coast of the island of Sardinia, celebrated for its warm baths. — 4. (Kavallo), a sea-port town in Thrace, subsequently Macedonia adjecta, on the Strymonic gulf, between the Strymon and Nessus. — II. In Asia and Africa. 1. (Scala Nuova, or near it), a small Ionian city, on the coast of Lydia, N. of Mycale and S.W. of Ephesus. The Ephesians, to whom it at first belonged, exchanged it with the Samians for MARATHESIUM. — 2, 3. Two towns of Caria, the one near Harpasa, the other on the coast, perhaps the new town of Myndus. — 4. (Tutinek? Ru.), in Pisidia S. of Antioch; afterwards reckoned to Galatia. — 5. In Palestine, the Sychem or Sychar of Scripture (Συχέμ, Συχάρ, Σικίμα, Joseph.: Nablous), one of the most ancient cities of Samaria, stood in the narrow valley between Mts. Ebal and Gerizim, and was the religious capital of the Samaritans, whose temple was built upon Mt. Gerizim. This temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, B.C. 129. Its full name, under the Romans, was Flavia Neapolis. It was the birthplace of Justin Martyr. — 6. A small town of Babylonia, on the W. bank of the Euphrates, opposite to the opening of the King's Canal. — 7. In Egypt. [CAENE]. — 8. In N. Africa on the W. coast of the Great Syrtis, by some identified with Leptis Magna, by others with the modern Tripoli. — 9. (Nabal), a very ancient Phoenician colony, on the E. coast of Zeugitana, near the N. extremity of the great gulf which was called after it Sinus Neapolitanus (Gulf of Hammamet). Under the Romans it was a libera civitas, and, according to Ptolemy, a colony.

Nearchus (Νέαρχος), a distinguished friend and officer of Alexander, was a native of Crete, but settled at Amphipolis. He appears to have occupied a prominent position at the court of Philip, by whom he was banished for participating in the intrigues of Alexander. After the death of Philip he was recalled, and treated with the utmost distinction by Alexander. He accompanied the king to Asia; and in B.C. 325, he was entrusted by Alexander with the command of the fleet which he had caused to be constructed on the Hydaspes. Upon reaching the mouth of the Indus, Alexander resolved to send round his ships by sea from thence to the Persian gulf, and he gladly accepted the offer of Nearchus to undertake the command of the fleet during this long and perilous navigation. Nearchus set out on the 21st of September, 326, and arrived at Susa in safety in February, 325. He was rewarded with a crown of gold for his distinguished services, and at the same time obtained in marriage a daughter of the Rhodian Mentor and of Barsine, to whom Alexander himself had been previously married. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander, he received the government of Lycia and Pamphylia, which he held as subordinate to Antigonus. In 317 he accompanied Antigonus in his march against Eumenes, and in 314 he is mentioned again as one of the generals of Antigonus. — Nearchus left a history of the voyage, the substance of which has been preserved to us by Arrian, who has derived from it the whole of the latter part of his "Indica."

Nebo, a mountain of Palestine, on the E. side of the Jordan, opposite to Jericho, was in the S. part of the range called Abarim. It was on a summit of this mountain, called Pisgah, that Moses died.

Nebrōdes Montes, the principal chain of mountains in Sicily, running through the whole of the island, and a continuation of the Apennines.

Neco or Necho (Νεκώς, Νέχως, Νεκαῦς, Νεχαώς, Νεχαώ), son of Psammetichus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Egypt in B.C. 617. His reign was marked by considerable energy and enterprise. He began to dig the canal intended to connect the Nile with the Arabian Gulf; but he desisted from the work, according to Herodotus, on being warned by an oracle that he was constructing it only for the use of the barbarian invader. But the greatest and most interesting enterprise with which his name is connected, is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phoenicians, in his service, who set sail from the Arabian Gulf, and accomplishing the voyage in somewhat more than 2 years, entered the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt through the Straits of Gibraltar. His military expeditions were distinguished at first by brilliant success, which was followed, however, by the most rapid and signal reverses. On his march against the Babylonians and Medes, whose joint forces had recently destroyed Nineveh, he was met at Magdolus (Megiddo) by Josiah, king of Judah, who was a vassal of Babylon. In the battle which ensued, Josiah was defeated and mortally wounded, and Necho advanced to the Euphrates, where he conquered the Babylonians and took Carchemish or Circesium, where he appears to have established a garrison. After the battle at Megiddo, he took the town of Cadytis, probably Jerusalem. In 606, Nebuchadnezzar attacked Carchemish, defeated Necho, and would appear also to have invaded Egypt itself. In 601 Necho died after a reign of 16 years, and was succeeded by his son Psammis or Psammuthis.

Nectanābis, Nectanēbus, or Nectanēbes (Νεκτάναβις, Νεκτάνεβος, Νεκτανέβης). 1. King of Egypt, the 1st of the 3 sovereigns of the Sebennite dynasty, succeeded Nepherites on the throne about B.C. 374, and in the following year successfully resisted the invasion of the Persian force under Pharnabazus and Iphicrates. He died after a reign of 10 years, and was succeeded by Tachos. — 2. The nephew of Tachos, deprived the latter of the sovereignty in 361, with the assistance of Agesilaus. For some time he defeated all the attempts of Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) to recover Egypt, but he was at length defeated himself, and despairing of making any further resistance, he fled into Aethiopia, 350. Nectanabis was the 3rd king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign who ever ruled in Egypt.

Nēda (Νέδα: Buzi), a river in Peloponnesus, rises in Arcadia in Mt. Cerausion, a branch of Mt. Lycaeus, and falls into the Ionian sea after forming the boundary between Arcadia and Messenia, and between Messenia and Elis.

Negra or Negrana (τὰ Νέγρανα: El-Nokra, N. of Mareb), a city of Arabia Felix, destroyed by Aelius Gallus.

Nēleus (Νηλεύς). 1. Son of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus. Poseidon once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. To conceal her shame she exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learnt their parentage; and after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, excluding Aeson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro. But Pelias soon afterwards expelled his brother, and thus became sole king. Thereupon Neleus went with Melampus and Bias to Pylos, which his uncle Aphareus gave to him, and of which he thus became king. Several towns of this name claimed the honour of being the city of Neleus or of his son Nestor, such as Pylos in Messenia, Pylos in Elis, and Pylos in Triphylia; the last of which is probably the one mentioned by Homer in connection with Neleus and Nestor. Neleus was married to Chloris, a daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, according to Homer, and a Theban woman according to others. By her he became the father of Nestor, Chromius, Periclymenus, and Pero, though he had in all 12 sons. When Hercules had killed Iphitus, he went to Neleus to be purified; but Neleus, who was a friend of Eurytus, the father of Iphitus, refused to grant the request of Hercules. In order to take vengeance, Hercules afterwards marched against Pylos, and slew all the sons of Neleus, with the exception of Nestor: some later writers add that Neleus himself was also killed. Neleus was now attacked, and his dominions plundered by Augeas, king of the Epeans; but the attacks of the latter were repelled by Nestor. The descendants of Neleus, the Nelīdae, were eventually expelled from their kingdom by the Heraclidae, and migrated for the most part to Athens. — 2. The younger son of Codrus, disputed the right of his elder brother Medon to the crown on account of his lameness, and when the Delphic oracle declared in favour of Medon, he placed himself at the head of the colonists who migrated to Ionia, and himself founded Miletus. His son Aepytus headed the colonists who settled in Priene. Another son headed a body of settlers who reinforced the inhabitants of Iasus, after they had lost a great number of their citizens in a war with the Carians. — 3. Of Scepsis, the son of Coriscus, was a disciple of Aristotle and Theophrastus, the latter of whom bequeathed to him his library, and appointed him one of his executors. The history of the writings of Aristotle as connected with Neleus and his heirs, is related elsewhere [p. 86, a].

Nēlīdes, Nēlēïădes, and Nēlēïus (Νηλείδης, Νηληϊάδης, Νηλήϊος), patronymics of Neleus, by which either Nestor, the son of Neleus, or Antilochus, his grandson, is designated.

Nemausus (Nemausensis: Nismes), one of the most important towns of Gallia Narbonensis, was the capital of the Arecomici and a Roman colony. It was situated inland E. of the Rhone on the highroad from Italy to Spain, and on the S. slope of M. Cevenna. It was celebrated as the place from which the family of the Antonines came. Though rarely mentioned by ancient writers, the Roman remains at Nismes, which are some of the most perfect N. of the Alps, prove that the ancient Nemausus was a large and flourishing city. Of these remains the most important are the amphitheatre, the Maison Carrée, a name given to a beautiful Corinthian temple, and the magnificent aqueduct, now called Pont du Gard, consisting of 3 rows of arches, raised one above the other, and 180 feet in height.

Nĕmĕa (Νεμέα, Ion. Νεμέη), a valley in Argolis between Cleonae and Phlius, celebrated in mythical story as the place where Hercules slew the Nemean lion. [See p. 308, b.] In this valley there was a splendid temple of Zeus Nemēus surrounded by a sacred grove, in which the Nemean games were celebrated every other year. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Nemea.)

Nemesiānus, M. Aurelĭus Olympĭus, a Roman poet, probably a native of Africa, flourished at the court of the emperor Carus (A. D. 283), carried off the prize in all the poetical contests of the day, and was esteemed second to the youthful prince Numerianus alone, who honoured him so far as to permit him to dispute, and to yield to the palm of verse. We are told that Nemesianus was the author of poems upon fishing, hunting, and aquatics; all of which have perished, with the exception of a fragment of the Cynegetica, extending to 325 hexameter lines, which, in so far as neatness and purity of expression are concerned, in some degree justifies the admiration of his contemporaries. The best edition of this fragment is by Stern, published along with Gratius Faliscus, Hal. Sax. 1832.

Nĕmĕsis (Νέμεσις), a Greek goddess, is most commonly described as a daughter of Night, though some call her a daughter of Erebus or of Oceanus. She is a personification of the moral reverence for law, of the natural fear of committing a culpable action, and hence of conscience. In later writers, as Herodotus and Pindar, Nemesis measures out happiness and unhappiness to mortals; and he who is blessed with too many or too frequent gifts of fortune, is visited by her with losses and sufferings, in order that he may become humble. This notion arose from a belief that the gods were envious of excessive human happiness. Nemesis was thus a check upon extravagant favours conferred upon man by Tyche or Fortune; and from this idea lastly arose that of her being an avenging and punishing fate, who, like Justice (Dike) and the Erinnyes, sooner or later overtakes the reckless sinner. She is frequently mentioned under the surnames Adrastia [Adrastia, No. 2], and Rhamnusia or Rhamnusis, the latter of which she derived from the town of Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated sanctuary. She was usually represented in works of art as a virgin divinity: in the more ancient works she seems to have resembled Aphrodite, whereas in the later ones she was more grave and serious. But there is an allegorical tradition that Zeus begot by Nemesis at Rhamnus an egg, which Leda found, and from which Helena and the Dioscuri sprang, whence Helena herself is called Rhamnusis.

Nĕmĕsĭus (Νεμέσιος), the author of a Greek treatise On the Nature of Man, is called bishop of Emesa, in Syria, and probably lived at the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th century after Christ. His treatise is an interesting philosophical work, which has generally been highly praised by all who have read it. Edited by Matthaei, Halae, 8vo. 1802.

Nemetacum. [Nemetocenna.]

Nemētes or Nemētae, a people in Gallia Belgica on the Rhine, whose chief town was Noviomagus, subsequently Nemetae (Speyer or Spires).

Nemetocenna or Nemetacum (Arras), the chief town of the Atrebates in Gallia Belgica, subsequently Atrebati, whence its modern name.

Nemorensis Lacus. [Aricia.]

Nemossus. [ARVERNI.]

Nĕŏbūlē. [ARCHILOCHUS.]

Neŏcaesarēa (Νεοκαισαρεία: Νεοκαισαρεύς, Neocaesariensis). 1. (Niksar), the capital, under the Roman empire, of Pontus Polemoniacus, in Asia Minor, stood on the river Lycus, 63 Roman miles E. of Amasia. It was a splendid city, and is famous in ecclesiastical history for the council held there in A.D. 314. — 2. (Kulat-en-Nejur? Ru.), a fortress established by Justinian, on the Euphrates, in the district of Syria called Chalybonitis.

Nĕōn (Νέων: Νεώνιος, Νεωναῖος), an ancient town in Phocis at the E. foot of Mt. Tithorea, a branch of Mt. Parnassus, was 80 stadia from Delphi across the mountains. Neon was destroyed by the Persians under Xerxes, but was subsequently rebuilt and named Tithŏrēa (Τιθορέα: Τιθορεύς) after the mountain on which it was situated. The new town however was not on exactly the same site as the ancient one. Tithorea was situated at the modern Velitza, and Neon at Palea-Fiva, between 4 and 5 miles N. of Velitza. Tithorea was destroyed in the Sacred war, and was again rebuilt, but remained an unimportant, though fortified place.

Neontīchos (Νέον τεῖχος, i. e. New Wall). 1. (Ainadsjik), one of the 12 cities of Aeolis on the coast of Mysia, in Asia Minor, stood on the N. side of the Hermus, on the slope of M. Sardene, 30 stadia inland from Larissa. One tradition makes it older than Cyme; but the more probable account is that it was built by the Aeolians of Cyme as a fortress against the Pelasgians of Larissa. — 2. A fort on the coast of Thrace, near the Chersonesus.

Neoptŏlĕmus (Νεοπτόλεμος). 1. Also called Pyrrhus, son of Achilles and Deidamīa, the daughter of Lycomedes; according to some he was a son of Achilles and Iphigenia, and after the sacrifice of his mother was carried by his father to the island of Scyros. The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given to him by Lycomedes, because he had fair (πυῤῥός) hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had borne the name of Pyrrha. He was called Neoptolemus, that is, young or late warrior, either because he had fought in early youth or because he had come late to Troy. From his father he is sometimes called Achillīdes, and from his grandfather or great-grandfather, Pelīdes and Aeacĭdes. Neoptolemus was brought up in Scyros in the palace of Lycomedes, and was fetched from thence by Ulysses to join the Greeks in the war against Troy, because it had been prophesied by Helenus that Neoptolemus and Philoctetes were necessary for the capture of Troy. At Troy Neoptolemus showed himself worthy of his great father. He was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse. At the capture of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Zeus, and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father. When the Trojan captives were distributed among the conquerors, Andromache, the widow of Hector, was given to Neoptolemus, and by her he became the father of Molossus, Pielus, Pergamus, and Amphialus. Respecting his return from Troy and the subsequent events of his life the traditions differ. It is related that Neoptolemus returned home by land, because he had been forewarned by Helenus of the dangers which the Greeks would have to encounter at sea. According to Homer Neoptolemus lived in Phthia, the kingdom of his father, and here he married Hermione, whom her father Menelaus sent to him from Sparta. According to others Neoptolemus himself went to Sparta to receive Hermione, because he had heard a report that she was betrothed to Orestes. Most writers relate that he abandoned his native kingdom of Phthia, and settled in Epirus, where he became the ancestor of the Molossian kings. Shortly after his marriage with Hermione, Neoptolemus went to Delphi, where he was murdered; but the reason of his visiting Delphi, as well as the person by whom he was slain, are differently related. Some say he went to plunder the temple of Apollo, others to present part of the Trojan booty as an offering to the god, and others again to consult the god about the means of obtaining children by Hermione. Some relate that he was slain at the instigation of Orestes, who was angry at being deprived of Hermione, and others, by the priest of the temple, or by Machaereus, the son of Daetas. His body was buried at Delphi; and he was worshipped there as a hero. — 2. I. King of Epirus, was son of Alcetas I., and father of Alexander I., and of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Neoptolemus reigned in conjunction with his brother Arymbas or Arrybas till his death, about B.C. 360. — 3. II. King of Epirus, son of Alexander I. and grandson of the preceding. At his father's death in 326, he was probably a mere infant, and his pretensions to the throne were passed over in favour of Aeacides. It was not till 302 that the Epirots, taking advantage of the absence of Pyrrhus, the son of Aeacides, rose in insurrection against him, and set up Neoptolemus in his stead. The latter reigned for the space of 6 years, but was obliged to share the throne with Pyrrhus in 296. He was shortly afterwards assassinated by Pyrrhus. — 4. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, after whose death he obtained the government of Armenia. In 321 he revolted from Perdiccas, and joined Craterus, but he was defeated by Eumenes, and was slain in battle by the hands of the latter. — 5. A general of Mithridates, and brother of Archelaus. — 6. An Athenian tragedian, who performed at the games in which Philip of Macedon was slain, 336. — 7. Of Paros, a Greek grammarian of uncertain date, wrote several works quoted by Athenaeus and the Scholiasts.

Nĕpĕte, Nepe or Nepet (Nepesinus: Nepi), an ancient town of Etruria, but not one of the 12 cities, was situated near the saltus Ciminius and was regarded as one of the keys and gates of Etruria (claustra portaeque Etruriae, Liv. vi. 9) It appears as an ally of the Romans at an early period, soon after the capture of Rome by the Gauls, and was subsequently made a Roman colony. There are still remains at Nepi of the walls of the ancient city.

Nĕphĕlē (Νεφέλη), wife of Athamas and mother of Phrixus and Helle. Hence Helle is called Nephelēis by Ovid. For details see ATHAMAS.

Nĕphĕlis (Νεφελίς), a small town and promontory on the coast of Cilicia Aspera, between Anemurium and Antiochia.

Nĕphĕris (Νέφερις), a fortified town in the immediate neighbourhood of Carthage, on a rock near the coast.

Nĕpos, Cornēlius, the contemporary and friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus, was probably a native of Verona, or of some neighbouring village, and died during the reign of Augustus. No other particulars, with regard to his personal history, have been transmitted to us. He is known to have written the following pieces, all of which are now lost. 1. Chronica, an Epitome of Universal History, probably in 3 books, to which Catullus appears to allude in dedicating his poems to Cornelius Nepos. 2. Exemplorum Libri, probably a collection of remarkable sayings and doings. 3. De Viris Illustribus, perhaps the same work as the preceding, quoted under a different title. 4. Vita Ciceronis. 5. Epistolae ad Ciceronem. 6. De Historicis.—There is still extant a work entitled Vitae Excellentium Imperatorum, containing biographies of several distinguished commanders, which is supposed by many critics to have been the production of Cornelius Nepos. In all MSS., however, this work is ascribed to an unknown Aemilius Probus, living under Theodosius at the end of the 4th century of the Christian aera, with the exception however of the life of Atticus, and the fragment of a life of Cato the Censor, which are expressly attributed to Cornelius Nepos. These 2 lives may safely be assigned to Cornelius Nepos; but the Latinity of the other biographies is such that we cannot suppose them to have been written by a learned contemporary of Cicero. At the same time their style presents a striking contrast to the meretricious finery of the later empire; and hence it may be conjectured that Probus abridged the work of Nepos, and that the biographies, as they now exist, are in reality epitomes of lives actually written by Nepos. The most useful editions of these lives are by Van Staveren, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1773; by Tzschucke, 8vo. Gotting. 1804; by Bremi, 8vo. Zurich, 1820; and by Roth, Basil. 8vo. 1841.

Nĕpos, Jūlĭus, last emperor but one of the West, A. D. 474—475, was raised to the throne by Leo, the emperor of the East. Nepos easily deposed Glycerius, who was regarded at Constantinople as an usurper [GLYCERIUS]; but he was in his turn deposed in the next year by Orestes, who proclaimed his son Romulus. Nepos fled into Dalmatia, where he was killed in 480.

Nepotiānus, Flavĭus Popilĭus, son of Eutropia, the half-sister of Constantine the Great, was proclaimed emperor at Rome in A. D. 350, but was slain by Marcellinus, the general of the usurper Magnentius, after a reign of 28 days.

Neptūnus, called Poseidon by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article. [POSEIDON.] Neptunus was the chief marine divinity of the Romans. As the early Romans were not a maritime people, the marine divinities are rarely mentioned, and we scarcely know with certainty what day in the year was set apart as the festival of Neptunus, though it seems to have been the 23rd of July (X. Kal. Sext.). His temple stood in the Campus Martius, not far from the septa. At his festival the people formed tents (umbrae) of the branches of trees, in which they enjoyed themselves in feasting and drinking. (Dict. of Ant. art. Neptunalia). When a Roman commander set sail with a fleet, he first offered up a sacrifice to Neptunus, which was thrown into the sea. In the Roman poets Neptunus is completely identified with the Greek Poseidon, and accordingly all the attributes of the latter are transferred by them to the former.

Neratĭus Priscus, a Roman jurist, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian. It is said that Trajan sometimes had the design of making Neratius his successor in place of Hadrian. He enjoyed a high reputation under Hadrian, and was one of his consiliarii. His works are cited in the Digest.

Nērēis or Nērēis (Νηρεΐς, in Hom. Νηρηΐς), a daughter of Nereus and Doris, and used especially in the plural, Nereides (Νηρεΐδες, Νηρηΐδες) to indicate the 50 daughters of Nereus and Doris. The Nereides were the marine nymphs of the Mediterranean, in contradistinction from the Naiades, or the nymphs of fresh water, and the Oceanides, or the nymphs of the great ocean. Their names are not the same in all writers; one of the most celebrated was Thetis, the mother of Achilles. They are described as lovely divinities, dwelling with their father at the bottom of the sea, and were believed to be propitious to all sailors, and especially to the Argonauts. They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in seaport towns. The epithets given them by the poets refer partly to their beauty and partly to their place of abode. They are frequently represented in works of art, and commonly as youthful, beautiful, and naked maidens; and they are often grouped with Tritons and other marine beings. Sometimes they appear on gems as half maidens and half fishes.

Nērēĭus, a name given by the poets to a descendant of Nereus, such as Phocus and Achilles.

Nerētum or Neritum (Neretinus: Narbo), a town of the Salentini in Calabria in the S. of Italy.

Nērēus (Νηρεύς), son of Pontus and Gaea, and husband of Doris, by whom he became the father of the 50 Nereides. He is described as the wise and unerring old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he dwelt. His empire is the Mediterranean or more particularly the Aegean sea, whence he is sometimes called the Aegean. He was believed, like other marine divinities, to have the power of prophesying the future and of appearing to mortals in different shapes; and in the story of Hercules he acts a prominent part, just as Proteus in the story of Ulysses, and Glaucus in that of the Argonauts. Virgil (Aen. ii. 418) mentions the trident as his attribute, and the epithets given him by the poets refer to his old age, his kindliness, and his trustworthy knowledge of the future. In works of art, Nereus, like other sea-gods, is represented with pointed sea-weeds taking the place of hair in the eyebrows, the chin, and the breast.

Nērĭcus. [LEUCAS.]

Nērīnē, equivalent to Nereis, a daughter of Nereus. [NEREIS.]

Nerio, Neriēne, or Neriēnis. [MARS.]

Nērĭtum, a mountain in Ithaca. [ITHACA.]

Nērĭtus, a smally rocky island near Ithaca, erroneously supposed by some to be Ithaca itself.

Nerĭum, also called Celtĭcum (C. Finisterre), a promontory in the N. W. corner of Spain, and in the territory of the Nerii, a tribe of the Celtic Artabri, whence the promontory is also called Artabrum.

Nĕro, Claudĭus. Nero is said to have signified "brave" in the Sabine tongue. 1. Tib., one of the 4 sons of App. Claudius Caecus, censor B. C. 312, from whom all the Claudii Nerones were descended.—2. C., a celebrated general in the 2nd Punic war. He was praetor 212, and was sent into Spain to oppose Hasdrubal, who eluded his attack, and he was succeeded by Scipio Africanus. Nero was consul in 207 with M. Livius Salinator. Nero marched into the S. of Italy against Hannibal, whom he defeated. He then marched into the N. of Italy, effected a junction with his colleague M. Livius in Picenum, and proceeded to crush Hasdrubal before his brother Hannibal could come to his assistance. Hasdrubal was defeated and slain on the river Metaurus. This great battle, which probably saved Rome, gave a lustre to the name of Nero, and consecrated it among the recollections of the Romans.

Quid debeas, o Roma, Neronibus,
Testis Metaurum flumen et Hasdrubal
Devictus. Horat. Carm. iv. 4.

Nero was censor, 204, with M. Livius. — 3. Tib., praetor, 204, with Sardinia for his province; and consul 202, when he obtained Africa as his province, but his fleet suffered so much at sea, that he was unable to join Scipio in Africa. — 4. Tib., served under Pompey in the war against the pirates, B. C. 67. He is probably the Tib. Nero who recommended that the members of the conspiracy of Catiline, who had been seized, should be kept confined till Catiline was put down. — 5. Tib., father of the emperor Tiberius, was probably the son of the last. He served as quaestor under Caesar (48) in the Alexandrine war. He sided with L. Antonius in the war of Perusia (41); and when this town surrendered, he passed over to Sex. Pompey in Sicily, and subsequently to M. Antony in Achaea. On a reconciliation being effected between Antony and Octavian at the close of the year (40), he returned with his wife to Rome. Livia, who possessed great beauty, excited the passion of Octavian, to whom she was surrendered by her husband, being then 6 months gone with child of her second son Drusus. Nero died shortly after, and left Octavian the tutor of his two sons.

Nĕro. 1. Roman emperor, A. D. 54—68, was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus Caesar, and sister of Caligula. Nero's original name was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after the marriage of his mother with her uncle, the emperor Claudius, he was adopted by Claudius (A. D. 50), and was called Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus. Nero was born at Antium, on the 15th of December, A. D. 37. Shortly after his adoption by Claudius, Nero, being then 16 years of age, married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messalina (53). Among his early instructors was Seneca. Nero had some talent and taste. He was fond of the arts, and made verses; but he was indolent and given to pleasure, and had no inclination for laborious studies. On the death of Claudius (54), Agrippina secured the succession for her son, to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. His mother wished to govern in the name of her son, and her ambition was the cause of Nero's first crime. Jealousy thus arose between Nero and his mother, which soon broke out into a quarrel, and Agrippina threatened to join Britannicus and raise him to his father's place; whereupon Nero caused Britannicus to be poisoned, at an entertainment where Agrippina and Octavia were present (55). During the early part of Nero's reign, the government of Rome was in the hands of Seneca, and of Burrhus, the praefect of the praetorians, who opposed the ambitious designs of Agrippina. Meantime the young emperor indulged his licentious inclinations without restraint. He neglected his wife for the beautiful, but dissolute Poppaea Sabina, the wife of Otho. This abandoned woman aspired to become the emperor's wife; but since she had no hopes of succeeding in her design while Agrippina lived, she used all her arts to urge Nero to put his mother to death. Accordingly in 59, Agrippina was assassinated by Nero's order, with the approbation at least of Seneca and Burrhus, who saw that the time was come for the destruction either of the mother or the son. Though Nero had no longer any one to oppose him, he felt the punishment of his guilty conscience, and said that he was haunted by his mother's spectre. He attempted to drown his reflections in fresh riot, in which he was encouraged by a band of flatterers. He did not, however, immediately marry Poppaea, being probably restrained by fear of Burrhus and Seneca. But the death of Burrhus in 62, and the retirement of Seneca from public affairs, which immediately followed, left Nero more at liberty. Accordingly he divorced his wife Octavia, and in 18 days married Poppaea. Not satisfied with putting away his wife, he falsely charged her with adultery, and banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. — In 64 the great fire at Rome happened. Its origin is uncertain, for it is hardly credible that the city was fired by Nero's order, as some ancient writers assert. Out of the 14 regiones of Rome into which Rome was divided, 3 were totally destroyed, and in 7 others only a few half-burnt houses remained. The emperor set about rebuilding the city on an improved plan, with wider streets. He found money for his purposes by acts of oppression and violence, and even temples were robbed of their wealth. With these means he began to erect his sumptuous golden palace, on a scale of magnitude and splendour which almost surpasses belief. The vestibule contained a colossal statue of himself 120 feet high. The odium of the conflagration which the emperor could not remove from himself, he tried to throw on the Christians, who were then numerous in Rome, and many of them were put to a cruel death. — The tyranny of Nero at last (65) led to the organisation of a formidable conspiracy against him, usually called Piso's conspiracy, from the name of one of the principal accomplices. The plot was discovered, and many distinguished persons were put to death, among whom was Piso himself, the poet Lucan, and the philosopher Seneca, though the latter appears to have taken no part in the plot. In the same year, Poppaea died of a kick, which her brutal husband gave her in a fit of passion when she was with child. Nero now married Statilia Messallina. The history of the remainder of Nero's reign is a catalogue of his crimes. Virtue in any form was the object of his fear; and almost every month was marked by the execution or banishment of some distinguished man. Among his other victims were Thrasea Paetus and Barea Soranus, both men of high rank, but of spotless integrity. In 67 Nero paid a visit to Greece, and took part in the contests of both the Olympic and Pythian games. He commenced a canal across the Isthmus of Corinth, but the works were afterwards suspended by his own orders. While in Greece he sent orders to put to death his faithful general Domitius Corbulo, which the old soldier anticipated by stabbing himself. The Roman world had long been tired of its oppressor; and the storm at length broke out in Gaul, where Julius Vindex, the governor, openly raised the standard of revolt. His example was followed by Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis. Galba was proclaimed emperor by his troops, but he only assumed the title of legatus of the senate and the Roman people. Soon after these news reached Rome, Nymphidius Sabinus, who was praefectus praetorio along with Tigellinus, persuaded the troops to proclaim Galba. Nero was immediately deserted. He escaped from the palace at night with a few freedmen, and made his way to a house about 4 miles from Rome, which belonged to his freedman Phaon. Here he gave himself a mortal wound, when he heard the trampling of the horses on which his pursuers were mounted. The centurion on entering attempted to stop the flow of blood, but Nero saying, "It is too late. Is this your fidelity?" expired with a horrid stare. Nero's progress in crime is easily traced, and the lesson is worth reading. Without a good education, and with no talent for his high station, he was placed in a position of danger from the first. He was sensual, and fond of idle display, and then he became greedy of money to satisfy his expenses; he was timid, and by consequence he became cruel when he anticipated danger; and, like other murderers, his first crime, the poisoning of Britannicus, made him capable of another. But, contemptible and cruel as he was, there are many persons who, in the same situation, might run the same guilty career. He was only in his 31st year when he died, and he had held the supreme power for 18 years and 8 months. He was the last of the descendants of Julia, the sister of the dictator Caesar. — The most important external events in the reign of Nero were the conquest of Armenia by Domitius Corbulo [CORBULO], and the insurrection of the Britons under Boadicea, which was quelled by Suetonius Paulinus. [PAULINUS]. — 2. Eldest son of Germanicus and Agrippina, fell a victim to the ambition of Sejanus, who resolved to get rid of the sons of Germanicus in order to obtain the imperial throne for himself. Drusus, the brother of Nero, was persuaded to second the designs of Sejanus, in hopes that the death of his elder brother would secure him the succession to the throne. There was no difficulty in exciting the jealousy of Tiberius; and accordingly in A. D. 29, Nero was declared an enemy of the state, was removed to the island of Pontia, and was there either starved to death or perished by his own hands.

Nertobrīga. 1. (Valera la vieja), a town in Hispania Baetica, with the surname Concordia Julia, probably the same place which Polybius calls (xxxv. 2) Ercobrica (Ἐρκόϐρικα). — 2. (Almuna), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis on the road from Emerita to Caesaraugusta.

Nerŭlum, a fortified place in Lucania on the Via Popilia.

Nerva, Cocceius. 1. M., consul B. C. 36, brought about the reconciliation between M. Antonius and Octavianus, 40, and is the same as the Cocceius mentioned by Horace (Sat. i. 5. 28). — 2. M., probably the son of the preceding, and grandfather of the emperor Nerva. He was consul A. D. 22. In 33, he resolutely starved himself to death, notwithstanding the intreaties of Tiberius, whose constant companion he was. He was a celebrated jurist and is often mentioned in the Digest. — 3. M., the son of the last, and probably father of the emperor, was also a celebrated jurist, and is often cited in the Digest under the name of Nerva Filius. — 4. M., Roman emperor, A. D. 96-98, was born at Narnia, in Umbria, A. D. 32. He was consul with Vespasian, 71, and with Domitian, 90. On the assassination of Domitian, in September, 96, Nerva, who had probably been privy to the conspiracy, was declared emperor at Rome by the people and the soldiers, and his administration at once restored tranquillity to the state. He stopped proceedings against those who had been accused of treason (majestas), and allowed many exiled persons to return to Rome. The class of informers were suppressed by penalties, and some were put to death. At the commencement of his reign, Nerva swore that he would put no senator to death; and he kept his word, even when a conspiracy had been formed against his life by Calpurnius Crassus. Though Nerva was virtuous and humane, he did not possess much energy and vigour; and his feebleness was shown by a mutiny of the Praetorian soldiers. The soldiers demanded the punishment of the assassins of Domitian, which the emperor refused. Though his body was feeble, his will was strong, and he offered them his own neck, and declared his readiness to die. However, it appears that the soldiers effected their purpose, and Nerva was obliged to put Petronius Secundus and Parthenius to death, or to permit them to be massacred by the soldiers. Nerva felt his weakness, but he showed his noble character and his good sense by appointing as his successor a man who possessed both vigour and ability to direct public affairs. He adopted as his son and successor, without any regard to his own kin, M. Ulpius Trajanus, who was then at the head of an army in Germany. Nerva died suddenly on the 27th of January, A. D. 98, at the age of 65 years.

Nervĭi, a powerful and warlike people in Gallia Belgica, whose territory extended from the river Sabis (Sambre) to the Ocean, and part of which was covered by the wood Arduenna. They were divided into several smaller tribes, the Centrones, Grudii, Levaci, Pleumoxii and Geiduni. In B. C. 58 they were defeated by Caesar with such slaughter that out of 60,000 men capable of bearing arms only 500 were left.

Nesactĭum, a town in Istria on the river Arsia, taken by the Romans, B. C. 177.

Nēsis (Nisita), a small island off the coast of Campania between Puteoli and Neapolis, and opposite Mt. Pausilypus. This island was a favourite residence of some of the Roman nobles.

Nessōnis (Νεσσωνίς), a lake in Thessaly, a little S. of the river Peneus, and N. E. of Larissa, is in summer merely a swamp, but in winter is not only full of water, but even overflows its banks. Nessonis and the neighbouring lake Boebeis were regarded by the ancients as remains of the vast lake, which was supposed to have covered the whole of Thessaly, till an outlet was made for its waters through the rocks of Tempe.

Nessus (Νέσσος), a centaur, who carried Deianira across the river Evenus, but, attempting to run away with her, was shot by Hercules with a poisoned arrow, which afterwards became the cause of the death of Hercules. See pp. 310, 311.

Nestor (Νέστωρ), king of Pylos, son of Neleus and Chloris, husband of Eurydice and father of Pisidice, Polycaste, Perseus, Stratius, Aretus, Echephron, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Thrasymedes. Some relate that, after the death of Eurydice, Nestor married Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus, and sister of Agamemnon; but this Anaxibia is elsewhere described as the wife of Strophius, and the mother of Pylades. When Hercules invaded the country of Neleus, and slew his sons, Nestor alone was spared, either because he was absent from Pylos, or because he had taken no part in carrying off from Hercules the oxen of Geryones. In his youth and early manhood, Nestor was a distinguished warrior. He defeated both the Arcadians and Eleans. He took part in the fight of the Lapithae against the Centaurs, and he is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters and the Argonauts. Although far advanced in age, he sailed with the other Greek heroes against Troy. Having ruled over three generations of men, his advice and authority were deemed equal to that of the immortal gods, and he was renowned for his wisdom, his justice, and his knowledge of war. After the fall of Troy he returned home, and arrived safely in Pylos, where Zeus granted to him the full enjoyment of old age, surrounded by intelligent and brave sons. Various towns in Peloponnesus, of the name of Pylos, laid claim to being the city of Nestor. On this point see p. 471, a.

Nestŏrĭdes (Νεστορίδης), i. e. a son of Nestor, as Antilochus and Pisistratus.

Nestorĭus, a celebrated Haeresiarch, was appointed patriarch of Constantinople A. D. 428, but in consequence of his heresy was deposed at the council of Ephesus, 431. His great opponent was Cyril. Nestorius was subsequently banished to one of the Oases in Egypt, and he died in exile probably before 450. Nestorius carefully distinguished between the divine and human nature attributed to Christ, and refused to give to the Virgin Mary the title of Theotocus (Θεοτόκος) or "Mother of God." The opinions of Nestorius are still maintained by the Nestorian Christians.

Nestus, sometimes Nessus (Νέστος: Mesto by the Greeks, Karasu by the Turks), a river in Thrace, which rises in Mt. Rhodope, flows S. E., and falls into the Aegaean sea W. of Abdera and opposite the island of Thasos. The Nestus formed the E. boundary of Macedonia from the time of Philip and Alexander the Great.

Nesus. [Oeniadae.]

Nētum (Netīnus: Noto Antiquo near Noto), a town in Sicily S. W. of Syracuse, and a dependency of the latter.

Neuri (Νεῦροι, Νευροί), a people of Sarmatia Europaea, whom Herodotus describes as not of Scythian race, though they followed Scythian customs. Having been driven out from their earlier abodes by a plague of serpents, they settled to the N.W. of the sources of the Tyras (Dniester). They were esteemed skilful in enchantment.

Nevirnum. [Noviodunum, No. 2.]

Nīcaea (Νικαία: Νικαιεύς, Νικαεύς, Nicaeensis, Nicensis). 1. (Iznik, Ru.), one of the most celebrated cities of Asia, stood on the E. side of the lake Ascania (Iznik) in Bithynia. Its site appears to have been occupied in very ancient times by a town called Attaea, and afterwards by a settlement of the Bottiaeans, called Ancore or Helicore, which was destroyed by the Mysians. Not long after the death of Alexander the Great, Antigonus built on the same spot a city which he named after himself, Antigonēa; but Lysimachus soon after changed the name into Nicaea, in honour of his wife. Under the kings of Bithynia it was often the royal residence, and it long disputed with Nicomedia the rank of capital of Bithynia. The Roman emperors bestowed upon it numerous honours and benefits, which are recorded on its coins. Its position, at the junction of several of the chief roads leading through Asia Minor to Constantinople, made it the centre of a large traffic. It is very famous in ecclesiastical history as the seat of the great Oecumenical Council, which Constantine convoked in A. D. 325, chiefly for the decision of the Arian controversy, and which drew up the Nicene Creed; that is to say, the first part of the well known creed so called, the latter part of which was added by the Council of Constantinople, in the year 381. The Council of Nice (as we commonly call it) also settled the time of keeping Easter. A second council held here in 787 decided in favour of the worship of images. In the very year of the great Council, Nicaea was overthrown by an earthquake, but it was restored by the emperor Valens in 368. Under the later emperors of the East, Nicaea long served as the bulwark of Constantinople against the Arabs and Turks: it was taken by the Seljuks in 1078, and became the capital of the Sultan Soliman; it was retaken by the First Crusaders in 1097. After the taking of Constantinople by the Venetians and the Franks, and the foundation of the Latin empire there in 1204, the Greek emperor Theodorus Lascaris made Nicaea the capital of a separate kingdom; in which his followers maintained themselves with various success against the Latins of Constantinople on the one side, and the Seljuks of Iconium on the other, and in 1261 regained Constantinople. At length, in 1330, Nicaea was finally taken by Orchan the son of the founder of the Ottoman empire, Othman. Iznik, the modern Nicaea, is a poor village of about 100 houses; but the double walls of the ancient city still remain almost complete, exhibiting 4 large and 2 small gates. There are also the remains of the 2 moles which formed the harbour on the lake, of an aqueduct, of the theatre, and of the gymnasium; in this last edifice, we are told, there was a point from which all the 4 gates were visible, so great was the regularity with which the city was built. — 2. (Nilab) a city of India, on the borders of the Paropamisadae, on the W. of the river Cophen. — 3. (Prob. Darapoor, Ru.), a city of India, on the river Hydaspes (Jelum) built by Alexander to commemorate his victory over Porus. — 4. A fortress of the Epicnemidian Locrians on the sea, near the pass of Thermopylae, which it commanded. From its important position, it is often mentioned in the wars of Greece with Macedonia and with the Romans. In the former, its betrayal to Philip by the Thracian dynast Phalaecus led to the decision of the Sacred War, B. C. 346; and after various changes, it is found, at the time of the wars with Rome, in the hands of the Aetolians. — 5. In Illyria. [Nicia]. — 6. An ancient name of Mariana in Corsica. — 7. (Nizza, Nice), a city on the coast of Liguria, a little E. of the river Var; a colony of Massilia, and subject to that city; hence it was considered as belonging to Gaul, though it was just beyond the frontier. It first became important as a stronghold of the Christian religion, which was preached there by Nazarius at an early period.

Nicander (Νίκανδρος). 1. King of Sparta, son of Charilaus, and father of Theopompus, reigned about B.C. 809—770. —2. A Greek poet, grammarian and physician, was a native of Claros near Colophon in Ionia, whence he is frequently called a Colophonian. He succeeded his father as one of the hereditary priests of Apollo Clarius. He appears to have flourished about B.C. 185—135. Of the numerous works of Nicander only two poems are extant, one entitled Theriaca (Θηριακά), which consists of nearly 1000 hexameter lines, and treats of venomous animals and the wounds inflicted by them, and another entitled Alexipharmaca (Ἀλεξιφάρμακα), which consists of more than 600 hexameter lines, and treats of poisons and their antidotes. Among the ancients his authority in all matters relating to toxicology seems to have been considered high. His works are frequently quoted by Pliny, Galen, and other ancient writers. His style is harsh and obscure; and his works are now scarcely ever read as poems, and are only consulted by those who are interested in points of zoological and medical antiquities. The best edition is by Schneider, who published the Alexipharmaca in 1792 Halae; and the Theriaca in 1816, Lips.

Nicānor (Νικάνωρ). 1. Son of Parmenion, a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander, died during the king's advance into Bactria, B. C. 330. — 2. A Macedonian officer, who, in the division of the provinces after the death of Perdiccas, (321), obtained the government of Cappadocia. He attached himself to the party of Antigonus, who made him governor of Media and the adjoining provinces, which he continued to hold until 312, when he was deprived of them by Seleucus. — 3. A Macedonian officer under Cassander, by whom he was secretly despatched, immediately on the death of Antipater, 319, to take the command of the Macedonian garrison at Munychia. Nicanor arrived at Athens before the news of Antipater's death, and thus readily obtained possession of the fortress. Soon afterwards he surprised the Piraeus also, and placed both fortresses in the hands of Cassander on the arrival of the latter in Attica in 318. Nicanor was afterwards despatched by Cassander with a fleet to the Hellespont, where he gained a victory over the admiral of Polysperchon. On his return to Athens he incurred the suspicion of Cassander, and was put to death.

Nicarchus (Νίκαρχος), the author of 38 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, appears to have lived at Rome near the beginning of the 2nd century of the Christian era.

Nicātor, Seleucus. [SELEUCUS.]

Nīcē (Νίκη), called Victōria by the Romans, the goddess of victory, is described as a daughter of Pallas and Styx, and as a sister of Zelus (zeal), Cratos (strength), and Bia (force). When Zeus commenced fighting against the Titans, and called upon the gods for assistance, Nice and her 2 sisters were the first who came forward, and Zeus was so pleased with their readiness, that he caused them ever after to live with him in Olympus. Nice had a celebrated temple on the acropolis at Athens, which is still extant and in excellent preservation. She is often seen represented in ancient works of art, especially with other divinities, such as Zeus and Athena, and with conquering heroes whose horses she guides. In her appearance she resembles Athena, but has wings, and carries a palm or a wreath, and is engaged in raising a trophy, or in inscribing the victory of the conqueror on a shield.

Nīcēphŏrĭum (Νικηφόριον). 1. (Rakkah), a fortified town of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, near the mouth of the river Bilecha (el Belikh), and due S. of Edessa, built by order of Alexander, and probably completed under Seleucus. It is doubtless the same place as the Callinīcus or Callinīcum (Καλλίνικος or ον), the fortifications of which were repaired by Justinian. Its name was again changed to Leontŏpŏlis, when it was adorned with fresh buildings by the emperor Leo. — 2. A fortress on the Propontis, belonging to the territory of Pergamus.

Nīcēphŏrĭus (Νικηφόριος), a river of Armenia Major, on which Tigranes built his residence TIGRANOCERTA. It was a tributary of the Upper Tigris; probably identical with the CENTRITES, or a small tributary of it.

Nīcēphŏrus (Νικηφόρος). 1. Callistus Xanthopulus, the author of the Ecclesiastical History, was born in the latter part of the 13th century, and died about 1450. His Ecclesiastical history was originally in 23 books, of which there are 18 extant, extending from the birth of Christ down to the death of the tyrant Phocas, in 610. Although Nicephorus compiled from the works of his predecessors, he entirely remodelled his materials, and his style is vastly superior to that of his contemporaries. Edited by Ducaeus, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. fol. — 2. Gregoras. [GREGORAS.] — 3. Patriarcha, originally the notary or chief secretary of state to the emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, subsequently retired into a convent, and was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 806. He was deposed in 815, and died in 828. Several of his works have come down to us, of which the most important is entitled Breviarium Historicum, a Byzantine history, extending from 602 to 770. This is one of the best works of the Byzantine period. Edited by Petavius, Paris, 1616.

Nicer (Neckar), a river in Germany falling into the Rhine at the modern Mannheim.

Niceratus (Νικήρατος). 1. Father of Nicias, the celebrated Athenian general. — 2. Son of Nicias, put to death by the 30 tyrants, to whom his great wealth was no doubt a temptation. — 3. A Greek writer on plants, one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia.

Nicētas (Νικήτας). 1. Acominatus, also called Choniates, because he was a native of Chonae, formerly Colossae, in Phrygia, one of the most important Byzantine historians, lived in the latter half of the 12th, and the former half of the 13th centuries. He held important public offices at Constantinople, and was present at the capture of the city by the Latins in 1204, of which he has given us a faithful description. He escaped to Nicaea, where he died about 1216. The history of Nicetas consists of 10 distinct works, each of which contains one or more books, of which there are 21, giving the history of the emperors from 1118 to 1206. The best edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1835. — 2. Eugenianus, lived probably towards the end of the 12th century, and wrote "The History of the Lives of Drusilla and Charicles," which is the worst of all the Greek romances that have come down to us. It was published for the first time by Boissonade, Paris, 1819, 2 vols.

Nicĭa (Enza ?), a tributary of the Po in Gallia Cisalpina.

Nicias (Νικίας). 1. A celebrated Athenian general during the Peloponnesian war, was the son of Niceratus, from whom he inherited a large fortune. His property was valued at 100 talents. From this cause, combined with his unambitious character, and his aversion to all dangerous innovations, he was naturally brought into connection with the aristocratical portion of his fellow-citizens. He was several times associated with Pericles, as strategus; and his great prudence and high character gained for him considerable influence. On the death of Pericles he came forward more openly as the opponent of Cleon, and the other demagogues of Athens; but from his military reputation, the mildness of his character, and the liberal use which he made of his great wealth, he was looked upon with respect by all classes of the citizens. His timidity led him to buy off the attacks of the sycophants. He was a man of strong religious feeling, and Aristophanes ridicules him in the Equites for his timidity and superstition. His characteristic caution was the distinguishing feature of his military career; and his military operations were almost always successful. He frequently commanded the Athenian armies during the earlier years of the Peloponnesian war. After the death of Cleon (B.C. 422) he exerted all his influence to bring about a peace, which was concluded in the following year (421). For the next few years Nicias used all his efforts to induce the Athenians to preserve the peace, and was constantly opposed by Alcibiades, who had now become the leader of the popular party. In 415, the Athenians resolved on sending their great expedition to Sicily, and appointed Nicias, Alcibiades and Lamachus to the command. Nicias disapproved of the expedition altogether, and did all that he could to divert the Athenians from this course. But his representations produced no effect; and he set sail for Sicily with his colleagues. Alcibiades was soon afterwards recalled [ALCIBIADES]; and the sole command was thus virtually left in the hands of Nicias. His early operations were attended with success. He defeated the Syracusans in the autumn, and employed the winter in securing the co-operation of several of the Greek cities, and of the Sicel tribes in the island. In the spring of next year he renewed his attacks upon Syracuse; he seized Epipolae, in which he was successful, and commenced the circumvallation of Syracuse. About this time Lamachus was slain, in a skirmish under the walls. All the attempts of the Syracusans to stop the circumvallation failed. The works were nearly completed, and the doom of Syracuse seemed sealed, when Gylippus, the Spartan, arrived in Sicily. [GYLIPPUS.] The tide of success now turned; and Nicias found himself obliged to send to Athens for reinforcements, and requested at the same time that another commander might be sent to supply his place, as his feeble health rendered him unequal to the discharge of his duties. The Athenians voted reinforcements, which were placed under the command of Demosthenes and Eurymedon; but they would not allow Nicias to resign his command. Demosthenes, upon his arrival in Sicily (413), made a vigorous effort to recover Epipolae, which the Athenians had lost. He was nearly successful, but was finally driven back with severe loss. Demosthenes now deemed any further attempts against the city hopeless, and therefore proposed to abandon the siege and return to Athens. To this Nicias would not consent. He professed to stand in dread of the Athenians at home; but he appears to have had reasons for believing that a party amongst the Syracusans themselves were likely in no long time to facilitate the reduction of the city. But meantime fresh succours arrived for the Syracusans; sickness was making ravages among the Athenian troops, and at length Nicias himself saw the necessity of retreating. Secret orders were given that every thing should be in readiness for departure, when an eclipse of the moon happened. The credulous superstition of Nicias led to the total destruction of the Athenian armament. The soothsayers interpreted the event as an injunction from the gods that they should not retreat before the next full moon, and Nicias resolutely determined to abide by their decision. The Syracusans resolved to bring the enemy to an engagement, and, in a decisive naval battle, defeated the Athenians. They were now masters of the harbour, and the Athenians were reduced to the necessity of making a desperate effort to escape. The Athenians were again decisively defeated; and having thus lost their fleet, they were obliged to retreat by land. They were pursued by the enemy, and were finally compelled to surrender. Both Nicias and Demosthenes were put to death by the Syracusans. — 2. The physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who offered to the Roman consul to poison the king, for a certain reward. Fabricius not only rejected his base offer with indignation, but immediately sent him back to Pyrrhus with notice of his treachery. He is sometimes, but erroneously, called Cineas. — 3. A Coan grammarian, who lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, with whom he was intimate. — 4. A celebrated Athenian painter, flourished about B.C. 320. He was the most distinguished disciple of Euphranor. His works seem to have been all painted in encaustic. One of his greatest paintings was a representation of the infernal regions as described by Homer. He refused to sell this picture to Ptolemy, although the price offered for it was 60 talents.

Nicochăres (Νικοχάρης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, the son of Philonides, was contemporary with Aristophanes.

Nicocles (Νικοκλῆς). 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, son of Evagoras, whom he succeeded B.C. 374. Isocrates addressed him a long panegyric upon his father's virtues, for which Nicocles rewarded the orator with the magnificent present of 20 talents. Scarcely any particulars are known of the reign of Nicocles. — He is said to have perished by a violent death, but neither the period nor circumstances of this event are recorded. — 2. Prince or ruler of Paphos, in Cyprus, during the period which followed the death of Alexander. He was at first one of those who took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus; but having subsequently entered into secret negotiations with Antigonus, he was compelled by Ptolemy to put an end to his own life, 310. — 3. Tyrant of Sicyon, was deposed by Aratus, after a reign of only 4 months, 251.

Nicocrĕon (Νικοκρέων), king of Salamis in Cyprus, at the time of Alexander's expedition into Asia. After the death of Alexander he took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus, and was entrusted by Ptolemy with the chief command over the whole island. Nicocreon is said to have ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to death in a stone mortar, in revenge for an insult which the latter had offered the king, when he visited Alexander at Tyre.

Nicolāus Chalcocondyles. [CHALCOCONDYLES.]

Nicolāus Damascēnus, a Greek historian, and an intimate friend both of Herod the Great and of Augustus. He was, as his name indicates, a native of Damascus, and a son of Antipater and Stratonice. He received an excellent education, and he carried on his philosophical studies in common with Herod, at whose court he resided. In B.C. 13 he accompanied Herod on a visit to Augustus at Rome; on which occasion Augustus made Nicolaus a present of the finest fruit of the palm-tree, which the emperor called Nicolai, — a name by which it continued to be known down to the Middle Ages. Nicolaus rose so high in the favour of Augustus, that he was on more than one occasion of great service to Herod, when the emperor was incensed against the latter. Nicolaus wrote a large number of works, of which the most important were: — 1. A life of himself, of which a considerable portion is still extant. 2. An universal history, which consisted of 144 books, of which we have only a few fragments. 3. A life of Augustus, from which we have some extracts made by command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. He also wrote commentaries on Aristotle, and other philosophical works, and was the author of several tragedies and comedies: Stobaeus has preserved a fragment of one of his comedies, extending to 44 lines. The best edition of his fragments is by Orelli, Lips. 1804.

Nicomăchus (Νικόμαχος). 1. Father of Aristotle. See p. 84, a. — 2. Son of Aristotle by the slave Herpyllis. He was himself a philosopher, and wrote some philosophical works. A portion of Aristotle's writings bears the name of Nicomachean Ethics, but why we cannot tell; whether the father so named them, as a memorial of his affection for his young son, or whether they derived their title from being afterwards edited and commented on by Nicomachus. — 3. Called Gerasenus, from his native place, Gerasa in Arabia, was a Pythagorean, and the writer of a life of Pythagoras, now lost. His date is inferred from his mention of Thrasyllus, who lived under Tiberius. He wrote on arithmetic and music; and 2 of his works on these subjects are still extant. The work on arithmetic was printed by Wechel, Paris, 1538; also, after the Theologumena Arithmeticae, attributed to Iamblichus, Lips. 1817. The work on music was printed by Meursius, in his collection, Lugd. Bat. 1616, and in the collection of Meibomius, Amst. 1652. — 4. Of Thebes, a celebrated painter, was the elder brother and teacher of the great painter Aristides. He flourished B.C. 360, and onwards. He was an elder contemporary of Apelles and Protogenes. He is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers in terms of the highest praise. Cicero says that in his works, as well as in those of Echion, Protogenes, and Apelles, every thing was already perfect. (Brutus, 18.)

Nīcomēdes (Νικομήδης). 1. I. King of Bithynia, was the eldest son of Zipoetes, whom he succeeded, B.C. 278. With the assistance of the Gauls, whom he invited into Asia, he defeated and put to death his brother Zipoetes, who had for some time held the independent sovereignty of a considerable part of Bithynia. The rest of his reign appears to have been undisturbed, and under his sway Bithynia rose to a high degree of power and prosperity. He founded the city of Nicomedia, which he made the capital of his kingdom. The length of his reign is uncertain, but he probably died about 250. He was succeeded by his son ZIELAS. — 2. II. Surnamed EPIPHANES, king of Bithynia, reigned B.C. 149—91. He was the son and successor of Prusias II., and 4th in descent from the preceding. He was brought up at Rome, where he succeeded in gaining the favour of the senate. Prusias, in consequence, became jealous of his son, and sent secret instructions for his assassination. The plot was revealed to Nicomedes, who thereupon returned to Asia, and declared open war against his father. Prusias was deserted by his subjects, and was put to death by order of his son, 149. Of the long and tranquil reign of Nicomedes few events have been transmitted to us. He courted the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Aristonicus, 131. He subsequently obtained possession of Paphlagonia, and attempted to gain Cappadocia, by marrying Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes VI. He was, however, expelled from Cappadocia by Mithridates; and he was also compelled by the Romans to abandon Paphlagonia, when they deprived Mithridates of Cappadocia. — 3. III. Surnamed PHILOPATOR, king of Bithynia (91—74), son and successor of Nicomedes II. Immediately after his accession, he was expelled by Mithridates, who set up against him his brother Socrates; but he was restored by the Romans in the following year (90). At the instigation of the Romans, Nicomedes now proceeded to attack the dominions of Mithridates, who expelled him a second time from his kingdom (88). This was the immediate occasion of the 1st Mithridatic war; at the conclusion of which (84) Nicomedes was again reinstated in his kingdom. He reigned nearly 10 years after this second restoration. He died at the beginning of 74, and having no children, by his will bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people.

Nīcomēdīa (Νικομηδεία: Νικομηδεύς, fem. Νικομήδισσα: Izmid or Iznikmid, Ru.), a celebrated city of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, built by king Nicomedes I. (B.C. 264), at the N.E. corner of the Sinus Astacenus (Gulf of Izmid: comp. ASTACUS). It was the chief residence of the kings of Bithynia, and it soon became one of the most splendid cities of the then known world. Under the Romans, it was a colony, and a favourite residence of several of the later emperors, especially of Diocletian and Constantine the Great. Though repeatedly injured by earthquakes, it was always restored by the munificence of the emperors. Like its neighbour and rival, NICAEA, it occupies an important place in the wars against the Turks; but it is still more memorable in history as the scene of Hannibal's death. It was the birthplace of the historian Arrian.

Nicōnīa or Nicōnīum, a town in Scythia on the right bank of the Tyras (Dniester).

Nīcŏphon and Nīcŏphron (Νικοφῶν, Νικόφρων), an Athenian comic poet, son of Theron, and a contemporary of Aristophanes at the close of his career.

Nīcŏpŏlis (Νικόπολις: Νικοπολίτης, Nicopolitānus). 1. (Paleoprevyza, Ru.), a city at the S.W. extremity of Epirus, on the point of land which forms the N. side of the entrance to the Gulf of Ambracia, opposite to Actium. It was built by Augustus in memory of the battle of Actium, and was peopled from Ambracia, Anactorium, and other neighbouring cities, and also with settlers from Aetolia. Augustus also built a temple of Apollo on a neighbouring hill, and founded games in honour of the god, which were held every 5th year. The city was received into the Amphictyonic league in place of the Dolopes. It is spoken of both as a libera civitas, and as a colony. It had a considerable commerce and extensive fisheries. It was made the capital of Epirus by Constantine, and its buildings were restored both by Julian and by Justinian. — 2. (Nicopoli), a city of Moesia Inferior, on the Danube, built by Trajan in memory of a victory over the Dacians, and celebrated as the scene of the great defeat of the Hungarians and Franks by the sultan Bajazet, on Sept. 28, 1396. — 3. (Enderez, or Devrigni?), a city of Armenia Minor, on or near the Lycus, and not far from the sources of the Halys, founded by Pompey on the spot where he gained his first victory over Mithridates: a flourishing place in the time of Augustus: restored by Justinian. — 4. A city in the N. E. corner of Cilicia, near the junction of the Taurus and Amanus. — 5. (Kars, Kiassera, or Caesar's Castle, Ru.), a city of Lower Egypt, about 2 or 3 miles E. of Alexandria, on the canal between Alexandria and Canopus, was built by Augustus in memory of his last victory over Antonius. Here also, as at Nicopolis opposite to Actium, Augustus founded a temple of Apollo, with games every 5th year. Not being mentioned after the time of the first Caesars, it would seem to have become a mere suburb of Alexandria.

Nicostrătus (Νικόστρατος), the youngest of the 3 sons of Aristophanes, was himself a comic poet. His plays belonged both to the middle and the new comedy.

Nigeir, Nigir, or Nigris (Νίγειρ, Νίγιρ, a compounded form of the word Geir or Gir, which seems to be a native African term for a river in general), changed, by a confusion which was the more easily made on account of the colour of the people of the region, into the Latin word Niger, a great river of Aethiopia Interior, which modern usage has identified with the river called Joli-ba (i. e. Great River) and Quorra (or rather Kowara), in W. Africa. As early as the time of Herodotus, we find an authentic statement concerning a river of the interior of Libya, which is evidently identical both with the Nigir of most of the ancient geographers, and with the Quorra. He tells us (ii. 32) that 5 young men of the Nasamones, a Libyan people on the Great Syrtis, on the N. coast of Africa, started to explore the desert parts of Libya; that, after crossing the inhabited part, and the region of the wild beasts, they journeyed many days through the Desert towards the W., till they came to a plain where fruit trees grew; and as they eat the fruit, they were seized by some little black men, whose language they could not understand, who led them through great marshes to a city, inhabited by the same sort of little black men, who were all enchanters; and a great river flowed by the city from W. to E., and in it there were crocodiles. Herodotus, like his informants, inferred from the course of the river, and from the crocodiles in it, that it was the Nile; but it can hardly be any river but the Quorra; and that the city was Timbuctoo is far more probable than not. The opinion, that the Niger was a W. branch of the Nile, prevailed very generally in ancient times; but by no means universally. Pliny gives the same account in a very confused manner, and makes the Nigris (as he calls it) the boundary between N. Africa and Aethiopia. Ptolemy, however, who evidently had new sources of information respecting the interior of Africa, makes the Nigeir rise not far from its real source (allowing for the imperfect observations on which his numerical latitudes and longitudes are founded) and follow a direction not very different from what that of the Joli-ba and Quorra would be if we suppose that the Zirmi, Koji, and Yeo, form an unbroken communication between the Quorra and the lake Tchad. But Ptolemy adds, what the most recent discoveries render a very remarkable statement, that a branch of the Nigeir communicates with the lake Libya (Λιϐύη), which he places in 16° 30′ N. lat. and 35° E. long. (i. e. from the Fortunate I. = 17° from Greenwich). This is almost exactly the position of lake Tchad; and, if the Tchadda really flows out of this lake, it will represent the branch of the Nigeir spoken of by Ptolemy, whose informants, however, seem to have inverted the direction of its stream. It is further remarkable that Ptolemy places on the Nigeir a city named Thamondocana in the exact position of Timbuctoo, and that the length of the river, computed from his position, agrees very nearly with its real length. The error of connecting the Niger and the Nile revived after the time of Ptolemy, and has only been exploded by very recent discoveries.

Nĭger, C. Pescennĭus, was governor of Syria during the latter end of the reign of Commodus, on whose death he was saluted emperor by the legions in the East, A. D. 193. But in the following year he was defeated and put to death by Septimius Severus. Many anecdotes have been preserved of the firmness with which Niger enforced the most rigid discipline among his troops; but he preserved his popularity by the impartiality which he displayed, and by the example of frugality, temperance, and hardy endurance of toil which he exhibited in his own person.

Nigīra (Νίγειρα, Ptol.: Jenneh?), a city on the N. side of the river Nigir, and the capital of the Nigritae.

Nigrītae or -ētes (Νιγρῖται, Νιγρῖται Αἰθίοπες, Νίγρητες), the N.-most of the Ethiopian (i. e. Negro) peoples of Central Africa, dwelt about the Nigir, in the great plain of Soudan.

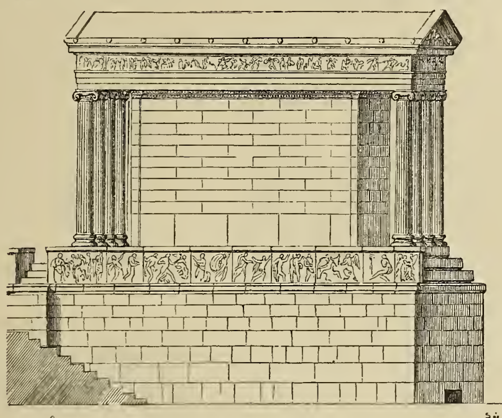
Nigrītis Lacus (Νιγρῖτις λίμνη), a lake in the interior of Africa, out of which Ptolemy represents the river Nigir as flowing. He places it about at the true source of the Nigir (i. e. the Joli-ba); but it is not yet discovered whether the river has its source in a lake. Some modern geographers identify it with the lake Debo, S. W. of Timbuctoo.

Nīlūpŏlis or Nīlus (Νείλου πόλις, Νεῖλος), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, in the Nomos Heracleopolites, was built on an island in the Nile, 20 geographical miles N. E. of Heracleopolis. There was a temple here in which, as throughout Egypt, the river Nile was worshipped as a god.



Nīlus (Νεῖλος, derived probably from a word which still exists in the old dialects of India, Nilas, i. e. black, and sometimes called Μέλας by the Greeks: Νεῖλος occurs first in Hesiod; Homer calls the river Αἰγυπτός: Nile, Arab. Bahr-Nil, or simply Bahr, i. e. the River: the modern names of its upper course, in Nubia and Abyssinia, are various). This river, one of the most important in the world, flows through a channel which forms a sort of cleft extending N. and S. through the high rocky and sandy land of N.E. Africa. Its W. or main branch has not yet been traced to its source, but it has been followed up to a point in 4° 42′ N. lat. and 30° 58′ E. long., where it is a rapid mountain stream, running at the rate of 6 knots an hour over a rocky bed, free from alluvial soil. After a course in the general direction of N. N. E. as far as a place called Khartum, in 15° 34′ N. lat. and 32° 30′ E. long., this river, which is called the Bahr-el-Abiad, i. e. White River, receives another large river, the Bahr-el-Azrek, i. e. Blue River, the sources of which are in the highlands of Abyssinia, about 11° N. lat. and 37 E. long: this is the middle branch of the Nile system, the ASTAPUS of the ancients. The third, or E. branch, called Tacazze, the ASTABORAS of the ancients, rises also in the highlands of Abyssinia, in about 11° 40′ N. lat., and 39° 40′ E. long., and joins the Nile (i. e. the main stream formed by the union of the Abiad and the Azrek), in 17° 45′ N. lat., and about 34° 5′ E. long.: the point of junction was the apex of the island of MEROE. Here the united river is about 2 miles broad. Hence it flows through Nubia, in a magnificent rocky valley, falling over 6 cataracts, the N.-most of which, called the First cataract (i. e. to a person going up the river), is and has always been the S. boundary of Egypt. Of its course from this point, to its junction with the Mediterranean, a sufficient general description has been given under AEGYPTUS (p. 14). The branches into which it parted at the S. point of the Delta were, in ancient times, 3 in number, and these again parted into 7, of which, Herodotus tells us, 5 were natural and 2 artificial. These 7 mouths were nearly all named from cities which stood upon them: they were called, proceeding from E. to W., the Pelusiac, the Tanitic or Saïtic, the Mendesian, the Phatnitic or Pathmetic or Bucolic, the Sebennytic, the Bolbitic or Bolbitine, and the Canobic or Canopic. Through the alterations caused by the alluvial deposits of the river, they have now all shifted their positions, or dwindled into little channels, except 2, and these are much diminished; namely, the Damiat mouth on the E. and the Rosetta mouth on the W. Of the canals connected with the Nile in the Delta, the most celebrated were the Canobic, which connected the Canobic mouth with the lake Mareotis and with Alexandria, and that of Ptolemy (afterwards called that of Trajan) which connected the Nile at the beginning of the Delta with the bay of Heroöpolis at the head of the Red Sea: the formation of the latter is ascribed to king Necho, and its repair and improvement successively to Darius the son of Hystaspes, Ptolemy Philadelphus and Trajan. That the Delta, and indeed the whole alluvial soil of Egypt has been created by the Nile, cannot be doubted; but the present small rate of deposit proves that the formation must have been made long before the historical period. The periodical rise of the river has been spoken of under AEGYPTUS. It is caused by the tropical rains on the highlands in which it rises. The best ancient accounts, preserved by Ptolemy, place its source in a range of mountains in Central Africa, called the Mountains of the Moon; and the most recent information points to a range of mountains, a little N. of the Equator, called Jebel-el-Kumri, or the Blue Mountain, as containing the probable sources of the Bahr Abiad. The ancient Egyptians deified the Nile, and took the utmost care to preserve its water from pollution.

Ninus, the reputed founder of the city of Ninus or Nineveh. An account of his exploits is given under Semiramis, his wife, whose name was more celebrated. [SEMIRAMIS.]

Nĭnus, Nĭnīvē (Νίνος, or less correctly Νῖνος: O. T. Nineveh, LXX. Νινευή, Νινευί: Νίνιος, Ninivītae, pl.), the capital of the great Assyrian monarchy, and one of the most ancient cities in the world, stood on the E. side of the Tigris, at the upper part of its course, in the district of Aturia. The accounts of its foundation and history are as various as those respecting the Assyrian monarchy in general [ASSYRIA]. The Greek and Roman writers ascribe its foundation to Ninus; but in the book of Genesis (x. 11) we are told, immediately after the mention of the kingdom of Nimrod and his foundation of Babel and other cities in Shinar (i. e. Babylonia), that "out of that land went forth Asshur" (or otherwise, "he — i. e. Nimrod — went forth into Assyria"), "and builded Nineveh." There is no further mention of Nineveh in Scripture till the reign of Jeroboam II., about B. C. 825, when the prophet Jonah was commissioned to preach repentance to its inhabitants. It is then described as "an exceeding great city, of 3 days' journey," and as containing "more than 120,000 persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand," which, if this phrase refers to children, would represent a population of 600,000 souls. The other passages, in which the Hebrew prophets denounce ruin against it, bear witness to its size, wealth, and luxury, and the latest of them (Zeph. ii. 13) is dated only a few years before the final destruction of the city, which was effected by the Medes and Babylonians about B. C. 606. It is said by Strabo to have been larger than Babylon, and Diodorus describes it as an oblong quadrangle of 150 stadia by 90, making the circuit of the walls 480 stadia (more than 55 statute miles): if so, the city was twice as large as London together with its suburbs. In judging of these statements, not only must allowance be made for the immense space occupied by palaces and temples, but also for the Oriental mode of building a city, so as to include large gardens and other open spaces within the walls. The walls of Nineveh are described as 100 feet high, and thick enough to allow 3 chariots to pass each other on them; with 1500 towers, 200 feet in height. The city is said to have been entirely destroyed by fire when it was taken by the Medes and Babylonians, about B. C. 606; and frequent allusions occur to its desolate state. Under the Roman empire, however, we again meet with a city Nineve, in the district of Adiabene, mentioned by Tacitus, and again by Ammianus Marcellinus, and a medieval historian of the 13th century mentions a fort of the same name: but statements like these must refer to some later place built among or near the ruins of the ancient Nineveh. Thus, of all the great cities of the world, none was thought to have been more utterly lost than the capital of the most ancient of the great monarchies. Tradition pointed out a few shapeless mounds opposite Mosul on the Upper Tigris, as all that remained of Nineveh; and a few fragments of masonry were occasionally dug up there, and elsewhere in Assyria, bearing inscriptions in an almost unknown character, called, from its shape, cunei-form or arrow-headed. Within the last 10 years, however, those shapeless mounds have been shown to contain the remains of great palaces, on the walls of which the scenes of Assyrian life and the records of Assyrian conquests are sculptured; while the efforts which had long been made to decipher the cuneiform inscriptions found in Persia and Babylonia, as well as Assyria, have been so far successful as to make it probable that we may soon read the records of Assyrian history from her own monuments. It is as yet premature to form definite conclusions to any great extent. The results of Major Rawlinson's study of the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria are only in process of publication. The excavations conducted by Dr. Layard and M. Botta have brought to light the sculptured remains of immense palaces, not only at the traditional site of Nineveh, namely Kouyunjik and Nebbi-Yunus, opposite to Mosul, and at Khorsabad, about 10 miles to the N.N.E., but also in a mound, 18 miles lower down the river, in the tongue of land between the Tigris and the Great Zab, which still bears the name of Nimroud; and it is clear that their remains belong to different periods, embracing the records of two distinct dynasties, extending over several generations; none of which can be later than B. C. 606, while some of them probably belong to a period at least as ancient as the 13th, and perhaps even the 15th century B. C. There are other mounds of ruins as yet unexplored. Which of these ruins correspond to the true site of Nineveh, or whether (as Dr. Layard suggests) that vast city may have extended all the way along the Tigris from Kouyunjik to Nimroud, and to a corresponding breadth N. E. of the river, as far as Khorsabad, are questions still under discussion. Meanwhile, the study of the monuments and inscriptions thus discovered must soon throw fresh light on the whole subject. Some splendid fragments of sculpture, obtained by Dr. Layard from Nimroud, are now to be seen in the British Museum.

Ninўas (Νινύας), son of Ninus and Semiramis. See Semiramis.

Nĭŏbē (Νιόβη). 1. Daughter of Phoroneus, and by Zeus the mother of Argus and Pelasgus. — 2. Daughter of Tantalus by the Pleiad Taygete or the Hyad Dione. She was the sister of Pelops, and the wife of Amphion, king of Thebes, by whom she became the mother of 6 sons and 6 daughters. Being proud of the number of her children, she deemed herself superior to Leto, who had given birth to only 2 children. Apollo and Artemis, indignant at such presumption, slew all her children with their arrows. For 9 days their bodies lay in their blood without any one burying them, for Zeus had changed the people into stones; but on the 10th day the gods themselves buried them. Niobe herself, who had gone to Mt. Sipylus, was metamorphosed into stone, and even thus continued to feel the misfortune with which the gods had visited her. This is the Homeric story, which later writers have greatly modified and enlarged. The number and names of the children of Niobe vary very much in the different accounts; for while Homer states that their number was 12, Hesiod and others mentioned 20, Alcman only 6, Sappho 18, and Herodotus 4; but the most commonly received number in later times appears to have been 14, namely 7 sons and 7 daughters. According to Homer all the children of Niobe fell by the arrows of Apollo and Artemis; but later writers state that one of her sons, Amphion or Amyclas, and one of her daughters, Meliboea, were saved, but that Meliboea, having turned pale with terror at the sight of her dying brothers and sisters, was afterwards called Chloris. The time and place at which the children of Niobe were destroyed are likewise stated differently. According to Homer, they perished in their mother's house. According to Ovid, the sons were slain while they were engaged in gymnastic exercises in a plain near Thebes, and the daughters during the funeral of their brothers. Others, again, transfer the scene to Lydia, or make Niobe, after the death of her children, go from Thebes to Lydia, to her father Tantalus on Mt. Sipylus, where Zeus, at her own request, metamorphosed her into a stone, which during the summer always shed tears. In the time of Pausanias people still fancied they could see the petrified figure of Niobe on Mt. Sipylus. The tomb of the children of Niobe, however, was shown at Thebes. The story of Niobe and her children was frequently taken as a subject by ancient artists. One of the most celebrated of the ancient works of art still extant is the group of Niobe and her children, which filled the pediment of the temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome, and which was discovered at Rome in the year 1583. This group is now at Florence, and consists of the mother, who holds her youngest daughter on her knees, and 13 statues of her sons and daughters, besides a figure usually called the paedagogus of the children. The Romans themselves were uncertain whether the group was the work of Scopas or Praxiteles.

Nĭphātes (ὁ Νιφάτης, i. e. Snow-mountain: Balan), a mountain chain of Armenia, forming an E. prolongation of the Taurus from where it is crossed by the Euphrates towards the Lake of Van, before reaching which it turns to the S., and approaches the Tigris below Tigranocerta; thus surrounding on the N. and E. the basin of the highest course of the Tigris (which is enclosed on the S. and S.W. by Mt. Masius), and dividing it from the valley of the Arsanias (Murad) or S. branch of the Euphrates. The continuation of Mt. Niphates to the S.E. along the E. margin of the Tigris valley is formed by the mountains of the Carduchi (Mts. of Kurdistan).

Nīreus (Νιρεύς), son of Charopus and Aglaia, was, next to Achilles, the handsomest among the Greeks at Troy. He came from the island of Syme (between Rhodes and Cnidus). Later writers relate that he was slain by Eurypylus or Aeneas.

Nisaea. [Megara.]

Nisaea, Nisaei, Nisaeus Campus (Νίσαια, Νισαῖοι, τὸ Νίσαιον πεδίον), these names are found in the Greek and Roman writers used for various places on the S. and S.E. of the Caspian: thus one writer mentions a city Nisaea in Margiana, and another a people Nisaei in the N. of Aria; but most apply the term Nisaean Plain to a plain in the N. of Great Media, near Rhagae, the pasture ground of a great number of horses of the finest breed, which supplied the studs of the king and nobles of Persia. It seems not unlikely that this breed of horses was called Nisaean from their original home in Margiana (a district famous for its horses) and that the Nisaean plain received its name from the horses kept in it.

Nisĭbis (Νίσιβις: Νισιβηνός). 1. Also Antiochīa Mygdoniae (O. T. Aram Zoba? Ru. nr. Nisi- bin), a celebrated city of Mesopotamia, and the capital of the district of Mygdonia, stood on the river Mygdonius (Nahr-al-Huali) 37 Roman miles S.W. of Tigranocerta, in a very fertile district. It was the centre of a considerable trade, and was of great importance as a military post. In the successive wars between the Romans and Tigranes, the Parthians, and the Persians, it was several times taken and retaken, until at last it fell into the hands of the Persians in the reign of Jovian. — 2. A city of Aria at the foot of M. Paropamisus.

Nīsus (Νῖσος). 1. King of Megara, was son of Pandion and Pylia, brother of Aegeus, Pallas, and Lycus, and husband of Abrote, by whom he became the father of Scylla. When Megara was besieged by Minos, Scylla, who had fallen in love with Minos, pulled out the purple or golden hair which grew on the top of her father's head, and on which his life depended. Nisus thereupon died, and Minos obtained possession of the city. Minos, however, was so horrified at the conduct of the unnatural daughter, that he ordered Scylla to be fastened to the poop of his ship, and afterwards drowned her in the Saronic gulf. According to others, Minos left Megara in disgust; Scylla leapt into the sea, and swam after his ship; but her father, who had been changed into a sea-eagle (haliaeëtus), pounced down upon her, whereupon she was metamorphosed into either a fish or a bird called Ciris. — Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, is sometimes confounded by the poets with Scylla, the daughter of Phorcus. Hence the latter is sometimes erroneously called Niseia Virgo, and Nisēis. [SCYLLA.] — Nisaea, the port town of Megara, is supposed to have derived its name from Nisus, and the promontory of Scyllaeum from his daughter. — 2. Son of Hyrtacus, and a friend of Euryalus. The two friends accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and perished in a night attack against the Rutulian camp.

Nisȳrus (Νίσυρος: Nikero), a small island in the Carpathian Sea, a little distance off the promontory of Caria called Triopium, of a round form, 80 stadia (8 geog. miles) in circuit, and composed of lofty rocks, the highest being 2271 feet high. Its volcanic nature gave rise to the fable respecting its origin, that Poseidon tore it off the neighbouring island of Cos to hurl it upon the giant Polybotes. It was celebrated for its warm springs, wine, and mill-stones. Its capital, of the same name, stood on the N.W. of the island, where considerable ruins of its Acropolis remain. Its first inhabitants are said to have been Carians; but already in the heroic age it had received a Dorian population, like other islands near it, with which it is mentioned by Homer as sending troops to the Greeks. It received other Dorian settlements in the historical age. At the time of the Persian War, it belonged to the Carian queen Artemisia: it next became a tributary ally of Athens: though transferred to the Spartan alliance by the issue of the Peloponnesian War, it was recovered for Athens by the victory at Cnidus, B. C. 394. After the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, it was assigned to Rhodes; and, with the rest of the Rhodian republic, was united to the Roman empire about B. C. 70.

Nitiobrīges, a Celtic people in Gallia Aquitanica between the Garumna and the Liger, whose fighting force consisted of 5000 men. Their chief town was AGINNUM (Agen).

Nitōcris (Νίτωκρις). 1. A queen of Babylon, mentioned by Herodotus, who ascribes to her many important works at Babylon and its vicinity. It is supposed by most modern writers that she was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, and the mother or grandmother of Labynetus or Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon. — 2. A queen of Egypt, was elected to the sovereignty in place of her brother, whom the Egyptians had killed. In order to take revenge upon the murderers of her brother, she built a very long chamber under ground, and when it was finished invited to a banquet in it those of the Egyptians who had had a principal share in the murder. While they were engaged in the banquet she let in upon them the waters of the Nile by means of a large concealed pipe, and drowned them all, and then, in order to escape punishment, threw herself into a chamber full of ashes. This is the account of Herodotus. We learn from other authorities that she was a celebrated personage in Egyptian legends. She is said to have built the third pyramid, by which we are to understand, that she finished the third pyramid, which had been commenced by Mycerinus. Modern writers make her the last sovereign of the 6th dynasty, and state that she reigned 6 years in place of her murdered husband (not her brother, as Herodotus states), whose name was Menthuôphis. The latter is supposed to be the son or grandson of the Moeris of the Greeks and Romans.

Nitriae, Nitrariae (Νιτρίαι, Νίτρια, Νίτραιαι: Birket-el-Duarah), the celebrated natron lakes in Lower Egypt, which lay in a valley on the S.W. margin of the Delta, and gave to the surrounding district the name of the Νομὸς Νιτριώτις or Νιτριώτης, and to the inhabitants, whose chief occupation was the extraction of the natron from the lakes, the name of Νιτριῶται. This district was the chief seat of the worship of Serapis, and the only place in Egypt where sheep were sacrificed.

Nixi Dii, a general term, applied by the Romans to those divinities who were believed to assist women in child-birth.

Nōbilior, Fulvius, plebeians. This family was originally called Paetinus, and the name of Nobilior was first assumed by No. 1, to indicate that he was more noble than any others of this name. 1. Ser., consul B. C. 255, with M. Aemilius Paulus, about the middle of the 1st Punic war. The 2 consuls were sent to Africa, to bring off the survivors of the army of Regulus. On their way to Africa they gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians; but on their return to Italy, they were wrecked off the coast of Sicily, and most of their ships were destroyed. — 2. M., grandson of the preceding, curule aedile 195; praetor 193, when he defeated the Celtiberi in Spain, and took the town of Toletum; and consul 189, when he received the conduct of the war against the Aetolians. He took the town of Ambracia, and compelled the Aetolians to sue for peace. On his return to Rome in 187, he celebrated a most splendid triumph. In 179 he was censor with M. Aemilius Lepidus, the pontifex maximus. Fulvius Nobilior had a taste for literature and art; he was a patron of the poet Ennius, who accompanied him in his Aetolian campaign; and he belonged to that party among the Roman nobles who were introducing into the city a taste for Greek literature and refinement. He was, therefore, attacked by Cato the censor, who made merry with his name, calling him mo- bilior instead of nobilior. Fulvius, in his censorship, erected a temple to Hercules and the Muses in the Circus Flaminius, as a proof that the state ought to cultivate the liberal arts; and he adorned it with the paintings and statues which he had brought from Greece upon his conquest of Aetolia. — 3. M., son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 171; curule aedile 166, the year in which the Andria of Terence was performed; and consul 159. — 4., Q., also son of No. 2, consul 153, when he had the conduct of the war against the Celtiberi in Spain, by whom he was defeated with great loss. He was censor in 136. He inherited his father's love for literature: he presented the poet Ennius with the Roman franchise when he was a triumvir for founding a colony.

Nōla (Nolānus: Nola), one of the most ancient towns in Campania, 21 Roman miles S. E. of Capua, on the road from that place to Nuceria, was founded by the Ausonians, but afterwards fell into the hands of the Tyrrheni (Etruscans), whence some writers call it an Etruscan city. In B. C. 327 Nola was sufficiently powerful to send 2000 soldiers to the assistance of Neapolis. In 313 the town was taken by the Romans. It remained faithful to the Romans even after the battle of Cannae, when the other Campanian towns revolted to Hannibal; and it was allowed in consequence to retain its own constitution as an ally of the Romans. In the Social war it fell into the hands of the confederates, and when taken by Sulla it was burnt to the ground by the Samnite garrison. It was afterwards rebuilt, and was made a Roman colony by Vespasian. The emperor Augustus died at Nola. In the neighbourhood of the town some of the most beautiful Campanian vases have been found in modern times. According to an ecclesiastical tradition, church bells were invented at Nola, and were hence called Campanae.

Nomentānus, mentioned by Horace as proverbially noted for extravagance and a riotous mode of living. The Scholiasts tell us that his full name was L. Cassius Nomentanus.

Nōmentum (Nomentanus: La Mentana), originally a Latin town founded by Alba, but subsequently a Sabine town, 14 (Roman) miles from Rome, from which the Via Nomentana (more anciently Via Ficulensis) and the Porta Nomentana at Rome derived their name. The neighbourhood of the town was celebrated for its wine.

Nōmĭa (τὰ Νόμια), a mountain in Arcadia on the frontiers of Laconia, is said to have derived its name from a nymph Nomia.

Nōmĭus (Νόμιος), a surname of divinities protecting the pastures and shepherds, such as Apollo, Pan, Hermes, and Aristaeus.

Nōnācris (Νώνακρις: Νωνακριάτης, Νωνακριεύς), a town in the N. of Arcadia, N.W. of Pheneus, was surrounded by lofty mountains, in which the river Styx took its origin. The town is said to have derived its name from Nonacris, the wife of Lycaon. From this town Hermes is called Nonacriates, Evander Nonacrius, Atalanta Nonacria, and Callisto Nonacrina Virgo, in the general sense of Arcadian.

Nōnĭus Marcellus. [MARCELLUS.]

Nōnĭus Sufēnas. [SUFENAS.]

Nonnus (Νόννος). 1. A Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and lived in the 6th century of the Christian era. Respecting his life nothing is known, except that he was a Christian. He is the author of an enormous epic poem, which has come down to us under the name of Dionysiaca or Bassarica (Διονυσιακά or Βασσαρικά), and which consists of 48 books. The work has no literary merit; the style is bombastic and inflated; and the incidents are patched together with little or no coherence. Edited by Graefe, Lips. 1819—1826, 2 vols. 8vo. Nonnus also made a paraphrase of the gospel of St. John in Hexameter verse, which is likewise extant. Edited by Heinsius, Lugd. Bat. 1627. — 2. Theophanes Nonnus, a Greek medical writer who lived in the 10th century after Christ. His work is entitled a "Compendium of the whole Medical art," and is compiled from previous writers. Edited by Bernard, Gothae et Amstel. 1794, 1795, 2 vols.

Nōra (τὰ Νῶρα: Νωρανός, Norensis). 1. (Torre Forcadizo), one of the oldest cities of Sardinia, founded by Iberian settlers under Norax, stood on the coast of the Sinus Caralitanus, 32 Roman miles S.W. of Caralis. — 2. A mountain fortress of Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia, on the N. side of the Taurus, noted for the siege sustained in it by Eumenes against Antigonus for a whole winter. In the time of Strabo, who calls it Νηροασσός, it was the treasury of Sisinas, a pretender to the throne of Cappadocia.

Norba (Norbanensis, Norbanus). 1. (Norma), a strongly fortified town in Latium on the slope of the Volscian mountains and near the sources of the Nymphaeus, originally belonged to the Latin and subsequently to the Volscian league. As early as B. C. 492 the Romans founded a colony at Norba. It espoused the cause of Marius in the civil war, and was destroyed by fire by its own inhabitants, when it was taken by one of Sulla's generals. There are still remains of polygonal walls, and a subterraneous passage at Norma. — 2. Surnamed Caesarēa (Alcantara), a Roman colony in Lusitania on the left bank of the Tagus, N.W. of Augusta Emerita. The bridge built by order of Trajan over the Tagus at this place is still extant. It is 600 feet long by 28 wide, and contains 6 arches.

Norbānus, C., tribune of the plebs, B. C. 95, when he accused Q. Servilius Caepio of majestas, but was himself accused of the same crime in the following year, on account of disturbances which took place at the trial of Caepio. In 90 or 89, Norbanus was praetor in Sicily during the Marsic war; and in the civil wars he espoused the Marian party. He was consul in 83, when he was defeated by Sulla near Capua. In the following year, 82, he joined the consul Carbo in Cisalpine Gaul, but their united forces were entirely defeated by Metellus Pius. Norbanus escaped from Italy, and fled to Rhodes, where he put an end to his life, when his person was demanded by Sulla.

Norbānus Flaccus. [FLACCUS.]

Norēĭa (Νωρήεια: Neumarkt in Styria), the ancient capital of the Taurisci or Norici in Noricum, from which the whole country probably derived its name. It was situated in the centre of Noricum, a little S. of the river Murius, and on the road from Virunum to Ovilaba. It is celebrated as the place where Carbo was defeated by the Cimbri, B. C. 113. It was besieged by the Boii in the time of Julius Caesar. (Caes. B. G. i. 5.)

Nōrĭcum, a Roman province S. of the Danube, which probably derived its name from the town of NOREIA, was bounded on the N. by the Danube, on the W. by Rhaetia and Vindelicia, on the E. by Pannonia, and on the S. by Pannonia and Italy. It was separated from Rhaetia and Vindelicia by the river Aenus (Inn), from Pannonia on the E. by M. Cetius, and from Pannonia and Italy on the S. by the river Savus, the Alpes Carnicae, and M. Ocra. It thus corresponds to the greater part of Styria and Carinthia, and a part of Austria, Bavaria, and Salzburg. Noricum was a mountainous country, for it was not only surrounded on the S. and E. by mountains, but one of the main branches of the Alps, the Alpes Noricae (in the neighbourhood of Salzburg), ran right through the province. In those mountains a large quantity of excellent iron was found; and the Noric swords were celebrated in antiquity. Gold also is said to have been found in the mountains in ancient times. The inhabitants of the country were Celts, divided into several tribes, of which the Taurisci, also called Norici, after their capital Noreia, were the most important. They were conquered by the Romans towards the end of the reign of Augustus, after the subjugation of Raetia by Tiberius and Drusus, and their country was formed into a Roman province. In the later division of the Roman empire into smaller provinces, Noricum was formed into 2 provinces, N. Ripense, along the bank of the Danube, and N. Mediterraneum, separated from the former by the mountains, which divide Austria and Styria: they both belonged to the diocese of Illyricum and the prefecture of Italy.

Nortĭa or Nurtĭa, an Etruscan divinity, worshipped at Volsinii, where a nail was driven every year into the wall of her temple, for the purpose of marking the number of years.

Nossis, a Greek poetess, of Locri in Italy, lived about B. C. 310, and is the author of 12 epigrams of considerable beauty in the Greek Anthology.

Nŏtus. [Auster.]

Novarĭa (Novarensis: Novara), a town in Gallia Transpadana, situated on a river of the same name (Gogna), and on the road from Mediolanum to Vercellae, subsequently a Roman municipium.

Novatiānus, a heretic, who insisted upon the perpetual exclusion from the Church of all Christians, who had fallen away from the faith under the terrors of persecution. On the election of Cornelius to the see of Rome, A. D. 251, Novatianus was consecrated bishop by a rival party, but was condemned by the council held in the autumn of the same year. After a vain struggle to maintain his position, he was obliged to give way, and became the founder of a new sect, who from him derived the name of Novatians. It should be observed that the individual who first proclaimed these doctrines was not Novatianus, but an African presbyter under Cyprian, named Novatus. Hence much confusion has arisen between Novatus and Novatianus, who ought, however, to be carefully distinguished. A few of the works of Novatianus are extant. The best edition of them is by Jackson, Lond. 1728.

Novātus. [Novatianus.]

Novensĭles or Novensĭdes Dii, Roman gods whose name is probably composed of nove and insides, and therefore signifies the new gods in opposition to the Indigetes, or old native divinities. It was customary among the Romans, after the conquest of a neighbouring town, to carry its gods to Rome, and there establish their worship.

Novesĭum (Neuss), a fortified town of the Ubii on the Rhine, and on the road leading from Colonia Agrippina (Cologne), to Castra Vetera (Xanten). The fortifications of this place were restored by Julian in A. D. 359.

Noviodūnum, a name given to many Celtic places from their being situated on a hill (dun). 1. (Nouan), a town of the Bituriges Cubi in Gallia Aquitanica, E. of their capital Avaricum. — 2. (Nevers), a town of the Aedui in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the road from Augustodunum to Lutetia, and at the confluence of the Niveris and the Liger, whence it was subsequently called Nevirnum, and thus acquired its modern name. — 3. A town of the Suessones in Gallia Belgica, probably the same as Augusta Suessonum. [Augusta, No. 6.] — 4. (Nion), a town of the Helvetii in Gallia Belgica, on the N. bank of the Lacus Lemanus, was made a Roman colony by Julius Caesar, B. C. 45, under the name of Colonia Equestris. — 5. (Isaczi), a fortress in Moesia Inferior on the Danube, near which Valens built his bridge of boats across the Danube in his campaign against the Goths.

Noviomagus or Noeomagus. 1. (Castelnan de Medoc), a town of the Bituriges Vivisci in Gallia Aquitanica, N. W. of Burdigala. — 2. A town of the Tricastini in Gallia Narbonensis, probably the modern Nions, though some suppose it to be the same place as Augusta Tricastinorum (Aouste). — 3. (Spires), the capital of the Nemetes. [Nemetes.] — 4. (Neumagen), a town of the Treviri in Gallia Belgica on the Mosella. — 5. (Nimwegen), a town of the Batavi.

Nŏvĭus, Q., a celebrated writer of Atellane plays, a contemporary of the dictator Sulla.

Novum Comum. [Comum.]

Nūba Palus (Νοῦβα λίμνη: prob. L. Fittreh, in Dar Zaleh), a lake in Central Africa, receiving the great river Gir, according to Ptolemy, who places it in 15° N. lat. and 40° E. long. (=22° from Greenwich.)

Nūbae, Nubaei (Νοῦβαι, Νουβαῖοι), an African people, who are found in 2 places, namely about the lake Nuba, and also on the banks of the Nile N. of Meroë, that is, in the N. central part of Nubia: the latter were governed by princes of their own, independent of Meroë. By the reign of Diocletian they had advanced N.-wards as far as the frontier of Egypt.

Nūcĕrĭa (Nucerīnus.) 1. Surnamed Alfaterna (Nocera), a town in Campania on the Sarnus (Sarno), and on the Via Appia, S. E. of Nola, and 9 (Roman) miles from the coast, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was again taken by Hannibal after the battle of Cannae, when it was burnt to the ground. It was subsequently rebuilt, and both Augustus and Nero planted here colonies of veterans. Pompeii was used as the harbour of Nuceria. — 2. Surnamed Camellaria (Nocera), a town in the interior of Umbria on the Via Flaminia. — 3. (Luzzara), a small town in Gallia Cispadana on the Po, N. E. of Brixellum. — 4. A town in Apulia, more correctly called Luceria.

Nuithones, a people of Germany, dwelling on the right bank of the Albis (Elbe), S. W. of the Saxones, and N. of the Langobardi, in the S. E. part of the modern Mecklenburg.

Nūma, Marcĭus. 1. An intimate friend of Numa Pompilius, whom he is said to have accompanied to Rome, where Numa made him the 1st Pontifex Maximus. Marcius aspired to the kingly dignity on the death of Pompilius, and he starved himself to death on the election of Tullus Hostilius. — 2. Son of the preceding, is said to have married Pompilia, the daughter of Numa Pompilius, and to have become by her the father of Ancus Marcius. Numa Marcius was appointed by Tullus Hostilius praefectus urbi.

Nŭma Pompilĭus, the 2nd king of Rome, who belongs to legend and not to history. He was a native of Cures in the Sabine country, and was elected king one year after the death of Romulus, when the people became tired of the interregnum of the senate. He was renowned for his wisdom and his piety; and it was generally believed that he had derived his knowledge from Pythagoras. His reign was long and peaceful, and he devoted his chief care to the establishment of religion among his rude subjects. He was instructed by the Camena Egeria, who visited him in a grove near Rome, and who honoured him with her love. He was revered by the Romans as the author of their whole religious worship. It was he who first appointed the pontiffs, the augurs, the flamens, the virgins of Vesta, and the Salii. He founded the temple of Janus, which remained always shut during his reign. The length of his reign is stated differently. Livy makes it 43 years; Polybius and Cicero, 39 years. The sacred books of Numa, in which he prescribed all the religious rites and ceremonies, were said to have been buried near him in a separate tomb, and to have been discovered by accident, 500 years afterwards, in B. C. 181. They were carried to the city-praetor Petilius, and were found to consist of 12 or 7 books in Latin on ecclesiastical law, and the same number of books in Greek on philosophy: the latter were burnt on the command of the senate, but the former were carefully preserved. The story of the discovery of these books is evidently a forgery; and the books, which were ascribed to Numa, and which were extant at a later time, were evidently nothing more than works containing an account of the ceremonial of the Roman religion.

Nŭmāna (Umana Distrutta), a town in Picenum, on the road leading from Ancona to Aternum along the coast, was founded by the Siculi, and was subsequently a municipium.

Nŭmantĭa (Numantīnus: nr. Puente de Don Guarray Ru.), the capital of the Arevacae or Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, and the most important town in all Celtiberia, was situated near the sources of the Durius, on a small tributary of this river, and on the road leading from Asturica to Caesaraugusta. It was strongly fortified by nature, being built on a steep and precipitous, though not lofty, hill, and accessible by only one path, which was defended by ditches and palisades. It was 24 stadia in circumference, but was not surrounded by regular walls, which the natural strength of its position rendered unnecessary. It was long the head-quarters of the Celtiberians in their wars with the Romans; and its protracted siege and final destruction by Scipio Africanus the younger (B. C. 133) is one of the most memorable events in the early history of Spain.

Numēnĭus (Νουμήνιος), of Apamea in Syria, a Pythagoreo-Platonic philosopher, who was highly esteemed by Plotinus and his school, as well as by Origen. He probably belongs to the age of the Antonines. His object was to trace the doctrines of Plato up to Pythagoras, and at the same time to show that they were not at variance with the dogmas and mysteries of the Brahmins, Jews, Magi, and Egyptians. Considerable fragments of his works have been preserved by Eusebius, in his Praeparatio Evangelica.

Numeriānus, M. Aurēlĭus, the younger of the 2 sons of the emperor Carus, who accompanied his father in the expedition against the Persians, A. D. 283. After the death of his father, which happened in the same year, Numerianus was acknowledged as joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The army, alarmed by the fate of Carus, who was struck dead by lightning, compelled Numerianus to retreat towards Europe. During the greater part of the march, which lasted for 8 months, he was confined to his litter by an affection of the eyes; but the suspicions of the soldiers having become excited, they at length forced their way into the imperial tent, and discovered the dead body of their prince. Arrius Aper, praefect of the praetorians, and father-in-law of the deceased, was arraigned of the murder in a military council, held at Chalcedon, and, without being permitted to speak in his own defence, was stabbed to the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor. [DIOCLETIANUS.]

Nŭmīcĭus or Nŭmīcus (Numico), a small river in Latium flowing into the Tyrrhene sea near Ardea, on the banks of which was the tomb of Aeneas, whom the inhabitants called Jupiter Indiges.

Nŭmĭdĭa (Νουμιδία, ἡ Νομαδία and Νομαδική: Νομάς, Nŭmĭda, pl. Νομάδες or Νομάδες Λίβυες, Nŭmĭdae: Algier), a country of N. Africa, which, in its original extent, was divided from Mauretania on the W. by the river Malva or Mulucha, and on the E. from the territory of Carthage (aft. the Roman Province of Africa) by the river Tusca: its N. boundary was the Mediterranean, and on the S. it extended indefinitely towards the chain of the Great Atlas and the country of the Gaetuli. Intersected by the chain of the Lesser Atlas, and watered by the streams running down from it, it abounded in fine pastures, which were early taken possession of by wandering tribes of Asiatic origin, who from their occupation as herdmen were called by the Greeks, here as elsewhere, Νομάδες, and this name was perpetuated in that of the country. A sufficient account of these tribes, and of their connection with their neighbours on the W., is given under MAURETANIA. The fertility of the country, inviting to agriculture, gradually gave a somewhat more settled character to the people; and, at their first appearance in Roman history, we find their 2 great tribes, the Massylians and the Massaesylians, forming 2 monarchies, which were united into one under Masinissa, B. C. 201. (For the historical details, see MASINISSA). On Masinissa's death in 148, his kingdom was divided, by his dying directions, between his 3 sons, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa; but it was soon reunited under MICIPSA, in consequence of the death of both his brothers. His death, in 118, was speedily followed by the usurpation of Jugurtha, an account of which and of the ensuing war with the Romans is given under JUGURTHA. On the defeat of Jugurtha in 106, the country became virtually subject to the Romans, but they permitted the family of Masinissa to govern it, with the royal title (see HIEMPSAL, No. 2; JUBA, No. 1), until B. C. 46, when Juba, who had espoused the cause of Pompey in the Civil Wars, was defeated and dethroned by Julius Caesar, and Numidia was made a Roman province. It seems to have been about the same time or a little later, under Augustus, that the W. part of the country was taken from Numidia, and added to MAURETANIA, as far E. as Saldae. In B.C. 30 Augustus restored Juba II. to his father's kingdom of Numidia; but in B.C. 25 he exchanged it for Mauretania, and Numidia, that is, the country between Saldae on the W. and the Tusca on the E., became a Roman province. It was again diminished by near a half, under Claudius (see MAURETANIA); and henceforth, until the Arab conquest, the senatorial province of Numidia denotes the district between the river Ampsaga on the W. and the Tusca on the E.: its capital was Cirta (Constantineh). The country, in its later restricted limits, is often distinguished by the name of New Numidia or Numidia Proper. The Numidians are celebrated in military history as furnishing the best light cavalry to the armies, first of Carthage, and afterwards of Rome.

Nūmĭdĭcus Sinus (Νουμιδικὸς κόλπος: Bay of Storah), the great gulf E. of Pr. Tretum (Seven Capes), on the N. of Numidia.

Numistro (Numistrānus), a town in Lucania near the frontiers of Apulia.

Nūmĭtor. [ROMULUS.]

Nursĭa (Nursīnus: Norcia), a town in the N. of the land of the Sabines, situated near the sources of the Nar and amidst the Apennines, whence it is called by Virgil (Aen. vii. 716) frigida Nursia. It was the birthplace of Sertorius and of the mother of Vespasian.

Nyctēis (Νυκτηΐς), that is, Antiope, daughter of Nycteus, and mother of Amphion and Zethus. [ANTIOPE; NYCTEUS.]

Nycteus (Νυκτεύς), son of Hyrieus by the nymph Clonia, and husband of Polyxo, by whom he became the father of Antiope; though, according to others, Antiope was the daughter of the river-god Asopus. Antiope was carried off by Epopeus, king of Sicyon; whereupon Nycteus, who governed Thebes, as the guardian of Labdacus, invaded Sicyon with a Theban army. Nycteus was defeated, and being severely wounded, he was carried back to Thebes, where, previous to his death, he appointed his brother Lycus guardian of Labdacus, and at the same time required him to take vengeance on Epopeus. [LYCUS.]

Nyctĭmĕnē, daughter of Epopeus, king of Lesbos, or, according to others, of Nycteus. Pursued and dishonoured by her amorous father, she concealed herself in the shade of forests, where she was metamorphosed by Athena into an owl.

Nymphae (Νύμφαι), the name of a numerous class of female divinities of a lower rank, though they are designated by the title of Olympian, are called to the meetings of the gods in Olympus, and are described as the daughters of Zeus. They may be divided into 2 great classes. The 1st class embraces those who were recognised in the worship of nature. The early Greeks saw in all the phenomena of ordinary nature some manifestation of the deity; springs, rivers, grottoes, trees, and mountains, all seemed to them fraught with life; and all were only the visible embodiments of so many divine agents. The salutary and beneficent powers of nature were thus personified, and regarded as so many divinities. The 2nd class of nymphs are personifications of tribes, races, and states, such as Cyrene, and many others. — I. The nymphs of the 1st class must again be subdivided into various species, according to the different parts of nature of which they are the representatives. 1. Nymphs of the watery element. To these belong first the nymphs of the ocean, Oceanides (Ὠκεανῖναι, Ὠκεανίδες, νύμφαι ἅλιαι), who were regarded as the daughters of Oceanus; and next the nymphs of the Mediterranean or inner sea, who were regarded as the daughters of Nereus, and hence were called Nereides (Νηρεΐδες). The rivers were represented by the Potameides (Ποταμηΐδες), who, as local divinities, were named after their rivers, as Acheloides, Anigrides, Ismenides, Amnisiades, Pactolides. The nymphs of fresh water, whether of rivers, lakes, brooks, or springs, were also designated by the general name Naiades (Νηΐδες), though they had, in addition, specific names (Κρηναῖαι, Πηγαῖαι, Ἑλειονόμοι, Λιμνατίδες, or Λιμνάδες). Even the rivers of the lower regions were described as having their nymphs; hence we read of Nymphae infernae paludis and Avernales. Many of these nymphs presided over waters or springs which were believed to inspire those who drank of them. The nymphs themselves were, therefore, thought to be endowed with prophetic power, and to inspire men with the same, and to confer upon them the gift of poetry. Hence all persons in a state of rapture, such as seers, poets, madmen, &c., were said to be caught by the nymphs (νυμφόληπτοι, in Lat. lymphati, lymphatici). As water is necessary to feed all vegetation as well as all living beings, the water-nymphs frequently appear in connection with higher divinities, as, for example, with Apollo, the prophetic god and the protector of herds and flocks; with Artemis, the huntress and the protectress of game, who was herself originally an Arcadian nymph; with Hermes, the fructifying god of flocks; with Dionysus; and with Pan, the Sileni and Satyrs, whom they join in their Bacchic revels and dances. — 2. Nymphs of mountains and grottoes, called Oreades (Ὀρειάδες, Ὀροδεμνιάδες), but sometimes also by names derived from the particular mountains they inhabited (e. g. Κιθαιρωνίδες, Πηλιάδες, Κορύκιαι). — 3. Nymphs of forests, groves, and glens, were believed sometimes to appear to and frighten solitary travellers. They are designated by the names Ἀλσηΐδες, Ὑληωροί, Αὐλωνιάδες, and Ναπαῖαι. — 4. Nymphs of trees, were believed to die together with the trees which had been their abode, and with which they had come into existence. They were called Dryades and Hamadryades (Δρυάδες, Ἁμαδρυάδες or Ἀδρυάδες), from δρῦς, which signifies not only an oak, but any wild-growing lofty tree; for the nymphs of fruit trees were called Melides (Μηλίδες, also Μηλιάδες, Ἐπιμηλίδες, or Ἁμαμηλίδες). They seem to be of Arcadian origin, and never appear together with any of the great gods. — II. The 2nd class of nymphs, who were connected with certain races or localities (Νύμφαι χθόνιαι), usually have a name derived from the places with which they are associated, as Nysiades, Dodonides, Lemniae. — The sacrifices offered to nymphs usually consisted of goats, lambs, milk, and oil, but never of wine. They were worshipped in many parts of Greece, especially near springs, groves, and grottoes. They are represented in works of art as beautiful maidens, either quite naked or only half-covered. Later poets sometimes describe them as having sea-coloured hair.

Nymphaeum (Νυμφαῖον, i. e. Nymph's abode). 1. A mountain, with perhaps a village, by the river Aous, near Apollonia, in Illyricum. — 2. A port and promontory on the coast of Illyricum, 3 Roman miles from Lissus. — 3. (C. Ghiorgi), the S.W. promontory of Acte or Athos, in Chalcidice. — 4. A sea-port town of the Chersonesus Taurica (Crimea) on the Cimmerian Bosporus, 25 stadia (2½ geog. miles) from Panticapaeum. — 5. A place on the coast of Bithynia, 30 stadia (3 geog. miles) W. of the mouth of the river Oxines. — 6. A place in Cilicia, between Celenderis and Soloë.

Nymphaeus (Νύμφαιος). 1. (Ninfa or Nimpa), a small river of Latium, falling into the sea above Astura; of some note as contributing to the formation of the Pomptine marshes. It now no longer reaches the sea, but falls into a little lake, called Lago di Monaci. — 2. A harbour on the W. side of the island of Sardinia, between the Prom. Mercurii and the town of Tillium. — 3. Also called Nymphĭus (Basilimfa), a small river of Sophene in Armenia, a tributary of the upper Tigris, flowing from N. to S. past Martyropolis, in the valley between M. Niphates and M. Masius.

Nymphĭdĭus Sabīnus, commander of the praetorian troops, together with Tigellinus, towards the latter end of Nero's reign. On the death of Nero, A. D. 68, he attempted to seize the throne, but was murdered by the friends of Galba.

Nymphis (Νύμφις), son of Xenagoras, a native of the Pontic Heraclea, lived about B. C. 250. He was a person of distinction in his native land, as well as an historical writer of some note. He wrote a work on Alexander and his successors, in 24 books, and also a history of Heraclea in 13 books.

Nymphodōrus (Νυμφόδωρος). 1. A Greek historian of Amphipolis, of uncertain date, the author of a work on the Laws or Customs of Asia (Νόμιμα Ἀσίας). — 2. Of Syracuse, likewise an historian, seems to have lived about the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He wrote a Periplus of Asia, and a work on Sicily.

Nȳsa or Nyssa (Νύσα, Νύσσα), was the legendary scene of the nurture of Dionysus, whence the name was applied to several places which were sacred to that god. 1. In India, in the district of Goryaea, at the N.W. corner of the Punjab, near the confluence of the rivers Cophen and Choaspes, probably the same place as Nagăra or Dionysopolis (Nagar or Naggar). Near it was a mountain of like name. — 2. A city or mountain in Aethiopia. — 3. (Sultan-Hisar, Ru., a little W. of Nazeli), a city of Caria, on the S. slope of M. Messogis, built on both sides of the ravine of the brook Eudon, which falls into the Maeander. It was said to have been named after the queen of one of the Antiochi, having been previously called Athymbra and Pythopolis. — 4. A city of Cappadocia, near the Halys, on the road from Caesarea to Ancyra: the bishopric of St. Gregory of Nyssa. — 5. A town in Thrace between the rivers Nestus and Strymon. — 6. A town in Boeotia near Mt. Helicon.

Nysaeus, Nysĭus, Nyseus, or Nysigĕna, a surname of Dionysus, derived from Nysa, a mountain or city (see above), where the god was said to have been brought up by nymphs.

Nȳsēĭdes or Nysiădes, the nymphs of Nysa, who are said to have reared Dionysus, and whose names are Cisseïs, Nysa, Erato, Eriphia, Bromia, and Polyhymno.

Nyx (Νύξ), called Nox by the Romans, was a personification of Night. Homer calls her the subduer of gods and men, and relates that Zeus himself stood in awe of her. In the ancient cosmogonies Night is one of the very first created beings, for she is described as the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Erebus, by whom she became the mother of Aether and Hemera. She is further said to have given birth, without a husband, to Moros, the Keres, Thanatos, Hypnos, Dreams, Momus, Oizys, the Hesperides, Moerae, Nemesis, and similar beings. In later poets, with whom she is merely the personification of the darkness of night, she is sometimes described as a winged goddess, and sometimes as riding in a chariot, covered with a dark garment and accompanied by the stars in her course. Her residence was in the darkness of Hades.

O.

Oănus (Ὤανος: Frascolari), a small river on the S. coast of Sicily near Camarina.

Oărus (Ὄαρος), a considerable river mentioned by Herodotus as rising in the country of the Thyssagetae, and falling into the Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov) E. of the Tanaïs (Don). As there is no river which very well answers this description, Herodotus is supposed to refer to one of the E. tributaries of the Don, such as the Sal or the Manyteh.

Oăsis (Ὄασις, Αὔασις, and in later writers Ὤασις) is the Greek form of an Egyptian word (in Coptic ouahé, an inhabited place), which was used to denote an island in the sea of sand of the great Libyan Desert: the word has been adopted into our language. The Oases are depressions in the great table-land of Libya, preserved from the inroad of the shifting sands by steep hills of limestone round them, and watered by springs, which make them fertile and habitable. With the substitution of these springs for the Nile, they closely resemble that greater depression in the Libyan table-land, the valley of Egypt. The chief specific applications of the word by the ancient writers are to the 2 Oases on the W. of Egypt, which were taken possession of by the Egyptians at an early period. — 1. Oasis Minor, the Lesser or Second Oasis (Ὄασις Μικρά, or ἡ δευτέρα: Wah-el-Bahryeh or Wah-el-Behnesa), lay W. of Oxyrynchus, and a good day's journey from the S.W. end of the lake Moeris. It was reckoned as belonging to the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt; and formed a separate Nomos. — 2. Oasis Major, the Greater, Upper, or First Oasis (Ὄ. μεγάλη, ἡ πρώτη, ἡ ἄνω Ὄ., and, in Herodotus, πόλις Ὄασις and νῆσος Μακάρων, Wah-el-Khargeh), is described by Strabo as 7 days' journey W. of Abydos, which applies to its N. end, as it extends over more than 1½° of latitude. It belonged to Upper Egypt, and, like the other, formed a distinct nome: these 2 nomes are mentioned together as "duo Oasitae" (αἱ δύο Ὀασῖται). When the ancient writers use the word Oasis alone, the Greater Oasis must generally be understood. The Greater Oasis contains considerable ruins of the ancient Egyptian and Roman periods. Between and near these were other Oases, about which we learn little or nothing from the ancient writers, though in one of them, the Wah-el-Gharbee or Wah-el-Dakhleh, 3 days W. of the Greater Oasis, there are the ruins of a Roman temple, inscribed with the names of Nero and of Titus. The Greater Oasis is about level with the valley of the Nile, the Lesser is about 200 feet higher than the Nile, in nearly the same latitude. — 3. A still more celebrated Oasis than either of these was that called Ammon, Hammon, Ammonium, Hammōnis Oraculum, from its being a chief seat of the worship and oracle of the god Ammon. It was called by the Arabs in the middle ages Santariah, and now Siwah. It is about 15 geog. miles long, and 12 wide: its chief town, Siwah, is in 29° 12′ N. lat., and 26° 17′ E. long.: its distance from Cairo is 12 days, and from the N. coast about 160 statute miles: the ancients reckoned it 12 days from Memphis, and 5 days from Paraetonium on the N. coast. It was inhabited by various Libyan tribes, but the ruling people were a race kindred to the Aethiopians above Egypt, who, at a period of unknown antiquity, had introduced, probably from Meroë, the worship of Ammon: the government was monarchical. The Ammonians do not appear to have been subject to the old Egyptian monarchy. Cambyses, after conquering Egypt in B. C. 525, sent an army against them, which was overwhelmed by the sands of the Desert. In B. C. 331, Alexander the Great visited the oracle, which hailed him as the son of Zeus Ammon. The oracle was also visited by Cato of Utica. Under the Ptolemies and the Romans, it was subject to Egypt, and formed part of the Nomos Libya. The most remarkable objects in the Oasis, besides the temple of Ammon, were the palace of the ancient kings, abundant springs of salt water (as well as fresh) from which salt was made, and a well, called Fons Solis, the water of which was cold at noon, and warm in the morning and evening. Considerable ruins of the temple of Ammon are still standing at the town of Siwah. In ancient times, the Oasis had no town, but the inhabitants dwelt in scattered villages. — 4. In other parts of the Libyan Desert, there were oases of which the ancients had some knowledge, but which they do not mention by the name of Oases, but by their specific names, such as AUGILA, PHAZANIA, and others.

Oaxes. [OAXUS.]

Oaxus (Ὄαξος: Ὀάξιος), called Axus (Ἄξος) by Herodotus, a town in the interior of Crete on the river Oaxes, and near Eleutherna, is said to have derived its name from Oaxes or Oaxus, who was, according to some accounts, a son of Acacallis, the daughter of Minos, and, according to others, a son of Apollo by Anchiale.

Obila (Avila), a town of the Vettones in Hispania Tarraconensis.

Obliviōnis Flumen. [LIMAEA.]

Obrīmas (Koja-Chai or Sandukli-Chai), an E. tributary of the Maeander, in Phrygia.

Obringa (Aar), a W. tributary of the Rhine, forming the boundary between Germania Superior and Inferior.

Obsĕquens, Jūlĭus, the name prefixed to a fragment entitled De Prodigiis or Prodigiorum Libellus, containing a record of the phenomena classed by the Romans under the general designation of Prodigia or Ostenta. The series extends in chronological order from the consulship of Scipio and Laelius, B. C. 190, to the consulship of Fabius and Aelius, B. C. 11. The materials are derived in a great measure from Livy, whose very words are frequently employed. With regard to the compiler we know nothing. The style is tolerably pure, but does not belong to the Augustan age. The best editions are by Scheffer, Amst. 1679, and by Oudendorp, Lug. Bat. 1720.

Obucŏla, Obucŭla or Obulcŭla (Monclova), a town in Hispania Baetica on the road from Hispalis to Emerita and Corduba.

Obulco (Porcuna), surnamed Pontificense, a Roman municipium in Hispania Baetica, 300 stadia from Corduba.

Ocalĕa (Ὠκαλέα, Ὠκαλέη, also Ὠκάλεια, Ὠκαλέαι: Ὠκαλεύς), an ancient town in Boeotia, between Haliartus and Alalcomenae, situated on a river of the same name falling into the lake Copais, and at the foot of the mountain Tilphusion.

Oceănĭdes. [NYMPHAE.]

Oceănus (Ὠκεανός), in the oldest Greek poets, is the god of the water which was believed to surround the whole earth, and which was supposed to be the source of all the rivers and other waters of the world. This water-god, in the Theogony of Hesiod, is the son of Heaven and Earth (Οὐρανός and Γαῖα), the husband of Tethys, and the father of all the river-gods and water-nymphs of the whole earth. He is introduced in person in the Prometheus of Aeschylus. As to the physical idea attached by the early Greeks to the word, it seems that they regarded the earth as a flat circle, which was encompassed by a river perpetually flowing round it, and this river was Oceanus. (This notion is ridiculed by Herodotus.) Out of and into this river the sun and the stars were supposed to rise and set; and on its banks were the abodes of the dead. From this notion it naturally resulted that, as geographical knowledge advanced, the name was applied to the great outer waters of the earth, in contradistinction to the inner seas, and especially to the Atlantic, or the sea without the Pillars of Hercules (ἡ ἔξω θαλάττα, Mare Exterius) as distinguished from the Mediterranean, or the Sea within that limit (ἡ ἐντός θάλαττα, Mare Internum); and thus the Atlantic is often called simply Oceanus. The epithet Atlantic (ἡ Ἀτλαντικὴ θάλασσα, Herod., ὁ Ἀ. πόντος, Eurip.; Atlantĭcum Mare) was applied to it from the mythical position of ATLAS being on its shores. The other great waters which were denoted by the same term are described under their specific names.

Ocēlis (Ὄκηλις: Ghela), a celebrated harbour and emporium, at the S.W. point of Arabia Felix, just at the entrance to the Red Sea.

Ocellus Lucānus, a Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of some Greek city in Lucania, but we have no particulars of his life. We have still extant under his name a considerable fragment of a work, entitled, "On the Nature of the Whole," (περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς φύσιος), written in the Ionic dialect; but it is much disputed whether it is a genuine work. In this work the author maintains that the whole (τὸ πᾶν, or ὁ κόσμος) had no beginning, and will have no end. Edited by Rudolphi, Lips. 1801—8.

Ocĕlum. 1. A town in the N. E. of Lusitania between the Tagus and the Durius, whose inhabitants, the Ocelenses, also bore the name of Lancienses. — 2. (Ucello or Uxeau), a town in the Cottian Alps, was the last place in Cisalpine Gaul, before entering the territories of king Cottius.

Ocha (Ὄχη), the highest mountain in Euboea, was in the S. of the island near Carystus, running out into the promontory Caphareus.

Ochus. [ARTAXERXES III.]

Ochus (Ὦχος, Ὦχος), a great river of Central Asia, flowing from the N. side of the Paropamisus (Hindoo Koosh), according to Strabo, through Hyrcania, into the Caspian; according to Pliny and Ptolemy, through Bactria, into the Oxus. Some suppose it to be only another name for the Oxus. In the Pehlvi dialect the word denotes a river in general.

Ocricŭlum (Ocriculānus: nr. Otricoli Ru.), an important municipium in Umbria, situated on the Tiber near its confluence with the Nar, and on the Via Flaminia, leading from Rome to Narnia, &c. There are ruins of an aqueduct, an amphitheatre and temples near the modern Otricoli.

Ocrisĭa or Oclisĭa, mother of Servius Tullius. For details, see TULLIUS.

Octāvĭa. 1. Sister of the emperor Augustus, was married first to C. Marcellus, consul, B. C. 50, and subsequently, upon the death of the latter, to Antony, the triumvir, in 40. This marriage was regarded as the harbinger of a lasting peace. Augustus was warmly attached to his sister, and she possessed all the charms and virtues likely to secure a lasting influence over the mind of a husband. Her beauty was universally allowed to be superior to that of Cleopatra, and her virtue was such as to excite admiration in an age of growing licentiousness and corruption. For a time Antony seemed to forget Cleopatra ; but he soon became tired of his virtuous wife, and upon his return to the East, he forbade her to follow him. When at length the war broke out between Antony and Augustus, Octavia was divorced by her husband ; but instead of resenting the insults she had received from him, she brought up with care his children by Fulvia and Cleopatra. She died B. C. 11. Octavia had 5 children, 3 by Marcellus, a son and 2 daughters, and 2 by Antony, both daughters. Her son, M. Marcellus, was adopted by Augustus, and was destined to be his successor, but died in 23. [MARCELLUS, No. 9.] The descendants of her 2 daughters by Antonius successively ruled the Roman world. The elder of them married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and became the grandmother of the emperor Nero ; the younger of them married Drusus, the brother of the emperor Tiberius, and became the mother of the emperor Claudius, and the grandmother of the emperor Caligula. [ANTONIA.] — 2. The daughter of the emperor Claudius, by his 3rd wife, Valeria Messalina, was born about A. D. 42. She was at first betrothed by Claudius to L. Silanus, who put an end to his life, as Agrippina had destined Octavia to be the wife of her son, afterwards the emperor Nero. She was married to Nero in A. D. 53, but was soon deserted by her young and profligate husband for Poppaea Sabina. After living with the latter as his mistress for some time, he resolved to recognise her as his legal wife ; and accordingly he divorced Octavia on the alleged ground of sterility, and then married Poppaea, A. D. 62. Shortly afterwards, Octavia was falsely accused of adultery, and was banished to the little island of Pandataria, where she was put to death. Her untimely end excited general commiseration. Octavia is the heroine of a tragedy, found among the works of Seneca, but the author of which was more probably Curiatius Maternus.

Octaviānus. [AUGUSTUS.]

Octāvĭus. 1. Cn., surnamed Rufus, quaestor about B. C. 230, may be regarded as the founder of the family. The Octavii originally came from the Volscian town of Velitrae, where a street and an altar bore the name of Octavius. — 2. Cn., son of No. 7, plebeian aedile 206, and praetor 205, when he obtained Sardinia as his province. He was actively employed during the remainder of the 2nd Punic war, and he was present at the battle of Zama. — 3. Cn., son of No. 2, was praetor 168, and had the command of the fleet in the war against Perseus. He was consul 165. In 162 he was one of 3 ambassadors sent into Syria, but was assassinated at Laodicea, by a Greek of the name of Leptines, at the instigation, as was supposed, of Lysias, the guardian of the young king Antiochus V. A statue of Octavius was placed on the rostra at Rome, where it was in the time of Cicero. — 4. Cn., son of No. 3, consul 128. — 5. M., perhaps younger son of No. 3, was the colleague of Tib. Gracchus in the tribunate of the plebs, 133, when he opposed his tribunitian veto to the passing of the agrarian law. He was in consequence deposed from his office by Tib. Gracchus. — 6. Cn., a supporter of the aristocratical party, was consul 87 with L. Cornelius Cinna. After Sulla's departure from Italy, in order to carry on the war against Mithridates, a vehement contest arose between the 2 consuls, which ended in the expulsion of Cinna from the city, and his being deprived of the consulship. Cinna soon afterwards returned at the head of a powerful army, and accompanied by Marius. Rome was compelled to surrender, and Octavius was one of the first victims in the massacres that followed. His head was cut off and suspended on the rostra. — 7. L., son of No. 6, consul 75, died in 74, as proconsul of Cilicia, and was succeeded in the command of the province by L. Lucullus. — 8. Cn., son of No. 7, consul 76. — 9. M., son of No. 8, was curule aedile 50, along with M. Caelius. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, Octavius espoused the aristocratical party, and served as legate to M. Bibulus, who had the supreme command of the Pompeian fleet. After the battle of Pharsalia, Octavius sailed to Illyricum ; but having been driven out of this country (47) by Caesar's legates, he fled to Africa. He was present at the battle of Actium (31), when he commanded part of Antony's fleet. — 10. C., younger son of No. 1, and the ancestor of Augustus, remained a simple Roman eques, without attempting to rise any higher in the state. — 11. C., son of No. 10, and great-grandfather of Augustus, lived in the time of the 2nd Punic war, in which he served as tribune of the soldiers. He was present at the battle of Cannae (216), and was one of the few who survived the engagement. — 12. C., son of No. 11, and grandfather of Augustus, lived quietly at his villa at Velitrae, without aspiring to the dignities of the Roman state. — 13. C., son of No. 12, and father of Augustus, was praetor 61, and in the following year succeeded C. Antonius in the government of Macedonia, which he administered with equal integrity and energy. He returned to Italy in 59, died the following year, 58, at Nola, in Campania, in the very same room in which Augustus afterwards breathed his last. By his 2nd wife Atia, Octavius had a daughter and a son, the latter of whom was subsequently the emperor Augustus. [AUGUSTUS.] — 14. L., a legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, 67, was sent by Pompey into Crete to supersede Q. Metellus in the command of the island; but Metellus refused to surrender the command to him. [METELLUS, No. 16.]

Octāvius Balbus. [BALBUS.]

Octodūrus (Octodurensis: Martigny), a town of the Veragri in the country of the Helvetii, is situated in a valley surrounded by lofty mountains, and on the river Drance near the spot where it flows into the Rhone. The ancient town, like the modern one, was divided by the Drance into 2 parts. The inhabitants had the Jus Latii.

Octogēsa, a town of the Ilergetes in Hispania Tarraconensis near the Iberus, probably S. of the Sicoris.

Octolŏphus, a place of uncertain site, in the N. of Thessaly or the S. of Macedonia.

Ocȳpĕtē. [HARPYIAE.]

Ocȳrhŏē('Ωκύροη.) 1. One of the daughters of Oceanus and Tethys. — 2. Daughter of the centaur Chiron, possessed the gift of prophecy, and is said to have been changed into a mare.

Odenāthus, the ruler of Palmyra, checked the victorious career of the Persians after the defeat and capture of Valerian, A. D. 260, and drove Sapor out of Syria. In return for these services, Gallienus bestowed upon Odenathus the title of Augustus. Odenathus was soon afterwards murdered by some of his relations, not without the consent, it is said, of his wife Zenobia, 266. He was succeeded by ZENOBIA.

Odessus ('Οδησσός: 'Οδησσίτης, 'Οδησσεύς). 1. (Varna), also called Odyssus and Odissus at a later time, a Greek town in Thracia (in the later Moesia Inferior) on the Pontus Euxinus nearly due E. of Marcianopolis, was founded by the Milesians in the territory of the Crobyzi in the reign of Astyages, king of Media (B. C. 594—559). The town possessed a good harbour, and carried on an extensive commerce. — 2. A seaport in Sarmatia Europaea, on the N. of the Pontus Euxinus and on the river Sangarius, W. of Olbia and the mouth of the Borysthenes. It was some distance N.E. of the modern Odessa.

Odoăcer, usually called king of the Heruli, was the leader of the barbarians, who overthrew the Western empire, A. D. 476. He took the title of king of Italy, and reigned till his power was overthrown by Theodoric, king of the Goths. Odoacer was defeated in 3 decisive battles by Theodoric (489—490), and then took refuge in Ravenna, where he was besieged for 3 years. He at last capitulated on condition that he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterwards murdered by his rival.

Odomantĭcē ('Οδομαντική), a district in the N.E. of Macedonia between the Strymon and the Nestus, inhabited by the Thracian tribe of the Odomanti or Odomantes.

Odrȳsae ('Οδρύσαι), the most powerful people in Thrace, dwelt, according to Herodotus, on both sides of the river Artiscus, a tributary of the Hebrus, but also spread further W. over the whole plain of the Hebrus. Soon after the Persian wars Teres, king of the Odrysae, obtained the sovereignty over several of the other Thracian tribes, and extended his dominions as far as the Black sea. He was succeeded by his son Sitalces, who became the master of almost the whole of Thrace. His empire comprised all the territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon; and it is described by Thucydides as the greatest of all the kingdoms between the Ionian gulf and the Euxine, both in revenue and opulence. Sitalces assisted the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war against Perdiccas, king of Macedonia. [SITALCES.] He died B. C. 424, and was succeeded by his nephew Seuthes I. On the death of the latter about the end of the Peloponnesian war, the power of the Odrysae declined. For the subsequent history of the Odrysae, see THRACIA.

Odyssēa ('Οδύσσεια), a town of Hispania Baetica, situated N. of Abdera amidst the mountains of Turdetania, with a temple of Athena, said to have been built by Odysseus (Ulysses). Its position is quite uncertain. Some of the ancients supposed it to be the same as OLISIPO.

Odysseus. [ULYSSES.]

Oea ('Εώα, Ptol.: Oeensis: Tripoli? Ru.), a city on the N. coast of Africa, in the Regio Syrtica (i. e. between the Syrtes), was one of the 3 cities of the African Tripolis, and, under the Romans, a colony by the name of Aelia Augusta Felix. It had a mixed population of Libyans and Sicilians.

Oea (Οἴα), a town in the island of Aegina, 20 stadia from the capital.

Oeagrus, or Oeăger (Οἴαγρος), king of Thrace, was the father, by the muse Calliope, of Orpheus and Linus. Hence the sisters of Orpheus are called Oeagrides, in the sense of the Muses. The adjective Oeagrius is also used by the poets as equivalent to Thracian. Hence Oeagrius Haemus, Oeagrius Hebrus, &c.

Oeanthē or Oeanthīa (Οἰάνθη, Οἰάνθεια: Οἰανθεύς: Galaxidhi), a town of the Locri Ozolae on the coast, near the entrance of the Crissaean gulf.

Oeăso or Oeasso (Oyarzun), a town of the Vascones on the N. coast of Hispania Tarraconensis situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the river Magrada.

Oeax (Οἴαξ), son of Nauplius and Clymene, and brother of Palamedes and Nausimedon.

Oebălus (Οἴβαλος). 1. Son of Cynortas, husband of Gorgophone, and father of Tyndareus, Pirene, and Arene, was king of Sparta, where he was afterwards honoured with an heroum. According to others he was son of Perieres and grandson of Cynortas, and was married to the nymph Batea, by whom he had several children. The patronymic Oebalides is not only applied to his descendants, but to the Spartans generally, as Hyacinthus, Castor, Pollux, &c. The feminine patronymic Oebalis and the adjective Oebalius are applied in the same way. Hence Helen is called by the poets Oebalis, and Oebalia pellex; the city of Tarentum is termed Oebalia arx, because it was founded by the Lacedaemonians; and since the Sabines were, according to one tradition, a Lacedaemonian colony, we find the Sabine king Titus Tatius named Oebalius Titus, and the Sabine women Oebalides matres. (Ov. Fast. i. 260, iii. 230.) — 2. Son of Telon by a nymph of the stream Sebethus, near Naples, ruled in Campania.

Oechălĭa (Οἰχαλία: Οἰχαλιεύς, Οἰχαλιώτης). 1. A town in Thessaly on the Peneus near Tricca. — 2. A town in Thessaly, belonging to the territory of Trachis. — 3. A town in Messenia on the frontier of Arcadia, identified by Pausanias with Carnasium, by Strabo with Andania. — 4. A town of Euboea in the district Eretria. — The ancients were divided in opinion which of these places was the residence of Eurytus, whom Hercules defeated and slew. The original legend probably belonged to the Thessalian Oechalia, and was thence transferred to the other towns.

Oecŭmĕnĭus (Οἰκουμένιος), bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, a Greek commentator on various parts of the New Testament, probably flourished about A.D. 950. He has the reputation of a judicious commentator, careful in compilation, modest in offering his own judgment, and neat in expression. Most of his commentaries were published at Paris, 1631.

Oedĭpus (Οἰδίπους), son of Laius and Jocaste of Thebes. The tragic fate of this hero is more celebrated than that of any other legendary personage, on account of the frequent use which the tragic poets have made of it. In their hands it underwent various changes and embellishments; but the common story ran as follows. Laius, son of Labdacus, was king of Thebes, and husband of Jocaste, a daughter of Menoeceus and sister of Creon. An oracle had informed Laius that he was destined to perish by the hands of his own son. Accordingly, when Jocaste gave birth to a son, they pierced his feet, bound them together, and exposed the child on Mt. Cithaeron. There he was found by a shepherd of king Polybus of Corinth, and was called from his swollen feet Oedipus. Having been carried to the palace, the king and his wife Merope (or Periboea) brought him up as their own child. Once, however, Oedipus was taunted by a Corinthian with not being the king's son, whereupon he proceeded to Delphi to consult the oracle. The oracle replied that he was destined to slay his father and commit incest with his mother. Thinking that Polybus was his father, he resolved not to return to Corinth; but on his road between Delphi and Daulis he met his real father Laius. Polyphontes, the charioteer of Laius bade Oedipus make way for them; whereupon a scuffle ensued in which Oedipus slew both Laius and his charioteer. In the mean time the celebrated Sphinx had appeared in the neighbourhood of Thebes. Seated on a rock, she put a riddle to every Theban that passed by, and whoever was unable to solve it was killed by the monster. This calamity induced the Thebans to proclaim that whoever should deliver the country of the Sphinx, should be made king, and should receive Jocaste as his wife. Oedipus came forward, and when he approached the Sphinx she gave the riddle as follows: "A being with 4 feet has 2 feet and 3 feet, and only one voice; but its feet vary, and when it has most it is weakest." Oedipus solved the riddle by saying that it was man, who in infancy crawls upon all fours, in manhood stands erect upon 2 feet, and in old age supports his tottering legs with a staff. The Sphinx, enraged at the solution of the riddle, thereupon threw herself down from the rock. Oedipus now obtained the kingdom of Thebes, and married his mother, by whom he became the father of Eteocles, Polynices, Antigone, and Ismene. In consequence of this incestuous alliance of which no one was aware, the country of Thebes was visited by a plague. The oracle, on being consulted, ordered that the murderer of Laius should be expelled. Oedipus accordingly pronounced a solemn curse upon the unknown murderer, and declared him an exile; but when he endeavoured to discover him, he was informed by the seer Tiresias that he himself was both the parricide and the husband of his mother. Jocaste now hung herself, and Oedipus put out his own eyes. From this point traditions differ, for according to some, Oedipus in his blindness was expelled from Thebes by his sons and brother-in-law, Creon, who undertook the government, and he was accompanied by Antigone in his exile to Attica; while according to others he was imprisoned by his sons at Thebes, in order that his disgrace might remain concealed from the eyes of the world. The father now cursed his sons, who agreed to rule over Thebes alternately, but became involved in a dispute, in consequence of which they fought in single combat, and slew each other. Hereupon Creon succeeded to the throne, and expelled Oedipus. After long wanderings Oedipus arrived in the grove of the Eumenides, near Colonus, in Attica; he was there honoured by Theseus in his misfortune, and, according to an oracle, the Eumenides removed him from the earth, and no one was allowed to approach his tomb. According to Homer, Oedipus, tormented by the Erinnyes of his mother, continued to reign at Thebes, after her death; he fell in battle, and was honoured at Thebes with funeral solemnities.

Oenĕōn (Οἰνεών: Οἰνεωνεύς), a seaport town of the Locri Ozolae, E. of Naupactus.

Oeneus (Οἰνεύς), son of Portheus, husband of Althaea, by whom he became the father of Tydeus and Meleager, and was thus the grandfather of Diomedes. He was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Aetolia. This is Homer's account; but according to later authorities he was the son of Porthaon and Euryte, and the father of Toxeus, whom he himself killed, Thyreus (Phereus), Clymenus, Periphas, Agelaus, Meleager, Gorge, Eurymede, Melanippe, Mothone, and Deianira. His second wife was Melanippe, the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus according to some accounts; though according to others Tydeus was his son by his own daughter Gorge. He is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius, who imprisoned and ill used him. He was subsequently avenged by Diomedes, who slew Agrius and his sons, and restored the kingdom either to Oeneus himself, or to his son-in-law Andraemon, as Oeneus was too old. Diomedes took his grandfather with him to Peloponnesus, but some of the sons who lay in ambush, slew the old man, near the altar of Telephus in Arcadia. Diomedes buried his body at Argos, and named the town of Oenoe after him. According to others Oeneus lived to extreme old age with Diomedes at Argos, and died a natural death. Homer knows nothing of all this; he merely relates that Oeneus once neglected to sacrifice to Artemis, in consequence of which she sent a monstrous boar into the territory of Calydon, which was hunted by Meleager. The hero Bellerophon was hospitably entertained by Oeneus, and received from him a costly girdle as a present.

Oenĭădae (Οἰνιάδαι: Trigardon or Trikhardo), an ancient town of Acarnania, situated on the Achelous near its mouth, and surrounded by marshes caused by the overflowing of the river, which thus protected it from hostile attacks. It was called in ancient times Erysiche (Ἐρυσίχη), and its inhabitants Erysichaei (Ἐρυσιχαῖοι); and it probably derived its later name from the mythical Oeneus, the grandfather of Diomedes. Unlike the other cities of Acarnania, Oeniadae espoused the cause of the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war. At the time of Alexander the Great, the town was taken by the Aetolians, who expelled the inhabitants; but the Aetolians were expelled in their turn by Philip V., king of Macedonia, who surrounded the place with strong fortifications. The Romans restored the town to the Acarnanians. The fortress Nesus or Nasus belonging to the territory of Oeniadae was situated in a small lake near Oeniadae.

Oenīdes, a patronymic from Oeneus, and hence given to Meleager, the son of Oeneus, and Diomedes, the grandson of Oeneus.

Oenoanda or Oeneanda, a town of Asia Minor, in the N.W. of Pisidia, or the district of Cabalia, subject to Cibyra.

Oenobaras (Οἰνοβάρας), a tributary of the Orontes, flowing through the plain of Antioch, in Syria.

Oenŏē (Οἰνόη: Οἰνοαῖος). 1. A demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, near Eleutherae on the frontiers of Boeotia, frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war.—2. A demus of Attica, near Marathon, belonging to the tribe Aiantis, and also to the Tetrapolis.—3. A fortress of the Corinthians, on the Corinthian gulf, between the promontory Olmiae and the frontier of Megaris.—4. A town in Argolis on the Arcadian frontier at the foot of Mt. Artemisium.—5. A town in Elis, near the mouth of the Selleis.—6. A town in the island Icarus or Icaria.

Oenŏmăus (Οἰνόμαος). 1. King of Pisa in Elis, was son of Ares and Harpinna, the daughter of Asopus, and husband of the Pleiad Sterope, by whom he became the father of Hippodamia. According to others he was a son of Ares and Sterope or a son of Alxion. An oracle had declared that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law; and as his horses were swifter than those of any other mortal, he declared that all who came forward as suitors for Hippodamia's hand should contend with him in the chariot-race, that whoever conquered should receive her, and that whoever was conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Poseidon, on the Corinthian isthmus. The suitor started with Hippodamia in a chariot, and Oenomaus then hastened with his swift horses after the lovers. He had overtaken and slain many a suitor, when Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, to take out the linch-pins from the wheels of his master's chariot, and he received from Poseidon a golden chariot, and most rapid horses. In the race which followed, the chariot of Oenomaus broke down, and he fell out and was killed. Thus Pelops obtained Hippodamia and the kingdom of Pisa. There are some variations in this story, such as, that Oenomaus was himself in love with his daughter, and for this reason slew her lovers. Myrtilus also is said to have loved Hippodamia, and as she favoured the suit of Pelops, she persuaded Myrtilus to take the linch-pins out of the wheels of her father's chariot. As Oenomaus was breathing his last he pronounced a curse upon Myrtilus. This curse had its desired effect, for as Pelops refused to give to Myrtilus the reward he had promised, or as Myrtilus had attempted to dishonour Hippodamia, Pelops thrust him down from Cape Geraestus. Myrtilus, while dying, likewise pronounced a curse upon Pelops, which was the cause of all the calamities that afterwards befell his house. The tomb of Oenomaus was shown on the river Cladeus in Elis. His house was destroyed by lightning, and only one pillar of it remained standing.—2. Of Gadara, a cynic philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian, or somewhat later, but before Porphyry. He wrote a work to expose the oracles, of which considerable fragments are preserved by Eusebius.—3. A tragic poet. [DIOGENES, No. 5.]

Oenōnē (Οἰνώνη), daughter of the river-god Cebren, and wife of Paris, before he carried off Helen. [PARIS.]

Oenōne or Oenopĭa, the ancient name of AEGINA.

Oenŏphўta (τὰ Οἰνόφυτα: Inia), a town in Boeotia, on the left bank of the Asopus, and on the road from Tanagra to Oropus, memorable for the victory gained here by the Athenians over the Boeotians, B.C. 456.

Oenŏpĭdes (Οἰνοπίδης) of Chios, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, perhaps a contemporary of Anaxagoras. Oenopides derived most of his astronomical knowledge from the priests and astronomers of Egypt, with whom he lived for some time. He obtained from this source his knowledge of the obliquity of the ecliptic, the discovery of which he is said to have claimed. The length of the solar year was fixed by Oenopides at 365 days, and somewhat less than 9 hours. He is said to have discovered the 12th and 23rd propositions of the 1st book of Euclid, and the quadrature of the meniscus.

Oenŏpĭon (Οἰνοπίων), son of Dionysus and husband of the nymph Helice, by whom he became the father of Thalus, Euanthes, Melas, Salagus, Athamas, and Merope, Aerope or Haero. Some writers call Oenopion a son of Rhadamanthus by Ariadne, and a brother of Staphylus. From Crete he migrated with his sons to Chios, which Rhadamanthus had assigned to him as his habitation. When king of Chios, the giant Orion sued for the hand of his daughter Merope. As Oenopion refused to give her to Orion, the latter violated Merope, whereupon Oenopion put out his eyes, and expelled him from the island. Orion went to Lemnos; he was afterwards cured of his blindness, and returned to Chios to take vengeance on Oenopion. But the latter was not to be found in Chios, for his friends had concealed him in the earth, so that Orion, unable to discover him, went to Crete.

Oenōtri, Oenōtrĭa. [ITALIA.]

Oenōtrĭdes, 2 small islands in the Tyrrhene sea, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the town of Elea or Velia and the mouth of the Helos.

Oenōtrŏpae. [ANIUS.]

Oenōtrus (Οἴνωτρος), youngest son of Lycaon, emigrated with a colony from Arcadia to Italy, and gave the name of Oenotria to the district in which he settled.

Oenūs (Οἰνοῦς: Kelesina), a river in Laconia, rising on the frontier of Arcadia, and flowing into the Eurotas, N. of Sparta. There was a town of the same name upon this river, celebrated for its wine.

Oenussae (Οἰνοῦσσαι, Οἰνοῦσαι). 1. A group of islands lying off the S. point of Messenia, opposite to the port of Phoenicus: the 2 largest of them are now called Sapienza and Cabrera.—2. (Spalmadori or Egonuses), a group of 5 islands between Chios and the coast of Asia Minor.

Oeōnus (Οἰωνός), son of Licymnius of Midea in Argolis, first victor at Olympia, in the foot-race. He is said to have been killed at Sparta by the sons of Hippocoon, but was avenged by Hercules, whose kinsman he was, and was honoured with a monument near the temple of Hercules.

Oĕrŏē (Ὠερόη), an island in Boeotia, formed by the river Asopus and opposite Plataeae.

Oescus (Isker or Esker) called Oscĭus (Ὄσκιος) by Thucydides, and Scius (Σκίος) by Herodotus, a river in Moesia, which rises in Mt. Scomius according to Thucydides, or in Mt. Rhodope according to Pliny, but in reality on the W. slope of Mt. Haemus, and flows into the Danube near a town of the same name (Oreszovitz).

Oesȳma (Οἰσύμη: Οἰσυμαῖος), called Aesȳma (Αἰσύμη) by Homer (Il. viii. 304), an ancient town in Thrace between the Strymon and the Nestus, a colony of the Thasians.

Oeta (Οἴτη, τὰ Οἰταίων οὔρεα: Katavothra), a rugged pile of mountains in the S. of Thessaly, an eastern branch of Mt. Pindus, extended S. of Mt. Othrys along the S. bank of the Sperchius to the Maliac gulf at Thermopylae, thus forming the N. barrier of Greece. Strabo and Livy give the name of Callidromus to the eastern part of Oeta, an appellation which does not occur in Herodotus and the earlier writers. Respecting the pass of Mt. Oeta, see THERMOPYLAE. Oeta was celebrated in mythology as the mountain on which Hercules burnt himself to death. From this mountain the S. of Thessaly bordering on Phocis was called Oetaea (Οἰταία) and its inhabitants Oetaei (Οἰταῖοι).

Oetylus (Οἴτυλος: Οἰτύλιος: Vitylo), also called Tylus (Τύλος), an ancient town in Laconia, on the Messenian gulf, S. of Thalama, called after an Argive hero of this name.

Ofella, a man of sound sense and of a straightforward character, whom Horace contrasts with the Stoic quacks of his time.

Ofella, Q. Lucrētius, originally belonged to the Marian party, but deserted to Sulla, who appointed him to the command of the army employed in the blockade of Praeneste, B. C. 82. Ofella became a candidate for the consulship in the following year, although he had not yet been either quaestor or praetor, thus acting in defiance of one of Sulla's laws. He was in consequence put to death by Sulla's orders.

Ofilĭus, a distinguished Roman jurist, was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, and a friend of Cicero and Caesar. His works are often cited in the Digest.

Oglasa (Monte Christo), a small island off the coast of Etruria.

Ogulnĭi, Q. and Cn., 2 brothers, tribunes of the plebs, B. C. 300, carried a law by which the number of the pontiffs was increased from 4 to 8, and that of the augurs from 4 to 9, and which enacted that 4 of the pontiffs and 5 of the augurs should be taken from the plebs. Besides these 8 pontiffs there was the pontifex maximus, who is generally not included when the number of pontiffs is spoken of.

Ogȳgĭa (Ὠγυγία), the mythical island of Calypso, is placed by Homer in the navel or central point of the sea, far away from all lands. Later writers pretended to find it in the Ionian sea, near the promontory Lacinium, in Bruttium.

Ogȳgus or Ogȳges (Ὠγύγης), sometimes called a Boeotian autochthon, and sometimes son of Boeotus, and king of the Hectenes, is said to have been the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of lake Copais rose above its banks, and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. The name of Ogyges is also connected with Attic story, for in Attica an Ogygian flood is likewise mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleusis, and as the father of Daira, the daughter of Oceanus. In the Boeotian tradition he was the father of Alalcomenia, Thelxinoea and Aulis. — Bacchus is called Ogygius deus, because he is said to have been born at Thebes.

Ogȳris (Ὤγυρις), an island of the Erythraean Sea (Indian Ocean), off the coast of Carmania, at a distance of 2000 stadia (20 geog. miles), noted as the alleged burial-place of the ancient king Erythras.

Oicles or Oicleus (Ὀϊκλῆς, Ὀϊκλεύς), son of Antiphates, grandson of Melampus and father of Amphiaraus, of Argos. He is also called a son of Amphiaraus, or a son of Mantius, the brother of Antiphates. Oicles accompanied Hercules on his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, and was there slain in battle. According to other traditions he returned home from the expedition, and dwelt in Arcadia, where he was visited by his grandson Alcmaeon, and where his tomb was shown.

Oïleus (Ὀϊλεύς), son of Hodoedocus and Laonome, grandson of Cynus, and great-grandson of Opus, was a king of the Locrians, and married to Eriopis, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence called Oïlīdes, Oïlīădes, and Ajax Oïlei. Oïleus was also the father of Medon by Rhene. He is mentioned among the Argonauts.

Olba or Olbē (Ὄλβη), an ancient inland city of Cilicia, in the mountains above Soloë, and between the rivers Lamus and Cydnus. Its foundation was ascribed by mythical tradition, to Ajax the son of Teucer, whose alleged descendants, the priests of the very ancient temple of Zeus, once ruled over all Cilicia Aspera. In later times it belonged to Isauria, and was the see of a bishop.

Olbăsa (Ὄλβασα). 1. A city of Cilicia Aspera, at the foot of the Taurus, N. of Selinus, and N.W. of Caystrus; not to be confounded with OLBA. — 2. A city in the S.E. of Lycaonia, S.W. of Cybistra, in the district called Antiochiana. — 3. A city in the N. of Pisidia, between Pednelissus and Selge.

Olbē. [OLBA.]

Olbĭa (Ὀλβία). 1. (Prob. Eoubes, near Hières), a colony of Massilia, on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, on a hill called Olbianus, E. of Telo Martius (Toulon). — 2. (Prob. Terra Nova), a very ancient city, near the N. end of the E. side of the island of Sardinia, with the only good harbour on this coast; and therefore the usual landing-place for persons coming from Rome. A mythical tradition ascribed its foundation to the Thespiadae. — 3. In Bithynia [ASTACUS]. The gulf of Astacus was also called from it, Sinus Olbianus. — 4. A fortress on the W. frontier of Pamphylia, on the coast, W. of the river Catarharractes; not improbably on the same site as the later ATTALIA. — 5. [BORYSTHENES.]

Olcădes, an ancient people in Hispania Tarraconensis, N. of Carthago Nova, near the sources of the Anas, in a part of the country afterwards inhabited by the Oretani. They are mentioned only in the wars of the Carthaginians with the inhabitants of Spain. Hannibal transplanted some of the Olcades to Africa. Their chief towns were Althaea and Carteia, the site of both of which is uncertain; the latter place must not be confounded with the celebrated CARTEIA in Baetica.

Olcinium (Olciniātae: Dulcigno), an ancient town on the coast of Illyria, S. W. of Scodra, belonging to the territory of Gentius.

Olearus. [OLIARUS.]

Oleastrum. 1. A town of the Cosetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Dertosa to Tarraco, probably the place from which the plumbum Oleastrense derived its name. — 2. A town in Hispania Baetica, near Gades.

Olen (Ὠλήν), a mythical personage, who is represented as the earliest Greek lyric poet, and the first author of sacred hymns in hexameter verse. He is closely connected with the worship of Apollo, of whom, in one legend, he was made the prophet. His connection with Apollo is also marked by his being called Hyperborean, and one of the establishers of oracles; though the more common story made him a native of Lycia. He is said to have settled at Delos. His name seems to signify simply the flute-player. Of the ancient hymns, which went under his name, Pausanias mentions those to Here, to Achaeïa, and to Ilithyia; the last was in celebration of the birth of Apollo and Artemis.

Olenus (Ὤλενος: Ὠλένιος). 1. An ancient town in Aetolia, near New Pleuron, and at the foot of Mt. Aracynthus, is mentioned by Homer, but was destroyed by the Aetolians at an early period. — 2. A town in Achaia, between Patrae and Dyme, refused to join the Achaean league on its restoration, in B. C. 280. In the time of Strabo the town was deserted. The goat Amalthaea, which suckled the infant Zeus, is called Olenia capella by the poets, either because the goat was supposed to have been born near the town of Olenus, and to have been subsequently transferred to Crete, or because the nymph Amalthaea, to whom the goat belonged, was a daughter of Olenus.

Olgassys (Ὄλγασσυς: Al-Gez Dagh), a lofty, steep, and rugged mountain chain of Asia Minor, extending nearly W. and E. through the E. of Bithynia, and the centre of Paphlagonia to the river Halys, nearly parallel to the chain of Olympus, of which it may be considered as a branch. Numerous temples were built upon it by the Paphlagonians.

Oliarus (Ὠλίαρος, Ὠλέαρος: Ὠλιάριος: Antiparos), a small island in the Aegean sea, one of the Cyclades, W. of Paros, originally colonized by the Phoenicians, is celebrated in modern times for its stalactite grotto, which is not mentioned by ancient writers.

Oligyrtus (Ὀλίγυρτος), a fortress in the N. E. of Arcadia on a mountain of the same name, between Stymphalus and Caphyae.

Olisipo (Lisbon), a town in Lusitania, on the right bank of the Tagus near its mouth, and a Roman municipium with the surname Felicitas Julia. It was celebrated for its swift horses. Its name is sometimes written Ulyssippo, because it was supposed by some to have been the town which Ulysses was said to have founded in Spain; but the town to which this legend referred was situated in the mountains of Turdetania.

Olizon (Ὀλιζών), a town of Thessaly on the coast of Magnesia and on the Pagasaean gulf, mentioned by Homer.

Ollius (Oglio), a river in Gallia Transpadana, falls into the Po, S. W. of Mantua.

Olmiae (Ὀλμιαί), a promontory in the territory of Corinth, which separated the Corinthian and Alcyonian gulfs.

Oloosson (Ὀλοοσσών: Ὀλοοσσόνιος: Elassona), a town of the Perrhaebi in Thessaly, in the district of Hestiaeotis. Homer (Il. ii. 739) calls it "white," an epithet which it obtained, according to Strabo, from the whiteness of its soil.

Olophyxus (Ὀλόφυξος: Ὀλοφύξιος), a town of Macedonia, on the peninsula of Mt. Athos.

Olpae or Olpe (Ὄλπαι, Ὀλπή: Ὀλπαῖος) 1. (Arapi), a town of the Amphilochi in Acarnania, on the Ambracian gulf, N. W. of Argos Amphilochicum. — 2. A town of the Locri Ozolae.

Olurus (Ὄλουρος: Ὀλούριος) 1. A town in Achaia, near Pellene, on the Sicyonian frontier. — 2. Also Oluris (Ὄλουρις), called Dorium (Δώριον) by Homer, a town in Messenia, S. of the river Neda.

Olus (Ὀλοῦς: Ὀλούντιος), a town and harbour on the E. coast of Crete, near the promontory of Zephyrium.

Olybrius, Anicius, Roman emperor A. D. 472, was raised to this dignity by Ricimer, who deposed Anthemius. He died in the course of the same year, after a reign of 3 months and 13 days. His successor was GLYCERIUS.

Olympene, and Olympeni, or Olympieni (Ὀλυμπηνή, Ὀλυμπηνοί, Ὀλυμπιηνοί), the names of the district about the Mysian Olympus, and of its inhabitants.

Olympia (Ὀλυμπία), the name of a small plain in Elis, in which the Olympic games were celebrated. It was surrounded on the N. and N. E. by the mountains Cronion and Olympus, on the S. by the river Alphēus, and on the W. by the river Cladĕus. In this plain was the sacred grove of Zeus, called Altis (Ἄλτις, an old Elean form of ἄλσος, a grove), situated at the angle formed by the confluence of the rivers Alpheus and Cladeus, and 300 stadia distant from the town of Pisa. The Altis and its immediate neighbourhood were adorned with numerous temples, statues, and public buildings, to which the general appellation of Olympia was given; but there was no town of this name. The Altis was surrounded by a wall. It contained the following temples: — 1. The Olympiēum, or temple of Zeus Olympius, which was the most celebrated of all the buildings at Olympia, and which contained the master-piece of Greek art, the colossal statue of Zeus by Phidias. The statue was made of ivory and gold, and the god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, and precious stones. [PHIDIAS.] 2. The Heraeum, or temple of Hera, which contained the celebrated chest of Cypselus, and was situated N. of the Olympiēum. 3. The Metrōum, or temple of the Mother of the gods. The other public buildings in the Altis most worthy of notice were, the Thesauri, or treasuries of the different states, which had sent dedicatory offerings to the Olympian Zeus, situated at the foot of Mt. Cronion: the Zanes, or statues of Zeus, which had been erected from fines imposed upon those who had been guilty of fraud or other irregularities in the Olympic contests, and which were placed on a stone platform near the Thesauri: the Prytaneum, in which the Olympic victors dined after the contests had been brought to a close: the Bouleuterion, in which all the regulations relating to the games were made, and which contained a statue of Zeus Horcius, before which the usual oaths were taken by the judges and the combatants: the Philippeum, a circular building of brick, surmounted with a dome, which was erected by Philip after the battle of Chaeronea, and which was situated near one of the gates of the Altis, close to the Prytaneum: the Hippodamīum, a sacred enclosure erected in honour of Hippodamīa: the Pelopium, a sacred enclosure, erected in honour of Pelops. The 2 chief buildings outside the Altis were the Stadium to the E. of Mt. Cronion, in which the gymnastic games were celebrated, and the Hippodromus, a little S.E. of the Stadium, in which the chariot races took place. At the place which formed the connection between the Stadium and Hippodromus, the Hellanodicae, or judges of the Olympic games had their seats. (For details see Dict. of Antiq. arts. Hippodromus and Stadium.) The Olympic games were celebrated from the earliest times in Greece, and their establishment was assigned to various mythical personages. There was an interval of 4 years between each celebration of the festival, which interval was called an Olympiad; but the Olympiads were not employed as a chronological aera till the victory of Coroebus in the foot-race, B. C. 776. An account of the Olympic games and of the Olympiads is given in the Dict. of Antiq. arts. Olympia and Olympias.

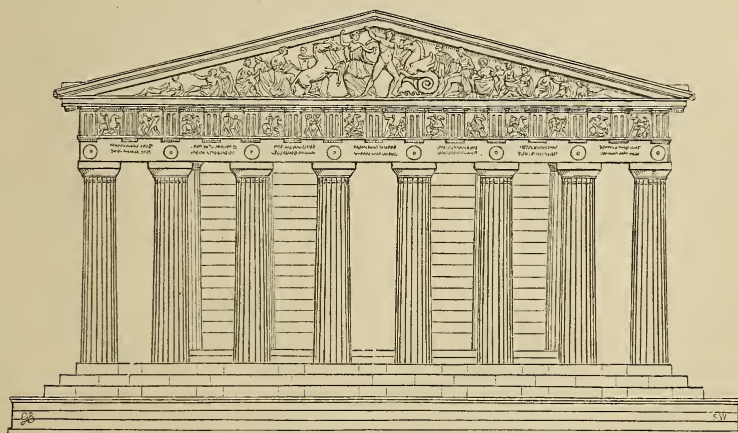
Olympīas (Ὀλυμπιάς), wife of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of Neoptolemus I., king of Epirus. She was married to Philip B. C. 359. The numerous amours of Philip, and the passionate and jealous character of Olympias occasioned frequent disputes between them; and when Philip married Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus (337), Olympias withdrew from Macedonia, and took refuge at the court of her brother Alexander, king of Epirus. It was generally believed that she lent her support to the assassination of Philip, 336; but it is hardly credible that she evinced her approbation of that deed in the open manner asserted by some writers. After the death of Philip she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed great influence through the affection of Alexander. On the death of the latter (323), she withdrew from Macedonia, where her enemy Antipater had the undisputed control of affairs, and took refuge in Epirus. Here she continued to live, as it were, in exile, until the death of Antipater (319) presented a new opening to her ambition. She gave her support to the new regent Polysperchon, in opposition to Cassander, who had formed an alliance with Eurydice the wife of Philip Arrhidaeus, the nominal king of Macedonia. In 317 Olympias, resolving to obtain the supreme power in Macedonia, invaded that country, along with Polysperchon, defeated Eurydice in battle, and put both her and her husband to death. Olympias followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of 100 of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles. Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnesus, hastened to turn his arms against Macedonia. Olympias on his approach threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she was closely blockaded by Cassander throughout the winter. At length in the spring of 316, she was compelled to surrender to Cassander, who caused her to be put to death. Olympias was not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit which distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that must for ever disgrace her name.

Olympiŏdōrus (Ὀλυμπιόδωρος). 1. A native of Thebes in Egypt, who lived in the 5th century after Christ. He wrote a work in 22 books (entitled Ἱστορικοὶ λόγοι), which comprised the history of the Western empire under the reign of Honorius, from A. D. 407 to October, A. D. 425. Olympiodorus took up the history from about the point at which Eunapius had ended. [EUNAPIUS.] The original work of Olympiodorus is lost, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius. After the death of Honorius Olympiodorus removed to Byzantium, to the court of the emperor Theodosius. Hierocles dedicated to this Olympiodorus his work on providence and fate [HIEROCLES]. Olympiodorus was a heathen. — 2. A peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, where Proclus was one of his pupils. — 3. The last philosopher of celebrity in the Neo-Platonic school of Alexandria. He lived in the first half of the 6th century after Christ, in the reign of the emperor Justinian. His life of Plato, and commentaries on several of Plato's dialogues are still extant. — 4. An Aristotelic philosopher, the author of a commentary on the Meteorologica of Aristotle, which is still extant, lived at Alexandria, in the latter half of the 6th century after Christ. Like Simplicius, to whom, however, he is inferior, he endeavours to reconcile Plato and Aristotle.

Olympīus (Ὀλύμπιος), the Olympian, occurs as a surname of Zeus, Hercules, the Muses (Olympiades), and in general of all the gods who were believed to live in Olympus, in contradistinction from the gods of the lower world.

Olympīus Nemesiānus. [NEMESIANUS.]



Olympus (Ὄλυμπος), the name of 2 Greek musicians, of whom one is mythical, and the other historical. — 1. The elder Olympus belongs to the mythical genealogy of Mysian and Phrygian flute-players — Hyagnis, Marsyas, Olympus — to each of whom the invention of the flute was ascribed, under whose names we have the mythical representation of the contest between the Phrygian auletic and the Greek citharoedic music. Olympus was said to have been a native of Mysia, and to have lived before the Trojan war. Olympus not unfrequently appears on works of art, as a boy, sometimes instructed by Marsyas, and sometimes as witnessing and lamenting his fate. — 2. The true Olympus was a Phrygian, and perhaps belonged to a family of native musicians, since he was said to be descended from the first Olympus. He flourished about B. C. 660—620. Though a Phrygian by origin, Olympus must be reckoned among the Greek musicians; for all the accounts make Greece the scene of his artistic activity; and he may be considered as having naturalized in Greece the music of the flute, which had previously been almost peculiar to Phrygia.

Olympus (Ὄλυμπος). I. In Europe. 1. (Grk. Elymbo, Turk. Semavat-Evi, i. e. Abode of the Celestials). The E. part of the great chain of mountains which extends W. and E. from the Acroceraunian promontory on the Adriatic, to the Thermaic Gulf, and which formed the N. boundary of ancient Greece proper. In a wide sense, the name is sometimes applied to all that part of this great chain which lies E. of the central range of Pindus, and which is usually called the Cambunian mountains; but the more specific and ordinary use of the name Olympus is to denote the extreme E. part of the chain, which striking off from the Cambunian mountains to the S.E., skirts the S. end of the slip of coast called Pieria, and forms at its termination the N. wall of the vale of TEMPE. Its shape is that of a blunt cone, with its outline picturesquely broken by minor summits; its height is about 9700 feet; and its chief summit is covered with perpetual snow. From its position as the boundary between Thessaly and Macedonia, it is sometimes reckoned to the former, sometimes to the latter. — In the Greek mythology, Olympus was the chief seat of the third dynasty of gods, of which Zeus was the head. It was a really local conception with the early poets, to be understood literally, and not metaphorically, that these gods

"on the snowy top
Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,
Their highest heaven."

Indeed, if Homer uses either of the terms Ὄλυμπος and οὐρανός metaphorically, it is the latter that is a metaphor for the former. Even the fable of the giants scaling heaven must be understood in this sense; not that they placed Pelion and Ossa upon the top of Olympus to reach the still higher heaven, but that they piled Pelion on the top of Ossa, and both on the lower slopes of Olympus, to scale the summit of Olympus itself, the abode of the gods. Homer describes the gods as having their several palaces on the summit of Olympus; as spending the day in the palace of Zeus, round whom they sit in solemn conclave, while the younger gods dance before them, and the Muses entertain them with the lyre and song. They are shut in from the view of men upon the earth by a wall of clouds, the gates of which are kept by the Hours. The same conceptions are found in Hesiod, and to a great extent in the later poets; with whom, however, even as early as the lyric poets and the tragedians, the idea becomes less material, and the real abode of the gods is gradually transferred from the summit of Olympus to the vault of heaven (i. e. the sky) itself. This latter is also the conception of the Roman poets, so far at least as any definite idea can be framed out of their compound of Homer's language with later notions. — 2. A hill in Laconia, near Sellasia, overhanging the river Oenus. — 3. Another name for Lycaeum in Arcadia. — II. In Asia. — 1. The Mysian Olympus (Ὄλυμπος ὁ Μύσιος: Keshish Dagh, Ala Dagh, Ishik Dagh, and Kush-Dagh), a chain of lofty mountains, in the N.W. of Asia Minor, forming, with Ida, the W. part of the N.-most line of the mountain system of that peninsula. It extends from W. to E. through the N. E. of Mysia and the S.W. of Bithynia, and thence, inclining a little N.-wards, it first passes through the centre of Bithynia, then forms the boundary between Bithynia and Galatia, and then extends through the S. of Paphlagonia to the river Halys. Beyond the Halys, the mountains in the N. of Pontus form a continuation of the chain. — 2. (Yanar Dagh), a volcano on the E. coast of Lycia, above the city of Phoenicus (Yanar). The names of the mountain and of the city are often interchanged. [PHOENICUS.]

Olynthus (Ὄλυνθος: Ὀλύνθιος: Aio Mamas), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic gulf, and at a little distance from the coast, between the peninsulas of Pallene and Sithonia. It was the most important of the Greek cities on the coast of Macedonia, though we have no record of its foundation. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Thracian Bottiaei, when they were expelled from their own country by the Macedonians. [BOTTIAEI.] It was taken by Artabazus, one of the generals of Xerxes, who peopled it with Chalcidians from Torone; but it owed its greatness to Perdiccas, who persuaded the inhabitants of many of the smaller towns in Chalcidice to abandon their own abodes and settle in Olynthus. This happened about the commencement of the Peloponnesian war; and from this time Olynthus appears as a prosperous and flourishing town, with a population of 5000 inhabitants capable of bearing arms. It became the head of a confederacy of all the Greek towns in this part of Macedonia, and it long maintained its independence against the attacks of the Athenians, Spartans and Macedonians; but in B.C. 379 it was compelled to submit to Sparta, after carrying on war with this state for 4 years. When the supremacy of Sparta was destroyed by the Thebans, Olynthus recovered its independence, and even received an accession of power from Philip, who was anxious to make Olynthus a counterpoise to the influence of Athens in the N. of the Aegean. With this view Philip gave Olynthus the territory of Potidaea, after he had wrested this town from the Athenians in 356. But when he had sufficiently consolidated his power to be able to set at defiance both Olynthus and Athens, he threw off the mask, and laid siege to the former city. The Olynthians earnestly besought Athens for assistance, and were warmly supported by Demosthenes in his Olynthiac orations; but as the Athenians did not render the city any effectual assistance, it was taken and destroyed by Philip, and all its inhabitants sold as slaves (347). Olynthus was never restored, and the remnants of its inhabitants were at a later time transferred by Cassander to Cassandrea. At the time of its prosperity Olynthus used the neighbouring town of MECYBERNA as its seaport.

Omăna or Omănum (Ὄμανα, Ὄμανον). 1. A celebrated port on the N.E. coast of Arabia Felix, a little above the E.-most point of the peninsula, Pr. Syagros (Ras el Had), on a large gulf of the same name. The people of this part of Arabia were called Omanītae (Ὀμανῖται) or Omani, and the name is still preserved in that of the district, Oman. — 2. (Prob. Schaina), a sea-port town in the E. of Carmania; the chief emporium on that coast, for the trade between India, Persia, and Arabia.

Omanītae and Omănum. [OMANA.]

Ombi (Ὄμβοι: Ὀμβῖται: Koum Ombou, i. e. Hill of Ombon, Ru.), the last great city of Upper Egypt, except Syene, from which it was distant about 30 miles, stood on the E. bank of the Nile, in the Ombites Nomos, and was celebrated as one of the chief seats of the worship of the crocodile. Juvenal's 15th satire is founded on a religious war between the people of Ombi and those of Tentyra, who hated the crocodile; but, as Tentyra lies so much further down the Nile, with several intervening cities celebrated, as well as Ombi, for crocodile-worship, critics have suspected an error in the names, and some have proposed to read Coptos or Copton for Ombos in v. 35. It seems, however, better to suppose that Juvenal used the name without reference to topographical precision.

Opposite to Ombi, on the left bank, was the town of Contra-Ombos.

Omphăle (Ὀμφάλη), daughter of the Lydian king Iardanus, and wife of Tmolus, after whose death she undertook the government herself. When Hercules, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was afflicted with a serious disease, and was informed by the oracle that he could only be cured by serving some one for wages for the space of 3 years, Hermes sold Hercules to Omphale. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and to please her, he is said to have spun wool and put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. She bore Hercules several children.

Omphalĭum (Ὀμφάλιον : Ὀμφαλίτης), a town in Crete in the neighbourhood of Cnossus.

On. [HELIOPOLIS.]

Onātas (Ὀνάτας), of Aegina, the son of Micon, was a distinguished statuary and painter, contemporary with Polygnotus, Ageladas, and Hegias. He flourished down to about B. C. 460, that is, in the age immediately preceding that of Phidias.

Oncae (Ὄγκαι), a village in Boeotia near Thebes, from which one of the gates of Thebes derived its name (Ὀγκαῖαι), and which contained a sanctuary of Athena, who was hence called Athena Onca.

Onchesmus or Onchismus (Ὄγχησμος, Ὄγχισμος : Orchido), a seaport town of Epirus in Chaonia, opposite the W. extremity of Corcyra. The ancients derived its name from Anchises, whence it is named by Dionysius the "Harbour of Anchises" (Ἀγχίσου λίμην). From this place Cicero calls the wind blowing from Epirus towards Italy Onchesmites.

Onchestus (Ὀγχηστός : Ὀγχήστιος) 1. An ancient town of Boeotia, said to have been founded by Onchestus, son of Poseidon, was situated a little S. of the lake Copais near Haliartus. It contained a celebrated temple and grove of Poseidon, and was the place of meeting of the Boeotian Amphictyony. The ruins of this town are still to be seen on the S. W. slope of the mountain Faga. — 2. A river in Thessaly, which rises in the neighbourhood of Eretria, and flows by Cynoscephalae, and falls into the lake Boebēis. It is perhaps the same as the river Onochōnus (Ὀνόχωνος) mentioned by Herodotus.

Onesicrĭtus (Ὀνησίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Astypalaea, and by others of Aegina. When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus chief pilot of the fleet, a post which he held not only during the descent of the Indus, but throughout the voyage from the mouth of that river to the Persian gulf, which was conducted under the command of Nearchus. Though an eye-witness of much that he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative, so that he early fell into discredit as an authority.

Oningis or Oringis. [ORINGIS.]

Onīros (Ὄνειρος), the Dream-God, was a personification of dreams. According to Homer Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the W. Oceanus, and the deceitful dreams come through an ivory gate, while the true ones issue from a gate made of horn. Hesiod calls dreams the children of night; and Ovid, who calls them children of Sleep, mentions 3 of them by name, viz. Morpheus, Icelus or Phobetor, and Phantasus. Euripides called them sons of Gaea, and conceived them as genii with black wings.

Onŏba, surnamed Aestuārĭa (Huelva), a seaport town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica, between the mouths of the Baetis and Anas, on an aestuary formed by the river Luxia. There are remains of a Roman aqueduct at Huelva.

Onomacrĭtus (Ὀνομάκριτος), an Athenian, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry. He lived about B. C. 520—485. He enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus, until he was detected by Lasus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an oracle of Musaeus, for which Hipparchus banished him. He seems to have gone into Persia, where the Pisistratids, after their expulsion from Athens, took him again into favour, and employed him to persuade Xerxes to engage in his expedition against Greece, by reciting to him all the ancient oracles which seemed to favour the attempt. It appears that Onomacritus had made a collection and arrangement of the oracles ascribed to Musaeus. It is further stated that he made interpolations in Homer as well as in Musaeus, and that he was the real author of some of the poems which went under the name of Orpheus.

Onomarchus (Ὀνόμαρχος), general of the Phocians in the Sacred war, succeeded his brother Philomelus in this command, B. C. 353. In the following year he was defeated in Thessaly by Philip, and perished in attempting to reach by swimming the Athenian ships, which were lying off the shore. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified, as a punishment for his sacrilege.

Onosander (Ὀνόσανδρος), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics (entitled Στρατηγικὸς λόγος), which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book, and it is still held in considerable estimation. He appears to have lived about A. D. 50. In his style he imitated Xenophon with some success. Edited by Schwebel, Nürnberg, 1761; and by Coraes, Paris, 1822.

Onu-gnathus (Ὄνου γνάθος : Elaphonisi), an island and a promontory on the S. coast of Laconia, W. of C. Malea.

Onūphis (Ὄνουφις), the capital of the Nomos Onuphites in the Delta of Egypt. Its site is uncertain; but it was probably near the middle of the Delta.

Ophēlĭon (Ὠφελίων), an Athenian comic poet, probably of the Middle Comedy, B. C. 380.

Ophellas (Ὀφέλλας), of Pella in Macedonia, was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he followed the fortunes of Ptolemy. In B. C. 322, he conquered Cyrene for Ptolemy, of which city he held the government on behalf of the Egyptian king for some years. But soon after 313 he threw off his allegiance to Ptolemy, and continued to govern Cyrene as an independent state for nearly 5 years. In 308 he formed an alliance with Agathocles, and marched against Carthage; but he was treacherously attacked by Agathocles near this city, and was slain.

Opheltes (Ὀφέλτης). 1. Also called Archemorus. [ARCHEMORUS.] — 2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who attempted to carry off Dionysus, and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins.

Ophīon (Ὀφίων). 1. One of the oldest of the Titans was married to Eurynome, with whom he ruled over Olympus, but being conquered by Cronos and Rhea, he and Eurynome were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus. — 2. A giant, who perished in the battle with Zeus. — 3. Father of the centaur Amycus, who is hence called Ophīonides.

Ophionenses or Ophienses (Ὀφιονεῖς, Ὀφιεῖς), a people in the N.E. of Aetolia.

Ophir (O.T. LXX. Σουφίρ, Σωφίρ, Σωφάρα), a place frequently referred to in the Old Testament, as proverbial for its gold, and to which Solomon, in conjunction with Hiram, king of Tyre, sent a fleet, which brought back gold and sandal-wood and precious stones. These ships were sent from Ezion-geber, at the head of the Red Sea, whence also king Jehoshaphat built ships to go to Ophir for gold, but this voyage was stopped by a shipwreck. It is clear, therefore, that Ophir was on the shores of the Erythraeum Mare of the ancients, or our Indian Ocean. Among the most plausible conjectures as to its site are: (1) that it was on the coast of India, or a name for India itself; (2) that it was on the coast of Arabia, in which case it is not necessary to suppose that Arabia furnished all the articles of commerce which were brought from Ophir, for Ophir may have been a great emporium of the Indian and Arabian trade; (3) that it is not the name of any specific place, but a general designation for the countries (or any of them) on the shores of the Indian Ocean, which supplied the chief articles of Indian and Arabian commerce.

Ophis (Ὄφις), a river in Arcadia, which flowed by Mantinēa.

Ophiūsa or Ophiussa (Ὀφιόεσσα, Ὀφιοῦσσα, Ὀφιοῦσα, i.e. abounding in snakes). 1. [PITYUSAE.] — 2. Or Ophiussa (Perhaps Palanea), a town of Europaean Scythia on the left bank of the Tyras (Dniester). — 3. A little island near Crete. — 4. (Afsia or Rabbi), a small island in the Propontis (Sea of Marmara), off the coast of Mysia, N.W. of Cyzicus and S.W. of Proconnesus. — 5. [RHODUS.] — 6. [TENOS.]

Ophrynīum (Ὀφρύνειον: prob. Fren-Kevi), a small town of the Troad, near the lake of Pteleos, between Dardanus and Rhoeteum, with a grove consecrated to Hector.

Opīci. [OSCI.]

Opilīus Macrīnus. [MACRINUS.]

Opilīus, Aurelīus, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and, finally, grammar. He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus (B.C. 92), whom he accompanied to Smyrna, and there the two friends grew old together in the enjoyment of each other's society. He composed several learned works, one of which, named Musae, is referred to by A. Gellius.

Opīmius. 1. Q., consul B.C. 154, when he subdued some of the Ligurian tribes N. of the Alps, who had attacked Massilia. He was notorious in his youth for his riotous living. — 2. L., son of the preceding, was praetor 125, in which year he took Fregellae, which had revolted against the Romans. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and was a violent opponent of C. Gracchus. He was consul in 121, and took the leading part in the proceedings which ended in the murder of Gracchus. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than 300 persons. For details see p. 288, a. In the following year (120), he was accused of having put Roman citizens to death without trial; but he was defended by the consul, C. Papirius Carbo, and was acquitted. In 112 he was at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and was bribed by Jugurtha, to assign to him the better part of the country. Three years after he was condemned under the law of the tribune, C. Mamilius Limetanus, by which an inquiry was made into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. Opimius went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct towards C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratical party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius. The year in which Opimius was consul (121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum, and was preserved for an almost incredible space of time.

Opis (Ὦπις), an important commercial city of Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, at the confluence of the Physcus (Odorneh) with the Tigris; not mentioned later than the Christian era.

Opitergīum (Opitergīnus: Oderzo), a Roman colony in Venetia in the N. of Italy, on the river Liquentia near its source, and on the high road from Aquileia to Verona. In the Marcomannic war it was destroyed by the Quadi, but it was rebuilt, and afterwards belonged to the Exarchate. From it the neighbouring mountains were called Montes Opitergini.

Oppiānus (Ὀππιανός), the author of 2 Greek hexameter poems still extant, one on fishing, entitled Halieutica (Ἁλιευτικά), and the other on hunting, entitled Cynegetica (Κυνηγετικά). Modern critics, however, have shown that these 2 poems were written by 2 different persons of this name. 1. The author of the Halieutica, was born either at Corycus or at Anazarba, in Cilicia, and flourished about A. D. 180. The poem consists of about 3500 hexameter lines, divided into 5 books, of which the first 2 treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other 3 of the art of fishing. — 2. The author of the Cynegetica, was a native of Apamea or Pella, in Syria, and flourished a little later than the other Oppianus, about A. D. 206. His poem, which is addressed to the emperor Caracalla, consists of about 2100 hexameter lines, divided into 4 books. The best edition of the 2 poems is by Schneider, Argent. 1776, and 2nd ed. Lips. 1813. There is also a prose paraphrase of a poem on hawking (Ἰξευτικά) attributed to Oppianus, but it is doubtful to which of the 2 authors of this name it belongs. Some critics think that the work was probably written by Dionysius.

Oppīus. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B. C. 213, carried a law to curtail the expenses and luxuries of Roman women. It enacted that no woman should have more than half an ounce of gold, nor wear a dress of different colours, nor ride in a carriage in the city, or in any town, or within a mile of it, unless on account of public sacrifices. This law was repealed in 195, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the elder Cato. — 2. Q., a Roman general in the Mithridatic war, B.C. 88, fell into the hands of Mithridates, but was subsequently surrendered by the latter to Sulla. — 3. C., an intimate friend of C. Julius Caesar, whose private affairs he managed in conjunction with Cornelius Balbus. Oppius was the author of several works, referred to by the ancient writers, but all of which have perished. The authorship of the histories of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars, was a disputed point as early as the time of Suetonius, some assigning them to Oppius and others to Hirtius. But the similarity in style and diction between the work on the Alexandrine war and the last book of the Commentaries on the Gallic war, leads to the conclusion that the former, at all events, was the work of Hirtius. The book on the African war was probably written by Oppius He also wrote the lives of several distinguished Romans, such as Scipio Africanus the elder, Marius, Pompey, and probably Caesar.

Ops, a female Roman divinity of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opimus, opulentus, inops, and copia. She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and the protectress of every thing connected with agriculture. Her abode was in the earth, and hence those who invoked her used to touch the ground. Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus, for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; but she had likewise a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the vicus jugarius, not far from the temple of Saturnus, she had an altar in common with Ceres. The festivals of Ops are called Opalia and Opiconsivia, from her surname Consiva, connected with the verb serere, to sow.

Optātus, bishop of Milevi in Numidia, flourished under the emperors Valentinian and Valens. He wrote a work, still extant, against the errors of the Donatists, entitled, De Schismate Donatistarum adversus Parmenianum. Edited by Dupin, Paris fol. 1700.

Opus (Ὀποῦς, contr. of Ὀπόεις: Ὀπούντιος). 1. (Talanda or Talanti?), the capital of the Opuntian Locrians, was situated, according to Strabo, 15 stadia (2 miles) from the sea, and 60 stadia from its harbour Cynos; but, according to Livy, it was only 1 mile from the coast. It was the birthplace of Patroclus. The bay of the Euboean sea near this town was called Opuntius Sinus. [LOCRI.] — 2. A small town in Elis.

Ora. 1. (Ὄρα) a city of Carmania, near the borders of Gedrosia. — 2. (Ὦρα), a city in the N.W. of India, near the sources of the Indus.

Orae. [ORITAE.]

Orbēlus (Ὄρβηλος), a mountain in the N.E. of Macedonia, on the borders of Thrace, extends from Mt. Rhodope along the Strymon to Mt. Pangaeus.

Orbĭlĭus Pupillus, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, best known to us from his having been the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagosus from the severe floggings which his pupils received from him. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 71.) He was a native of Beneventum, and after serving as an apparitor of the magistrates, and also as a soldier in the army, he settled at Rome in the 50th year of his age, in the consulship of Cicero, B.C. 63. He lived nearly 100 years, but had lost his memory long before his death.

Orbōna, a female Roman divinity, was invoked by parents who had been deprived of their children, and desired to have others, and also in dangerous maladies of children.

Orcădes Insŭlae (Orkney and Shetland Isles), a group of several small islands off the N. coast of Britain, with which the Romans first became acquainted when Agricola sailed round the N. of Britain.

Orchŏmĕnus (Ὀρχόμενος: Ὀρχομένιος). 1. (Scripu), an ancient, wealthy, and powerful city of Boeotia, the capital of the Minyean empire in the ante-historical ages of Greece, and hence called by Homer the Minyean Orchomenos (Ὀρχ. Μινύειος). It was situated N.W. of the lake Copais, on the river Cephissus, and was built on the slope of a hill on the summit of which stood the acropolis. It is said to have been originally called Andreis (Ἀνδρείς), from Andreus, the son of Peneus, who emigrated from the Peneus in Thessaly; to have been afterwards called Phlegya (Φλεγύα), from Phlegyas, a son of Ares and Chryse; and to have finally obtained its later name from Orchomenus, son of Zeus or Eteocles and the Danaid Hesione, and father of Minyas. This Orchomenus was regarded as the real founder of the Minyean empire, which before the time of the Trojan war extended over the whole of the W. of Boeotia. The cities of Coronea, Haliartus, Lebedea, and Chaeronea were subject to it; and even Thebes at one time was compelled to pay it tribute. It lost, however, much of its power after its capture by Hercules, but in the time of the Trojan war it still appears as a powerful city. Sixty years after the Trojan war it was taken by the Boeotians; its empire was completely destroyed; and it became a member of the Boeotian league. All this belongs to the mythical period. In the historical age it continued to exist as an independent town till B.C. 367, when it was taken and destroyed by the Thebans, and its inhabitants murdered or sold as slaves. In order to weaken Thebes, it was rebuilt at the instigation of the Athenians, but was soon destroyed again by the Thebans; and although it was again restored by Philip in 338, it never recovered its former prosperity; and in the time of Strabo was in ruins. The most celebrated building in Orchomenos was the so-called treasury of Minyas, but which, like the similar monument at Mycenae, was more probably a family-vault of the ancient heroes of the place. It was a circular vault of massive masonry embedded in the hill, with an arched roof, and had a side door of entrance. The remains of this building are extant; and its form may still be traced, though the whole of the stonework of the vault has disappeared. Orchomenos possessed a very ancient temple of the Charites or Graces; and here was celebrated in the most ancient times a musical festival, which was frequented by poets and singers from all parts of the Hellenic world. There was a temple of Hercules 7 stadia N. of the town, near the sources of the river Melas. Orchomenos is memorable on account of the great victory which Sulla gained in its neighbourhood over Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, 86. — 2. (Kalpaki), an ancient town of Arcadia, mentioned by Homer with the epithet πολύμηλος, to distinguish it from the Minyean Orchomenus, is said to have been founded by Orchomenus, son of Lycaon. It was situated on a hill N.W. of Mantinea, and its territory included the towns of Methydrium, Theisoa, Teuthis, and the Tripolis. In the Peloponnesian war Orchomenus sided with Sparta, and was taken by the Athenians. After the battle of Leuctra the Orchomenians did not join the Arcadian confederacy in consequence of its hatred against Mantinea. In the contests between the Achaeans and Aetolians, it was taken successively by Cleomenes and Antigonus Doson; but it eventually became a member of the Achaean League. — 3. A town on the confines of Macedonia and Thessaly, and hence sometimes said to belong to the former, and sometimes to the latter country.

Orcus. [HADES.]

Ordessus (Ὀρδησσός), a tributary of the Ister (Danube) in Scythia, mentioned by Herodotus, but which cannot be identified with any modern river.

Ordovīces, a people in the W. of Britain, opposite the island Mona (Anglesey), occupying the N. portion of the modern Wales.

Oreădes. [NYMPHAE.]

Orestae (Ὀρέσται), a people in the N. of Epirus on the borders of Macedonia, inhabiting the district named after them, Orestis or Orestias. They were originally independent, but were afterwards subject to the Macedonian monarchs. They were declared free by the Romans in their war with Philip. According to the legend, they derived their name from Orestes, who is said to have fled into this country after murdering his mother, and to have there founded the town of Argos Oresticum.

Orestes (Ὀρέστης). 1. Son of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigenia). According to the Homeric account, Agamemnon on his return from Troy was murdered by Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra before he had an opportunity of seeing him. In the 8th year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenae and slew the murderer of his father. This simple story of Orestes has been enlarged and embellished in various ways by the tragic poets. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended to despatch Orestes also, but that by means of Electra he was secretly carried to Strophius, king in Phocis, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse, who allowed Aegisthus to kill her own child, supposing it to be Orestes. In the house of Strophius, Orestes grew up with the king's son Pylades, with whom he had formed that close and intimate friendship which has become proverbial. Being frequently reminded by messengers from Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret to Argos. Here he pretended to be a messenger of Strophius, who had come to announce the death of Orestes, and brought the ashes of the deceased. After visiting his father's tomb, and sacrificing upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, and soon afterwards slew both Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra in the palace. Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized with madness. He now fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinnyes of his mother. At length by Apollo's advice, he took refuge with Athena at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areopagus to decide his fate. The Erinnyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Athena According to another modification of the legend, Orestes consulted Apollo how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and to fetch from that country the image of Artemis, which was believed to have fallen there from heaven, and to carry it to Athens. Orestes and Pylades accordingly went to Tauris, where Thoas was king. On their arrival they were seized by the natives, in order to be sacrificed to Artemis, according to the custom of the country. But Iphigenia, the priestess of Artemis, was the sister of Orestes, and, after recognising each other, all three escaped with the statue of the goddess. After his return to Peloponnesus Orestes took possession of his father's kingdom at Mycenae, which had been usurped by Aletes or Menelaus. When Cylarabes of Argos died without leaving any heir, Orestes also became king of Argos. The Lacedaemonians likewise made him their king of their own accord, because they preferred him, the grandson of Tyndareus, to Nicostratus and Megapenthes, the sons of Menelaus by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocians increased his power by allying themselves with him. He married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and became by her the father of Tisamenus. The story of his marriage with Hermione, who had previously been married to Neoptolemus, is related elsewhere. [HERMIONE; NEOPTOLEMUS.] He died of the bite of a snake in Arcadia, and his body, in accordance with an oracle, was afterwards carried from Tegea to Sparta, and there buried. His bones are said to have been found at a later time in a war between the Lacedaemonians and Tegeatans, and to have been conveyed to Sparta. — 2. Regent of Italy during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 475—476. He was born in Pannonia, and served for some years under Attila; after whose death he rose to eminence at the Roman court. Having been entrusted with the command of an army by Julius Nepos, he deposed this emperor, and placed his son Romulus Augustulus on the throne; but in the following year he was defeated by Odoacer and put to death. [ODOACER.] — 3. L. Aurelius Orestes, consul B.C. 126, received Sardinia as his province, where he remained upwards of 3 years. C. Gracchus was quaestor to Orestes in Sardinia. — 4. Cn. Aufidius Orestes, originally belonged to the Aurelia gens, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Aufidius, the historian, when the latter was an old man. Orestes was consul, 71.

Orestēum, Oresthēum, or Oresthasĭum (Ὀρέστειον, Ὀρέσθειον, Ὀρεσθάσιον), a town in the S. of Arcadia in the district Maenalia, not far from Megalopolis.

Orestĭas. 1. The country of the Orestae. [ORESTAE.] — 2. A name frequently given by the Byzantine writers to Hadrianopolis in Thrace.

Orestilla, Aurelĭa. [AURELIA.]

Orētāni, a powerful people in the S.W. of Hispania Tarraconensis, bounded on the S. by Baetica, on the N. by the Carpetani, on the W. by Lusitania, and on the E. by the Bastetani; their territory corresponded to the eastern part of Granada, the whole of La Mancha, and the western part of Murcia. Their chief town was Castulo.

Orĕus (Ὠρεός: Ὠρείτης), a town in the N. of Euboea, on the river Callas, at the foot of the mountain Telethrium, and in the district Hestiaeotis, was itself originally called Hestiaea or Histiaea. After the Persian wars Oreus, with the rest of Euboea, became subject to the Athenians; but on the revolt of the island, in B.C. 445, Oreus was taken by Pericles, its inhabitants expelled, and their place supplied by 2000 Athenians. The site of Oreus made it an important place, and its name frequently occurs in the Grecian wars down to the dissolution of the Achaean league.

Orgetŏrix, the noblest and richest among the Helvetii, formed a conspiracy to obtain the royal power B.C. 61, and persuaded his countrymen to emigrate from their own country. Two years were devoted to making the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Orgetorix having meantime transpired, and the Helvetii having attempted to bring him to trial, he suddenly died, probably, as was suspected, by his own hands.

Oribasĭus (Ὀρειβάσιος or Ὀριβάσιος), an eminent Greek medical writer, born about A. D. 325, either at Sardis in Lydia, or at Pergamus in Mysia. He early acquired a great professional reputation. He was an intimate friend of the emperor Julian, with whom he became acquainted several years before Julian's accession to the throne. He was almost the only person to whom Julian imparted the secret of his apostasy from Christianity. He accompanied Julian in his expedition against Persia, and was with him at the time of his death, 363. The succeeding emperors, Valentinian and Valens, confiscated the property of Oribasius and banished him. He was afterwards recalled from exile, and was alive at least as late as 395. Of the personal character of Oribasius we know little or nothing, but it is clear that he was much attached to paganism and to the heathen philosophy. He was an intimate friend of Eunapius, who praises him very highly, and wrote an account of his life. We possess at present 3 works of Oribasius: 1. Collecta Medicinalia (Συναγωγαὶ Ἰατρικαί), or sometimes Hebdomecontabiblos (Ἑβδομηκοντάβιβλος), which was compiled at the command of Julian, when Oribasius was still a young man. It contains but little original matter, but is very valuable on account of the numerous extracts from writers whose works are no longer extant. More than half of this work is now lost, and what remains is in some confusion. There is no complete edition of the work. 2. An abridgment (Σύνοψις) of the former work, in 9 books. It was written 30 years after the former. 3. Euporista or De facile Parabilibus (Εὐπόριστα), in 4 books. Both this and the preceding work were intended as manuals of the practice of medicine.

Orĭcum or Orĭcus (Ὤρικον, Ὤρικος: Ὠρίκιος: Ericho), an important Greek town on the coast of Illyria, near the Ceraunian mountains and the frontiers of Epirus. According to tradition it was founded by the Euboeans, who were cast here by a storm on their return from Troy; but, according to another legend, it was a Colchian colony. The town was strongly fortified, but its harbour was not very secure. It was destroyed in the civil wars, but was rebuilt by Herodes Atticus. The turpentine tree (terebinthus) grew in the neighbourhood of Oreus.

Origĕnes (Ὠριγένης), usually called Origen, one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, was born at Alexandria, A. D. 186. He received a careful education from his father, Leonides, who was a devout Christian; and he subsequently became a pupil of Clement of Alexandria. His father having been put to death in the persecution of the Christians in the 10th year of Severus (202), Origen was reduced to destitution; whereupon he became a teacher of grammar, and soon acquired a great reputation. At the same time he gave instruction in Christianity to several of the heathen; and though only in his 18th year, he was appointed to the office of Catechist, which was vacant through the dispersion of the clergy consequent on the persecution. The young teacher showed a zeal and self-denial beyond his years. Deeming his profession as teacher of grammar inconsistent with his sacred work, he gave it up; and he lived on the merest pittance. His food and his periods of sleep were restricted within the narrowest limits; and he performed a strange act of self-mutilation, in obedience to what he regarded as the recommendation of Christ. (Matth. xix. 12.) At a later time however he repudiated this literal understanding of our Lord's words. About 211 or 212 Origen visited Rome, where he made however a very short stay. On his return to Alexandria he continued to discharge his duties as Catechist, and to pursue his biblical studies. About 216 he paid a visit to Caesarea in Palestine, and about 230 he travelled into Greece. Shortly after his return to Alexandria, he had to encounter the open enmity of Demetrius, the bishop of the city. He was first deprived of his office of Catechist, and was compelled to leave Alexandria; and Demetrius afterwards procured his degradation from the priesthood and his excommunication. The charges brought against him are not specified; but his unpopularity appears to have arisen from the obnoxious character of some of his opinions, and was increased by the circumstance that even in his lifetime his writings were seriously corrupted. Origen withdrew to Caesarea in Palestine, where he was received with the greatest kindness. Among his pupils at this place was Gregory Thaumaturgus, who afterwards became his panegyrist. In 235 Origen fled from Caesarea in Palestine, and rook refuge at Caesarea in Cappadocia, where he remained concealed 2 years. It was subsequent to this that he undertook a 2nd journey into Greece, the date of which is doubtful. In the Decian persecution (249—251), Origen was put to the torture; but though his life was spared, the sufferings which he underwent hastened his end. He died in 253 or 254, in his 69th year at Tyre, in which city he was buried.—The following are the most important of Origen's works: 1. The Hexapla, which consisted of 6 copies of the Old Testament, ranged in parallel columns. The 1st column contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters, the 2nd the same text in Greek characters, the 3rd the version of Aquila, the 4th that of Symmachus, the 5th the Septuagint, the 6th the version of Theodotion. Beside the compilation and arrangement of these versions, Origen added marginal notes, containing, among other things, an explanation of the Hebrew names. Only fragments of this valuable work are extant; the best edition of which is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1714. 2. Exegetical works, which comprehend 3 classes: (1.) Tomi, which Jerome renders Volumina, containirg ample commentaries, in which he gave full scope to his intellect. (2.) Scholia, brief notes on detached passages. (3.) Homiliae, popular expositions, chiefly delivered at Caesarea. In his various expositions Origen sought to extract from the Sacred Writings their historical, mystical or prophetical, and moral significance. His desire of finding continually a mystical sense led him frequently into the neglect of the historical sense, and even into the denial of its truth. This capital fault has at all times furnished ground for depreciating his labours, and has no doubt materially diminished their value: it must not, however, be supposed that his denial of the historical truth of the Sacred Writings is more than occasional, or that it has been carried out to the full extent which some of his accusers have charged upon him. 3. De Principiis (Περὶ ἀρχῶν). This work was the great object of attack with Origen's enemies, and the source from which they derived their chief evidence of his various alleged heresies. It was divided into 4 books. Of this work some important fragments are extant; and the Latin version of Rufinus has come down to us entire; but Rufinus took great liberties with the original, and the unfaithfulness of his version is denounced in the strongest terms by Jerome. 4. Exhortatio ad Martyrium (Εἰς μαρτύριον προτρεπτικὸς λόγος), or De Martyria (Περὶ μαρτυρίου), written during the persecution under the emperor Maximin (235—238), and still extant. 5. Contra Celsum Libri VIII. (Κατὰ Κέλσου τόμοι η'), still extant. In this important work Origen defends the truth of Christianity against the attacks of Celsus. [CELSUS.] — There is a valuable work entitled Philocalia (Φιλοκαλία), which is a compilation by Basil of Caesarea and his friend Gregory of Nazianzus, made almost exclusively from the writings of Origen, of which many important fragments have been thus preserved. Few writers have exercised greater influence by the force of their intellect and the variety of their attainments than Origen, or have been the occasion of longer and more acrimonious disputes. Of his more distinctive tenets, several had reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, to the subject of the incarnation, and to the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, which, as well as the pre-existence of other human souls, he affirmed. He was charged also with holding the corporeity of angels, and with other errors as to angels and daemons. He held the freedom of the human will, and ascribed to man a nature less corrupt and depraved than was consistent with orthodox views of the operation of divine grace. He held the doctrine of the universal restoration of the guilty, conceiving that the devil alone would suffer eternal punishment. The best edition of his works is by Delarue, Paris, 1733—1759, 4 vols. fo.

Oringis or Oningis, probably the same place as Aurinx, a wealthy town in Hispania Baetica, with silver mines, near Munda.

Orīon (Ὠρίων), son of Hyrieus, of Hyria, in Boeotia, a handsome giant and hunter, said to have been called by the Boeotians Candaon. Once he came to Chios (Ophiusa), and fell in love with Aero, or Merope, the daughter of Oenopion, by the nymph Helice. He cleared the island from wild beasts, and brought the spoils of the chase as presents to his beloved; but as Oenopion constantly deferred the marriage, Orion once when intoxicated offered violence to the maiden. Oenopion now implored the assistance of Dionysus, who caused Orion to be thrown into a deep sleep by satyrs, in which state Oenopion deprived him of his sight. Being informed by an oracle that he should recover his sight, if he would go towards the east and expose his eye-balls to the rays of the rising sun, Orion followed the sound of a Cyclops' hammer, went to Lemnos, where Hephaestus gave to him Cedalion as his guide. Having recovered his sight, Orion returned to Chios to take vengeance on Oenopion; but as the latter had been concealed by his friends, Orion was unable to find him, and then proceeded to Crete, where he lived as a hunter with Artemis. The cause of his death, which took place either in Crete or Chios, is differently stated. According to some, Eos (Aurora), who loved Orion for his beauty, carried him off, but as the gods were angry at this, Artemis killed him with an arrow in Ortygia. According to others, he was beloved by Artemis, and Apollo, indignant at his sister's affection for him, asserted that she was unable to hit with her arrow a distant point which he showed her in the sea. She thereupon took aim, and hit it, but the point was the head of Orion, who had been swimming in the sea. A third account, which Horace follows (Carm. ii. 4. 72), states that he attempted to violate Artemis (Diana), and was killed by the goddess with one of her arrows. A fourth account, lastly, states that he boasted he would conquer every animal, and would clear the earth from all wild beasts; but the earth sent forth a scorpion which destroyed him. Aesculapius attempted to recall him to life, but was slain by Zeus with a flash of lightning. The accounts of his parentage and birth-place vary in the different writers, for some call him a son of Poseidon and Euryale, and others say that he was born of the earth, or a son of Oenopion. He is further called a Theban, or Tanagraean, but probably because Hyria, his native place, sometimes belonged to Tanagra, and sometimes to Thebes. After his death, Orion was placed among the stars where he appears as a giant with a girdle, sword, a lion's skin and a club. The constellation of Orion set at the commencement of November, at which time storms and rain were frequent; hence he is often called imbrifer, nimbosus, or aquosus.

Orīon and Orus (Ὠρίων and Ὧρος), names of several ancient grammarians, who are frequently confounded with each other. It appears, however, that we may distinguish 3 writers of these names. 1. Orion, a Theban grammarian, who taught at Caesarea, in the 5th century after Christ, and is the author of a lexicon, still extant, published by Sturz, Lips. 1820.—2. Orus, of Miletus, a grammarian, lived in the 2nd century after Christ, and was the author of the works mentioned by Suidas. — 3. Orus, an Alexandrine grammarian, who taught at Constantinople not earlier than the middle of the 4th century after Christ.

Orippo, a town in Hispania Baetica, on the road between Gades and Hispalis.

Orītae, Horītae, or Orae (Ὠρεῖται, Ὧραι), a people of Gedrosia, who inhabited a district on the coast nearly 200 miles long, abounding in wine, corn, rice, and palm-trees, the modern Urboo on the coast of Beloochistan. Some of the ancient writers assert that they were of Indian origin, while others say that, though they resembled the Indians in many of their customs, they spoke a different language.

Orithyia (Ὠρείθυια), daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. Once as she had strayed beyond the river Ilissus she was seized by Boreas, and carried off to Thrace, where she bore to Boreas Cleopatra, Chione, Zetes, and Calais.

Ormĕnus (Ὄρμενος), son of Cercaphus, grandson of Aeolus and father of Amyntor, was believed to have founded the town of Ormenium, in Thessaly. From him Amyntor is sometimes called Ormenides, and Astydamia, his grand-daughter, Ormenis.

Ornĕae (Ὀρνεαί: Ὀρνεάτης), an ancient town of Argolis, near the frontiers of the territory of Phlius, and 120 stadia from Argos. It was originally independent of Argos, but was subdued by the Argives in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 415.

Orneus (Ὀρνεύς), son of Erechtheus, father of Peteus, and grandfather of Menestheus; from him the town of Orneae was believed to have derived its name.

Oroanda (Ὀρόανδα: Ὀροανδεύς, or -ικός, Oroandensis), a mountain city of Pisidia, S. E. of Antiochia, from which the "Oroandicus tractus" obtained its name.

Oroātis (Ὀροάτις: Tab), the largest of the minor rivers which flow into the Persian Gulf, formed the boundary between Susiana and Persis.

Orŏbĭae (Ὀροβίαι), a town on the coast of Euboea, not far from Aegae, with an oracle of Apollo.

Orōdes (Ὀρώδης), the name of 2 kings of Parthia. [ARSACES XIV., XVII.]

Oroetes (Ὀροίτης), a Persian, was made satrap of Sardis by Cyrus, which government he retained under Cambyses. In B.C. 522, he decoyed POLYCRATES into his power by specious promises, and put him to death. But being suspected of aiming at the establishment of an independent sovereignty, he was himself put to death by order of Darius.

Orontes (Ὀρόντης). 1. (Nahr-el-Asy), the largest river of Syria, has 2 chief sources in Coelesyria, the one in the Antilibanus, the other further N. in the Libanus; flows N. E. into a lake S. of Emesa, and thence N. past Epiphania and Apamea, till near Antioch, where it suddenly sweeps round to the S. W. and falls into the sea at the foot of M. Pieria. According to tradition its earlier name was Typhon (Τυφών), and it was called Orontes from the person who first built a bridge over it. — 2. A mountain on the S. side of the Caspian, between Parthia and Hyrcania. — 3. A people of Assyria, E. of Gaugamela.

Orōpus (Ὠρωπός: Ὠρώπιος: Oropo), a town on the eastern frontiers of Boeotia and Attica, near the Euripus, originally belonged to the Boeotians, but was at an early time seized by the Athenians, and was long an object of contention between the 2 peoples. At length, after being taken and retaken several times, it remained permanently in the hands of the Athenians, and is always reckoned by later writers as a town of Attica. Its seaport was Delphinium at the mouth of the Asopus, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the town.

Orōsĭus, Paulus, a Spanish presbyter, a native of Tarragona, flourished under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for St. Augustine, he passed over into Africa about A.D. 413. After remaining in Africa about 2 years, Augustine sent him into Syria, to counteract the influence of Pelagius, who had resided for some years in Palestine. Orosius found a warm friend in Jerome, but was unable to procure the condemnation of Pelagius, and was himself anathematized by John, bishop of Jerusalem, when he brought a formal charge against Pelagius. Orosius subsequently returned to Africa, and there, it is believed, died, but at what period is not known. The following works by Orosius are still extant. 1. Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII., dedicated to St. Augustine, at whose suggestion the task was undertaken. The pagans having been accustomed to complain that the ruin of the Roman empire must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities, whose worship had been abandoned, Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from the earliest epoch the world had been the scene of calamities as great as the Roman empire was then suffering. The work, which extends from the Creation down to A.D. 417, is, with exception of the concluding portion, extracted from Justin, Eutropius, and inferior second-hand authorities. Edited by Havercamp, Lug. Bat. 1738. 2. Liber Apologeticus de Arbitrii Libertate, written in Palestine, A.D. 415, appended to the edition of the History by Havercamp. 3. Commonitorium ad Augustinum, the earliest of the works of Orosius, composed soon after his first arrival in Africa.

Orospĕda or Ortospĕda (Sierra del Mundo), the highest range of mountains in the centre of Spain, began in the centre of Mt. Idubeda, ran first W. and then S., and terminated near Calpe at the Fretum Herculeum. It contained several silver mines, whence the part in which the Baetis rises was called Mt. Argentarius or the Silver Mountain.

Orpheus (Ὀρφεύς), a mythical personage, was regarded by the Greeks as the most celebrated of the early poets, who lived before the time of Homer. His name does not occur in the Homeric or Hesiodic poems; but it already had attained to great celebrity in the lyric period. There were numerous legends about Orpheus, but the common story ran as follows. Orpheus, the son of Oeagrus and Calliope, lived in Thrace at the period of the Argonauts, whom he accompanied in their expedition. Presented with the lyre by Apollo, and instructed by the Muses in its use, he enchanted with its music not only the wild beasts, but the trees and rocks upon Olympus, so that they moved from their places to follow the sound of his golden harp. The power of his music caused the Argonauts to seek his aid, which contributed materially to the success of their expedition: at the sound of his lyre the Argo glided down into the sea; the Argonauts tore themselves away from the pleasures of Lemnos; the Symplegadae, or moving rocks, which threatened to crush the ship between them, were fixed in their places; and the Colchian dragon, which guarded the golden fleece, was lulled to sleep: other legends of the same kind may be read in the Argonautica, which bears the name of Orpheus. After his return from the Argonautic expedition he took up his abode in a cave in Thrace, and employed himself in the civilisation of its wild inhabitants. There is also a legend of his having visited Egypt. The legends respecting the loss and recovery of his wife, and his own death, are very various. His wife was a nymph named Agriope or Eurydice. In the older accounts the cause of her death is not referred to. The legend followed in the well-known passages of Virgil and Ovid, which ascribes the death of Eurydice to the bite of a serpent, is no doubt of high antiquity; but the introduction of Aristaeus into the legend cannot be traced to any writer older than Virgil himself. He followed his lost wife into the abodes of Hades, where the charms of his lyre suspended the torments of the damned, and won back his wife from the most inexorable of all deities; but his prayer was only granted upon this condition, that he should not look back upon his restored wife, till they had arrived in the upper world: at the very moment when they were about to pass the fatal bounds, the anxiety of love overcame the poet; he looked round to see that Eurydice was following him; and he beheld her caught back into the infernal regions. His grief for the loss of Eurydice led him to treat with contempt the Thracian women, who in revenge tore him to pieces under the excitement of their Bacchanalian orgies. After his death, the Muses collected the fragments of his body, and buried them at Libethra at the foot of Olympus, where the nightingale sang sweetly over his grave. His head was thrown into the Hebrus, down which it rolled to the sea, and was borne across to Lesbos, where the grave in which it was interred was shown at Antissa. His lyre was also said to have been carried to Lesbos; and both traditions are simply poetical expressions of the historical fact that Lesbos was the first great seat of the music of the lyre: indeed Antissa itself was the birth-place of Terpander, the earliest historical musician. The astronomers taught that the lyre of Orpheus was placed by Zeus among the stars, at the intercession of Apollo and the Muses. In these legends there are some points which are sufficiently clear. The invention of music, in connection with the services of Apollo and the Muses, its first great application to the worship of the gods, which Orpheus is therefore said to have introduced, its power over the passions, and the importance which the Greeks attached to the knowledge of it, as intimately allied with the very existence of all social order, — are probably the chief elementary ideas of the whole legend. But then comes in one of the dark features of the Greek religion, in which the gods envy the advancement of man in knowledge and civilisation, and severely punish any one who transgresses the bounds assigned to humanity. In a later age, the conflict was no longer viewed as between the gods and man, but between the worshippers of different divinities; and especially between Apollo, the symbol of pure intellect, and Dionysus, the deity of the senses; hence Orpheus, the servant of Apollo, falls a victim to the jealousy of Dionysus, and the fury of his worshippers. — Orphic Societies and Mysteries. About the time of the first development of Greek philosophy, societies were formed, consisting of persons called the followers of Orpheus (οἱ Ὀρφικοί), who, under the pretended guidance of Orpheus, dedicated themselves to the worship of Dionysus. They performed the rites of a mystical worship, but instead of confining their notions to the initiated, they published them to others, and committed them to literary works. The Dionysus, to whose worship the Orphic rites were annexed, was Dionysus Zagreus, closely connected with Demeter and Cora (Persephone). The Orphic legends and poems related in great part to this Dionysus, who was combined, as an infernal deity, with Hades; and upon whom the Orphic theologers founded their hopes of the purification and ultimate immortality of the soul. But their mode of celebrating this worship was very different from the popular rites of Bacchus. The Orphic worshippers of Bacchus did not indulge in unrestrained pleasure and frantic enthusiasm, but rather aimed at an ascetic purity of life and manners. All this part of the mythology of Orpheus, which connects him with Dionysus, must be considered as a later invention, quite irreconcilable with the original legend, in which he is the servant of Apollo and the Muses: but it is almost hopeless to explain the transition. — Many poems ascribed to Orpheus were current as early as the time of the Pisistratids [ONOMACRITUS]. They are often quoted by Plato, and the allusions to them in later writers are very frequent. The extant poems, which bear the name of Orpheus, are the forgeries of Christian grammarians and philosophers of the Alexandrian school; but among the fragments, which form a part of the collection, are some genuine remains of that Orphic poetry which was known to Plato, and which must be assigned to the period of Onomacritus, or perhaps a little earlier. The Orphic literature, which in this sense may be called genuine, seems to have included Hymns, a Theogony, Oracles, &c. The apocryphal productions which have come down to us are, 1. Argonautica, an epic poem in 1384 hexameters, giving an account of the expedition of the Argonauts. 2. Hymns, 87 or 88 in number, in hexameters, evidently the productions of the Neo-Platonic school. 3. Lithica (Λιθικά), treats of properties of stones, both precious and common, and their uses in divination. 4. Fragments, chiefly of the Theogony. It is in this class that we find the genuine remains of the literature of the early Orphic theology, but intermingled with others of a much later date. The best edition is by Hermann, Lips. 1805.

Orthĭa (Ὀρθία, Ὀρθίς, or Ὀρθωσία), a surname of the Artemis who is also called Iphigenia or Lygodesma, and must be regarded as the goddess of the moon. Her worship was probably brought to Sparta from Lemnos. It was at the altar of Artemis Orthia that Spartan boys had to undergo the flogging, called diamastigosis.

Orthōsĭa (Ὀρθωσία). 1. A city of Caria, on the Maeander, with a mountain of the same name, where the Rhodians defeated the Carians, B.C. 167. — 2. A city of Phoenice, S. of the mouth of the Eleutherus, and 12 Roman miles from Tripolis.

Orthrus (Ὄρθρος), the two-headed dog of Geryones, who was begotten by Typhon and Echidna, and was slain by Hercules. [See p. 309, b.]

Ortospana or -um (Ὀρτόσπανα: Cabul?), a considerable city of the Paropamisadae, at the sources of a W. tributary of the river Coës, and at the junction of 3 roads, one leading N. into Bactria, and the others S. and E. into India. It was also called Carura or Cabura.

Ortȳgĭa (Ὀρτυγία). 1. The ancient name of Delos. Since Artemis (Diana) and Apollo were born at Delos, the poets sometimes call the goddess Ortygia, and give the name of Ortygiae boves to the oxen of Apollo. The ancients connected the name with Ortyx (Ὄρτυξ) a quail. [See p. 379, a.] — 2. An island near Syracuse. [SYRACUSAE]. — 3. A grove near Ephesus, in which the Ephesians pretended that Apollo and Artemis were born. Hence Propertius calls the Cayster, which flowed near Ephesus, Ortygius Cayster.

Orus. [HORUS; ORION.]

Osca. 1. (Huesca in Arragonia), an important town of the Ilergetes and a Roman colony in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Ilerda, with silver mines; whence Livy speaks of argentum Osciense, though these words may perhaps mean silver money coined at Osca. — 2. (W. of Huescar in Granada), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Baetica.

Oscĕla. [Lepontii.]

Osci or Opĭci (Ὄσκοι, Ὀπικοί), one of the most ancient tribes of Italy, inhabited the centre of the peninsula, from which they had driven out the Siculi. Their principal settlement was in Campania, but we also find them in parts of Latium and Samnium. They were subdued by the Sabines and Tyrrhenians, and disappeared from history at a comparatively early period. They were called in their own language Uskus. They are identified by many writers with the Ausones or Aurunci; but others think that the latter is a collective name for all the people dwelling in the plain, and that the Osci were a branch of the Ausones. The Oscan language was closely connected with the other ancient Italian dialects, out of which the Latin language was formed; and it continued to be spoken by the people of Campania long after the Oscans had disappeared as a separate people. A knowledge of it was preserved at Rome by the Fabulae Atellanae, which were a species of farce or comedy written in Oscan.

Osi, a people in Germany, probably in the mountains between the sources of the Oder and the Gran, were, according to Tacitus, tributary to the Sarmatians, and spoke the Pannonian language.

Osicerda. [Ossigerda.]

Osīris (Ὄσιρις), the great Egyptian divinity, and husband of Isis. According to Herodotus they were the only divinities who were worshipped by all the Egyptians. His Egyptian name is said to have been Hysiris, which is interpreted to mean "son of Isis;" though some said that it meant "many-eyed." He is said to have been originally king of Egypt, and to have reclaimed his subjects from a barbarous life by teaching them agriculture, and enacting wise laws. He afterwards travelled into foreign lands, spreading, wherever he went, the blessings of civilisation. On his return to Egypt, he was murdered by his brother Typhon, who cut his body into pieces, and threw them into the Nile. After a long search Isis discovered the mangled remains of her husband, and with the assistance of her son Horus defeated Typhon, and recovered the sovereign power, which Typhon had usurped. See Isis.

Osismii, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, at the N.W. extremity of the coast, and in the neighbourhood of the modern Quimper and Brest.

Osroēnē (Ὀσροηνή: Ὀσροηνοί, pl.: Pashalik of Orfah), the W. of the 2 portions into which N. Mesopotamia was divided by the river Chaboras (Khabour), which separated it from Mygdonia on the E. and from the rest of Mesopotamia on the S.: the Euphrates divided it, on the W. and N. W., from the Syrian districts of Chalybonitis, Cyrrhestice, and Commagene; and on the N. it was separated by M. Masius from Armenia. Its name was said to be derived from Osroës, an Arabian chieftain, who, in the time of the Seleucidae, established over it a petty principality, with Edessa for its capital, which lasted till the reign of Caracalla, and respecting the history of which, see Abgarus.

Ossa (Ὄσσα: Kissavo, i. e. ivy-clad), a celebrated mountain in the N. of Magnesia, in Thessaly, connected with Pelion on the S. E., and divided from Olympus on the N. W. by the vale of Tempe. It is one of the highest mountains in Greece, but much less lofty than Olympus. It is mentioned by Homer, in the legend of the war of the Giants, respecting which see Olympus.

Osset, with the surname Constantia Julia, a town in Hispania Baetica, on the right bank of the Baetis, opposite Hispalis.

Ossigerda or Osicerda (Ossigerdensis), a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman municipium.

Ossīgi (Maquiz), a town of the Turduli in Hispania Baetica, on the spot where the Baetis first enters Baetica.

Ossonŏba (Estoy N. of Faro), a town of the Turdetani in Lusitania, between the Tagus and Anas.

Osteōdes (Ὀστεώδης νῆσος: Alicur), an island at some distance from the N. coast of Sicily, opposite the town of Soli.

Ostĭa (Ostiensis: Ostia), a town at the mouth of the river Tiber, and the harbour of Rome, from which it was distant 16 miles by land, was situated on the left bank of the left arm of the river. It was founded by Ancus Martius, the 4th king of Rome, was a Roman colony, and eventually became an important and flourishing town. In the civil wars it was destroyed by Marius, but it was soon rebuilt with greater splendour than before. The emperor Claudius constructed a new and better harbour on the right arm of the Tiber, which was enlarged and improved by Trajan. This new harbour was called simply Portus Romanus or Portus Augusti, and around it there sprang up a flourishing town, also called Portus (the inhabitants Portuenses). The old town of Ostia, whose harbour had been already partly filled up by sand, now sank into insignificance, and only continued to exist through its salt-works (salinae), which had been established by Ancus Martius. The ruins of Ostia are between 2 and 3 miles from the coast, as the sea has gradually receded in consequence of the accumulation of sand deposited by the Tiber.

Ostia Nili. [Nilus.]

Ostorĭus Scapŭla. [Scapula.]

Ostra (Ostrānus), a town in Umbria in the territory of the Senones.

T. Otăcĭlius Crassus, a Roman general during the 2nd Punic war, was praetor B. C. 217, and subsequently pro-praetor in Sicily. In 215 he crossed over to Africa, and laid waste the Carthaginian coast. He was praetor for the 2nd time, 214, and his command was prolonged during the next 3 years. He died in Sicily, 211.

L. Otăcĭlius Pilitus, a Roman rhetorician, who opened a school at Rome B. C. 81, was originally a slave; but having exhibited talent, and a love of literature, he was manumitted by his master. Cn. Pompeius Magnus was one of his pupils, and he wrote the history of Pompey, and of his father likewise.

Otānes (Ὀτάνης). 1. A Persian, son of Pharnaspes, was the first who suspected the imposture of Smerdis the Magian, and took the chief part in organizing the conspiracy against the pretender (B. C. 521). After the accession of Darius Hystaspis, he was placed in command of the Persian force which invaded Samos for the purpose of placing Syloson, brother of Polycrates, in the government. — 2. A Persian, son of Sisamnes, succeeded Megabyzus (B. C. 506) in the command of the forces on the sea-coast, and took Byzantium, Chalcedon, Antandrus, and Lamponium, as well as the islands of Lemnos and Imbros. He was probably the same Otanes who is mentioned as a son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis, and as a general employed against the revolted Ionians in 499.

Otho, L. Roscius, tribune of the plebs B. C. 67, was a warm supporter of the aristocratical party. He opposed the proposal of Gabinius to bestow upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; and in the same year he proposed and carried the law which gave to the equites a special place at the public spectacles, in fourteen rows or seats (in quattuordecim gradibus sive ordinibus), next to the place of the senators, which was in the orchestra. This law was very unpopular; and in Cicero's consulship (63) there was such a riot occasioned by the obnoxious measure, that it required all his eloquence to allay the agitation.

Otho, Salvius. 1. M., grandfather of the emperor Otho, was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Ferentinum, in Etruria. His father was a Roman eques; his mother was of low origin, perhaps even a freedwoman. Through the influence of Livia Augusta, in whose house he had been brought up, Otho was made a Roman senator, and eventually obtained the praetorship, but was not advanced to any higher honour. — 2. L., son of the preceding, and father of the emperor Otho, stood so high in the favour of Tiberius and resembled this emperor so strongly in person, that it was supposed by most that he was his son. He was consul suffectus in A. D. 33; was afterwards proconsul in Africa; and in 42 was sent into Illyricum, where he restored discipline among the soldiers, who had lately rebelled against Claudius. At a later time he detected a conspiracy which had been formed against the life of Claudius. — 3. L., surnamed TITIANUS, elder son of No. 2, was consul 52, and proconsul in Asia 63, when he had Agricola for his quaestor. It is related to the honour of the latter that he was not corrupted by the example of his superior officer, who indulged in every kind of rapacity. On the death of Galba in January 69, Titianus was a second time made consul, with his brother Otho, the emperor. On the death of the latter, he was pardoned by Vitellius. — 4. M., Roman emperor from January 15th to April 16th, A. D. 69, was the younger son of No. 2. He was born in the early part of 32. He was of moderate stature, ill-made in the legs, and had an effeminate appearance. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries; but when the emperor took possession of his wife, the beautiful but profligate Poppaea Sabina, Otho was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last 10 years of Nero's life. Otho attached himself to Galba when he revolted against Nero, in the hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But when Galba adopted L. Piso, on the 10th of January, 69, Otho formed a conspiracy against Galba, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers at Rome, who put Galba to death. Meantime Vitellius had been proclaimed emperor at Cologne by the German troops on the 3rd of January; and his generals forthwith set out for Italy to place their master on the throne. When these news reached Otho, he marched into the N. of Italy to oppose the generals of Vitellius. The fortune of war was at first in his favour. He defeated Caecina, the general of Vitellius, in more than one engagement; but his army was subsequently defeated in a decisive battle near Bedriacum by the united forces of Caecina and Valens, whereupon he put an end to his own life at Brixellum in the 37th year of his age.

Othrȳădes (Ὀθρυάδης). 1. A patronymic given to Panthous or Panthus, the Trojan priest of Apollo, as the son of Othrys. — 2. A Spartan, one of the 300 selected to fight with an equal number of Argives for the possession of Thyrea. Othryades was the only Spartan who survived the battle, and was left for dead. He spoiled the dead bodies of the enemy, and remained at his post, while Alcenor and Chromius, the two survivors of the Argive party, hastened home with the news of victory, supposing that all their opponents had been slain. As the victory was claimed by both sides, a general battle ensued, in which the Argives were defeated. Othryades slew himself on the field, being ashamed to return to Sparta as the one survivor of her 300 champions.

Othrys (Ὄθρυς), a lofty range of mountains in the S. of Thessaly, which extended from Mt. Tymphrestus, or the most S.-ly part of Pindus, to the E. coast and the promontory between the Pagasaean gulf and the N. point of Euboea. It shut in the great Thessalian plain on the S.

Otus, and his brother, Ephialtes, are better known by their name of the Alōīdae. [ALOEUS.]

P. Ovidius Nāso, the Roman poet, was born at Sulmo, in the country of the Peligni, on the 20th March, B. C. 43. He was descended from an ancient equestrian family, but possessing only moderate wealth. He, as well as his brother Lucius, who was exactly a year older than himself, was destined to be a pleader, and received a careful education to qualify him for that calling. He studied rhetoric under Arellius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and attained to considerable proficiency in the art of declamation. But the bent of his genius showed itself very early. The hours which should have been spent in the study of jurisprudence were employed in cultivating his poetical talent. The elder Seneca, who had heard him declaim, tells us that his oratory resembled a solutum carmen, and that any thing in the way of argument was irksome to him. His father denounced his favourite pursuit as leading to inevitable poverty; but the death of his brother, at the early age of 20, probably served in some degree to mitigate his father's opposition, for the patrimony which would have been scanty for two might amply suffice for one. Ovid's education was completed at Athens, where he made himself thoroughly master of the Greek language. Afterwards he travelled with the poet Macer, in Asia and Sicily. It is a disputed point whether he ever actually practised as an advocate after his return to Rome. The picture Ovid himself draws of his weak constitution and indolent temper prevents us from thinking that he ever followed his profession with perseverance, if indeed at all. The same causes deterred him from entering the senate, though he had put on the latus clavus when he assumed the toga virilis, as being by birth entitled to aspire to the senatorial dignity. (Trist. iv. 10. 29.) He became, however, one of the Triumviri Capitales; and he was subsequently made one of the Centumviri, or judges who tried testamentary and even criminal causes; and in due time he was promoted to be one of the Decemviri, who assembled and presided over the court of the Centumviri. — Such is all the account that can be given of Ovid's business life. He married twice in early life at the desire of his parents, but he speedily divorced each of his wives in succession. The restraint of a wife was irksome to a man like Ovid, who was devoted to gallantry and licentious life. His chief mistress in the early part of his life was the one whom he celebrates in his poems under the name of Corinna. If we may believe the testimony of Sidonius Apollinaris, Corinna was no less a personage than Julia, the accomplished, but abandoned daughter of Augustus. There are several passages in Ovid's Amores which render the testimony of Sidonius highly probable. Thus it appears that his mistress was a married woman, of high rank, but profligate morals; all which particulars will suit Julia. How long Ovid's connection with Corinna lasted there are no means of deciding; but it probably ceased before his marriage with his 3rd wife, whom he appears to have sincerely loved. We can hardly place his 3rd marriage later than his 30th year, since a daughter, Perilla, was the fruit of it (Trist. iii. 7. 3), who was grown up and married at the time of his banishment. Perilla was twice married, and had a child by each husband. Ovid was a grandfather before he lost his father at the age of 90; soon after whose decease his mother also died. Till his 50th year Ovid continued to reside at Rome, where he had a house near the Capitol, occasionally taking a trip to his Pelignan farm. He not only enjoyed the friendship of a large circle of distinguished men, but the regard and favour of Augustus and the imperial family. But in A. D. 9 Ovid was suddenly commanded by an imperial edict to transport himself to Tomi, a town on the Euxine, near the mouths of the Danube, on the very border of the empire. He underwent no trial, and the sole reason for his banishment stated in the edict was his having published his poem on the Art of Love (Ars Amatoria). It was not, however, an exsilium, but a relegatio; that is, he was not utterly cut off from all hope of return, nor did he lose his citizenship. The real cause of his banishment has long exercised the ingenuity of scholars. The publication of the Ars Amatoria was certainly a mere pretext. The poem had been published nearly 10 years previously; and moreover, whenever Ovid alludes to that, the ostensible cause, he invariably couples with it another which he mysteriously conceals. According to some writers, the real cause was his intrigue with Julia. But this is sufficiently refuted by the fact that Julia had been an exile since B. C. 2. Other writers suppose that he had been guilty of an intrigue with the younger Julia, the daughter of the elder one; and the remarkable fact that the younger Julia was banished in the same year with Ovid leads very strongly to the inference that his fate was in some way connected with hers. But Ovid states himself that his fault was an involuntary one; and the great disparity of years between the poet and the younger Julia renders it improbable that there had been an intrigue between them. He may more probably have become acquainted with Julia's profligacy by accident, and by his subsequent conduct, perhaps, for instance, by concealing it, have given offence to Livia, or Augustus, or both. Ovid draws an affecting picture of the miseries to which he was exposed in his place of exile. He complains of the inhospitable soil, of the severity of the climate, and of the perils to which he was exposed, when the barbarians plundered the surrounding country, and insulted the very walls of Tomi. In the most abject terms he supplicated Augustus to change his place of banishment, and besought his friends to use their influence in his behalf. In the midst of all his misfortunes he sought some relief in the exercise of his poetical talents. Not only did he finish his Fasti in his exile, besides writing the Ibis, the Tristia, Ex Ponto, &c., but he likewise acquired the language of the Getae, in which he composed some poems in honour of Augustus. These he publicly recited, and they were received with tumultuous applause by the Tomitae. With his new fellow-citizens, indeed, he had succeeded in rendering himself highly popular, insomuch that they honoured him with a decree, declaring him exempt from all public burthens. He died at Tomi in the 60th year of his age, A. D. 18. — The following is a list of Ovid's works, arranged, as far as possible, in chronological order: — 1. Amorum Libri III., the earliest of the poet's works. According to the epigram prefixed, the work, as we now possess it, is a 2nd edition, revised and abridged, the former one having consisted of 5 books. 2. Epistolae Heroïdum, 21 in number. 3. Ars Amatoria, or De Arte Amandi, written about B. C. 2. At the time of Ovid's banishment this poem was ejected from the public libraries by command of Augustus. 4. Remedia Amoris, in 1 book. 5. Nux, the elegiac complaint of a nut-tree respecting the ill-treatment it receives from wayfarers, and even from its own master. 6. Metamorphoseon Libri XV. This, the greatest of Ovid's poems in bulk and pretensions, appears to have been written between the age of 40 and 50. It consists of such legends or fables as involved a transformation, from the Creation to the time of Julius Caesar, the last being that emperor's change into a star. It is thus a sort of cyclic poem made up of distinct episodes, but connected into one narrative thread, with much skill. 7. Fastorum Libri XII., of which only the first 6 are extant. This work was incomplete at the time of Ovid's banishment. Indeed he had perhaps done little more than collect the materials for it; for that the 4th book was written in Pontus appears from ver. 88. The Fasti is a sort of poetical Roman calendar, with its appropriate festivals and mythology, and the substance was probably taken in a great measure from the old Roman annalists. The work shows a good deal of learning, but it has been observed that Ovid makes frequent mistakes in his astronomy, from not understanding the books from which he took it. 8. Tristium Libri V., elegies written during the first 4 years of Ovid's banishment. They are chiefly made up of descriptions of his afflicted condition, and petitions for mercy. The 10th elegy of the 4th book is valuable, as containing many particulars of Ovid's life. 9. Epistolarum ex Ponto Libri IV., are also in the elegiac metre, and much the same in substance as the Tristia, to which they were subsequent. It must be confessed that age and misfortune seem to have damped Ovid's genius both in this and the preceding work. Even the versification is more slovenly, and some of the lines very prosaic. 10. Ibis, a satire of between 600 and 700 elegiac verses, also written in exile. The poet inveighs in it against an enemy who had traduced him. Though the variety of Ovid's imprecations displays learning and fancy, the piece leaves the impression of an impotent explosion of rage. The title and plan were borrowed from Callimachus. 11. Consolatio ad Liviam Augustam, is considered by most critics not to be genuine, though it is allowed on all hands to be not unworthy of Ovid's genius. 12. The Medicamina Faciei and Halieuticon are mere fragments, and their genuineness not altogether certain. — Of his lost works, the most celebrated was his tragedy, Medea, of which only two lines remain. That Ovid possessed a great poetical genius is unquestionable; which makes it the more to be regretted that it was not always under the control of a sound judgment. He possessed great vigour of fancy, warmth of colouring, and facility of composition. Ovid has himself described how spontaneously his verses flowed; but the facility of composition possessed more charms for him than the irksome, but indispensable labour of correction and retrenchment. Ovid was the first to depart from that pure and correct taste which characterises the Greek poets, and their earlier Latin imitators. His writings abound with those false thoughts and frigid conceits which we find so frequently in the Italian poets; and in this respect he must be regarded as unantique. The best edition of Ovid's complete works is by Burmann, Amsterdam, 1727, 4 vols. 4to.

Oxīa Palus, is first mentioned distinctly by Ammianus Marcellinus as the name of the Sea of Aral, which the ancients in general did not distinguish from the Caspian. When Ptolemy, however, speaks of the Oxiāna Palus (ἡ Ὠξειανὴ λίμνη) as a small lake in the steppes of Sogdiana, he is perhaps following some vague account of the separate existence of the Sea of Aral, and the same remark may be applied to Pliny's account that the source (instead of the termination) of the river Oxus was in a lake of the same name.

Oxiāni (Ὠξιανοί, Οὐξιανοί), a people of Sogdiana, on the N. of the Oxus.

Oxĭi Montes (τὰ Ὤξεια, or Οὔξεια, ὄρη: prob. Ak-tagh), a range of mountains between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes; the N. boundary of Sogdiana towards Scythia.

Oxus or Oaxus (Ὄξος, Ὦξος: Jihoun or Amou), a great river of Central Asia, rose, according to some of the ancient geographers, on the N. side of the Paropamisus M. (Hindoo Koosh), and, according to others, in the Emodi M., and flowed N. W., forming the boundary between Sogdiana on the N. and Bactria and Margiana on the S., and then, skirting the N. of Hyrcania, it fell into the Caspian. The Jihoun now flows into the S. W. corner of the Sea of Aral; but there are still distinct traces of a channel extending in a S. W. direction from the Sea of Aral to the Caspian, by which at least a portion, and probably the whole, of the waters of the Oxus found their way into the Caspian; and very probably the Sea of Aral itself was connected with the Caspian by this channel. The ancient geographers mention, as important tributaries of the Oxus, the Ochus, the Margus, and the Bactrus, which are now intercepted by the sands of the Desert. The Oxus is a broad and rapid river, navigable through a considerable portion of its course. It formed, in ancient times, a channel of commercial intercourse between India and W. Asia, goods being brought down it to the Caspian, and thence up the Cyrus and across Armenia, into Asia Minor. It occupies also an important place in history, having been in nearly all ages the extreme boundary between the great monarchies of S. W. Asia and the hordes which wander over the central steppes. Cyrus and Alexander both crossed it; but the former effected no permanent conquests on its N. side; and the conquests of the latter in Sogdiana, though for a time preserved under the Bactrian kings, were always regarded as lying beyond the limits of the civilised world, and were lost at the fall of the Bactrian kingdom. — Herodotus does not mention the Oxus by name, but it is supposed to be the river which he calls Araxes.

Oxybĭi, a Ligurian people on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, W. of the Alps, and between the Flumen Argenteum (Argens) and Antipolis (Antibes). They were neighbours of the Salluvii and Deciates.

Oxydracae (Ὀξυδράκαι), a warlike people of India intra Gangem, in the Punjab, between the rivers Hydaspes (Jhelum) and Acesines (Chenab), in whose capital Alexander was wounded. They called themselves descendants of Dionysus.

Oxȳlus (Ὄξυλος), the leader of the Heraclidae in their invasion of Peloponnesus, and subsequently king of Elis. [See p. 306, b.]

Oxyrhynchus (Ὀξύρυγχος: Behneseh, Ru.), a city of Middle Egypt, on the W. bank of the canal which runs parallel to the Nile on its W. side (Bahr Yussuf). It was the capital of the Nomos Oxyrhynchites, and the chief seat of the worship of the fish called oxyrynchus.

Ozogardana, a city of Mesopotamia on the Euphrates, the people of which preserved a lofty throne or chair of stone, which they called Trajan's judgment-seat.

P.

Pacăris. [Hypacyris.]

Pacatiāna. [Phrygia].

Paccĭus or Paccĭus Antiochus, a physician about the beginning of the Christian era, who was a pupil of Philonides of Catana, and lived probably at Rome. He made a large fortune by the sale of a certain medicine of his own invention, the composition of which he kept a profound secret. At his death he left his prescription as a legacy to the emperor Tiberius, who, in order to give it as wide a circulation as possible, ordered a copy of it to be placed in all the public libraries.

Paches (Πάχης), an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war, took Mytilene and reduced Lesbos, B. C. 427. On his return to Athens he was brought to trial on some charge, and, perceiving his condemnation to be certain, drew his sword and stabbed himself in the presence of his judges.

Pachymĕres, Georgĭus, an important Byzantine writer, was born about A. D. 1242 at Nicaea, but spent the greater part of his life at Constantinople. He was a priest, and opposed the union of the Greek and Latin churches. Pachymeres wrote several works, the most important of which is a Byzantine History, containing an account of the emperors Michael Palaeologus and Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, in 13 books. The style is remarkably good and pure for the age. Edited by Possinus, Rome, 1666—1669, 2 vols. fol., and by Bekker, Bonn, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

Pachȳnus or Pachȳnum (Capo Passaro), a promontory at the S. E. extremity of Sicily, and one of the 3 promontories which give to Sicily its triangular figure, the other 2 being Pelorum and Lilybaeum. By the side of Pachynus was a bay, which was used as a harbour, and which is called by Cicero Portus Pachyni (Porto di Palo).

Pacĭlus, the name of a family of the patrician Furia gens, mentioned in the early history of the republic.

Pacŏrus. 1. Son of Orodes I., king of Parthia. His history is given under Arsaces XIV. — 2. King of Parthia. [Arsaces XXIV.]

Pactōlus (Πακτωλός: Sarabat), a small but celebrated river of Lydia, rose on the N. side of Mt. Tmolus, and flowed N. past Sardis into the Hermus, which it joined 30 stadia below Sardis. The golden sands of Pactolus have passed into a proverb. Lydia was long the California of the ancient world, its streams forming so many gold "washings;" and hence the wealth of the Lydian kings, and the alleged origin of gold money in that country. But the supply of gold was only on the surface, and by the beginning of our era, it was so far exhausted as not to repay the trouble of collecting it.

Pactyas (Πακτύας), a Lydian, who on the conquest of Sardis (B.C. 546), was charged by Cyrus with the collection of the revenue of the province. When Cyrus left Sardis on his return to Ecbatana, Pactyas induced the Lydians to revolt against Cyrus; but when an army was sent against him he first fled to Cyme, then to Mytilene, and eventually to Chios. He was surrendered by the Chians to the Persians.

Pactȳē (Πακτύη: St. George), a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, on the Propontis, 36 stadia from Cardia, to which Alcibiades retired when he was banished by the Athenians, B. C. 407.

Pactyĭca (Πακτυϊκή), the country of the Pactyes (Πάκτυες), in the N.W. of India, W. of the Indus, and in the 13th satrapy of the Persian Empire, is most probably the N.E. part of Afghanistan, about Jellalabad.

M. Pācŭvĭus, one of the early Roman tragedians, was born about B. C. 220, at Brundisium, and is said to have been the son of the sister of Ennius. Pacuvius appears to have been brought up at Brundisium, but he afterwards repaired to Rome. Here he devoted himself to painting and poetry, and obtained so much distinction in the former art, that a painting of his in the temple of Hercules, in the forum boarium, was regarded as only inferior to the celebrated painting of Fabius Pictor. After living many years at Rome, for he was still there in his 80th year, he returned to Brundisium, on account of the failure of his health, and died in his native town, in the 90th year of his age, B.C. 130. We have no further particulars of his life, save that his talents gained him the friendship of Laelius, and that he lived on the most intimate terms with his younger rival Accius. Pacuvius was universally allowed by the ancient writers to have been one of the greatest of the Latin tragic poets. (Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 56.) He is especially praised for the loftiness of his thoughts, the vigour of his language, and the extent of his knowledge. Hence we find the epithet doctus frequently applied to him. He was also a favourite with the people, with whom his verses continued to be esteemed in the time of Julius Caesar. His tragedies were taken from the great Greek writers; but he did not confine himself, like his predecessors, to a mere translation of the latter, but worked up his materials with more freedom and independent judgment. Some of the plays of Pacuvius were not based upon the Greek tragedies, but belonged to the class called Praetextatae, in which the subjects were taken from Roman story. One of these was entitled Paulus, which had as its hero L. Aemilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, king of Macedonia. The fragments of Pacuvius are published by Bothe, Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragm. Lips. 1834.

Pădus (Po), the chief river of Italy, whose name is said to have been of Celtic origin, and to have been given it on account of the pine trees (in Celtic padi) which grew on its banks. In the Ligurian language it was called Bodencus or Bodincus. Almost all later writers identified the Padus with the fabulous Eridanus, from which amber was obtained; and hence the Roman poets frequently give the name of Eridanus to the Padus. The reason of this identification appears to have been, that the Phoenician vessels received at the mouths of the Padus the amber which had been transported by land from the coasts of the Baltic to those of the Adriatic. The Padus rises from 2 springs on the E. side of Mt. Vesula (Monte Viso) in the Alps, and flows with a general E.-ly direction through the great plain of Cisalpine Gaul, which it divides into 2 parts, Gallia Cispadana and Gallia Transpadana. It receives numerous affluents, which drain the whole of this vast plain, descending from the Alps on the N. and the Apennines on the S. These affluents, increased in the summer by the melting of the snow on the mountains, frequently bring down such a large body of water as to cause the Padus to overflow its banks. The whole course of the river, including its windings, is about 450 miles. About 20 miles from the sea the river divides itself into 2 main branches, of which the N. one was called Padoa (Maestra, Po Grande, or Po delle Fornaci) and the S. one Olana (Po d'Ariano); and each of these now falls into the Adriatic by several mouths. The ancient writers enumerate 7 of these mouths, some of which were canals. They lay between Ravenna and Altinum, and bore the following names, according to Pliny, beginning with the S. and ending with the N. 1. Padusa, also called Augusta Fossa, was a canal dug by Augustus, which connected Ravenna with the Po. 2. Vatrenus, also called Eridanum Ostium or Spineticum Ostium (Po di Primaro), from the town of Spina at its mouth. 3. Ostium Caprasiae (Porto Interito di bell' Ochio). 4. Ostium Sagis (Porto di Magnavacca). 5. Olane or Volane, the S. main branch of the river, mentioned above. 6. Padoa, the N. main branch, subdivided into several small branches called Ostia Carbonaria. 7. Fossae Philistinae, connecting the river, by means of the Tartarus, with the Athesis.

Padūsa. [Padus.]

Paean (Παιάν, Παιήων or Παιών), that is, "the healing," is according to Homer the designation of the physician of the Olympian gods, who heals, for example, the wounded Ares and Hades. After the time of Homer and Hesiod, the word Paean became a surname of Aesculapius, the god who had the power of healing. The name was, however, used also in the more general sense of deliverer from any evil or calamity, and was thus applied to Apollo and Thanatos, or Death, who are conceived as delivering men from the pains and sorrows of life. With regard to Apollo and Thanatos, however, the name may at the same time contain an allusion to παίειν, to strike, since both are also regarded as destroyers. From Apollo himself the name Paean was transferred to the song dedicated to him, that is, to hymns chaunted to Apollo for the purpose of averting an evil, and to warlike songs, which were sung before or during a battle.

Paeānĭa (Παιανία: Παιανιεύς), a demus in Attica, on the E. slope of Mt. Hymettus, belonging to the tribe Pandionis. It was the demus of the orator Demosthenes.

Paemāni, a people of German origin in Gallia Belgica.

Paeŏnes (Παίονες), a powerful Thracian people, who in early times were spread over a great part of Macedonia and Thrace. According to a legend preserved by Herodotus, they were of Teucrian origin; and it is not impossible that they were a branch of the great Phrygian people, a portion of which seems to have settled in Europe. In Homer the Paeonians appear as allies of the Trojans, and are represented as having come from the river Axius. In historical times they inhabited the whole of the N. of Macedonia, from the frontiers of Illyria to some little distance E. of the river Strymon. Their country was called Paeŏnĭa (Παιονία). The Paeonians were divided into several tribes, independent of each other, and governed by their own chiefs; though at a later period they appear to have owned the authority of one king. The Paeonian tribes on the lower course of the Strymon were subdued by the Persians, B.C. 513, and many of them were transplanted to Phrygia; but the tribes in the N. of the country maintained their independence. They were long troublesome neighbours to the Macedonian monarchs, whose territories they frequently invaded and plundered; but they were eventually subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who allowed them nevertheless to retain their own monarchs. They continued to be governed by their own kings till a much later period; and these kings were often virtually independent of the Macedonian monarchy. Thus we read of their king Audoleon, whose daughter Pyrrhus married. After the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, 168, the part of Paeonia E. of the Axius formed the 2nd, and the part of Paeonia W. of the Axius formed the 3rd, of the 4 districts into which Macedonia was divided by the Romans.

Paeŏnĭus (Παιώνιος). 1. Of Ephesus, an architect, probably lived between B. C. 420 and 380. In conjunction with Demetrius, he finally completed the great temple of Artemis, at Ephesus, which Chersiphron had begun; and, with Daphnis the Milesian, he began to build at Miletus a temple of Apollo, of the Ionic order. The latter was the famous Didymaeum, or temple of Apollo Didymus, the ruins of which are still to be seen near Miletus. The former temple, in which the Branchidae had an oracle of Apollo, was burnt at the capture of Miletus by the army of Darius, 498. The new temple, which was on a scale only inferior to that of Artemis, was never finished. — 2. Of Mende, in Thrace, a statuary and sculptor, flourished about 435.

Paeoplae (Παιόπλαι), a Paeonian people on the lower course of the Strymon and the Angites, who were subdued by the Persians, and transplanted to Phrygia by order of Darius, B. C. 513. They returned to their native country with the help of Aristagoras, 500; and we find them settled N. of Mt. Pangaeus in the expedition of Xerxes, 480.

Paerisădes or Parisădes (Παιρισάδης or Παρισάδης), the name of 2 kings of Bosporus. 1. Son of Leucon, succeeded his brother Spartacus B. C. 349, and reigned 38 years. He continued the same friendly relations with the Athenians which were begun by his father Leucon. — 2. The last monarch of the first dynasty that ruled in Bosporus. The pressure of the Scythian tribes induced Paerisades to cede his sovereignty to Mithridates the Great. The date of this event cannot be placed earlier than 112, nor later than 88.

Paestānus Sinus. [PAESTUM.]

Paestum (Paestanus), called Posīdōnĭa (Ποσειδωνία: Ποσειδωνιάτης) originally, was a city in Lucania, situated between 4 and 5 miles S. E. of the mouth of the Silarus, and near the bay which derived its name from the town (Ποσειδωνιάτης κόλπος, Paestanus Sinus: G. of Salerno). Its origin is uncertain, but it was probably in existence before it was colonized by the Sybarites about B. C. 524. It soon became a powerful and flourishing city; but after its capture by the Lucanians (between 438 and 424), it gradually lost the characteristics of a Greek city, and its inhabitants at length ceased to speak the Greek language. Its ancient name of Posidonia was probably changed into that of Paestum at this time. Under the supremacy of the Romans, who founded a Latin colony at Paestum about B. C. 274, the town gradually sank in importance; and in the time of Augustus it is only mentioned on account of the beautiful roses grown in its neighbourhood. The ruins of Paestum are striking and magnificent. They consist of the remains of walls, of an amphitheatre, of 2 fine temples, and of another building. The 2 temples are in the Doric style, and are some of the most remarkable ruins of antiquity.

Paesus (Παισός), a town in the Troad, mentioned by Homer, but destroyed before the time of Strabo, its population having been transplanted to Lampsacus. Its site was on a river of the same name (Beiram-Dere) between Lampsacus and Parium.

Paetīnus, the name of a family of the Fulvia Gens, which was eventually superseded by the name of Nobilior. [NOBILIOR.]

Paetus, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signified a person who had a slight cast in the eye.

Paetus, Aelĭus. 1. P., probably the son of Q. Aelius Paetus, a pontifex, who fell in the battle of Cannae. He was plebeian aedile B. C. 204; praetor 203; magister equitum 202; and consul 201. In his consulship he fought a battle with the Boii, and made a treaty with the Ingauni Ligures. In 199, he was censor with P. Scipio Africanus. He afterwards became an augur, and died 174, during a pestilence at Rome. He is mentioned as one of the Roman jurists. — 2. Sex., brother of the last, curule aedile 200; consul 198; and censor 193 with Cn. Cethegus. He was a jurist of eminence, and a prudent man, whence he got the cognomen Catus. He is described in a line of Ennius as "Egregie cordatus homo Catus Aelius Sextus." He is enumerated among the old jurists who collected or arranged the matter of law, which he did in a work entitled Tripartita or Jus Aelianum. This was a work on the Twelve Tables, which contained the original text, an interpretation, and the Legis actio subjoined. It was probably the first commentary written on the Twelve Tables. — 3. Q., son of No. 1., was elected augur 174, in place of his father, and was consul 167, when he laid waste the territory of the Ligurians.

Paetus, P. Autrōnius, was elected consul for B.C. 65 with P. Cornelius Sulla; but he and Sulla were accused of bribery by L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, and condemned. Their election was accordingly declared void: and their accusers were chosen consuls in their stead. Enraged at his disappointment Paetus conspired with Catiline to murder the consuls Cotta and Torquatus; and this design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who gave the signal prematurely before the whole of the conspirators had assembled. [CATILINA.] Paetus afterwards took an active part in the Catilinarian conspiracy, which broke out in Cicero's consulship, 63. After the suppression of the conspiracy Paetus was brought to trial for the share he had had in it; he was condemned, and went into exile to Epirus, where he was living when Cicero himself went into banishment in 58. Cicero was then much alarmed lest Paetus should make an attempt upon his life.

Paetus, C. Caesennīus, sometimes called Caesonīus, consul A. D. 61, was sent by Nero in 63 to the assistance of Domitius Corbulo in Armenia. He was defeated by Vologeses, king of Parthia, and purchased peace of the Parthians on the most disgraceful terms. After the accession of Vespasian, he was appointed governor of Syria, and deprived Antiochus IV., king of Commagene, of his kingdom.

Paetus Thrasēa. [THRASEA.]

Pāgae or Pēgae (Παγαί, Att. Πηγαί: Παγαῖος: Psatho), a town in Megaris, a colony from Megara, was situated at the E. extremity of the Alcyonian sea, and was the most important town in the country after Megara. It possessed a good harbour.

Pagăsae, called by the Romans Păgăsa -ae (Παγασαί: Volo), a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia, and on the bay called after it Sinus Pagasaeus or Pagasicus (Παγασητικὸς κόλπος: G. of Volo). It was the port of Iolcos, and afterwards of Pherae, and is celebrated in mythology as the place where Jason built the ship Argo. Hence some of the ancients derived its name from πήγνυμι; but others connected the name with the fountains (πηγαί) in the neighbourhood. — The adjective Pagasaeus is applied to Jason on account of his building the ship Argo, and to Apollo because he had a sanctuary at Pagasae. The adjective is also used in the general sense of Thessalian: thus Alcestis, the wife of Admetus, is called by Ovid Pagasaea conjux.

Pagrae (Πάγραι: Pagras, Bagras, Bargas), a city of Syria, on the E. side of Mt. Amanus, at the foot of the pass called by Ptolemy the Syrian Gates, on the road between Antioch and Alexandria: the scene of the battle between Alexander Balas and Demetrius Nicator, B. C. 145.

Pagus (Πάγος), a remarkable conical hill, about 500—600 feet high, a little N. of Smyrna in Ionia. It was crowned with a shrine of Nemesis, and had a celebrated spring.

Pălaemon (Παλαίμων). 1. Son of Athamas and Ino, was originally called Melicertes. When his mother, who was driven mad by Hera, had thrown herself, with her boy, into the sea, both were changed into marine divinities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palaemon. [For details see ATHAMAS.] According to some, Melicertes after his apotheosis was called Glaucus, whereas, according to another version, Glaucus is said to have leaped into the sea from his love of Melicertes. The body of Melicertes, according to the common tradition, was washed by the waves, or carried by dolphins into the port Schoenus on the Corinthian isthmus, or to that spot on the coast where the altar of Palaemon subsequently stood. There the body was found by his uncle Sisyphus, who ordered it to be carried to Corinth, and on the command of the Nereides he instituted the Isthmian games and sacrifices of black bulls in honour of the deified Palaemon. In the island of Tenedos, it is said that children were sacrificed to him, and the whole worship seems to have had something gloomy about it. The Romans identified Palaemon with their own god Portunus, or Portumnus. [PORTUNUS.] — 2. Q. Remmius Palaemon, a grammarian in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was a native of Vicentia (Vicenza), in the north of Italy, and was originally a slave; but having been manumitted, he opened a school at Rome, where he became the most celebrated grammarian of his time, though his moral character was infamous. He is twice mentioned by Juvenal (vi. 451, vii. 251). He was the master of Quintilian.

Palaeopŏlis. [NEAPOLIS.]

Palaephătus (Παλαίφατος). 1. Of Athens, a mythical epic poet of the ante-Homeric period. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but he appears to have been usually placed after Phemonoe [PHEMONOE], though some writers assigned him even an earlier date. — 2. Of Paros, or Priene, lived in the time of Artaxerxes. Suidas attributes to him the work "On Incredible Tales," spoken of below. — 3. Of Abydus, an historian, lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and is stated to have been loved by the philosopher Aristotle. — 4. An Egyptian or Athenian, and a grammarian. His most celebrated work was entitled Troica (Τρωϊκά), which is frequently referred to by the ancient grammarians. — There is extant a small work in 51 sections, entitled Παλαίφατος περὶ ἀπίστων, or "On Incredible Tales," giving a brief account of some of the most celebrated Greek legends. It is an abstract of a much larger work, which is lost. It was to the original work to which Virgil refers (Ciris, 88): "Docta Palaephatia testatur voce papyrus." It is doubtful who was the author of this work; but as he adopts the rationalistic interpretation of the myths, he must be looked upon as a disciple of Evemerus [EVEMERUS], and may thus have been an Alexandrine Greek, and the same person as No. 4. The best edition is by Westermann, in the Mythographi, Brunswick, 1843.

coast of Chaonia, and a little S. of the Acroceraunian mountains: here Caesar landed his forces when he crossed over to Greece to carry on the war against Pompey.

Palaestīna (Παλαιστίνη, ἡ Παλαιστίνη Συρίη: Παλαιστινός, Palaestinus, and rarely Palaestinensis: Palestine, or the Holy Land), is the Greek and Roman form of the Hebrew word which was used to denote the country of the Philistines, and which was extended to the whole country. In the Scriptures it is called Canaan, from Canaan, the son of Ham, whose descendants were its first inhabitants; the Land of Israel, the Land of Promise, the Land of Jehovah, and the Holy Land. The Romans usually called it Judaea, extending to the whole country the name of its S. part. It was regarded by the Greeks and Romans as a part of Syria. Its extent is pretty well defined by natural boundaries; namely, the Mediterranean on the W.; the mountains of Lebanon on the N.; the Jordan and its lakes on the E., in the original extent of the country as defined in the O. T., but in the wider and usual extent of the country, the Arabian Desert was its boundary on the E.; and on the S. and S.W. the deserts which stretch N. of the head of the Red Sea as far as the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean: here it was separated from Egypt by the small stream called in Scripture the River of Egypt (prob. the brook El-Arish), which fell into the Mediterranean at Rhinocolura (El-Arish), the frontier town of Egypt. The S. boundary of the territory E. of Jordan was the river Arnon (Wady-el-Mojib). The extent of country within these limits was about 11,000 square miles. The political boundaries varied at different periods. By the covenant of God with Abraham (Gen. xv. 18), the whole land was given to his descendants, from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates; but the Israelites never had the faith or courage to take permanent possession of this their lot; the nearest approach made to the realisation of the promise was in the reigns of David and Solomon, when the conquests of the former embraced a large part of Syria, and the latter built Tadmor (aft. Palmyra) in the Syrian Desert; and, for a time, the Euphrates seems to have been the border of the kingdom on the N.E. (See 2 Sam. viii. 3, 1 Chron. xviii. 3). On the W. again, the Israelites never had full possession of the Mediterranean coast, a strip of which, N. of Mt. Carmel, was always retained by the Phoenicians [Phoenice]; and another portion in the S. W. was held by the Philistines, who were independent, except during brief intervals. On the S. and E. again, portions of the land were frequently subjugated by the neighbouring peoples of Amalek, Edom, Midian, Moab, Ammon, &c. On the N., except during the reigns of David and Solomon, Palestine ceased at the S. entrance of the valley of Coelesyria, and at M. Hermon in Antilibanus.—In the physical formation of Palestine, the most remarkable feature is the depression which forms by the valley of the Jordan and its lakes [Jordanes], between which and the Mediterranean the country is intersected by mountains, chiefly connected with the Lebanon system, and running N. and S. Between these ranges, and between the central range and the W. coast, are some comparatively extensive plains, such as those of Esdraelon and Sharon, and several smaller valleys; in the S. of the country the mountains gradually subside into the rocky deserts of Arabia Petraea. The valleys and slopes of the hills are extremely fertile, and were much more so in ancient times, when the soil on the mountain sides was preserved by terraces which are now destroyed through neglect or wantonness. This division of the country has only a few small rivers (besides mountain streams), which fall into the Mediterranean: the chief of them are the Belus, just S. of Ptolemaïs (Acre), the Kishon, flowing from M. Tabor, through the plain of Esdraelon, and falling into the Bay of Acre N. of M. Carmel, the Chorseus, N. of Caesarea, the Kanah, W. of Sebaste (Samaria), the Jarkon, N. of Joppa, the Eshcol, near Askelon, and the Besor, near Gaza. On the E. of the Jordan, the land rises towards the rocky desert of the Hauran (the ancient Auranitis), and the hills bordering the Syrian Desert, its lower portion, near the river, forming rich pastures, watered by the E. tributaries of the Jordan, the chief of which are the Hieromax, the Jabbok, and the Arnon, the last flowing into the Dead Sea.—The earliest inhabitants of Palestine were the several tribes of Canaanites. It is unnecessary to recount in detail those events with which we are familiar through the sacred history: the divine call of Abraham from Mesopotamia to live as a stranger in the land which God promised to his descendants, and the story of his and his son's and his grandson's residence in it, till Israel and his family removed to Egypt: their return and conquest of the land of Canaan and of the portion of territory E. of the Jordan, and the partition of the whole among the 12 tribes: the contests with the surrounding nations, and the government by Judges, till the establishment of the monarchy under Saul: the conquests of David, the splendid reign of Solomon, and the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam into the kingdom of Israel, including 2-3rds of the country W. of Jordan, and all E. of it, and the kingdom of Judah, including the S. portion which was left, between the Mediterranean on the W. and the Dead Sea and a small extent of Jordan on the E.: and the histories of these 2 monarchies down to their overthrow by the Assyrians and Babylonians respectively. The former of these conquests made an important change in the population of Palestine, by the removal of the greater part of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Israel. and the settlement in their place of heathen peoples from other parts of the Assyrian empire, thus restricting the country occupied by the genuine Israelites within the limits of the kingdom of Judah. Hence the names of Judaea and Jews applied to the country and the people in their subsequent history. Between these last and the mixed people of N. Palestine a deadly enmity arose; the natural dislike of the pure race of Israel to heathen foreigners being aggravated by the wrongs they suffered from them, especially at their return from the Babylonish captivity, and still more by the act of religious usurpation of which the remnant of the N. Israelites were guilty at a later period, in setting up a temple for themselves on M. Gerizim [Samaria]. The date assigned to the Assyrian conquest of the kingdom of Israel is B. C. 721. The remainder of the history of the kingdom of Judah (passing over its religious history, which is most important during this period) consists of alternate contests with, and submissions to, the kings of Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon, till the conquest of the country by Nebuchadnezzar and the removal of a part of its people to Babylonia, in 598, and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, after the rebellion of Zedekiah, in 588, when a still larger portion of the people were carried captive to Babylon, while others escaped to Egypt. In 584, during the siege of Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar sent a further portion of the Jews into captivity; but there was still a considerable remnant left in the land, and (what is very important) foreign settlers were not introduced; so that, when Cyrus, after overthrowing the Babylonian empire, issued his edict for the return of the Jews to their own land (B. C. 536), there was no great obstacle to their quiet settlement in it. They experienced some trouble from the jealousy and attacks of the Samaritans, and the changeful dispositions of the Persian court; but at length, by the efforts of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah, the new temple was finished and dedicated, in 516, and Jerusalem was rebuilt. Fresh bands of Jewish exiles returned under Ezra, 458, and Nehemiah, 445; and, between this time and that of the Macedonian conquest, Judaea was repeopled by the Jews, and through the tolerance of the Persian kings, it was governed virtually by the high-priests. In B. C. 332, after Alexander had taken Tyre and Gaza, he visited Jerusalem, and received the quiet submission of the Jews, paying the most marked respect to their religion. Under the successors of Alexander, Palestine belonged alternately to Egypt and Syria, the contests between whose kings for its possession are too complicated to recount here; but its internal government seems to have been pretty much in the hands of the high-priests, until the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes provoked the successful revolt under the Maccabees, or Asmonaeans, whose history is given under MACCABAEI, and the history of the Idumaean dynasty, who succeeded them, is given under ANTIPATER, HERODES, and ARCHELAUS. The later Asmonaean princes had regained the whole of Palestine, including the districts of Judaea, Samaria, and Galilee (besides Idumaea), W. of the Jordan, and the several districts of Peraea, Batanea, Gaulonitis, Ituraea, and Trachonitis or Auranitis, E. of it; and this was the extent of Herod's kingdom. But, from B. C. 63, when Pompey took Jerusalem, the country was really subject to the Romans. At the death of Herod, his kingdom was divided between his sons as tetrarchs, under the sanction of Augustus, Archelaus receiving Judaea, Samaria, and Idumaea, Herod Antipas Galilee and Peraea, and Philip Batanaea, Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis; all standing to the Roman empire in a relation of virtual subjection, which successive events converted into an integral union. First, A.D. 7, Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and Judaea was placed under a Roman procurator: next, about 31, Philip died, and his government was united to the province of Syria, and was in 37 again conferred on Herod Agrippa I., with the title of king, and with the addition of Abilene, the district round Damascus. In 39, Herod Antipas was banished to Gaul, and his tetrarchy was added to the kingdom of Herod Agrippa; and 2 years later he received from Claudius the government of Judaea and Samaria, and thus Palestine was reunited under a nominal king. On his death, in 44, Palestine again became a part of the Roman province of Syria, under the name of Judaea, which was governed by a procurator. The Jews were, however, most turbulent subjects of the Roman empire, and at last they broke out into a general rebellion, which, after a most sanguinary war, was crushed by Vespasian and Titus; and the latter took and destroyed Jerusalem in A. D. 70. Under Constantine, Palestine was divided afresh into the three provinces of P. Prima in the centre, P. Secunda in the N., and P. Tertia, the S. of Judaea, with Idumaea.

Pălămēdēs (Παλαμήδης). 1. Son of Nauplius and Clymene. He joined the Greeks in their expedition against Troy; but Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Ulysses, envious of his fame, caused a captive Phrygian to write to Palamedes a letter in the name of Priam, and bribed a servant of Palamedes to conceal the letter under his master's bed. They then accused Palamedes of treachery; upon searching his tent they found the letter which they themselves had dictated; and thereupon they caused him to be stoned to death. When Palamedes was led to death, he exclaimed, "Truth, I lament thee, for thou hast died even before me." According to some traditions, it was Ulysses alone who hated and persecuted Palamedes. The cause of this hatred is also stated differently. According to some, Ulysses hated him because he had been compelled by him to join the Greeks against Troy; according to others, because he had been severely censured by Palamedes for returning with empty hands from a foraging excursion into Thrace. The manner in which Palamedes perished is likewise related differently. Some say that Ulysses and Diomedes induced him to descend into a well, where they pretended they had discovered a treasure, and when he was below they cast stones upon him, and killed him; others state that he was drowned by them whilst fishing; and others that he was killed by Paris with an arrow. The place where he was killed is either Colonae in Troas, or in Tenedos, or at Geraestus. The story of Palamedes, which is not mentioned by Homer, seems to have been first related in the Cypria, and was afterwards developed by the tragic poets, especially by Euripides, and lastly by the sophists, who liked to look upon Palamedes as their pattern. The tragic poets and sophists describe him as a sage among the Greeks, and as a poet; and he is said to have invented light-houses, measures, scales, the discus, dice, the alphabet, and the art of regulating sentinels. — 2. A Greek grammarian, was a contemporary of Athenaeus, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his work.

Palē (Πάλη: Παλεῖς, Ion. Παλέες, Att. Παλῆς, in Polyb. Παλαιεῖς: nr. Lixuri, Ru.), one of the 4 cities of Cephallenia, situated on a height opposite Zacynthus.

Pălēs, a Roman divinity of flocks and shepherds, is described by some as a male, and by others as a female divinity. Hence some modern writers have inferred that Pales was a combination of both sexes; but such a monstrosity is altogether foreign to the religion of the Romans. Some of the rites performed at the festival of Pales, which was celebrated on the 21st of April, the birth-day of the city of Rome, would seem to indicate, that the divinity was a female; but besides the express statements to the contrary, there are also other reasons for believing that Pales was a male divinity. The name seems to be connected with Palatinus, the centre of all the earliest legends of Rome, and the god himself was with the Romans the embodiment of the same idea as Pan among the Greeks. Respecting the festival of the Palilia see Dict. of Antiq. s. v.

Palicānus, Lollīus. [Lollius.]

Pălīci (Παλικοί), were Sicilian gods, twin sons of Zeus and the nymph Thalia, the daughter of Hephaestus. Sometimes they are called sons of Hephaestus by Aetna, the daughter of Oceanus. Thalia, from fear of Hera, prayed to be swallowed up by the earth; her prayer was granted; but in due time she sent forth from the earth twin boys, who, according to the absurd etymology of the ancients, were called Παλικοί, from τοῦ πάλιν ἱκέσθαι. They were worshipped in the neighbourhood of Mt. Aetna, near Palice; and in the earliest times human sacrifices were offered to them. Their sanctuary was an asylum for runaway slaves, and near it there gushed forth from the earth two sulphureous fountains, called Deilloi, or brothers of the Palici; at which solemn oaths were taken. The oaths were written on tablets, and thrown into one of the fountains; if the tablet swam on the water, the oath was considered to be true, but if it sank down, the oath was regarded as a perjury, and was believed to be punished instantaneously by blindness or death.

Palinūrum (C. Palinuro), a promontory on the W. coast of Lucania, which was said to have derived its name from Palinurus, the son of Jasus, and pilot of the ship of Aeneas, who fell into the sea, and was murdered on the coast by the natives.

Pallacŏpas (Παλλακόπας), a canal in Babylonia, cut from the Euphrates, at a point 800 stadia (80 geog. miles) S. of Babylon, W.-ward to the edge of the Arabian Desert, where it lost itself in marshes.

Pallădas (Παλλάδας), the author of a large number of epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a pagan and an Alexandrian grammarian. He lived at the beginning of the 5th century of the Christian era, for in one of his epigrams he speaks of Hypatia, the daughter of Theon, as still alive. Hypatia was murdered in A. D. 415.

Pallădĭum (Παλλάδιον), properly any image of Pallas Athena (Minerva), but generally applied to an ancient image of this goddess, which was kept hidden and secret, and was revered as a pledge of the safety of the town, where it existed. Among these ancient images of Pallas none is more celebrated than the Trojan Palladium, concerning which there was the following tradition. Athena was brought up by Triton; and when his daughter, Pallas, and Athena were once wrestling together for the sake of exercise, Zeus interfered in the struggle, and suddenly held the aegis before the face of Pallas. Pallas, while looking up to Zeus, was wounded by Athena, and died. Athena in her sorrow caused an image of the maiden to be made, round which she hung the aegis. When Electra had come as a suppliant to the Palladium, Zeus hurled it down from heaven upon the earth, because it had been sullied by the hands of one, who was no longer a pure maiden. The image fell upon the earth at Troy, when Ilus was just beginning to build the city. Ilus erected a sanctuary to it. According to some, the image was dedicated by Electra, and according to others it was given by Zeus to Dardanus. The image itself is said to have been 3 cubits in height, with its legs close together, and holding in its right hand a spear, and in the left a spindle and a distaff. This Palladium remained at Troy until Ulysses and Diomedes contrived to carry it away, because the city could not be taken so long as it was in the possession of that sacred treasure. According to some accounts Troy contained two Palladia, one of which was carried off by Ulysses and Diomedes, while the other was conveyed by Aeneas to Italy, or the one taken by the Greeks was a mere imitation, while that which Aeneas brought to Italy was the genuine image. But this twofold Palladium was probably a mere invention to account for its existence in more than one place. Several towns both in Greece and Italy claimed the honour of possessing the genuine Trojan Palladium; as for example, Argos and Athens, where it was believed that Demophon took it from Diomedes on his return from Troy. [Demophon.] This Palladium at Athens, however, was different from another image of Pallas there, which was also called Palladium, and stood on the acropolis. In Italy the cities of Rome, Lavinium, Luceria, and Siris likewise pretended to possess the Trojan Palladium.

Pallădĭus (Παλλάδιος). — 1. Of Methone, a sophist or rhetorician, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great. — 2. Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia, to which he was raised A. D. 400. He was ordained by Chrysostom; and on the banishment of the latter, Palladius was accused of holding the opinions of Origen, and, fearful of the violence of his enemies, he fled to Rome, 405. Shortly afterwards he ventured to return to the East, but was arrested and banished to the extremity of Upper Egypt. He was afterwards restored to his bishopric of Helenopolis, from which he was translated to that of Aspona or Aspuna in Galatia, perhaps about 419 or 420. Three works in Greek have come down to us under the name of Palladius; but there has been considerable dispute, whether they were written by one individual or more: — (1.) Historia Lausiaca, "the Lausiac History," so called from its being dedicated to Lausus, a chamberlain at the imperial court. This work contains internal proofs of having been written by the bishop of Helenopolis. It gives biographical notices or characteristic anecdotes of a number of ascetics, with whom Palladius was personally acquainted, or concerning whom he received information from those who had known them personally. Edited by Meursius, Lugd. Bat. 1616. (2.) The Life of Chrysostom, was probably written by a different person from the bishop of Helenopolis. Edited by Bigotius, Paris, 1680. (3.) De Gentibus Indiae et Bragmanibus (Brahmans). The authorship of this work is uncertain. It appears that the writer himself had visited India. Edited by Camerarius in Liber Gnomologicus, 8vo. Lips. without date; and by Bissaeus, London, 1665. — 3. Surnamed Iatrosophista, a Greek medical writer, of whose life nothing is known. He lived after Galen. We possess 3 works commonly attributed to him: namely, 2 books of commentaries on Hippocrates, and a short treatise on Fevers, all of which are taken chiefly from Galen. — 4. Palladĭus Rutilĭus Taurus Aemiliānus, the author of a treatise De Re Rustica, in the form of a Farmer's Calendar, the various operations connected with agriculture and a rural life being arranged in regular order, according to the seasons in which they ought to be performed. It is comprised in 14 books: the first is introductory, the 12 following contain the duties of the 12 months in succession, commencing with January; the last is a poem, in 85 elegiac couplets, upon the art of grafting (De Insitione). A considerable portion of the work is taken from Columella. The date of the author is uncertain; but it is most probable that he lived in the middle of the 4th century of the Christian aera. The work was very popular in the middle ages. Edited in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae by Gesner, Lips. 1735; reprinted by Ernesti in 1773, and by Schneider, Lips. 1794.

Pallantĭa (Pallantinus: Palencia), the chief town of the Vaccaei in the N. of Hispania Tarraconensis, and on a tributary of the Durius.

Pallantĭas and Pallantis, patronymics, given to Aurora, the daughter of the giant Pallas.

Pallantĭum (Παλλάντιον: Παλλαντιεύς), an ancient town of Arcadia, near Tegea, said to have been founded by Pallas, the son of Lycaon. Evander is said to have come from this place, and to have called the town, which he founded on the banks of the Tiber, Pallantēum (afterwards Palantĭum and Palatĭum), after the Arcadian town. On the foundation of Megalopolis, most of the inhabitants of Pallantium settled in the new city; and the town remained almost deserted, till it was restored by Antoninus Pius, and exempted from taxes on account of its supposed connection with the imperial city.

Pallas (Πάλλας). — 1. One of the Titans, son of Crius and Eurybia, husband of Styx, and father of Zelus, Cratos, Bia, and Nice. — 2. A giant, slain by Athena in the battle with the gods. — 3. According to some traditions, the father of Athena, who slew him when he attempted to violate her. — 4. Son of Lycaon, and grandfather of Evander, is said to have founded the town of Pallantium in Arcadia. Hence Evander is called by the poets Pallantius heros. — 5. Son of Evander, and an ally of Aeneas, was slain by the Rutulian Turnus. — 6. Son of the Athenian king Pandion, and father of Clytus and Butes. His 2 sons were sent with Cephalus to implore assistance of Aeacus against Minos. Pallas was slain by Theseus. The celebrated family of the Pallantidae at Athens traced their origin from this Pallas.

Pallas (Παλλάς), a surname of Athena. In Homer this name always appears united with that of Athena, as Παλλὰς Ἀθήνη or Παλλὰς Ἀθηναίη; but in later writers we also find Pallas alone instead of Athena. Some ancient writers derive the name from πάλλειν, to brandish, in reference to the goddess brandishing the spear or aegis, others derive it from the giant Pallas, who was slain by Athena. But it is more probable that Pallas is the same word as πάλλαξ, i. e. a virgin or maiden.

Pallas, a favourite freedman of the emperor Claudius. In conjunction with another freedman, Narcissus, he administered the affairs of the empire. After the death of Messalina, Pallas persuaded the weak emperor to marry Agrippina; and as Narcissus had been opposed to this marriage, he now lost his former power, and Pallas and Agrippina became the rulers of the Roman world. It was Pallas who persuaded Claudius to adopt the young Domitius (afterwards the emperor Nero), the son of Agrippina; and it was doubtless with the assistance of Pallas that Agrippina poisoned her husband. Nero soon after his accession became tired of his mother's control, and as one step towards emancipating himself from her authority, he deprived Pallas of all his public offices, and dismissed him from the palace in 56. He was suffered to live unmolested for some years, till at length his immense wealth excited the rapacity of Nero, who had him removed by poison in 63. His enormous wealth, which was acquired during the reign of Claudius, had become proverbial, as we see from the line in Juvenal (i. 107), ego possideo plus Pallante et Licinio. The brother of Pallas was Antonius or Claudius Felix, who was appointed by Claudius procurator of Judaea. [Felix, Antonius.]

Pallas Lacus. [Triton.]

Pallēnē (Παλλήνη). 1. (Παλληναῖος, Παλλήνιος), the most W.-ly of the 3 peninsulas running out from Chalcidice in Macedonia. It is said to have been formerly called Phlegra (Φλέγρα), and on the narrow isthmus, which connected it with the main land, stood the important town of Potidaea. — 2. (Παλληνεύς, rarely Παλληναῖος), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochis, was situated on one of the slopes of Pentelicus, a few miles S. W. of Marathon. It possessed a temple of Athena, surnamed Pallenis (Παλληνίς) from the place; and in its neighbourhood took place the contest between Pisistratus and the party opposed to him.

Palma (Palma), a Roman colony on the S.W. coast off the island Balearis Major (Majorca).

Palmarĭa (Palmaruola), a small uninhabited island off the coast of Latium and the promontory Circeium.

Palmȳra (Πάλμυρα: Παλμυρηνός, Palmyrēnus: O. T. Tadmor: Tadmor, Ru.), a celebrated city of Syria, stood in an oasis of the great Syrian Desert, which from its position must have been in the earliest times a halting place for the caravans between Syria and Mesopotamia. Here Solomon built a city, which was called in Hebrew Tadmor, that is, the city of palm-trees; and of this name the Greek Πάλμυρα is a translation. It lies in 34° 18′ N. lat. and 38° 14′ E. long., and was reckoned 237 Roman miles from the coast of Syria, 176 N.E. of Damascus, 80 E. of Emesa, and 113 S.E. of Apamea. With the exception of a tradition that it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, we hear nothing of it till the time of the government of the East by M. Antonius, who marched to surprise it, but the inhabitants retreated with their moveable property beyond the Euphrates. Under the early Roman emperors it was a free city and a great commercial emporium. Its position on the border between the Parthian and Roman dominions gave it the command of the trade of both, but also subjected it to the injuries of war. Under Hadrian and the Antonines it was highly favoured and reached its greatest splendour. The history of its temporary elevation to the rank of a capital, in the 3rd century, is related under Odenathus and Zenobia. On its capture by Aurelian, in 270, it was plundered, and soon afterwards an insurrection of its inhabitants led to its partial destruction. It was fortified by Justinian, but never recovered from its fall. In the Arabian conquest it was one of the first cities taken; but it was still inhabited by a small population, chiefly of Jews, till it was taken and plundered by Timour (Tamerlane) in 1400. It has long been entirely deserted, except when a horde of Bedouins pitch their tents among its splendid ruins. Those ruins, which form a most striking object in the midst of the Desert, are of the Roman period, and decidedly inferior in the style of architecture, as well as in grandeur of effect, to those of Baalbek [HELIOPOLIS], the sister deserted city of Syria. The finest remains are those of the temple of the Sun; the most interesting are the square sepulchral towers of from 3 to 5 stories. The streets and the foundations of the houses are traceable to some extent; and there are several inscriptions in Greek and in the native Palmyrene dialect, besides one in Hebrew and one or two in Latin. The surrounding district of Palmyrēne contained the Syrian Desert from the E. border of Coelesyria to the Euphrates.

Pamīsus (Πάμισος). 1. A southern tributary of the Peneus in Thessaly. — 2. (Pirnatza), the chief river of Messenia, rises in the E. part of the country, 40 stadia E. of Ithome, flows first S. W., and then S. through the Messenian plain, and falls into the Messenian gulf. — 3. A small river in Laconia, falls into the Messenian gulf near Leuctra. It was at one time the ancient boundary between Laconia and Messenia.

Pamphīa or Pamphīum (Παμφία, Πάμφιον), a village of Aetolia, destroyed by the Macedonians.

Pamphīla (Παμφίλη), a female historian of considerable reputation, who lived in the reign of Nero. She is described by some writers as a native of Epidaurus, by others as an Egyptian. Her principal work, of which Photius has given some extracts, was a kind of Historical Miscellany (entitled συμμίκτων ἱστορικῶν ὑπομνημάτων λόγοι). It was not arranged according to subjects or according to any settled plan, but it was more like a common-place book, in which each piece of information was set down as it fell under the notice of the writer. Modern scholars are best acquainted with the name of Pamphila, from a statement in her work, preserved by A. Gellius (xv. 23), by which is ascertained the year of the birth of Hellanicus, Herodotus, and Thucydides respectively.

Pamphĭlus (Πάμφιλος). 1. A disciple of Plato, who is only remembered by the circumstance that Epicurus, when a young man, heard him at Samos. Epicurus used to speak of him with great contempt, that he might not be thought to owe anything to his instruction; for it was the great boast of Epicurus, that he was the sole author of his own philosophy. — 2. An Alexandrian grammarian, of the school of Aristarchus, and the author of a lexicon, which is supposed by some scholars to have formed the foundation of the lexicon of Hesychius. He appears to have lived in the 1st century of our era. — 3. A philosopher or grammarian of Nicopolis, the author of a work on agriculture, of which there are considerable fragments in the Geoponica. — 4. Presbyter of Caesarea, in Palestine, saint and martyr, and celebrated for his friendship with Eusebius, who, as a memorial of this intimacy, assumed the surname of Pamphilus. [EUSEBIUS.] He suffered martyrdom A. D. 307. The life of Pamphilus seems to have been entirely devoted to the cause of biblical literature. He was an ardent admirer and follower of Origen. He formed, at Caesarea, an important public library chiefly of ecclesiastical authors. Perhaps the most valuable of the contents of this library were the Tetrapla and Hexapla of Origen, from which Pamphilus, in conjunction with Eusebius, formed a new recension of the Septuagint, numerous copies of which were put into circulation. — 5. Of Amphipolis, one of the most distinguished of the Greek painters, flourished about B. C. 390—350. He was the disciple of Eupompus, the founder of the Sicyonian school of painting, for the establishment of which, however, Pamphilus seems to have done much more than even Eupompus himself. Of his own works we have most scanty accounts; but as a teacher of his art he was surpassed by none of the ancient masters. According to Pliny, he was the first artist who possessed a thorough acquaintance with all branches of knowledge, especially arithmetic and geometry, without which he used to say that the art could not be perfected. All science, therefore, which could in any way contribute to form the perfect artist, was included in his course of instruction, which extended over ten years, and for which the fee was no less than a talent. Among those who paid this price for his tuition were Apelles and Melanthius. Not only was the school of Pamphilus remarkable for the importance which the master attached to general learning, but also for the minute attention which he paid to accuracy in drawing.

Pamphōs (Πάμφως), a mythical poet, who is placed by Pausanias later than Olen, and much earlier than Homer. His name is connected particularly with Attica.

Pamphȳlĭa (Παμφυλία: Πάμφυλος, Παμφύλιος, Pamphylius), in its original and more restricted sense, was a narrow strip of the S. coast of Asia Minor, extending in a sort of arch along the Sinus Pamphylius (G. of Adalia), between Lycia on the W., and Cilicia on the E., and on the N. bordering on Pisidia. Its boundaries, as commonly stated, were Mt. Climax on the W., the river Melas on the E., and the foot of Mt. Taurus on the N.; but the statements are not very exact: Strabo gives to the coast of Pamphylia a length of 640 stadia, from Olbia on the W. to Ptolemaïs, some distance E. of the Melas, and he makes its width barely 2 miles; and there are still other different accounts. It was a belt of mountain coast land, intersected by rivers flowing down from the Taurus in a short course, but several of them with a considerable body of water: the chief of them, going from W. to E., were the CATARRHACTES, CESTRUS, EURYMEDON, and MELAS [No. 6], all navigable for some distance from their mouths. The inhabitants were a mixture of races, whence their name Πάμφυλοι, of all races (the genuine old form, the other in -ιοι is later). Besides the aboriginal inhabitants, of the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) family, and Cilicians, there were very early Greek settlers and later Greek colonies in the land. Tradition ascribed the first Greek settlements to MOPSUS, after the Trojan War, from whom the country was in early times called Mopsopia. It was successively a part of the Persian, Macedonian, Greco-Syrian, and Pergamene kingdoms, and passed by the will of Attalus III. to the Romans (B. C. 130), under whom it was made a province; but this province of Pamphylia included also Pisidia and Isauria, and afterwards a part of Lycia. Under Constantine Pisidia was again separated from Pamphylia.

Pamphȳlĭum Mare, Pamphȳlĭus Sinus (τὸ Παμφύλιον πέλαγος, Παμφύλιος κόλπος: Gulf of Adalia), the great gulf formed in the S. coast of Asia Minor by the direction of the Taurus chain and by Mt. Solyma, between the Pr. Sacrum or Chelidonium (C. Khelidonia), the S.E. point of Lycia, and Pr. Anemurium (C. Anemour), the S. point of Cilicia. Its depth from N. to S., from Pr. Sacrum to Olbia, is reckoned by Strabo at 367 stadia (36·7 geog. miles), which is too little.

Pamphȳlus (Πάμφυλος), son of Aegimius and brother of Dymas, was king of the Dorians at the foot of Mt. Pindus, and along with the Heraclidae invaded Peloponnesus.

Pān (Πάν), the great god of flocks and shepherds among the Greeks. He is usually called a son of Hermes by the daughter of Dryops; but he is also described as a son of Hermes by Callisto, by Oeneis or Thymbris, or by Penelope, whom the god visited in the shape of a ram, or as a son of Penelope by Ulysses, or by all her suitors in common. He was perfectly developed from his birth; and when his mother saw him, she ran away through fear; but Hermes carried him to Olympus, where all the gods were delighted with him, and especially Dionysus. From his delighting all the gods, the Homeric hymn derives his name. He was originally only an Arcadian god; and Arcadia was always the principal seat of his worship. From this country his name and worship afterwards spread over other parts of Greece; but at Athens his worship was not introduced till the time of the battle of Marathon. In Arcadia he was the god of forests, pastures, flocks, and shepherds, and dwelt in grottoes, wandered on the summits of mountains and rocks, and in valleys, either amusing himself with the chase, or leading the dances of the nymphs. As the god of flocks, both of wild and tame animals, it was his province to increase and guard them; but he was also a hunter, and hunters owed their success or failure to him. The Arcadian hunters used to scourge the statute of the god, if they had been disappointed in the chase. During the heat of mid-day he used to slumber, and was very indignant when any one disturbed him. As the god of flocks, bees also were under his protection, as well as the coast where fishermen carried on their pursuit. As the god of every thing connected with pastoral life, he was fond of music, and the inventor of the syrinx or shepherd's flute, which he himself played in a masterly manner, and in which he instructed others also, such as Daphnis. He is thus said to have loved the poet Pindar, and to have sung and danced his lyric songs, in return for which Pindar erected to him a sanctuary in front of his house. Pan, like other gods who dwelt in forests, was dreaded by travellers to whom he sometimes appeared, and whom he startled with sudden awe or terror. Thus when Phidippides, the Athenian, was sent to Sparta to solicit its aid against the Persians, Pan accosted him, and promised to terrify the barbarians, if the Athenians would worship him. Hence sudden fright without any visible cause was ascribed to Pan, and was called a Panic fear. He is further said to have had a terrific voice, and by it to have frightened the Titans in their fight with the gods. It seems that this feature, namely, his fondness of noise and riot, was the cause of his being considered the minister and companion of Cybele and Dionysus. He was at the same time believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and to have even instructed Apollo in this art. While roaming in his forests he fell in love with Echo, by whom or by Pitho he became the father of Iynx. His love of Syrinx, after whom he named his flute, is well known from Ovid (Met. i. 691, seq.). Fir-trees were sacred to him, since the nymph Pitys, whom he loved, had been metamorphosed into that tree; and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of cows, rams, lambs, milk, and honey. Sacrifices were also offered to him in common with Dionysus and the nymphs. The various epithets which are given him by the poets refer either to his singular appearance, or are derived from the names of the places in which he was worshipped. The Romans identified with Pan their own god Inuus, and also Faunus, which name is merely another form of Pan. In works of art Pan is represented as a voluptuous and sensual being, with horns, puck-nose, and goat's feet, sometimes in the act of dancing, and sometimes playing on the syrinx.

Panacēa (Πανάκεια), i. e. "the all-healing," a daughter of Aesculapius, who had a temple at Oropus.

Panăchaicus Mons (τὸ Παναχαϊκὸν ὄρος), a mountain in Achaia, 6300 feet high, immediately behind Patrae.

Panacra (Πάνακρα), a mountain in Crete, a branch of Mt. Ida.

Panactum (Πάνακτον), a town on the frontiers of Attica and Boeotia, originally belonged to Boeotia, and after being a frequent object of contention between the Athenians and Boeotians, at length became permanently annexed to Attica.

Panaenus (Πάναινος), a distinguished Athenian painter, who flourished B. C. 448. He was the nephew of Phidias, whom he assisted in decorating the temple of Zeus, at Olympia. He was also the author of a series of paintings, of the battle of Marathon, in the Poecile at Athens.

Panaetĭus (Παναίτιος), a native of Rhodes, and a celebrated Stoic philosopher, studied first at Pergamum under the grammarian Crates, and subsequently at Athens under the stoic Diogenes, of Babylon, and his disciple Antipater of Tarsus. He afterwards went to Rome, where he became an intimate friend of Laelius and of Scipio Africanus the younger. In B. C. 144 he accompanied Scipio on the embassy which he undertook to the kings of Egypt and Asia in alliance with Rome. Panaetius succeeded Antipater, as head of the stoic school, and died at Athens, at all events before 111. The principal work of Panaetius was his treatise on the theory of moral obligation (περὶ τοῦ καθήκοντος), in 3 books, from which Cicero took the greater part of his work De Officiis. Panaetius had softened down the harsh severity of the older stoics, and, without giving up their fundamental definitions, had modified them so as to make them applicable to the conduct of life, and had clothed them in the garb of eloquence.

Panaetolĭum, a mountain in Aetolia near Thermon, in which town the Panaetolium or general assembly of the Aetolians was held.

Panda, a river in the country of the Siraces in the interior of Sarmatia Asiatica (Tac. Ann. xii. 16).

Pandărĕōs (Πανδάρεως), son of Merops of Miletus, is said to have stolen from the temple of Zeus in Crete the golden dog which Hephaestus had made, and to have carried it to Tantalus. When Zeus sent Hermes to Tantalus to claim the dog back, Tantalus declared that it was not in his possession. The god, however, took the animal by force, and threw mount Sipylus upon Tantalus. Pandareos fled to Athens, and thence to Sicily, where he perished with his wife Harmothoe. The story of Pandareos derives more interest from that of his 3 daughters. Aëdon, the eldest of them, was married to Zethus, the brother of Amphion, by whom she became the mother of Itylus. From envy of Amphion, who had many children, she determined to murder one of his sons, Amaleus, but in the night she mistook her own son for her nephew, and killed him. The 2 other daughters of Pandareos, Merope and Cleodora (according to Pausanias, Camira and Clytia), were, according to Homer, deprived of their parents by the gods, and remained as helpless orphans in the palace. Aphrodite, however, fed them with milk, honey, and wine. Hera gave them beauty and understanding far above other women. Artemis gave them dignity, and Athena skill in the arts. When Aphrodite went up to Olympus to arrange the nuptials for her maidens, they were carried off by the Harpies.

Pandărus (Πάνδαρος.) 1. A Lycian, son of Lycaon, commanded the inhabitants of Zelea on Mt. Ida, in the Trojan war. He was distinguished in the Trojan army as an archer, and was said to have received his bow from Apollo. He was slain by Diomedes, or, according to others, by Sthenelus. He was afterwards honoured as a hero at Pinara in Lycia. — 2. Son of Alcanor, and twin-brother of Bitias, was one of the companions of Aeneas, and was slain by Turnus.

Pandātăria (Vendutene), a small island in the Tyrrhenian sea off the coast of Campania, to which Julia, the daughter of Augustus, was banished.

Pandēmos (Πάνδημος), i. e. "common to all the people," a surname of Aphrodite, used in a twofold sense: 1. as the goddess of low sensual pleasures as Venus vulgivaga or popularis, in opposition to Venus Urania, or the heavenly Aphrodite; 2. as the goddess uniting all the inhabitants of a country into one social or political body. Under the latter view she was worshipped at Athens along with Peitho (persuasion), and her worship was said to have been instituted by Theseus at the time when he united the scattered townships into one great body of citizens. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of white goats.

Pandīon (Πανδίων). 1. I. King of Athens, son of Erichthonius, by the Naiad Pasithea, was married to Zeuxippe, by whom he became the father of Procne and Philomela, and of the twins Erechtheus and Butes. In a war against Labdacus, king of Thebes, he called upon Tereus of Daulis in Phocis, for assistance, and afterwards rewarded him by giving him his daughter Procne in marriage. [TEREUS.] It was in his reign that Dionysus and Demeter were said to have come to Attica. — 2. II. King of Athens, son of Cecrops and Metiadusa. Being expelled from Athens by the Metionidae, he fled to Megara, and there married Pylia, the daughter of king Pylas. When the latter, in consequence of a murder, migrated into Peloponnesus, Pandion obtained the government of Megara. He became the father of Aegeus, Pallas, Nisus, Lycus, and a natural son, Oeneus, and also of a daughter, who was married to Sciron. After his death his 4 sons, called the Pandīŏnidae (Πανδιονίδαι), returned from Megara to Athens, and expelled the Metionidae. Aegeus obtained Athens, Lycus the E. coast of Attica, Nisus Megaris, and Pallas the S. coast.

Pandōra (Πανδώρα), the name of the first woman on earth. When Prometheus had stolen the fire from heaven, Zeus in revenge caused Hephaestus to make a woman out of earth, who by her charms and beauty should bring misery upon the human race. Aphrodite adorned her with beauty; Hermes bestowed upon her boldness and cunning; and the gods called her Pandora, or All-gifted, as each of the gods had given her some power by which she was to work the ruin of man. Hermes took her to Epimetheus, who made her his wife, forgetting the advice of his brother Prometheus that he should not receive any gifts from Zeus. In the house of Epimetheus was a closed jar, which he had been forbidden to open. But the curiosity of a woman could not resist the temptation to know its contents; and when she opened the lid all the evils incident to man poured out. She had only time to shut down the lid, and prevent the escape of hope. Later writers relate that Pandora brought with her from heaven a box (and not a jar), containing all human ills, upon opening which all escaped and spread over the earth, Hope alone remaining. At a still later period, the box is said to have contained all the blessings of the gods, which would have been preserved for the human race, had not Pandora opened the vessel, so that the winged blessings escaped.

Pandŏsĭa (Πανδοσία). 1. (Kastri), a town of Epirus in the district Thesprotia, on the river Acheron, and in the territory of the Cassopaei. — 2. (Castel Franco ?), a town in Bruttium near the frontiers of Lucania, situated on the river Acheron, and also either upon or at the foot of 3 hills, was originally a residence of native Oenotrian chiefs. It was here that Alexander of Epirus fell, B. C. 326, in accordance with an oracle.

Pandrŏsos (Πάνδροσος), i.e. "the all-bedewing," or "refreshing," was a daughter of Cecrops and Agraulos, and a sister of Erysichthon, Herse, and Aglauros. She was worshipped at Athens, along with Thallo, and had a sanctuary there near the temple of Athena Polias.

Panēas. [CAESAREA, No. 2.]

Panēum or -ium (Πάνειον, Πάνιον, i. e. Pan's-abode), the Greek name of the cave, in a mountain at the S. extremity of the range of Antilibanus, out of which the river Jordan takes its rise, a little above the town of Paneas or Caesarea Philippi. The mountain, in whose S. side the cave is, was called by the same name; and the surrounding district was called Paneas.

Pangaeum or Pangaeus (Παγγαῖον, Πάγγαιος: Pangea), a celebrated range of mountains in Macedonia, between the Strymon and the Nestus, and in the neighbourhood of Philippi, with gold and silver mines, and with splendid roses.

Panhellēnĭus (Πανελλήνιος), i. e. the god worshipped by all the Hellenes. This surname is said to have been given to Zeus by Aeacus, when he offered a propitiatory sacrifice on behalf of all the Greeks, for the purpose of averting a famine. In Aegina there was a sanctuary of Zeus Panhellenius, which was said to have been founded by Aeacus; and a festival, Panhellenia, was celebrated there.

Paniōnĭum. [MYCALE: and Dict. of Ant. s. v. Panionia.]

Panĭum (Πάνιον), a town on the coast of Thrace near Heraclea.

Pannŏnĭa, one of the most important of the Roman provinces between the Danube and the Alps, was separated on the W. from Noricum by the Mons Cetius, and from Upper Italy by the Alpes Juliae, on the S. from Illyria by the Savus, on the E. from Dacia by the Danube, and on the N. from Germany by the same river. It thus corresponded to the eastern part of Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, the whole of Hungary between the Danube and the Save, Slavonia, and a part of Croatia and Bosnia. The mountains in the S. and W. of the country on the borders of Illyria, Italy, and Noricum, belonged to the Alps, and are therefore called by the general name of the Alpes Pannonicae, of which the separate names are Ocra, Carvancas, Cetius, and Albii or Albani Montes. The principal rivers of Pannonia, besides the Danube, were the DRAVUS (Drave), SAVUS (Save), and Arrabo (Raab), all of which flow into the Danube. — The Pannonians (Pannonii), sometimes called Paeonians by the Greek writers, were probably of Illyrian origin, and were divided into numerous tribes. They were a brave and warlike people, but are described by the Roman writers as cruel, faithless, and treacherous. They maintained their independence of Rome, till Augustus, after his conquest of the Illyrians (B. C. 35), turned his arms against the Pannonians, who were shortly afterwards subdued by his general Vibius. In A. D. 7 the Pannonians joined the Dalmatians and the other Illyrian tribes in their revolt from Rome, and were with difficulty conquered by Tiberius, after a desperate struggle, which lasted 3 years (A. D. 7—9). It was after the termination of this war that Pannonia appears to have been reduced to the form of a Roman province, and was garrisoned by several Roman legions. The dangerous mutiny of these troops after the death of Augustus (A. D. 14) was with difficulty quelled by Drusus. From this time to the end of the empire, Pannonia always contained a large number of Roman troops, on account of its bordering on the Quadi and other powerful barbarous nations. We find at a later time that Pannonia was the regular quarters of 7 legions. In consequence of this large number of troops always stationed in the country, several towns were founded and numerous fortresses were erected along the Danube. Pannonia originally formed only one province, but was soon divided into 2 provinces, called Pannonia Superior and Pannonia Inferior. These were separated from one another by a straight line drawn from the river Arrabo S. as far as the Savus, the country W. of this line being P. Superior, and the part E. P. Inferior. Each of the provinces was governed by a separate propraetor; but they were frequently spoken of in the plural under the name of Pannoniae. In the 4th century the part of P. Inferior between the Arrabo, the Danube, and the Dravus, was formed into a separate province by Galerius, who gave it the name of Valeria in honour of his wife. But as P. Inferior had thus lost a great part of its territory, Constantine added to it a portion of P. Superior, comprising the upper part of the course of the Dravus and the Savus. P. Superior was now called Pannonia I., and P. Inferior Pannonia II.; and all 3 Pannonian provinces (together with the 2 Noric provinces and Dalmatia) belonged to the 6 Illyrian provinces of the Western Empire. In the middle of the 5th century Pannonia was taken possession of by the Huns. After the death of Attila it passed into the hands of the Ostrogoths, and subsequently into those of the Langobards.

Panomphaeus (Πανομφαῖος), i. e. the author of all signs and omens, a surname of Zeus, who had a sanctuary on the Hellespont between capes Rhoeteum and Sigeum.

Pănŏpe (Πανόπη), a nymph of the sea, daughter of Nereus and Doris.

Panŏpeus (Πανοπεύς), son of Phocus and Asteropaea, accompanied Amphitryon on his expedition against the Taphians or Teleboans, and took an oath not to embezzle any part of the booty; but having broken his oath, he was punished by his son Epeus becoming unwarlike. He is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters.

Pănŏpeus (Πανοπεύς, Hom.), Pănŏpēae (Πανοπέαι), or Pănŏpe (Πανόπη, Thuc.; ethnic Πανοπεύς, Agio Vlasi), an ancient town in Phocis on the Cephissus and near the frontiers of Boeotia, 20 stadia W. of Chaeronea, said to have been founded by Panopeus, son of Phocus.

Panŏpŏlis. [CHEMMIS.]

Panoptes. [ARGUS.]

Panormus (Πάνορμος), that is, "All-Port," or a place always fit for landing, the name of several harbours. 1. (Πανορμίτης, Panormīta, Panormitanus: Palermo), an important town on the N. coast of Sicily and at the mouth of the river Orethus, was founded by the Phoenicians, and at a later time received its Greek name from its excellent harbour. From the Phoenicians it passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, in whose power it remained for a long time, and who made it one of the chief stations for their fleet. It was taken by the Romans in the 1st Punic war, B. C. 254, and was subsequently made a Roman colony. — 2. (Porto Raphti), the principal harbour on the E. coast of Attica, near the demus Prasiae, and opposite the S. extremity of Euboea. — 3. (Tekieh), a harbour in Achaia, 15 stadia E. of the promontory Rhium. — 4. A harbour in Epirus in the middle of the Acroceraunian rocks. — 5. (Nr. Mylopotamo Rn.), a town and harbour on the N. coast of Crete. — 6. The outer harbour of Ephesus formed by the mouth of the river Caÿster. [See p. 242, a.]

Pansa, C. Vibĭus, a friend and partisan of Caesar, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 51, and was appointed by Caesar in 46 to the government of Cisalpine Gaul as successor to M. Brutus. Caesar subsequently nominated him and Hirtius, consuls for 43. Pansa was consul in that year along with Hirtius, and fell before Mutina in the month of April. The details are given under HIRTIUS.

Pantăcÿas, Pantăgĭas, or Pantăgĭes (Παντακύας: Fiume di Porcari), a small river on the E. coast of Sicily, which flowed into the sea between Megara and Syracuse.

Pantălĕōn (Πανταλέων), son of Omphalion, king or tyrant of Pisa in Elis at the period of the 34th Olympiad (B. C. 644), assembled an army, with which he made himself master of Olympia, and assumed by force the sole presidency of the Olympic games. The Eleans on this account would not reckon this as one of the regular Olympiads. Pantaleon assisted the Messenians in the 2nd Messenian war.

Panthēa. [ABRADATAS.]

Panthēum (Πάνθειον), a celebrated temple at Rome in the Campus Martius, which is still extant and used as a Christian church. It is in a circular form, surmounted by a dome, and contains a noble Corinthian portico of 16 pillars. In its general form it resembles the Colosseum in the Regent's Park. It was built by M. Agrippa in his 3rd consulship, B. C. 27, as the inscription on the portico still testifies. All the ancient authors call it a temple, and there is no reason for supposing, as some modern writers have done, that it was originally an entrance to the public baths. The name is commonly derived from its being supposed to be sacred to all the gods ; but Dion Cassius expressly states that it was dedicated to Mars and Venus. The temple of Julius Caesar was erected by Augustus in the interior of the temple, and that of Augustus in the pronaos. It was restored by the emperor Septimius Severus, A. D. 202. Between 608 and 610 it was consecrated as a Christian church by the pope Boniface IV., with the approbation of the emperor Phocas. In 655, the plates of gilded-bronze that covered the roof were carried to Constantinople by command of Constans II. The Pantheon is the largest circular building of antiquity ; the interior diameter of the rotunda is 142 feet, and the height from the pavement to the summit about 148 feet. The portico is 103 feet wide, and the columns 47 feet high.

Panthŏus contr. Panthūs (Πάνθοος, Πάνθους), one of the elders at Troy, husband of Phrontis, and father of Euphorbus, Polydamas, and Hyperenor. Hence both Euphorbus and Polydamas are called Panthoides. He is said to have been originally a priest of Apollo at Delphi, and to have been carried to Troy by Antenor, on account of his beauty. He continued to be a priest of Apollo, and is called by Virgil (Aen. ii. 319) Othryades, or son of Othryas.

Panticapaeum (Παντικάπαιον: Παντικαπαῖος, Παντικαπαιεύς, Παντικαπιάτης: Kertsch), a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, was situated on a hill 20 stadia in circumference on the Cimmerian Bosporus, and opposite the town of Phanagoria in Asia. It derived its name from the river Panticapes. It was founded by the Milesians, about B. C. 541, and from its position and excellent harbour soon became a place of great commercial importance. It was the residence of the Greek kings of the Bosporus, and hence is sometime called Bosporus. Justinian caused it to be surrounded with new walls.

Panticapes (Παντικάπης), a river in European Sarmatia, which, according to Herodotus, rises in a lake, separates the agricultural and nomad Scythians, flows through the district Hylaea, and falls into the Borysthenes. It is usually identified with the modern Somara, but without sufficient grounds.

Panyasis (Πανύασις). 1. A Greek epic poet, was a native of Halicarnassus, and a relation of the historian Herodotus, probably his uncle. Panyasis began to be known about B. C. 489, continued in reputation till 467, and was put to death by Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, about 457. The most celebrated of the poems of Panyasis was his Heraclea or Heracleas, which gave a detailed account of the exploits of Hercules. It consisted of 14 books and 9000 verses. Another poem of Panyasis bore the name of Ionica (Ἰωνικά), and contained 7000 verses; it related the history of Neleus, Codrus, and the Ionic colonies. In later times the works of Panyasis were extensively read, and much admired; the Alexandrine grammarians ranked him with Homer, Hesiod, Pisander, and Antimachus, as one of the 5 principal epic poets.— 2. A philosopher, also a native of Halicarnassus, who wrote 2 books "On Dreams" (Περὶ ὀνείρων), was perhaps a grandson of the poet.

Paphlăgŏnĭa (Παφλαγονία: Παφλαγών, pl. -όνες, Paphlăgo), a district on the N. side of Asia Minor, between Bithynia on the W. and Pontus on the E., being separated from the former by the river Parthenius, and from the latter by the Halys; on the S. it was divided by the chain of Mt. Olympus (according to others by Olgassys) from Phrygia, in the earlier times, but from Galatia afterwards; and on the N. it bordered on the Euxine. These boundaries, however, are not always exactly observed. Xenophon brings the Paphlagonians as far E. as Themiscyra and the Jasonian promontory. It appears to have been known to the Greeks in the mythical period. The Argonautic legends mentioned Paphlagon, the son of Phineus, as the hero eponymus of the country. In the Homeric Catalogue, Pylaemenes leads the Paphlagonians, as allies of the Trojans, from the land of the Heneti, about the river Parthenius, a region famed for its mules: and from this Pylaemenes the later princes of Paphlagonia claimed their descent, and the country itself was sometimes called Pylaemenia. Herodotus twice mentions the Halys as the boundary between the Paphlagonians and the Syrians of Cappadocia ; but we learn also from him and from other authorities that the Paphlagonians were of the same race as the Cappadocians (i. e. the Semitic or Syro-Arabian) and quite distinct, in their language and their customs, from their Thracian neighbours on the W. They were good soldiers, especially as cavalry; but uncivilised and superstitious. The country had also other inhabitants, probably of a different race, namely the Heneti and the Caucones ; and Greek settlements were established on the coast at an early period. The Paphlagonians were first subdued by Croesus. Under the Persian empire they belonged to the third satrapy, but their satraps made themselves independent and assumed the regal title; maintaining themselves in this position (with a brief interruption, during which Paphlagonia was subject to Eumenes) until the conquest of the country by Mithridates, who added the E. part of his own kingdom, and made over the W. part to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who gave it to his son Pylaemenes. After the fall of Mithridates the Romans added the N. of Paphlagonia, along the coast, to Bithynia; and the interior was left to the native princes, as tributaries to Rome; but, the race of these princes becoming soon extinct, the whole of Paphlagonia was made Roman, and Augustus made it a part of the province of Galatia. It was made a separate province under Constantine; but the E. part, from Sinope to the Halys, was assigned to Pontus, under the name of Hellespontus. Paphlagonia was a mountainous country, being intersected from W. to E. by 3 chains of the Olympus system, namely the Olympus itself on the S. border, Olgassys in the centre, and a minor chain with no specific name nearer to the coast. The belt of land between this last chain and the sea was very fertile, and the Greek cities of Amastris and Sinope brought a considerable commerce to its shore; but the inland parts were chiefly covered with native forests, which were celebrated as hunting grounds. The country was famed for its horses and mules, and in some parts there were extensive sheepwalks; and its rivers were particularly famous for their fish. The country was divided into 9 districts, the names of which are not of enough importance to be specified here.

Păphus (Πάφος), son of Pygmalion by the statue into which life had been breathed by Aphrodite. From him the town of Paphus is said to have derived its name; and Pygmalion himself is called the Paphian hero. (Ov. Met. x. 290.)

Păphus (Πάφος : Πάφιος), the name of 2 towns on the W. coast of Cyprus, near each other, and called respectively "Old Paphos" (Παλαίπαφος) and "New Paphos" (Πάφος νέα). Old Paphos was situated near the promontory Zephyrium on the river Bocarus 10 stadia from the coast, where it had a good harbour; while New Paphos lay more inland, in the midst of a fertile plain, 60 stadia from the former. Old Paphos was the chief seat of the worship of Aphrodite (Venus), who is said to have landed at this place after her birth among the waves, and who is hence frequently called the Paphian goddess (Paphia). Here she had a celebrated temple, the high priest of which exercised a kind of religious superintendence over the whole island. Every year there was a grand procession from New Paphos to the temple of the goddess in the old city. There were 2 legends respecting the foundation of Paphos, one describing the Syrian king Cinyras as its founder, and the other the Arcadian Agapenor on his return from Troy. These statements are reconciled by the supposition that Cinyras was the founder of Old Paphos and Agapenor of New Paphos. There can be no doubt of the Phoenician origin of Old Paphos, and that the worship of Aphrodite was introduced here from the East; but an Arcadian colony cannot be admitted. When Paphos is mentioned by later writers without any epithet, they usually mean the New City; but when the name occurs in the poets, we are generally to understand the Old City, as the poets, for the most part, speak of the place in connection with the worship of Aphrodite. Old Paphos was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Augustus, but was rebuilt by order of the emperor, and called Augusta. Under the Romans New Paphos was the capital of one of the 4 districts into which the island was divided. Old Paphos corresponds to the modern Kukla or Konuklia, and New Paphos to the modern Baffa.

Papĭas (Παπίας), an early Christian writer, said to have been a hearer of the Apostle John, and a companion of Polycarp, was bishop of Hierapolis, on the border of Phrygia. He taught the doctrine of the Millennium, maintaining that there will be for 1000 years after the resurrection of the dead, a bodily reign of Christ on this earth. Only fragments of his works are extant.

Papiniānus, Aemĭlius, a celebrated Roman jurist, was praefectus praetorio, under the emperor Septimius Severus, whom he accompanied to Britain. The emperor died at York A. D. 211, and is said to have commended his 2 sons Caracalla and Geta to the care of Papinian. On the death of his father, Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office, and shortly afterwards put him to death. There are 595 excerpts from Papinian's works in the Digest. These excerpts are from the 37 books of Quaestiones, a work arranged according to the order of the Edict, the 19 books of Responsa, the 2 books of Definitiones, the 2 books De Adulteriis, a single book De Adulteriis, and a Greek work or fragment, which probably treated of the office of Aedile both at Rome and in other towns. No Roman jurist had a higher reputation than Papinian. Nor is his reputation unmerited. It was not solely because of the high station that he filled, his penetration and his knowledge, that he left an imperishable name; his excellent understanding, guided by integrity of purpose, has made him the model of a true lawyer.

Păpĭnĭus Statĭus. [STATIUS.]

Păpīrĭa Gens, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Papirii were divided into the families of Crassus, Cursor, Maso, and Mugillanus; and the Plebeian Papirii into those of Carbo, Paetus, and Turdus. Of these the families of CARBO, CURSOR, MASO, and MUGILLANUS, alone require mention.

Papiriānae Fossae, a village in Etruria on the Via Aemilia, between Luna and Pisa.

Păpīrĭus, C. or Sex., the author of a supposed collection of the Leges Regiae, which was called Jus Papirianum, or Jus Civile Papirianum. He is said to have lived in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus.

Papius Mutĭlus. [MUTILUS.]

Pappŭa (Παππούα), a lofty rugged mountain on the extreme border of Numidia, perhaps the same as the Thammes of Ptolemy, and as the mountain abounding with wild cats, near the city of Melitene, to which Diodorus Siculus refers (xx. 58), but without mentioning its name.

Pappus (Πάππος), of Alexandria, one of the later Greek geometers, is said by Suidas to have lived under Theodosius (A. D. 379—395). Of the works of Pappus, the only one which has come down to us is his celebrated Mathematical Collections (Μαθηματικῶν συναγωγῶν βιβλία). This work, as we have it now in print, consists of the last 6 of 8 books. Only portions of these books have been published in Greek. There are 2 Latin editions of Pappus; the first, by Commandinus, Pisauri, 1588; and the second by Manolessius, Bononiae, 1660.

Paprēmis (Πάπρημις), a city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Papremites, and sacred to the Egyptian god whom the Greeks identified with Ares. It is only mentioned by Herodotus, and is perhaps the same as the Choïs of later times.

Papus, Aemĭlius. 1. M., dictator B. C. 321. — 2. Q., twice consul 282, and 278; and censor 275. In both his consulships and in his censorship he had as colleague C. Fabricius Luscinus. — 3. L., consul 225, defeated the Cisalpine Gauls with great slaughter. He was censor 220 with C. Flaminius.

Parachelōĭtis (Παραχελωῖτις), the name of the plain in Acarnania and Aetolia, near the mouth of the Achelous, and through which that river flows.

Parachoāthras (Παραχοάθρας, τὰ Παραχοάθρα: Mnts. of Louristan), a part of the chain of mountains forming the E. margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, was the boundary between Susiana and Media. The same name is given to an E. branch of the chain, which formed the boundary between Parthia and the desert of Carmania. Strabo places it too far N.

Paraetăcēnē (Παραιτακηνή: Παραιτακαί, Παραιτακηνοί, Paraetăcae, Paraetacēni), the name of various mountainous regions in the Persian empire, is the Greek form of a Persian word, signifying mountainous. 1. The best known of those districts was on the borders of Media and Persis, and was inhabited by a people of Median origin, who are mentioned several times by the historians of Alexander and his successors. — 2. A district between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes, on the borders of Bactria and Sogdiana. — 3. A district between Arachosia and Drangiana, also called Sacastana, from its inhabitants, the Scythian Sacae.

Paraetōnĭum or Ammōnĭa (Παραιτόνιον, ἡ Ἀμμωνία: El-Bareton or Marsa-Labeit), an important city on the N. coast of Africa, belonged to Marmarica in its widest sense, but politically to Egypt, namely to the Nomos Libya: hence this city on the W. and Pelusium on the E. are called "cornua Aegypti." It stood near the promontory Artos or Pythis (Ras-el-Hazeit); and was reckoned 200 Roman miles W. of Alexandria, between 70 and 80, or, according to Strabo, 900 stadia (all too small) E. of the Catabathmos Major, and 1300 stadia N. of Ammonium in the Desert (Siwah), which Alexander the Great visited by the way of Paraetonium. The city was 40 stadia in circuit. It was an important sea port, a strong fortress, and a renowned seat of the worship of Isis. It was restored by Justinian, and continued a place of some consequence till its complete destruction by the late Pasha of Egypt, Mehemet Ali, in 1820.

Părăgon Sinus (Παραγων κόλπος: Gulf of Oman), a gulf of the Indicus Oceanus, on the coast of Gedrosia, namely, the gulf formed in the N. W. of the Indian Ocean by the approach of the N. E. coast of Arabia to that of Beloochistan and Persia, outside of the entrance to the Persian Gulf.

Părălĭa (Παραλία), the sea-coast district of Attica, around the promontory of Sunium, extending upwards as far as Halae Axonides on the W. coast and Prasiae on the E. coast. The inhabitants of this district, the Paralii (Παράλιοι), were one of the 3 political parties, into which Attica was divided at the time of Pisistratus, the other 2 being the Diacrii (Διάκριοι), or Highlanders, and the Pediasii (Πεδιάσιοι), or inhabitants of the plain.

Părălus (Πάραλος), the younger of the 2 legitimate sons of Pericles. He and his brother Xanthippus were educated by their father with the greatest care, but they both appear to have been of inferior capacity, which was anything but compensated by worth of character, though Paralus seems to have been a somewhat more hopeful youth than his brother. They both fell victims to the plague, B. C. 429.

Parapotămĭi or ĭa (Παραποτάμιοι, -αμία: Belissi), an ancient town in Phocis, situated on a steep hill, and on the left bank of the river Cephissus, from which it derives its name. It was near the frontiers of Boeotia, being only 40 stadia from Chaeronea and 60 stadia from Orchomenus. It is probably mentioned by Homer (Il. ii. 522). It was destroyed by Xerxes, but was rebuilt, and was destroyed a second time in the Sacred War.

Parasōpĭa (Παρασωπία), a district in the S. of Boeotia, on both banks of the Asopus, the inhabitants of which were called Parasōpĭi (Παρασώπιοι).

Parcae. [MOIRAE.]

Parentĭum (Parenzo), a town in Istria, with a good harbour, inhabited by Roman citizens, but not a Roman colony, 31 miles from Pola.

Păris (Πάρις), also called Alexander (Ἀλέξανδρος), was the second son of Priam and Hecuba. Before his birth Hecuba dreamed that she had brought forth a firebrand, the flames of which spread over the whole city. Accordingly as soon as the child was born, he was given to a shepherd, who was to expose him on Mt. Ida. After the lapse of 5 days, the shepherd, on returning to Mt. Ida, found the child still alive, and fed by a she-bear. Thereupon he carried the boy home, and brought him up along with his own child, and called him Paris. When Paris had grown up, he distinguished himself as a valiant defender of the flocks and shepherds, and hence received the name of Alexander, i. e. the defender of men. He also succeeded in discovering his real origin, and was received by Priam as his son. He now married Oenone, the daughter of the river god Cebren, by whom, according to some, he became the father of Corythus. But the most celebrated event in the life of Paris was his abduction of Helen. This came to pass in the following way. Once upon a time, when Peleus and Thetis solemnized their nuptials, all the gods were invited to the marriage, with the exception of Eris, or Strife. Enraged at her exclusion, the goddess threw a golden apple among the guests, with the inscription, "to the fairest." Thereupon Hera, Aphrodite and Athena each claimed the apple for herself. Zeus ordered Hermes to take the goddesses to Mt. Gargarus, a portion of Ida, to the beautiful shepherd Paris, who was there tending his flocks, and who was to decide the dispute. The goddesses accordingly appeared before him. Hera promised him the sovereignty of Asia and great riches, Athena great glory and renown in war, and Aphrodite the fairest of women for his wife. Paris decided in favour of Aphrodite, and gave her the golden apple. This judgment called forth in Hera and Athena fierce hatred against Troy. Under the protection of Aphrodite, Paris now sailed to Greece, and was hospitably received in the palace of Menelaus at Sparta. Here he succeeded in carrying off Helen, the wife of Menelaus, who was the most beautiful woman in the world. — The accounts of this rape are not the same in all writers. According to the more usual account Helen followed her seducer willingly, owing to the influence of Aphrodite, while Menelaus was absent in Crete. Others relate that the goddess deceived Helen, by giving to Paris the appearance of Menelaus; and others again say that Helen was carried off by Paris by force, either during a festival or during the chase. — On his return to Troy, Paris passed through Egypt and Phoenicia, and at length arrived at Troy with Helen and the treasures which he had treacherously taken from the hospitable house of Menelaus. — In regard to this voyage the accounts again differ, for according to some Paris and Helen reached Troy 3 days after their departure; whereas, according to later traditions, Helen did not reach Troy at all, for Zeus and Hera allowed only a phantom resembling her to accompany Paris to Troy, while the real Helen was carried to Proteus in Egypt, and remained there until she was fetched by Menelaus. — The abduction of Helen gave rise to the Trojan war. Before her marriage with Menelaus, she had been wooed by the noblest chiefs in all parts of Greece. Her former suitors now resolved to revenge her abduction, and sailed against Troy. [AGAMEMNON.] Homer describes Paris as a handsome man, fond of the female sex and of music, and not ignorant of war, but as dilatory and cowardly, and detested by his own friends for having brought upon them the fatal war with the Greeks. He fought with Menelaus before the walls of Troy, and was defeated, but was carried off by Aphrodite. He is said to have killed Achilles, either by one of his arrows, or by treachery in the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo. [ACHILLES.] On the capture of Troy, Paris was wounded by Philoctetes with an arrow of Hercules, and then returned to his long abandoned wife Oenone. But she, remembering the wrongs she had suffered, or according to others being prevented by her father, refused to heal the wound. He then went back to Troy and died. Oenone quickly repented, and hastened after him with remedies, but came too late, and in her grief hung herself. According to others she threw herself from a tower, or rushed into the flames of the funeral pile on which the body of Paris was burning. Paris is represented in works of art as a beautiful youth, without a beard, with a Phrygian cap, and sometimes with an apple in his hand, which he presented to Aphrodite.

Păris, the name of two celebrated pantomimes. 1. The elder Paris lived in the reign of the emperor Nero, with whom he was a great favourite. He was originally a slave of Domitia, the aunt of the emperor, and he purchased his freedom by paying her a large sum of money. Paris was afterwards declared, by order of the emperor, to have been free-born (ingenuus), and Domitia was compelled to restore to him the sum which she had received for his freedom. When Nero attempted to become a pantomime, he put Paris to death as a dangerous rival. — 2. The younger Paris, and the more celebrated of the two, was a native of Egypt, and lived in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was also a great favourite. He was put to death by Domitian, because he had an intrigue with Domitia, the wife of the emperor.

Părīsĭi. [LUTETIA PARISIORUM.]

Părĭum (τὸ Πάριον: Παριᾱνός, Παριηνός, Παριανεύς: Kemer, Ru.), a city of Mysia, on the N. coast of the Troad, on the Propontis, between Lampsacus and Priapus, was founded by a colony from Miletus, mingled with natives of Paros and Erythrae, and became a flourishing seaport, having a better harbour than that of Priapus. Under Augustus it was made a Roman colony, by the name of Colonia Pariana Julia Augusta. It was a renowned seat of the worship of Eros, Dionysus, and Apollo. The surrounding district was called ἡ Παριανή.

Parma (Parmensis: Parma), a town in Gallia Cispadana, situated on a river of the same name and on the Via Aemilia, between Placentia and Mutina, was originally a town of the Boii, but was made a Roman colony B.C. 183, along with Mutina, and from that time became a place of considerable importance. It suffered some injury in the civil war after Caesar's death, but was enlarged and embellished by Augustus, and received the name of Colonia Julia Augusta. After the fall of the Western Empire it was for a time called Chrysopolis, or the "Gold-City," but for what reason we do not know. The country around Parma was originally marshy; but the marshes were drained by the consul Scaurus, and converted into fertile land. The wool of Parma was particularly good.

Parmĕnĭdes (Παρμενίδης), a distinguished Greek philosopher, was a native of Elea in Italy. According to Plato, Parmenides, at the age of 65, came to Athens to the Panathenaea, accompanied by Zeno, then 40 years old, and became acquainted with Socrates, who at that time was quite young. Supposing Socrates to have been 19 or 20 years of age at the time, we may place the visit of Parmenides to Athens in B.C. 448, and consequently his birth in 513. Parmenides was regarded with great esteem by Plato and Aristotle; and his fellow-citizens thought so highly of him, that every year they bound their magistrates to render obedience to the laws which he had enacted for them. The philosophical opinions of Parmenides were developed in a didactic poem, in hexameter verse, entitled On Nature, of which only fragments remain. In this poem he maintained that the phaenomena of sense were delusive; and that it was only by mental abstraction that a person could attain to the knowledge of the only reality, a One and All, a continuous and self-existent substance, which could not be perceived by the senses. But although he believed the phaenomena of sense to be delusive, nevertheless he adopted 2 elements, Warm and Cold, or Light and Darkness. The best edition of the fragments of Parmenides is by Karsten, in Philosophorum Graec. Veterum Oper. Reliquiae, Amstelod. 1835.

Parmĕnĭon (Παρμενίων). 1. Son of Philotas, a distinguished Macedonian general in the service of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. Philip held him in high esteem, and used to say of him, that he had never been able to find more than one general, and that was Parmenion. In Alexander's invasion of Asia, Parmenion was regarded as second in command. At the three great battles of the Granicus, Issus and Arbela, while the king commanded the right wing of the army, Parmenion was placed at the head of the left, and contributed essentially to the victory on all those memorable occasions. The confidence reposed in him by Alexander appears to have been unbounded, and he is continually spoken of as the most attached of the king's friends, and as holding, beyond all question, the second place in the state. But when Philotas, the only surviving son of Parmenion, was accused in Drangiana (B.C. 330) of being privy to the plot against the king's life, he not only confessed his own guilt, when put to the torture, but involved his father also in the plot. Whether the king really believed in the guilt of Parmenion, or deemed his life a necessary sacrifice to policy after the execution of his son, he caused his aged friend to be assassinated in Media before he could receive the tidings of his son's death. The death of Parmenion, at the age of 70 years, will ever remain one of the darkest stains upon the character of Alexander. It is questionable whether even Philotas was really concerned in the conspiracy, and we may safely pronounce that Parmenion had no connection with it. — 2. Of Macedonia, an epigrammatic poet, whose verses were included in the collection of Philip of Thessalonica; whence it is probable that he flourished in, or shortly before, the time of Augustus.

Parnassus (Παρνασσός, Παρνασός, Ion. Παρνησός), the name, in its widest signification, of a range of mountains, which extends from Oeta and Corax S. E. through Doris and Phocis, and under the name of Cirphis (Κίρφις) terminates at the Corinthian gulf between Cirrha and Anticyra.

But in its narrower sense, Parnassus indicates the highest part of the range a few miles N. of Delphi. Its 2 highest summits were called Tithorĕa (Τιθορέα: Velitza), and Lycorēa (Λυκώρεια: Liakura), the former being N. W. and the latter N. E. of Delphi; and hence Parnassus is frequently described by the poets as double-headed. Immediately above Delphi the mountain forms a semicircular range of lofty rocks, at the foot of which the town was built. These rocks were called Phaedriades (Φαιδριάδες) or the "Resplendent," from their facing the S., and thus receiving the full rays of the sun during the most brilliant part of the day. The sides of Parnassus were well wooded: at its foot grew myrtle, laurel and olive-trees, and higher up firs; and its summit was covered with snow during the greater part of the year. It contained numerous caves, glens and romantic ravines. It is celebrated as one of the chief seats of Apollo and the Muses, and an inspiring source of poetry and song. On Mt. Lycorea was the Corycian cave, from which the Muses are sometimes called the Corycian nymphs. Just above Delphi was the far-famed Castalian spring, which issued from between 2 cliffs, called Nauplia and Hyamplia. These cliffs are frequently called by the poets the summits of Parnassus, though they are in reality only small peaks at the base of the mountain. The mountain also was sacred to Dionysus, and on one of its summits the Thyades held their Bacchic revels. Between Parnassus Proper and Mt. Cirphis was the valley of the Plistus, through which the sacred road ran from Delphi to Daulis and Stiris; and at the point where the road branched off to these 2 places (called σχιστή), Oedipus slew his father Laius.— 2. A town in the N. of Cappadocia, on a mountain of the same name (Pascha Dagh), probably on the river Halys, and on the road between Ancyra and Archelais.

Parnēs (Πάρνης, gen. Πάρνηθος: Ozia or Nozia), a mountain in the N. E. of Attica, in some parts as high as 4000 feet, was a continuation of Mt. Cithaeron, from which it extended E.-wards as far as the coast at Rhamnus. It was well wooded, abounded in game, and on its lower slopes produced excellent wine. It formed part of the boundary between Boeotia and Attica; and the pass through it between these 2 countries was easy of access, and was therefore strongly fortified by the Athenians. On the summit of the mountain there was a statue of Zeus Parnethius, and there were likewise altars of Zeus Semaleos and Zeus Ombrius or Apemius.

Parnōn (Πάρνων: Malevo), a mountain 6335 feet high, forming the boundary between Laconia and the territory of Tegea in Arcadia.

Paropamisădae (Παροπαμισάδαι) or Paropamisĭi, the collective name of several peoples dwelling in the S. slopes of Mt. Paropamisus (see next article), and of the country they inhabited, which was not known by any other name. It was divided on the N. from Bactria by the Paropamisus; on the W. from Aria, and on the S., from Drangiana and Arachosia, by indefinite boundaries; and on the E. from India by the river Indus: thus corresponding to the E. part of Afghanistan and the strip of the Punjab W. of the Indus. Under the Persian empire it was the N.E.-most district of Ariana. It was conquered by Alexander, when he passed through it on his march to India; but the people soon regained their independence, though parts of the country were nominally included in the limits of the Greco-Syrian and Bactrian kingdoms. It is a rugged mountain region, intersected by branches of the Paropamisus. In the N. the climate is so severe that, according to the ancient writers, confirmed by modern travellers, the snow almost buries the houses; but in the S. the valleys of the lower mountain slopes yield all the products of the warmer regions of Asia. In its N. was the considerable river Cophes or Cophen (Cabool), flowing into the Indus, and having a tributary, Choăs, Choēs, or Choaspes (No. 2). The particular tribes, included under the general name of Paropamisadae, were the Cabolītae (Καβολῖται) in the N., whose name and position point to Cabool, the Parsii (Πάρσιοί) in the S.W., the Ambautae (Ἀμβαῦται) in the E., on the river Choas, the Parsuētae (Παρσυῆται) on the S., and the Ἀριστόφυλοι, probably a dominant tribe of a different race, on the W. At the time of the Macedonian conquest the people were little civilised, but quiet and inoffensive. The chief cities were Ortospana and Alexandria, the latter founded by Alexander the Great.

Paropamisus (Παροπάμισος, and several other forms, of which the truest is probably Παροπάνισος: Hindoo-Koosh), a word no doubt derived, as many other words beginning like it, from the Old Persian paru, a mountain, is the name of a part of the great mountain-chain which runs from W. to E. through the centre of the S. portion of the highlands of Central Asia, and divides the part of the continent, which slopes down to the Indian Ocean, from the great central table-land of Tartary and Thibet. It is a prolongation of the chain of Anti-Taurus. The name was applied to that part of the chain between the Sariphi M. (M. of Kohistan) on the W. and M. Imaus (Himalaya) on the E., or from about the sources of the river Margus on the W. to the point where the Indus breaks through the chain on the E. They were believed by the ancients to be among the highest mountains in the world (which they are), and to contain the sources of the Oxus and the Indus; the last statement being an error which naturally arose from confounding the cleft by which the Indus breaks through the chain with its unknown source. When Alexander the Great crossed these mountains, his followers — regarding the achievement as equivalent to what a Greek considered as the highest geographical adventure, namely the passage of the Caucasus — conferred this glory on their chief by simply applying the name of Caucasus to the mountain chain which he had thus passed; and then, for the sake of distinction, this chain was called Caucasus Indicus, and this name has come down to our times in the native form of Hindoo-Koosh, and in others also. The name Paropamisus is also applied sometimes to the great S. branch of this chain (Soliman M.) which skirts the valley of the Indus on the W., and which is more specifically called Paryeti or Parsyetae.

Parōpus (Paropinus), a small town in the interior of Sicily, N. of the Nebrodes Montes.

Parōrēa (Παρώρεια). 1. A town in Thrace on the frontiers of Macedonia, whose inhabitants were the same people as the Paroraei of Pliny.— 2. Or Parōrĭa (Παρωρία), a town in the S. of Arcadia, N. of Megalopolis, said to have been founded by Paroreus, son of Tricolonus, and a grandson of Lycaon, the inhabitants of which took part in the building of Megalopolis.

Parōrĕātae (Παρωρεάται), the most ancient inhabitants of the mountains in Triphylia in Elis, who were expelled by the Minyae.

Parorios. [PHRYGIA.]

Păros (Πάρος: Πάριος: Paro), an island in the Aegean sea, one of the larger of the Cyclades, was situated S. of Delos and W. of Naxos, being separated from the latter by a channel 5 or 6 miles wide. It is about 36 miles in circumference. It is said to have been originally colonized by Cretans, but was afterwards inhabited by Ionians, and became so prosperous, even at an early period, as to send out colonies to Thasos and to Parium on the Propontis. In the first invasion of Greece by the generals of Darius, Paros submitted to the Persians; and after the battle of Marathon, Miltiades attempted to reduce the island, but failed in his attempt, and received a wound, of which he died. [MILTIADES.] After the defeat of Xerxes, Paros came under the supremacy of Athens and shared the fate of the other Cyclades. Its name rarely occurs in subsequent history. The most celebrated production of Paros was its marble, which was extensively used by the ancient sculptors. It was chiefly obtained from a mountain called Marpessa. The Parian figs were also highly prized. The chief town of Paros was situated on the W. coast, and bore the same name as the island. The ruins of it are still to be seen at the modern Paroikia. Paros was the birthplace of the poet Archilochus.— In Paros was discovered the celebrated inscription called the Parian Chronicle, which is now preserved at Oxford. The inscription is cut on a block of marble, and in its perfect state contained a chronological account of the principal events in Greek history from Cecrops, B. C. 1582 to the archonship of Diognetus, 264.

Parrhăsĭa (Παῤῥασία: Παῤῥάσιοι), a district in the S. of Arcadia, to which, according to Pausanias, the towns Lycosura, Thocnia, Trapezus, Proseis, Acacesium, Acontium, Macaria, and Dasea belonged. The Parrhasii are said to have been one of the most ancient of the Arcadian tribes. At the time of the Peloponnesian war they were under the supremacy of Mantinea, but were rendered independent of that city by the Lacedaemonians. Homer (Il. ii. 608) mentions a town Parrhasia, said to have been founded by Parrhasus, son of Lycaon, or by Pelasgus, son of Arestor.—The adjective Parrhasius is frequently used by the poets as equivalent to Arcadian.

Parrhăsĭus (Παῤῥάσιος), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of Ephesus, the son and pupil of Evenor. He practised his art chiefly at Athens: and by some writers he is called an Athenian, probably because the Athenians had bestowed upon him the right of citizenship. He flourished about B. C. 400. Parrhasius did for painting, at least in pictures of gods and heroes, what had been done for sculpture by Phidias in divine subjects, and by Polycletus in the human figure: he established a canon of proportion, which was followed by all the artists that came after him. Several interesting observations on the principles of art which he followed are made in a dialogue with Socrates, as reported by Xenophon (Mem. iii. 10). The character of Parrhasius was marked in the highest degree by that arrogance which often accompanies the consciousness of pre-eminent ability. In epigrams inscribed on his works he not only made a boast of his luxurious habits, but he also claimed the honour of having assigned with his own hand the precise limits of the art, and fixed a boundary which never was to be transgressed. Respecting the story of his contest with Zeuxis, see ZEUXIS. Of the works of Parrhasius, the most celebrated seems to have been his picture of the Athenian People.

Parsĭi. [PAROPAMISADAE.]

Parsĭci Montes (τὰ Παρσικὰ ὄρη, Bushkurd M. in the W. of Beloochistan), a chain of mountains running N.E. from the Paragon Sinus (G. of Oman) and forming the boundary between Carmania and Gedrosia. At the foot of these mountains, in the W. of Gedrosia, were a people called Parsĭdae, with a capital Parsis (perhaps Serbah).

Parsyētae (Παρσυῆται), a people on the borders of Arachosia and the Paropamisadae, with a mountain of the same name, which is probably identical with the PARUETI M. and with the Soliman mountains.

Parthălis, the chief city of the Calingae, a tribe of the Gangaridae, in India intra Gangem, at the head of the Sinus Gangeticus (Sea of Bengal).

Parthēni. [PARTHINI.]

Parthĕnĭas (Παρθενίας), also called Parthĕnĭa, a small river in Elis, which flows into the Alpheus E. of Olympia not far from Harpinna.

Parthĕnĭum (Παρθένιον). 1. A town in Mysia, S. of Pergamum.—2. (Felenk-burun), a promontory in the Chersonesus Taurica, on which stood a temple of the Tauric Artemis, from whom it derived its name. It was in this temple that human sacrifices were offered to the goddess.

Parthĕnĭum Mare (τὸ Παρθενικὸν πέλαγος), the S.E. part of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Cyprus.

Parthĕnĭus (Παρθένιος), of Nicaea, or according to others, of Myrlea, a celebrated grammarian, is said by Suidas to have been taken prisoner by Cinna, in the Mithridatic war, to have been manumitted on account of his learning, and to have lived to the reign of Tiberius. If this statement is true, Parthenius must have attained a great age, since there were 77 years from the death of Mithridates to the accession of Tiberius. Parthenius taught Virgil Greek; and he seems to have been very popular among the distinguished Romans of his time. The emperor Tiberius imitated his poems, and placed his works and statues in the public libraries, along with the most celebrated ancient writers. Parthenius wrote many poems, but the only one of his works which has come down to us is in prose, and entitled Περὶ ἐρωτικῶν παθημάτων. It contains 36 brief love-stories, which ended in an unfortunate manner. It is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, and was compiled for his use, that he might avail himself of the materials in the composition of epic and elegiac poems. The best edition is by Westermann, in the Mythographi, Brunswick, 1843.

Parthĕnĭus (Παρθένιος). 1. A mountain on the frontiers of Argolis and Arcadia, through which was an important pass leading from Argolis to Tegea. This pass is still called Partheni, but the mountain itself, which rises to the height of 3993 feet, bears the name of Roino. It was on this mountain that Telephus, the son of Hercules and Auge, was said to have been suckled by a hind; and it was here also that the god Pan is said to have appeared to Phidippides, the Athenian courier, shortly before the battle of Marathon.—2. (also Παρθένης: Chati-Su or Bartan-Su), the chief river of Paphlagonia, rises in Mt. Olgassys, and flows N.W. into the Euxine 90 stadia W. of Amastris, forming in the lower part of its course the boundary between Bithynia and Paphlagonia.

Parthĕnōn (ὁ Παρθενών, i. e. the virgin's chamber), was the usual name of one of the finest and, in its influence upon art, one of the most important edifices ever built, the temple of Athena Parthenos on the Acropolis of Athens. It was also called Hecatompĕdon (Ἑκατόμπεδον) or Hecatompedos (Ἑκατόμπεδος, sc. νεώς) from its being 100 feet in one of its chief dimensions, probably in the breadth of the top step on which the front pillars stand. It was erected, under the administration of Pericles, on the site of the older temple of Athena, burnt during the Persian invasion, and was completed by the dedication of the statue of the goddess, B.C. 438. Its architects were Ictinus and Callicrates, but all the works were under the superintendence of Phidias. It was built entirely of Pentelic marble: its dimensions were, 227 English feet long, 101 broad, and 65 high: it was 50 feet longer than the edifice which preceded it. Its architecture was of the Doric order, and of the purest kind. It consisted of an oblong central building (the cella or νεώς), surrounded on all sides by a peristyle of pillars, 46 in number, 8 at each end and 17 at each side (reckoning the corner pillars twice), elevated on a platform, which was ascended by 3 steps all round the building. Within the porticoes at each end was another row of 6 pillars, standing on a level with the floor of the cella, and 2 steps higher than that of the peristyle. The cella was divided into 2 chambers of unequal size, the prodomus or pronaos (πρόδομος, πρόναος), and the opisthodomus (ὀπισθόδομος) or posticum; the former, which was the larger, contained the statue of the goddess, and was the true sanctuary, the latter being probably used as a treasury and vestry. Both these chambers had inner rows of pillars (in 2 stories, one over the other), 16 in the former and 4 in the latter, supporting the partial roof, for the large chamber, at least, had its centre open to the sky. Technically, the temple is called peripteral octastyle hypaethral. It was adorned, within and without, with colours and gilding, and with sculptures which are regarded as the masterpieces of ancient art. The colossal chryselephantine (ivory and gold) statue of Athena, which stood at the end of the prodomus, opposite to the entrance, was the work of Phidias himself, and surpassed every other statue in the ancient world, except that of Zeus at Olympia by the same artist. The other sculptures were executed under the direction of Phidias by different artists, as may still be seen by differences in their style; but the most important of them were doubtless from the hand of Phidias himself. (1.) The tympana of the pediments (i. e. the inner flat portion of the triangular gable-ends of the roof above the 2 end porticoes), were filled with groups of detached colossal statues, those of the E. or principal front representing the birth of Athena, and those of the W. front the contest between Athena and Poseidon for the land of Attica. (2.) In the frieze of the entablature (i. e. the upper of the 2 portions into which the surface between the columns and the roof is divided), the metopes between the triglyphs (i. e. the square spaces between the projections answering to the ends of beams if the roof had been of wood) were filled with sculptures in high relief, 92 in all, 14 on each front, and 32 on each side, representing subjects from the Attic mythology, among which the battle of the Athenians with the Centaurs forms the subject of the 15 metopes from the S. side, which are now in the British Museum. (3.) Along the top of the external wall of the cella, under the ceiling of the peristyle, ran a frieze sculptured with a representation of the Panathenaic procession, in very low relief. A large number of the slabs of this frieze were brought to England by Lord Elgin, with the 15 metopes just mentioned, and a considerable number of other fragments, including some of the most important, though mutilated, statues from the pediments; and the whole collection was purchased by the nation in 1816, and deposited in the British Museum, where may also be seen excellent models of the ruins of the Parthenon and of the temple as conjecturally restored. The worst of the injuries which it has suffered from war and pillage was inflicted in the siege of Athens by the Venetians in 1687, when a bomb exploded in the very centre of the Parthenon, and threw down much of both the side walls. Its ruins are still, however, in sufficient preservation to give a good idea of the construction of all its principal parts.

Parthĕnŏpaeus (Παρθενοπαῖος), one of the 7 heroes who accompanied Adrastus in his expedition against Thebes. He is sometimes called a son of Ares or Milanion and Atalanta, sometimes of Meleager and Atalanta, and sometimes of Talaus and Lysimache. His son, by the nymph Clymene, who marched against Thebes as one of the Epigoni, is called Promachus, Stratolaus, Thesimenes, or Tlesimenes. Parthenopaeus was killed at Thebes by Asphodicus, Amphidicus or Periclymenus.

Parthĕnŏpŏlis (Παρθενόπολις), a town in Moesia Inferior near the Pontus Euxinus, and between Calatis and Tomi.

Parthĭa, Parthyaea, Parthiēnē (Παρθία, Παρθυαία, Παρθυηνή: Πάρθοι, Παρθυαῖοι, Parthi, Parthiēni: Khorassan), a country of Asia, to the S.E. of the Caspian. Its extent was different at different times; but, as the term was generally understood by the ancient geographers, it denoted the partly mountainous and partly desert country on the S. of the mountains which hem in the Caspian on the S.E. (M. Labuta), and which divided Parthia on the N. from Hyrcania. On the N.E. and E., a branch of the same chain, called Masdoranus, divided it from Aria; on the S. the deserts of Parthia joined those of Carmania, and further W.-ward the M. Parachoathras divided Parthia from Persis and Susiana: on the W. and N.W. it was divided from Media by boundaries which cannot be exactly marked out. Of this district, only the N. part, in and below the mountains of Hyrcania, seems to have formed the proper country of the Parthi, who were a people of Scythian origin. The ancient writers tell us that the name means exiles; but this is uncertain. They were a very warlike people, and were especially celebrated as horse-archers. Their tactics, of which the Romans had fatal experience in their first wars with them, became so celebrated as to pass into a proverb. Their mail-clad horsemen spread like a cloud round the hostile army, and poured in a shower of darts; and then evaded any closer conflict by a rapid flight, during which they still shot their arrow backwards upon the enemy. Under the Persian empire, the Parthians, with the Chorasmii, Sogdii, and Arii, formed the 16th satrapy: under Alexander and the Greek kings of Syria, Parthia and Hyrcania together formed a satrapy. About B.C. 250 they revolted from the Seleucidae, under a chieftain named Arsaces, who founded an independent monarchy, the history of which is given under ARSACES. During the period of the downfall of the Syrian kingdom, the Parthians overran the provinces E. of the Euphrates, and about B.C. 130 they overthrew the kingdom of Bactria, so that their empire extended over Asia from the Euphrates to the Indus, and from the Indian Ocean to the Paropamisus, or even to the Oxus; but on this N. frontier they had to maintain a continual conflict with the nomad tribes of Central Asia. On the W. their progress was checked by Mithridates and Tigranes, till those kings fell successively before the Romans, who were thus brought into collision with the Parthians. After the memorable destruction of Crassus and his army, B.C. 53 [CRASSUS], the Parthians threatened Syria and Asia Minor; but their progress was stopped by 2 signal defeats, which they suffered from Antony's legate Ventidius, in 39 and 38. The preparations for renewing the war with Rome were rendered fruitless by the contest for the Parthian throne between Phraates IV. and Tiridates, which led to an appeal to Augustus, and to the restoration of the standards of Crassus, B.C. 20; an event to which the Roman poets often allude in terms of flattery to Augustus, almost as if he had conquered the Parthian empire. It is to be observed that the poets of the Augustan age use the names Parthi, Persae, and Medi indifferently. The Parthian empire had now begun to decline, owing to civil contests and the defection of the governors of provinces, and had ceased to be formidable to the Romans. There were, however, continual disputes between the 2 empires for the protectorate of the kingdom of Armenia. In consequence of one of these disputes Trajan invaded the Parthian empire, and obtained possession for a short time of Mesopotamia; but his conquests were surrendered under Hadrian, and the Euphrates again became the boundary of the 2 empires. There were other wars at later periods, which resulted in favour of the Romans, who took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and made the district of Osroëne a Roman province. The exhaustion which was the effect of these wars at length gave the Persians the opportunity of throwing off the Parthian yoke. Led by Artaxerxes (Ardshir) they put an end to the Parthian kingdom of the Arsacidae, after it had lasted 476 years, and established the Persian dynasty of the Sassanidae, A.D. 226. [ARSACES: SASSANIDAE.]

Parthīni or Parthēni (Παρθινοί, Παρθηνοί), an Illyrian people in the neighbourhood of Dyrrhachium.

Parthiscus or Parthissus, a river in Dacia, probably the same as the Tibiscus. [TIBISCUS.]

Paryadres (Παρυάδρης: Kara-bel Dagh, or Kut-Tagh), a mountain chain of W. Asia, running S.W. and N.E. from the E. of Asia Minor into the centre of Armenia, and forming the chief connecting link between the Taurus and the mountains of Armenia. It was considered as the boundary between Cappadocia (i. e. Pontus Cappadocius) and Armenia (i. e. Armenia Minor). In a wide sense the name seems sometimes to extend so far N.E as to include M. Abus (Ararat) in Armenia.

Paryēti Montes (τὰ Παρυητῶν ὄρη, from the Indian word paruta, i. e. a mountain: Soliman M.), the great mountain chain which runs N. and S. on the W. side of the valley of the Indus, and forms the connecting link between the mountains which skirt the N. coast of the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean, and the parallel chain, further N., called the Paropamisus or Indian Caucasus; or, between the E. extensions of the Taurus and Anti-Taurus systems, in the widest sense. This chain formed the boundary between Arachosia and the Paropamisadae: it now divides Beloochistan and Afghanistan on the W. from Scinde and the Punjab on the E., and it meets the Hindoo-Koosh in the N.E. corner of Afghanistan, between Cabool and Peshawur. Its ancient inhabitants were called Paryētae (Παρυῆται); and the name Paruta is found in old Persian inscriptions and in the Zend-avesta (the old Persian sacred book), as that of a people.

Parysătis (Παρύσατις or Παρυσάτις), daughter of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, king of Persia, was given by her father in marriage to her own brother Darius, surnamed Ochus, who in B.C. 424 succeeded Xerxes II. on the throne of Persia. The feeble character of Darius threw the chief power into the hands of Parysatis; whose administration was little else than a series of murders. Four of her sons grew up to manhood. The eldest of these, Artaxerxes Mnemon, was born before Darius had obtained the sovereign power, and on this pretext Parysatis sought to set aside his claims to the throne in favour of her second son Cyrus. Failing in this attempt, she nevertheless interposed after the death of Darius, 405, to prevent Artaxerxes from putting Cyrus to death; and prevailed with the king to allow him to return to his satrapy in Asia Minor. After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (401), she did not hesitate to display her grief for the death of her favourite son, by bestowing funeral honours on his mutilated remains; and she subsequently succeeded in getting into her power all the authors of the death of Cyrus, whom she put to death by the most cruel tortures. She afterwards poisoned Statira, the wife of Artaxerxes. The feeble and indolent king was content to banish her to Babylon; and it was not long before he recalled her to his court, where she soon recovered all her former influence. Of this she availed herself to turn his suspicions against Tissaphernes, whom she had long hated as having been the first to discover the designs of Cyrus to his brother, and who was now put to death by Artaxerxes at her instigation, 396. She appears to have died soon afterwards.

Pasargăda or -ae (Πασαργάδα, Πασαργάδαι), the older of the 2 capitals of Persis (the other and later being Persepolis), is said to have been founded by Cyrus the Great, on the spot where he gained his great victory over Astyages. The tomb of Cyrus stood here in the midst of a beautiful park. The exact site is doubtful. Strabo describes it as lying in the hollow part of Persis, on the river Cyrus, S.E. of Persepolis, and near the borders of Carmania. Most modern geographers identify it with Murghab, N.E. of Persepolis, where there are the remains of a great sepulchral monument of the ancient Persians. Others place it at Farsa or at Darab-gherd, both S.E. of Persepolis, but not answering Strabo's description in other respects so well as Murghab. Others identify it with Persepolis; which is almost certainly an error.

Pasargădae (Πασαργάδαι), the most noble of the 3 chief tribes of the ancient Persians, the other 2 being the Maraphii and Maspii. The royal house of the Achaemenidae were of the race of the Pasargadae. They had their residence chiefly in and about the city of PASARGADA.

Pasĭas, a Greek painter, belonged to the Sicyonian school, and flourished about B.C. 220.

Pasĭon (Πασίων), a wealthy banker at Athens, was originally a slave of Antisthenes and Archestratus, who were also bankers. In their service he displayed great fidelity as well as aptitude for business, and was manumitted as a reward. He afterwards set up a banking concern on his own account, by which, together with a shield manufactory, he greatly enriched himself, while he continued all along to preserve his old character for integrity, and his credit stood high throughout Greece. He did not however escape an accusation of fraudulently keeping back some money which had been entrusted to him by a foreigner from the Euxine. The plaintiff's case is stated in an oration of Isocrates (τραπεζιτικός), still extant. Pasion did good service to Athens with his money on several occasions. He was rewarded with the freedom of the city, and was enrolled in the demus of Acharnae. He died at Athens in B.C. 370, after a lingering illness, accompanied with failure of sight. Towards the end of his life his affairs were administered to a great extent by his freedman Phormion, to whom he let his banking shop and shield manufactory, and settled in his will that he should marry his widow Archippe, with a handsome dowry, and undertake the guardianship of his younger son Pasicles. His elder son, Apollodorus, grievously diminished his patrimony by extravagance and law-suits.

Pāsĭphăē (Πασιφάη), daughter of Helios (the Sun) and Perseis, and a sister of Circe and Aeetes, was the wife of Minos, by whom she became the mother of Androgeos, Catreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Acalle, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phaedra. Hence Phaedra is called Pasiphaëia (Ov. Met. xv. 500.) Respecting the passion of Pasiphaë for the beautiful bull, and the birth of the Minotaurus, see p. 450, a.

Pasĭtĕles (Πασιτέλης). 1. A statuary, who flourished about B.C. 468, and was the teacher of Colotes, the contemporary of Phidias. — 2. A statuary, sculptor, and silver-chaser, of the highest distinction, was a native of Magna Graecia, and obtained the Roman franchise with his countrymen in B.C. 90. He flourished at Rome from about 60 to 30. Pasiteles also wrote a treatise in 5 books upon celebrated works of sculpture and chasing.

Pasĭthĕa (Πασιθέα). 1. One of the Charites, or Graces, also called Aglaia. — 2. One of the Nereids.

Pasitigris (Πασιτιγρης or Πασιτιγρις: prob. Karoon), a considerable river of Asia, rising in the mountains E. of Mesobatene, on the confines of Media and Persis, and flowing first W. by N. to M. Zagros or Parachoathras, then, breaking through this chain, it turns to the S., and flows through Susiana into the head of the Persian Gulf, after receiving the Eulaeus on its W. side. Some geographers make the Pasitigris a tributary of the Tigris.

Passărōn (Πασσάρων: near Dhramisius S.W. of Joannina), a town of Epirus in Molossia, and the ancient capital of the Molossian kings. It was destroyed by the Romans, together with 70 other towns of Epirus, after the conquest of Macedonia, B.C. 168.

Pataeci (Πάταικοι), Phoenician divinities whose dwarfish figures were attached to Phoenician ships.

Patăla, Patalēne. [PATTALA, PATTALENE.]

Patăra (τὰ Πάταρα: Παταρεύς: Patara, Ru.), one of the chief cities of Lycia, was a flourishing sea-port, on a promontory of the same name (ἡ Παταρων ἄκρα), 60 stadia (6 geog. miles) E. of the mouth of the Xanthus. It was early colonised by Dorians from Crete, and became a chief seat of the worship of Apollo, who had here a very celebrated oracle, which uttered responses in the winter only, and from whose son Patarus the name of the city was mythically derived. It was restored and enlarged by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who called it Arsinoë, but it remained better known by its old name.

Pătăvĭum (Patavīnus: Padova or Padua), an ancient town of the Veneti in the N. of Italy, on the Medoacus Minor, and on the road from Mutina to Altinum, was said to have been founded by the Trojan Antenor. It became a flourishing and important town in early times, and was powerful enough in B.C. 302 to drive back the Spartan king Cleomenes with great loss, when he attempted to plunder the surrounding country. Under the Romans Patavium was the most important city in the N. of Italy, and, by its commerce and manufactures (of which its woollen stuffs were the most celebrated), it attained great opulence. According to Strabo it possessed 500 citizens, whose fortune entitled them to the equestrian rank. It was plundered by Attila; and, in consequence of a revolt of its citizens, it was subsequently destroyed by Agilolf, king of the Langobards, and razed to the ground; hence the modern town contains few remains of antiquity. — Patavium is celebrated as the birth-place of the historian Livy. — In its neighbourhood were the Aquae Patavinae, also called Aponi Fons, respecting which, see p. 65, b.

Patercŭlus, C. Velleius, a Roman historian, was probably born about B.C. 19, and was descended from a distinguished Campanian family. He adopted the profession of arms; and, soon after he had entered the army, he accompanied C. Caesar in his expedition to the East, and was present with the latter at his interview with the Parthian king, in A.D. 2. Two years afterwards, A.D. 4, he served under Tiberius in Germany, succeeding his father in the rank of Praefectus Equitum, having previously filled in succession the offices of tribune of the soldiers and tribune of the camp. For the next 8 years Paterculus served under Tiberius, either as praefectus or legatus, in the various campaigns of the latter in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and, by his activity and ability, gained the favour of the future emperor. He was quaestor A.D. 7, but he continued to serve as legatus under Tiberius. He accompanied his commander on his return to Rome in 12, and took a prominent part in the triumphal procession of Tiberius, along with his brother Magius Celer. The 2 brothers were praetors in 15. Paterculus was alive in 30, as he drew up his history in that year for the use of M. Vinicius, who was then consul; and it is conjectured, with much probability, that he perished in the following year (31), along with the other friends of Sejanus. The favourable manner in which he had so recently spoken in his history of this powerful minister would be sufficient to ensure his condemnation on the fall of the latter. The work of Paterculus, which has come down to us, is a brief historical compendium in two books, and bears the title C. Velleii Paterculi Historiae Romanae ad M. Vinicium Cos. Libri II. The beginning of the work is wanting, and there is also a portion lost after the 8th chapter of the first book. The object of this compendium was to give a brief view of universal history, but more especially of the events connected with Rome, the history of which occupies the main portion of the book. It commenced apparently with the destruction of Troy, and ended with the year 30. In the execution of his work, Velleius has shown great skill and judgment. He does not attempt to give a consecutive account of all the events of history; he seizes only upon a few of the more prominent facts, which he describes at sufficient length to leave them impressed upon the recollection of his hearers. His style, which is a close imitation of Sallust's, is characterised by clearness, conciseness, and energy. In his estimate of the characters of the leading actors in Roman history he generally exhibits both discrimination and judgment; but he lavishes the most indiscriminate praises, as might have been expected, upon his patron Tiberius. Only one manuscript of Paterculus has come down to us; and as this manuscript abounds with errors, the text is in a very corrupt state. The best editions are by Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat. 1789; by Orelli, Lips. 1835; and by Bothe, Turici, 1837.

Paternus, Tarruntēnus, a jurist, is probably the same person who was praefectus praetorio under Commodus, and was put to death by the emperor on a charge of treason. He was the author of a work in 4 books, entitled De Re Militari or Militarium, from which there are two excerpts in the Digest.

Patmos (Πάτμος: Patmo), one of the islands called Sporades, in the Icarian Sea, at about equal distances S. of Samos, and W. of the Prom. Posidium on the coast of Caria, celebrated as the place to which the Apostle John was banished, and in which he wrote the Apocalypse. The natives still affect to show the cave where St. John saw the apocalyptic visions (τὸ σπήλαιον τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως). On the E. side of the island was a city with a harbour.

Patrae (Πάτραι, Πατρέες Herod.: Πατρεύς: Patras), one of the 12 cities of Achaia, was situated W. of Rhium, near the opening of the Corinthian gulf. It is said to have been originally called Aroe (Ἀρόη), and to have been founded by the autochthon Eumelus; and after the expulsion of the Ionians to have been taken possession of by Patreus, from whom it derived its name. The town is rarely mentioned in early Greek history, and was chiefly of importance as the place from which the Peloponnesians directed their attacks against the opposite coast of Aetolia. Patrae was one of the 4 towns which took the leading part in founding the 2nd Achaean league. In consequence of assisting the Aetolians against the Gauls in B.C. 279, Patrae became so weakened that most of the inhabitants deserted the town and took up their abodes in the neighbouring villages. Under the Romans it continued to be an insignificant place till the time of Augustus, who rebuilt the town after the battle of Actium, again collected its inhabitants, and added to them those of Rhypae. Augustus further gave Patrae dominion over the neighbouring towns, and even over Locris, and also bestowed upon it the privileges of a Roman colony: hence we find it called on coins Colonia Augusta Aroe Patrensis. Strabo describes Patrae in his time as a flourishing and populous town with a good harbour; and it was frequently the place at which persons landed sailing from Italy to Greece. The modern Patras is still an important place, but contains few remains of antiquity.

Patrocles (Πατροκλῆς), a Macedonian general in the service of Seleucus I. and Antiochus I., kings of Syria. Patrocles held, both under Seleucus and Antiochus, an important government over some of the E. provinces of the Syrian empire. During the period of his holding this position, he collected accurate geographical information, which he afterwards published to the world; but though he is frequently cited by Strabo, who placed the utmost reliance on his accuracy, neither the title nor exact subject of his work is mentioned. It seems clear, however, that it included a general account of India, as well as of the countries on the banks of the Oxus and the Caspian Sea. Patrocles regarded the Caspian Sea as a gulf or inlet of the ocean, and maintained the possibility of sailing thither by sea from the Indian Ocean.

Patrocli Insŭla (Πατρόκλου νῆσος: Gadaronesi or Gaidronisi), a small island off the S.W. coast of Attica, near Sunium.

Patroclus (Πάτροκλος or Πατροκλῆς), the celebrated friend of Achilles, was son of Menoetius of Opus, and grandson of Actor and Aegina, whence he is called Actorides. His mother is commonly called Sthenele, but some mention her under the name of Periapis or Polymele. Aeacus, the grandfather of Achilles, was a brother of Menoetius, so that Achilles and Patroclus were kinsmen as well as friends. While still a boy Patroclus involuntarily slew Clysonymus, son of Amphidamas. In consequence of this accident he was taken by his father to Peleus at Phthia, where he was educated together with Achilles. He is said to have taken part in the expedition against Troy on account of his attachment to Achilles. He fought bravely against the Trojans, until his friend withdrew from the scene of action, when Patroclus followed his example. But when the Greeks were hard pressed, he begged Achilles to allow him to put on his armour, and with his men to hasten to the assistance of the Greeks. Achilles granted the request, and Patroclus succeeded in driving back the Trojans and extinguishing the fire which was raging among the ships. He slew many enemies, and thrice made an assault upon the walls of Troy; but on a sudden he was struck by Apollo, and became senseless. In this state Euphorbus ran him through with his lance from behind, and Hector gave him the last and fatal blow. Hector also took possession of his armour. A long struggle now ensued between the Greeks and Trojans for the body of Patroclus; but the former obtained possession of it, and brought it to Achilles, who was deeply grieved, and vowed to avenge the death of his friend. Thetis protected the body with ambrosia against decomposition, until Achilles had leisure solemnly to burn it with funeral sacrifices. His ashes were collected in a golden urn which Dionysus had once given to Thetis, and were deposited under a mound, where the remains of Achilles were subsequently buried. Funeral games were celebrated in his honour. Achilles and Patroclus met again in the lower world; or, according to others, they continued after their death to live together in the island of Leuce.

Patron, an Epicurean philosopher, lived for some time in Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero and others. From Rome he removed to Athens, and there succeeded Phaedrus as president of the Epicurean school, B. C. 52.

Pattăla. [PATTALENE.]

Pattălēne or Patalēne (Παττααληνή, Παταληνή: Lower Scinde), the name of the great delta formed by the 2 principal arms by which the Indus falls into the sea. At the apex of the delta stood the city Pattăla or Patăla (prob. Hyderabad). The name is probably a native Indian word, namely the Sanscrit patâla, which means the W. country, and is applied to the W. part of N. India about the Indus, in contradistinction to the E. part about the Ganges.

Patulcĭus, a surname of Janus. [JANUS.]

Patūmus (Πάτουμος: O. T. Pithom: prob. near Habaseyh, or Belbeïs), an Egyptian city in the Arabian Desert, on the E. margin of the Delta, near Bubastis, and near the commencement of Necho's canal from the Nile to the Red Sea; built by the Israelites during their captivity (Exod. i. 11).

Paulīna or Paullīna. 1. Lollia. [LOLLIA.] — 2. Pompeia, wife of Seneca the philosopher, and probably the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus, who commanded in Germany in the reign of Nero. When her husband was condemned to death, she opened her veins along with him. After the blood had flowed some time, Nero commanded her veins to be bound up; she lived a few years longer, but with a paleness which testified how near she had been to death.

Paulīnus. 1. Pompeius, commanded in Germany along with L. Antistius Vetus in A. D. 58, and completed the dam to restrain the inundations of the Rhine, which Drusus had commenced 63 years before. Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Brevitate Vitae; and the Pompeia Paulina, whom the philosopher married, was probably the daughter of this Paulinus. — 2. C. Suetōnĭus, propraetor in Mauretania, in the reign of the emperor Claudius, A. D. 42, when he conquered the Moors who had revolted, and advanced as far as Mt. Atlas. He had the command of Britain in the reign of Nero, from 59 to 62. For the first 2 years all his undertakings were successful; but during his absence on an expedition against the island of Mona (Anglesey), the Britons rose in rebellion under Boadicea (61). They at first met with great success, but were conquered by Suetonius on his return from Mona. [BOADICEA.] In 66 he was consul; and after the death of Nero in 68 he was one of Otho's generals in the war against Vitellius. It was against his advice that Otho fought the battle at Bedriacum. He was pardoned by Vitellius after Nero's death. — 3. Of Milan (Mediolanensis), was the secretary of St. Ambrose, after whose death he became a deacon, and repaired to Africa, where, at the request of St. Augustine, he composed a biography of his former patron. This biography, and 2 other small works by Paulinus, are still extant. — 4. Meropius Pontius Anicius Paulinus, bishop of Nola, and hence generally designated Paulinus Nolanus, was born at Bourdeaux, or at a neighbouring town, which he calls Embromagum, about A. D. 353. His parents were wealthy and illustrious, and he received a careful education, enjoying in particular the instructions of the poet Ausonius. After many years spent in worldly honours he withdrew from the world, and was eventually chosen bishop of Nola in 409. He died in 431. The works of Paulinus are still extant, and consist of Epistolae (51 in number), Carmina (32 in number, composed in a great variety of metres), and a short tract entitled Passio S. Genesii Arelatensis. Edited by Le Brun, 4to. Paris, 1685, reprinted at Veron. 1736.

Paullus or Paulus, a Roman cognomen in many gentes, but best known as the name of a family of the Aemilia gens. The name was originally written with a double l, but subsequently with only one l.

Paulus (Παῦλος), Greek writers. 1. Aeginēta, a celebrated medical writer, of whose personal history nothing is known except that he was born in Aegina, and that he travelled a good deal, visiting, among other places, Alexandria. He probably lived in the latter half of the 7th century after Christ. He wrote several medical works in Greek, of which the principal one is still extant, with no exact title, but commonly called De Re Medica Libri Septem. This work is chiefly a compilation from former writers. The Greek text has been twice published, Venet. 1528, and Basil. 1538. There is an excellent English translation by Adams, London, 1834, seq. — 2. Of Alexandria, wrote, in A. D. 378, an Introduction to Astrology (Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὴν ἀποτελεσματικήν), which has come down to us, edited by Schatus or Schato, Wittenberg, 1586. — 3. Of Samosata, a celebrated heresiarch of the 3rd century, was made bishop of Antioch, about A. D. 260. He was condemned and deposed by a council held in 269. Paulus denied the distinct personality of the Son of God, and maintained that the Word came and dwelt in the man Jesus. — 4. Silentiarius, so called, because he was chief of the silentiarii, or secretaries of the emperor Justinian. He wrote various poems, of which the following are extant: — (1.) A Description of the Church of St. Sophia (Ἔκφρασις τοῦ ναοῦ τῆς ἁγίας Σοφίας), consisting of 1029 verses, of which the first 134 are iambic, the rest hexameter. This poem gives a clear and graphic description of the superb structure which forms its subject, and was recited by its author at the second dedication of the church (A. D. 562), after the restoration of the dome, which had fallen in. Edited by Graefe, Lips. 1822, and by Bekker, Bonn, 1837, in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians. (2.) A Description of the Pulpit (Ἔκφρασις τοῦ ἄμβωνος), consisting of 304 verses, is a supplement to the former poem. It is printed in the editions mentioned above. (3.) Epigrams, 83 in all, given in the Anthologia. Among these is a poem On the Pythian Baths (Εἰς τὰ ἐν Πυθίοις θέρμα).

Paulus, Aemilius. 1. M., consul B. C. 302, and magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, 301. — 2. M., consul 255 with Ser. Fulvius Paetinus Nobilior, about the middle of the 1st Punic war. See NOBILIOR, No. 1. — 3. L., son of No. 2., consul 219, when he conquered Demetrius of the island of Pharos in the Adriatic, and compelled him to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. He was consul a 2nd time in 216 with C. Terentius Varro. This was the year of the memorable defeat at Cannae. [HANNIBAL.] The battle was fought against the advice of Paulus; and he was one of the many distinguished Romans who perished in the engagement, refusing to fly from the field, when a tribune of the soldiers offered him his horse. Hence we find in Horace (Carm. i. 12): "animaeque magnae prodigum Paulum superante Poeno." Paulus was a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and was raised to the consulship by the latter party to counterbalance the influence of the plebeian Terentius Varro. — 4. L., afterwards surnamed MACEDONICUS, son of No. 3, was born about 230 or 229, since at the time of his 2nd consulship, 168, he was upwards of 60 years of age. He was one of the best specimens of the high Roman nobles. He would not condescend to flatter the people for the offices of the state, maintained with strictness severe discipline in the army, was deeply skilled in the law of the augurs, to whose college he belonged, and maintained throughout life a pure and unspotted character. He was elected curule aedile 192; was praetor 191, and obtained Further Spain as his province, where he carried on war with the Lusitani; and was consul 181, when he conquered the Ingauni, a Ligurian people. For the next 13 years he lived quietly at Rome, devoting most of his time to the education of his children. He was consul a 2nd time in 168, and brought the war against Perseus to a conclusion by the defeat of the Macedonian monarch near Pydna, on the 22nd of June. Perseus shortly afterwards surrendered himself to Paulus. [PERSEUS.] Paulus remained in Macedonia during the greater part of the following year as proconsul, and arranged the affairs of Macedonia, in conjunction with 10 Roman commissioners, whom the senate had despatched for the purpose. Before leaving Greece, he marched into Epirus, where, in accordance with a cruel command of the senate, he gave to his soldiers 70 towns to be pillaged, because they had been in alliance with Perseus. The triumph of Paulus, which was celebrated at the end of November, 167, was the most splendid that Rome had yet seen. It lasted three days. Before the triumphal car of Aemilius walked the captive monarch of Macedonia and his children, and behind it were his two illustrious sons, Q. Fabius Maximus and P. Scipio Africanus the younger, both of whom had been adopted into other families. But the glory of the conqueror was clouded by family misfortune. At this very time he lost his two younger sons; one, 12 years of age, died only 5 days before his triumph, and the other, 14 years of age, only 3 days after his triumph. The loss was all the severer, since he had no son left to carry his name down to posterity. In 164 Paulus was censor with Q. Marcius Philippus, and died in 160, after a long and tedious illness. The fortune he left behind him was so small as scarcely to be sufficient to pay his wife's dowry. The Adelphi of Terence was brought out at the funeral games exhibited in his honour. Aemilius Paulus was married twice. By his first wife, Papiria, the daughter of C. Papirius Maso, consul 231, he had 4 children, 2 sons, one of whom was adopted by Fabius Maximus and the other by P. Scipio, and 2 daughters, one of whom was married to Q. Aelius Tubero, and the other to M. Cato, son of Cato the censor. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and by his 2nd wife, whose name is not mentioned, he had 2 sons, whose death has been mentioned above, and a daughter, who was a child at the time that her father was elected to his 2nd consulship.

Paulus, Jūlius, one of the most distinguished of the Roman jurists, has been supposed, without any good reason, to be of Greek origin. He was in the auditorium of Papinian, and consequently was acting as a jurist in the reign of Septimius Severus. He was exiled by Elagabalus, but he was recalled by Alexander Severus when the latter became emperor, and was made a member of his consilium. Paulus also held the office of praefectus praetorio: he survived his contemporary Ulpian. Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the Digest than from any other jurist, except Ulpian. Upwards of 70 separate works by Paulus are quoted in the Digest. Of these his greatest work was Ad Edictum, in 80 books.

Paulus, Passiēnus, a contemporary and friend of the younger Pliny, was a distinguished Roman eques, and was celebrated for his elegiac and lyric poems. He belonged to the same municipium (Mevania in Umbria) as Propertius, whom he numbered among his ancestors.

Pausanĭas (Παυσανίας). 1. A Spartan of the Agid branch of the royal family, the son of Cleombrotus and nephew of Leonidas. Several writers incorrectly call him king; but he only succeeded his father Cleombrotus in the guardianship of his cousin Plistarchus, the son of Leonidas, for whom he exercised the functions of royalty from B. C. 479 to the period of his death. In 479, when the Athenians called upon the Lacedaemonians for aid against the Persians, the Spartans sent a body of 5000 Spartans, each attended by 7 Helots, under the command of Pausanias. At the Isthmus Pausanias was joined by the other Peloponnesian allies, and at Eleusis by the Athenians, and forthwith took the command of the combined forces, the other Greek generals forming a sort of council of war. The allied forces amounted to nearly 110,000 men. Near Plataeae in Boeotia, Pausanias defeated the Persian army under the command of Mardonius. This decisive victory secured the independence of Greece. Pausanias received as his reward a tenth of the Persian spoils. In 477 the confederate Greeks sent out a fleet under the command of Pausanias, to follow up their success by driving the Persians completely out of Europe and the islands. Cyprus was first attacked, and the greater part of it subdued. From Cyprus Pausanias sailed to Byzantium, and captured the city. The capture of this city afforded Pausanias an opportunity for commencing the execution of the design which he had apparently formed even before leaving Greece. Dazzled by his success and reputation, his station as a Spartan citizen had become too restricted for his ambition. His position as regent was one which must terminate when the king became of age. He therefore aimed at becoming tyrant over the whole of Greece, with the assistance of the Persian king. Among the prisoners taken at Byzantium were some Persians connected with the royal family. These he sent to the king, with a letter, in which he offered to bring Sparta and the rest of Greece under his power, and proposed to marry his daughter. His offers were gladly accepted, and whatever amount of troops and money he required for accomplishing his designs. Pausanias now set no bounds to his arrogant and domineering temper. The allies were so disgusted by his conduct, that they all, except the Peloponnesians and Aeginetans, voluntarily offered to transfer to the Athenians that pre-eminence of rank which Sparta had hitherto enjoyed. In this way the Athenian confederacy first took its rise. Reports of the conduct and designs of Pausanias reached Sparta, and he was recalled and put upon his trial; but the evidence respecting his meditated treachery was not yet thought sufficiently strong. Shortly afterwards he returned to Byzantium, without the orders of the ephors, and renewed his treasonable intrigues. He was again recalled to Sparta, was again put on his trial, and again acquitted. But even after this second escape he still continued to carry on his intrigues with Persia. At length a man, who was charged with a letter to Persia, having his suspicions awakened by noticing that none of those sent previously on similar errands had returned, counterfeited the seal of Pausanias and opened the letter, in which he found directions for his own death. He carried the letter to the ephors, who prepared to arrest Pausanias: but he took refuge in the temple of Athena Chalcioecus. The ephors stripped off the roof of the temple and built up the door; the aged mother of Pausanias is said to have been among the first who laid a stone for this purpose. When he was on the point of expiring, the ephors took him out lest his death should pollute the sanctuary. He died as soon as he got outside, B. C. 470. He left 3 sons behind him, Plistoanax, afterwards king, Cleomenes and Aristocles. — 2. Son of Plistoanax, and grandson of the preceding, was king of Sparta from B. C. 408 to 394. In 403 he was sent with an army into Attica, and secretly favoured the cause of Thrasybulus and the Athenian exiles, in order to counteract the plans of Lysander. In 395 Pausanias was sent with an army against the Thebans; but in consequence of the death of Lysander, who was slain under the walls of Haliartus, on the day before Pausanias reached the spot, the king agreed to withdraw his forces from Boeotia. On his return to Sparta he was impeached, and seeing that a fair trial was not to be hoped for, went into voluntary exile, and was condemned to death. He was living at Tegea in 385, when Mantinea was besieged by his son Agesipolis, who succeeded him on the throne. — 3. King of Macedonia, the son and successor of Aeropus. He was assassinated in the year of his accession by Amyntas II., 394. — 4. A pretender to the throne of Macedonia, made his appearance in 367, after Alexander II. had been assassinated by Ptolemaeus. Eurydice, the mother of Alexander, sent to request the aid of the Athenian general, Iphicrates, who expelled Pausanias from the kingdom. — 5. A Macedonian youth of distinguished family, from the province of Orestis. Having been shamefully treated by Attalus, he complained of the outrage to Philip; but as Philip took no notice of his complaints, he directed his vengeance against the king himself. He shortly afterwards murdered Philip at the festival held at Aegae, 336, but was slain on the spot by some officers of the king's guard. Suspicion rested on Olympias and Alexander of having been privy to the deed; but with regard to Alexander at any rate the suspicion is probably totally unfounded. There was a story that Pausanias, while meditating revenge, having asked the sophist Hermocrates which was the shortest way to fame, the latter replied, that it was by killing the man who had performed the greatest achievements. — 6. The traveller and geographer, was perhaps a native of Lydia. He lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius, and wrote his celebrated work in the reign of the latter emperor. This work, entitled Ἑλλάδος Περιήγησις, a Periegesis or Itinerary of Greece, is in 10 books, and contains a description of Attica and Megaris (i.), Corinthia, Sicyonia, Phliasia, and Argolis (ii.), Laconica (iii.), Messenia (iv.), Elis (v. vi.), Achaea (vii.), Arcadia (viii.), Boeotia (ix.), Phocis (x.). The work shows that Pausanias visited most of the places in these divisions of Greece, a fact which is clearly demonstrated by the minuteness and particularity of his description. The work is merely an Itinerary. Pausanias gives no general description of a country or even of a place, but he describes the things as he comes to them. His account is minute; but it mainly refers to objects of antiquity, and works of art, such as buildings, temples, statues, and pictures. He also mentions mountains, rivers, and fountains, and the mythological stories connected with them, which indeed are his chief inducements to speak of them. His religious feeling was strong, and his belief sure, for he tells many old legends in true good faith and seriousness. His style has been much condemned by modern critics; but if we except some corrupt passages, and if we allow that his order of words is not that of the best Greek writers, there is hardly much obscurity to a person who is competently acquainted with Greek, except that obscurity which sometimes is owing to the matter. With the exception of Herodotus, there is no writer of antiquity, and perhaps none of modern times, who has comprehended so many valuable facts in a small volume. The best editions are by Siebelis, Lips. 1822—1828, 5 vols. 8vo. and by Schubart and Walz, Lips. 1838—40, 3 vols. 8vo.

Pausĭas (Παυσίας), one of the most distinguished Greek painters, was a contemporary of Aristides, Melanthius, and Apelles (about B. C. 360—330), and a disciple of Pamphilus. He had previously been instructed by his father Brietes, who lived at Sicyon, where also Pausias passed his life. The department of the art which Pausias most practised was painting in encaustic with the cestrum. His favourite subjects were small panel-pictures, chiefly of boys. One of his most celebrated pictures was the portrait of Glycera, a flower-girl of his native city, of whom he was enamoured when a young man. Most of his paintings were probably transported to Rome with the other treasures of Sicyonian art, in the aedileship of Scaurus, when the state of Sicyon was compelled to sell all the pictures which were public property, in order to pay its debts.

Pausilȳpum (τὸ Παυσίλυπον), that is, the "grief-assuaging," was the name of a splendid villa near Neapolis in Campania, which Vedius Pollio bequeathed to Augustus. The name was transferred to the celebrated grotto (now Posilippo) between Naples and Puzzuoli, which was formed by a tunnel cut through the rock by the architect Cocceius, by command of Agrippa. At its entrance the tomb of Virgil is still shown.

Pauson (Παύσων), a Greek painter, who appears from the description of Aristotle (Poet. 2. § 2.) to have lived somewhat earlier than the time of this philosopher.

Pausŭlae (Pausulānus: Monte dell' Olmo), a town in the interior of Picenum, between Urbs Salvia and Asculum.

Păvor. [PALLOR.]

Pax, the goddess of Peace, called Irēne by the Greeks. [IRENE.]

Pax Jūlĭa or Pax Augusta (Beja), a Roman colony in Lusitania, and the seat of a Conventus juridicus, N. of Julia Myrtilis.

Paxi (Paxo and Antipaxo), the name of 2 small islands off the W. coast of Greece, between Corcyra and Leucas.

Pēdaeum or Pedaeus (Πήδαιον, accus., Hom. Il. xiii. 172), a town of the Troad.

Pēdălĭum (Πηδάλιον). 1. (C. Ghinazi), a promontory of Caria, on the W. side of the Sinus Glaucus, called also Artemisium from a temple of Artemis upon it. — 2. (Capo della Grega) a promontory on the E. side of Cyprus.

Pēdăsa (Πήδασα: Πηδασεύς, pl. Πηδασέες, Herod.), a very ancient city of Caria, was originally a chief abode of the Leleges. Alexander assigned it to Halicarnassus. At the time of the Roman empire it had entirely vanished, though its name was preserved in that of the district around its site, namely Pedăsis (Πηδασίς). Its locality is only known thus far, that it must have stood somewhere in the triangle formed by Miletus, Halicarnassus, and Stratonicea.

Pēdăsus (Πήδασος), a town of Mysia on the Satnioïs, mentioned several times by Homer. It was destroyed by the time of Strabo, who says that it was a settlement of the Leleges on M. Ida.

Pĕdĭānus, Asconĭus. [ASCONIUS.]

Pedius. 1. Q., the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, being the grandson of Julia, Caesar's eldest sister. He served under Caesar in Gaul as his legatus, B. C. 57. In 55, he was a candidate for the curule aedileship with Cn. Plancius and others, but he lost his election. In the civil war he fought on Caesar's side. He was praetor in 48, and in that year he defeated and slew Milo in the neighbourhood of Thurii. In 45, he served against the Pompeian party in Spain. In Caesar's will Pedius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and L. Pinarius, Octavius obtaining 3-4ths of the property, and the remaining 1-4th being divided between Pinarius and Pedius: the latter resigned his share of the inheritance to Octavius. After the fall of the consuls, Hirtius and Pansa, at the battle of Mutina in April, 43, Octavius marched upon Rome at the head of an army, and in the month of August he was elected consul along with Pedius. The latter forthwith proposed a law, known by the name of the Lex Pedia, by which all the murderers of Julius Caesar were punished with aquae et ignis interdictio. Pedius was left in charge of the city, while Octavius marched into the N. of Italy. He died towards the end of the year shortly after the news of the proscription had reached Rome. — 2. Sextus, a Roman jurist, frequently cited by Paulus and Ulpian. lived before the time of Hadrian.

Pednēlissus (Πεδνηλισσός), a city in the interior of Pisidia, and apparently on the Eurymedon, above Aspendus and Selge. It formed an independent state; but was almost constantly at war with Selge. Mr. Fellowes supposes its site to be marked by the ruins of the Roman period near Bolkas-Koi on the E. bank of the Eurymedon.

Pĕdo Albinovānus. [ALBINOVANUS.]

Peducaeus, Sex. 1. Propraetor in Sicily, B. C. 76 and 75, in the latter of which years Cicero served under him as quaestor. — 2. Son of the preceding, and an intimate friend of Atticus and Cicero. In the civil war Peducaeus sided with Caesar, by whom he was appointed in 48 to the government of Sardinia. In 39, he was propraetor in Spain.

Pedum (Pedānus: Gallicano), an ancient town of Latium on the Via Lavicana, which fell into decay at an early period.

Pegae. [PAGAE.]

Pēgăsis (Πηγασίς), i. e. sprung from Pegasus, was applied to the fountain Hippocrene, which was called forth by the hoof of Pegasus. The Muses are also called Pegasides, because the fountain Hippocrene was sacred to them.

Pēgăsus (Πήγασος). 1. The celebrated winged horse, whose origin is thus related. When Perseus struck off the head of Medusa, with whom Poseidon had had intercourse in the form of a horse or a bird, there sprang from her Chrysaor and the horse Pegasus. The latter received this name because he was believed to have made his appearance near the sources (πῆγαι) of Oceanus. He ascended to the seats of the immortals, and afterwards lived in the palace of Zeus, for whom he carried thunder and lightning. According to this view, which is apparently the most ancient, Pegasus was the thundering horse of Zeus; but later writers describe him as the horse of Eos (Aurora), and place him among the stars.—Pegasus also acts a prominent part in the combat of Bellerophon against the Chimaera. In order to kill the Chimaera, it was necessary for Bellerophon to obtain possession of Pegasus. For this purpose the soothsayer Polyidus at Corinth advised him to spend a night in the temple of Athena. As Bellerophon was asleep in the temple, the goddess appeared to him in a dream, commanding him to sacrifice to Poseidon, and gave him a golden bridle. When he awoke he found the bridle, offered the sacrifice, and caught Pegasus, while he was drinking at the well Pirene. According to some Athena herself tamed and bridled Pegasus, and surrendered him to Bellerophon. After he had conquered the Chimaera, he endeavoured to rise up to heaven upon his winged horse, but fell down upon the earth. [BELLEROPHON.] Pegasus however continued his flight to heaven. — Pegasus was also regarded as the horse of the Muses, and in this connection is more celebrated in modern times than in antiquity; for with the ancients he had no connection with the Muses, except producing with his hoof the inspiring fountain Hippocrene. The story about this fountain runs as follows. When the 9 Muses engaged in a contest with the 9 daughters of Pierus on Mt. Helicon, all beeame darkness when the daughters of Pierus began to sing; whereas during the song of the Muses, heaven, the sea, and all the rivers stood still to listen, and Helicon rose heavenward with delight, until Pegasus, on the advice of Poseidon, stopped its ascent by kicking it with his hoof. From this kick there arose Hippocrene, the inspiring well of the Muses, on Mt. Helicon, which, for this reason, Persius calls fons caballinus. Others again relate that Pegasus caused the well to gush forth because he was thirsty. Pegasus is often seen represented in ancient works of art along with Athena and Bellerophon. — 2. A Roman jurist, one of the followers or pupils of Proculus and praefectus urbi under Domitian (Juv. iv. 76). The Senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was passed in the time of Vespasian, when Pegasus was consul suffectus with Pusio, probably took its name from him.

Peiso Lacus. [PELSO LACUS.]

Pelagĭus, probably a native of Britain, celebrated as the propagator of those heretical opinions, which have derived their name from him, and which were opposed with great energy by his contemporaries Augustine and Jerome. He first appears in history about the beginning of the 5th century, when we find him residing at Rome. In the year 409 or 410, when Alaric was threatening the metropolis, Pelagius accompanied by his disciple and ardent admirer Coelestius, passed over to Sicily, from thence proceeded to Africa, and leaving Coelestius at Carthage, sailed for Palestine. The fame of his sanctity had preceded him, for upon his arrival he was received with great warmth by Jerome and many other distinguished fathers of the church. Soon afterwards the opinions of Pelagius were denounced as heretical; and in A. D. 417 Pelagius and Coelestius were anathematized by Pope Innocentius. A very few only of the numerous treatises of Pelagius have descended to us. They are printed with the works of Jerome.

Pelagŏnĭa (Πελαγονία : Πελάγονες, pl.). 1. A district in Macedonia. The Pelagones were an ancient people, probably of Pelasgic origin, and seem originally to have inhabited the valley of the Axius, since Homer calls Pelagon, a son of Axius. The Pelagones afterwards migrated W.-wards to the Erigon, the country around which received the name of Pelagonia, which thus lay S. of Paeonia. The chief town of this district was also called Pelagonia (now Vitolia or Monastir), which was under the Romans the capital of the 4th division of Macedonia. It was situated on the Via Egnatia not far from the narrow passes leading into Illyria. — 2. A district in Thessaly, called the Pelagonian Tripolis, because it consisted of the 3 towns of Azōrus, Pythium, and Doliche. It was situated W. of Olympus in the upper valley of the Titaresius, and belonged to Perrhaebia, whence these 3 towns are sometimes called the Perrhaebian Tripolis. Some of the Macedonian Pelagonians, who had been driven out of their homes by the Paeonians, migrated into this part of Thessaly, which was originally inhabited by Dorians.

Pĕlasgi (Πελασγοί), the earliest inhabitants of Greece who established the worship of the Dodonaean Zeus, Hephaestus, the Cabiri, and other divinities that belong to the earliest inhabitants of the country. They claimed descent from a mythical hero Pelasgus, of whom we have different accounts in the different parts of Greece inhabited by Pelasgians. The nation was widely spread over Greece and the islands of the Grecian archipelago; and the name of Pelasgia was given at one time to Greece. One of the most ancient traditions represented Pelasgus, as a descendant of Phoroneus, king of Argos; and it seems to have been generally believed by the Greeks that the Pelasgi spread from Argos to the other countries of Greece. Arcadia, Attica, Epirus and Thessaly, were, in addition to Argos, some of the principal seats of the Pelasgi. They were also found on the coasts of Asia Minor, and according to some writers in Italy as well. Of the language, habits, and civilisation of this people, we possess no certain knowledge. Herodotus says they spoke a barbarous language, that is, a language not Greek; but from the facility with which the Greek and Pelasgic languages coalesced in all parts of Greece, and from the fact that the Athenians and Arcadians are said to have been of pure Pelasgic origin, it is probable that the 2 languages had a close affinity. The Pelasgi are further said to have been an agricultural people, and to have possessed a considerable knowledge of the useful arts. The most ancient architectural remains of Greece, such as the treasury or tomb of Athens at Mycenae, are ascribed to the Pelasgians, and are cited as specimens of Pelasgian architecture, though there is no positive authority for these statements.

Pĕlasgĭa (Πελασγία), an ancient name of the islands of Delos and Lesbos, referring, of course, to their having been early seats of the Pelasgians.

Pelasgĭōtis (Πελασγιῶτις), a district in Thessaly, between Hestiaeotis and Magnesia. [THESSALIA.]

Pelasgus. [PELASGI.]

Pelendŏnes, a Celtiberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis between the sources of the Durius and the Iberus.

Pelethrŏnĭum (Πελεθρόνιον), a mountainous district in Thessaly, part of Mt. Pelion, where the Lapithae dwelt, and which is said to have derived its name from Pelethronius, king of the Lapithae, who invented the use of the bridle and the saddle.

Pĕleus (Πηλεύς), son of Aeacus and Endeis, was king of the Myrmidons at Phthia in Thessaly. He was a brother of Telamon, and step-brother of Phocus, the son of Aeacus, by the Nereid Psamathe. Peleus and Telamon resolved to get rid of Phocus, because he excelled them in their military games, and Telamon, or, according to others, Peleus, murdered their step-brother. The 2 brothers concealed their crime by removing the body of Phocus, but were nevertheless found out, and expelled by Aeacus from Aegina. Peleus went to Phthia in Thessaly, where he was purified from the murder by Eurytion, the son of Actor, married his daughter Antigone, and received with her a 3rd of Eurytion's kingdom. Others relate that he went to Ceyx at Trachis; and as he had come to Thessaly without companions, he prayed to Zeus for an army; and the god, to please Peleus, metamorphosed the ants (μύρμηκες) into men, who were accordingly called Myrmidons. Peleus accompanied Eurytion to the Calydonian hunt, and involuntarily killed him with his spear, in consequence of which he fled from Phthia to Iolcus, where he was again purified by Acastus, the king of the place. While residing at Iolcus, Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, fell in love with him; but as her proposals were rejected by Peleus, she accused him to her husband of having attempted her virtue. Acastus, unwilling to stain his hand with the blood of the man whom he had hospitably received, and whom he had purified from his guilt, took him to Mt. Pelion, where they hunted wild beasts; and when Peleus, overcome with fatigue, had fallen asleep, Acastus left him alone, and concealed his sword, that he might be destroyed by the wild beasts. When Peleus awoke and sought his sword, he was attacked by the Centaurs, but was saved by Chiron, who also restored to him his sword. There are some modifications of this account in other writers: instead of Astydamia, some mention Hippolyte, the daughter of Cretheus; and others relate that after Acastus had concealed the sword of Peleus, Chiron or Hermes brought him another, which had been made by Hephaestus. While on Mt. Pelion, Peleus married the Nereid Thetis, by whom he became the father of Achilles, though some regarded this Thetis as different from the marine divinity, and called her a daughter of Chiron. The gods took part in the marriage solemnity; Chiron presented Peleus with a lance, Poseidon with the immortal horses, Balius and Xanthus, and the other gods with arms. Eris or Strife was the only goddess who was not invited to the nuptials, and she revenged herself by throwing an apple among the guests, with the inscription "to the fairest." [PARIS.] Homer mentions Achilles as the only son of Peleus and Thetis, but later writers state that she had already destroyed by fire 6 children, of whom she was the mother by Peleus, and that as she attempted to make away with Achilles, her 7th child, she was prevented by Peleus. After this Peleus, who is also mentioned among the Argonauts, in conjunction with Jason and the Dioscuri, besieged Acastus and Iolcus, slew Astydamia, and over the scattered limbs of her body led his warriors into the city. The flocks of Peleus were at one time worried by a wolf, which Psamathe had sent to avenge the murder of her son Phocus, but she herself afterwards, on the request of Thetis, turned the animal into stone. Peleus, who had in former times joined Hercules in his expedition against Troy, was too old to accompany his son Achilles against that city: he remained at home and survived the death of his son.

Pĕlĭădes (Πελιάδες), the daughters of Pelias. See PELIAS.

Pĕlĭas (Πελίας), son of Poseidon and Tyro, a daughter of Salmoneus. Poseidon once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, with whom she was in love, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. To conceal her shame, their mother exposed the 2 boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learnt their parentage; and after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, to the exclusion of Aeson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro. Pelias soon afterwards expelled his own brother Neleus, and thus became sole ruler of Iolcos. After Pelias had long reigned over Iolcos, Jason, the son of Aeson, came to Iolcos and claimed the kingdom as his right. In order to get rid of him, Pelias sent him to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece. Hence arose the celebrated expedition of the Argonauts. After the return of Jason, Pelias was cut to pieces and boiled by his own daughters (the Peliades), who had been told by Medea that in this manner they might restore their father to vigour and youth. His son Acastus held funeral games in his honour at Iolcus, and expelled Jason and Medea from the country. [For details, see JASON; MEDEA; ARGONAUTAE.] The names of several of the daughters of Pelias are recorded. The most celebrated of them was Alcestis, the wife of Admetus, who is therefore called by Ovid Peliae gener.

Pēlīdes (Πηλείδης, Πηλείων), a patronymic from Peleus, generally given to his son Achilles, more rarely to his grandson Neoptolemus.

Pēligni, a brave and warlike people of Sabine origin in central Italy, bounded S.E. by the Marsi, N. by the Marrucini, S. by Samnium and the Frentani, and E. by the Frentani likewise. The climate of their country was cold (Hor. Carm. iii., 19. 8.); but it produced a considerable quantity of flax and was celebrated for its honey. The Peligni, like their neighbours, the Marsi, were regarded as magicians. Their principal towns were CORFINIUM and SULMO. They offered a brave resistance to the Romans, but concluded a peace with the republic along with their neighbours the Marsi, Marrucini and Frentani in B. C. 304. They took an active part in the Social war (90, 89), and their chief town Corfinium was destined by the allies to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome. They were subdued by Pompeius Strabo, after which time they are rarely mentioned.

Pĕlinaeus Mons (τὸ Πελιναῖον ὄρος, or Πελληναῖον: M. Elias), the highest mountain of the island of Chios, a little N. of the city of Chios, with a celebrated temple of Ζεὺς Πελιναῖος.

Pelinna, or more commonly Pelinnaeum (Πέλιννα, Πελινναῖον: Gardhiki), a town of Thessaly in Hestiaeotis, on the left bank of the Peneus, was taken by the Romans in their war with Antiochus.

Pēlion, more rarely Pēlios (τὸ Πήλιον ὄρος: Plessidhi or Zagora), a lofty range of mountains in Thessaly in the district of Magnesia, was situated between the lake Boebēis and the Pagasaean gulf, and formed the promontories of Sepias and Aeantium. Its sides were covered with wood, and on its summit was a temple of Zeus Actaeus, where the cold was so severe, that the persons who went in procession to this temple once a year wore thick skins to protect themselves. Mt. Pelion was celebrated in mythology. The giants in their war with the gods are said to have attempted to heap Ossa and Olympus on Pelion, or Pelion and Ossa on Olympus in order to scale heaven. Near the summit of this mountain was the cave of the Centaur Chiron, whose residence was probably placed here on account of the number of the medicinal plants which grew upon the mountain, since he was celebrated for his skill in medicine. On Pelion also the timber was felled, with which the ship Argo was built, whence Ovid applies the term Pelias arbor to this ship.

Pella (Πέλλα: Πελλαῖος, Pellaeus). 1. (Alaklisi), an ancient town of Macedonia in the district Bottiaea, was situated upon a hill, and upon a lake formed by the river Lydias, 120 stadia from its mouth. It continued to be a place of small importance till the time of Philip, who made it his residence and the capital of the Macedonian monarchy, and adorned it with many public buildings. It is frequently mentioned by subsequent writers on account of its being the birth-place of Alexander the Great. It was the capital of one of the 4 districts into which the Romans divided Macedonia [see p. 404, a.], and was subsequently made a Roman colony under the name of Col. Jul. Aug. Pella. — 2. (El-Bujeh ?), the S.-most of the 10 cities which composed the Decapolis in Peraea, that is in Palestine E. of the Jordan, stood 5 Roman miles S.E.

of Scythopolis, and was also called Βοῦτις. It was taken by Antiochus the Great, in the wars between Syria and Egypt, and was held by a Macedonian colony, till it was destroyed by Alexander Jannaeus on account of the refusal of its inhabitants to embrace the Jewish religion. It was restored and given back to its old inhabitants by Pompey. It was the place of refuge of the Christians who fled from Jerusalem before its capture by the Romans. The exact site of Pella is very uncertain. — 3. A city of Syria on the Orontes, formerly called Pharnace, was named Pella by the Macedonians, and afterwards APAMEA (No. 1.) — 4. In Phrygia. [PELTAE.]

Pellaeus Pagus was the name given by Alexander, after Pella in Macedonia, to the district of Susiana about the mouths of the Tigris; in which he built the city of Alexandria, afterwards called Charax.

Pellāna. [PELLENE, No. 2.]

Pellēnē (Πελλήνη, Dor. Πελλάνα: Πελληνεύς). 1. A city in Achaia bordering on Sicyonia, the most E.-ly of the 12 Achaean cities, was situated on a hill 60 stadia from the city, and was strongly fortified. Its port-town was Aristonautae. The ancients derived its name from the giant Pallas, or from the Argive Pellen, the son of Phorbas. It is mentioned in Homer; and the inhabitants of Scione in the peninsula of Pallene in Macedonia professed to be descended from the Pellenaeans in Achaia, who were shipwrecked on the Macedonian coast on their return from Troy. In the Peloponnesian war Pellene sided with Sparta. In the later wars of Greece between the Achaean and Aetolian leagues, the town was several times taken by the contending parties. — Between Pellene and Aegae there was a smaller town of the same name, where the celebrated Pellenian cloaks (Πελληνιακαὶ χλαῖναι) were made, which were given as prizes to the victors in the games at this place. — 2. Usually called Pellana, a town in Laconia on the Eurotas, about 50 stadia N.W. of Sparta, belonging to the Spartan Tripolis.

Pēlōdēs (Πηλώδης λιμήν, in App. Παλόεις: Armyro), a port-town belonging to Buthrotum in Epirus, and on a bay which probably bore the same name.

Pĕlŏpēa or Pelopīa (Πελόπεια), daughter of Thyestes, dwelt at Sicyon, where her father offered her violence, without knowing that she was his daughter. While pregnant by her father, she married her uncle Atreus. Shortly afterwards she bore a son Aegisthus, who eventually murdered Atreus. [For details, see AEGISTHUS.]

Pelŏpĭdas (Πελοπίδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Hippoclus, was descended from a noble family and inherited a large estate, of which he made a liberal use. He lived always in the closest friendship with Epaminondas, to whose simple frugality, as he could not persuade him to share his riches, he is said to have assimilated his own mode of life. He took a leading part in expelling the Spartans from Thebes, B.C. 379; and from this time until his death there was not a year in which he was not entrusted with some important command. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedaemonians, and joined Epaminondas in urging the expediency of immediate action. In 369, he was also one of the generals in the 1st invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans. Respecting his accusation on his return from this campaign, see p. 241, b. In 368 Pelopidas was sent again into Thessaly, on 2 separate occasions, in consequence of complaints against Alexander of Pherae. On his 1st expedition Alexander of Pherae sought safety in flight; and Pelopidas advanced into Macedonia to arbitrate between Alexander II. and Ptolemy of Alorus. Among the hostages whom he took with him from Macedonia was the famous Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. On his 2nd visit to Thessaly, Pelopidas went simply as an ambassador, not expecting any opposition, and unprovided with a military force. He was seized by Alexander of Pherae, and was kept in confinement at Pherae till his liberation in 367, by a Theban force under Epaminondas. In the same year in which he was released he was sent as ambassador to Susa, to counteract the Lacedaemonian and Athenian negotiations at the Persian court. In 364, the Thessalian towns again applied to Thebes for protection against Alexander, and Pelopidas was appointed to aid them. His forces, however, were dismayed by an eclipse of the sun (June 13), and, therefore, leaving them behind, he took with him into Thessaly only 300 horse. On his arrival at Pharsalus he collected a force which he deemed sufficient, and marched against Alexander, treating lightly the great disparity of numbers, and remarking that it was better as it was, since there would be more for him to conquer. At Cynoscephalae a battle ensued, in which Pelopidas drove the enemy from their ground, but he himself was slain as, burning with resentment, he pressed rashly forward to attack Alexander in person. The Thebans and Thessalians made great lamentations for his death, and the latter, having earnestly requested leave to bury him, celebrated his funeral with extraordinary splendour.

Pĕlŏponnēsus (ἡ Πελοπόννησος: Morea), the S. part of Greece or the peninsula, which was connected with Hellas proper by the isthmus of Corinth. It is said to have derived its name Peloponnesus or the "island of Pelops," from the mythical Pelops. [PELOPS.] This name does not occur in Homer. In his time the peninsula was sometimes called Apia, from Apis, son of Phoroneus, king of Argos, and sometimes Argos; which names were given to it on account of Argos being the chief power in Peloponnesus at that period. Peloponnesus was bounded on the N. by the Corinthian gulf, on the W. by the Ionian or Sicilian sea, on the S. by the Libyan, and on the W. by the Cretan and Myrtoan seas. On the E. and S. there are 3 great gulfs, the Argolic, Laconian, and Messenian. The ancients compared the shape of the country to the leaf of a plane tree; and its modern name, the Morea (ὁ Μωρέος), which first occurs in the 12th century of the Christian aera, was given it on account of its resemblance to a mulberry-leaf. Peloponnesus was divided into various provinces, all of which were bounded on one side by the sea, with the exception of ARCADIA, which was in the centre of the country. These provinces were ACHAIA in the N., ELIS in the W., MESSENIA in the W. and S., LACONIA in the S. and E., and CORINTHIA in the E. and N. An account of the geography of the peninsula is given under these names. The area of Peloponnesus is computed to be 7779 English miles; and it probably contained a population of upwards of a million in the flourishing period of Greek history. — Peloponnesus was originally inhabited by Pelesgians. Subsequently the Achaeans, who belonged to the Aeolic race, settled in the E. and S. parts of the peninsula, in Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia; and the Ionians in the N. part, in Achaia; while the remains of the original inhabitants of the country, the Pelasgians, collected chiefly in the central part, in Arcadia. Eighty years after the Trojan war, according to mythical chronology, the Dorians, under the conduct of the Heraclidae, invaded and conquered Peloponnesus, and established Doric states in Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia, from whence they extended their power over Corinth, Sicyon, and Megara. Part of the Achaean population remained in these provinces as tributary subjects to the Dorians under the name of Perioeci; while others of the Achaeans passed over to the N. of Peloponnesus, expelled the Ionians, and settled in this part of the country, which was called after them Achaia. The Aetolians, who had invaded Peloponnesus along with the Dorians, settled in Elis and became intermingled with the original inhabitants. The peninsula remained under Doric influence during the most important period of Greek history, and opposed to the great Ionic city of Athens. After the conquest of Messenia by the Spartans, it was under the supremacy of Sparta, till the overthrow of the power of the latter by the Thebans at the battle of Leuctra, B. C. 371.

Pĕlops (Πέλοψ), grandson of Zeus, and son of Tantalus and Dione, the daughter of Atlas. Some writers call his mother Euryanassa or Clytia. He was married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Atreus, Thyestes, Dias, Cynosurus, Corinthius, Hippalmus (Hippalcmus or Hippalcimus), Hippasus, Cleon, Argīus, Alcathous, Aelius, Pittheus, Troezen, Nicippe, and Lysidice. By Axioche or the nymph Danais he is said to have been the father of Chrysippus. Pelops was king of Pisa in Elis, and from him the great southern peninsula of Greece was believed to have derived its name Peloponnesus. According to a tradition which became very general in later times, Pelops was a Phrygian, who was expelled by Ilus from Phrygia (hence called by Ovid, Met. viii. 622, Pelopeïa arva), and thereupon migrated with his great wealth to Pisa. Others describe him as a Paphlagonian, and call the Paphlagonians themselves Πελοπήϊοι. Others again represent him as a native of Greece; and there can be little doubt that in the earliest traditions Pelops was described as a native of Greece and not as a foreign immigrant; and in them he is called the tamer of horses and the favourite of Poseidon. The legends about Pelops consist mainly of the story of his being cut to pieces and boiled, of his contest with Oenomaus and Hippodamia, and of his relation to his sons; to which we may add the honours paid to his remains. 1. Pelops cut to pieces and boiled (Κρεουργία Πέλοπος). Tantalus, the favourite of the gods, once invited them to a repast, and on that occasion killed his own son, and having boiled him set the flesh before them that they might eat it. But the immortal gods, knowing what it was, did not touch it; Demeter alone, being absorbed by grief for her lost daughter, consumed the shoulder of Pelops. Hereupon the gods ordered Hermes to put the limbs of Pelops into a cauldron, and thereby restore him to life. When the process was over, Clotho took him out of the cauldron, and as the shoulder consumed by Demeter was wanting, the goddess supplied its place by one made of ivory; his descendants (the Pelopidae), as a mark of their origin, were believed to have one shoulder as white as ivory. 2. Contest with Oenomaus and Hippodamia. As an oracle had declared to Oenomaus that he should be killed by his son-in-law, he refused giving his fair daughter Hippodamia in marriage to any one. But since many suitors appeared, Oenomaus declared that he would bestow her hand upon the man who should conquer him in the chariot-race, but that he should kill all who were defeated by him. Among other suitors Pelops also presented himself, but when he saw the heads of his conquered predecessors stuck up above the door of Oenomaus, he was seized with fear, and endeavoured to gain the favour of Myrtilus, the charioteer of Oenomaus, promising him half the kingdom if he would assist him in conquering his master. Myrtilus agreed, and left out the linch-pins of the chariot of Oenomaus. In the race the chariot of Oenomaus broke down, and he was thrown out and killed. Thus Hippodamia became the wife of Pelops. But as Pelops had now gained his object, he was unwilling to keep faith with Myrtilus; and accordingly as they were driving along a cliff he threw Myrtilus into the sea. As Myrtilus sank, he cursed Pelops and his whole race. Pelops returned with Hippodamia to Pisa in Elis, and soon also made himself master of Olympia, where he restored the Olympian games with greater splendour than they had ever been celebrated before. 3. The sons of Pelops. Chrysippus was the favourite of his father, and was in consequence envied by his brothers. The two eldest among them, Atreus and Thyestes, with the connivance of Hippodamia, accordingly murdered Chrysippus, and threw his body into a well. Pelops, who suspected his sons of the murder, expelled them from the country. Hippodamia, dreading the anger of her husband, fled to Midea in Argolis, from whence her remains were afterwards conveyed by Pelops to Olympia. Pelops, after his death, was honoured at Olympia above all other heroes. His tomb with an iron sarcophagus existed on the banks of the Alpheus, not far from the temple of Artemis near Pisa. The spot on which his sanctuary (Πελόπιον) stood in the Altis, was said to have been dedicated by Hercules, who also offered to him the first sacrifices. The magistrates of the Eleans likewise offered to him there an annual sacrifice, consisting of a black ram, with special ceremonies. The name of Pelops was so celebrated that it was constantly used by the poets in connection with his descendants and the cities they inhabited. Hence we find Atreus, the son of Pelops, called Pelopeïus Atreus, and Agamemnon, the grandson or great-grandson of Atreus, called Pelopeïus Agamemnon. In the same way Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, and Hermione, the wife of Menelaus, are each called by Ovid Pelopeïa virgo. Virgil (Aen. ii. 193) uses the phrase Pelopēa moenia to signify the cities in Peloponnesus, which Pelops and his descendants ruled over; and in like manner Mycenae is called by Ovid Pelopeïades Mycenae.

Pelōris, Pelōrias, or Pelōrus (Πελωρίς, Πελωριάς, Πέλωρος: C. Faro), the N.E. point of Sicily, was N.E. of Messana on the Fretum Siculum, and one of the 3 promontories which formed the triangular figure of the island. According to the usual story it derived its name from Pelorus, the pilot of Hannibal's ship, who was buried here after being killed by Hannibal in a fit of anger; but the name was more ancient than Hannibal's time, being mentioned by Thucydides. On the promontory there was a temple of Poseidon, and a tower, probably a light-house, from which the modern name of the Cape (Faro) appears to have come.

Pelōrus (Πέλωρος: prob. Lori or Luri), a river of Iberia in Asia, appears to have been a S. tributary of the Cyrus (Kour.)

Pelso or Peiso (Plattensee), a great lake in Pannonia, the waters of which were conducted into the Danube by the emperor Galerius, who thus gained a great quantity of fertile land for his newly formed province of Valeria.

Peltae (Πέλται: Πελτηνός), an ancient and flourishing city of Asia Minor, in the N. of Phrygia, 10 parasangs from Celaenae (Xenoph.), and no doubt the same place as the Pella of the Roman writers, 26 Roman miles N. or N.E. of Apamea Cibotus, to the conventus of which it belonged. The surrounding district is called by Strabo τὸ Πελτηνὸν πέδιον. Its site is uncertain. Some identify it with the ruins 8 miles S. of Sandakli; others with those near Ishekli.

Peltuīnum (Peltuīnas, -ātis: Monte Bello), a town of the Vestini in central Italy.

Pēlūsīum (Πηλούσιον: Egypt. Peremoun or Peromi; O. T. Sin.: all these names are derived from nouns meaning mud: Πηλουσιώτης; Pelusiōta: Tineh, Ru.), also called Abaris in early times, a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, stood on the E. side of the E.-most mouth of the Nile, which was called after it the Pelusiac mouth, 20 stadia (2 geog. miles) from the sea, in the midst of morasses, from which it obtained its name. As the key of Egypt on the N. E., and the frontier city towards Syria and Arabia, it was strongly fortified, and was the scene of many battles and sieges, in the wars of Egypt with Assyria, Persia, Syria, and Rome, from the defeat of Sennacherib near it by Sethon, down to its capture by Octavianus after the battle of Actium. In later times it was the capital of the district of Augustamnica. It was the birth-place of the geographer Claudius Ptolemaeus.

Pĕnātes, the household gods of the Romans, both those of a private family and of the state, as the great family of citizens. Hence we have to distinguish between private and public Penates. The name is connected with penus; and the images of those gods were kept in the penetralia, or the central part of the house. The Lares were included among the Penates; both names, in fact, are often used synonymously. The Lares, however, though included in the Penates, were not the only Penates; for each family had usually no more than one Lar, whereas the Penates are always spoken of in the plural. Since Jupiter and Juno were regarded as the protectors of happiness and peace in the family, these divinities were worshipped as Penates. Vesta was also reckoned among the Penates, for each hearth, being the symbol of domestic union, had its Vesta. All other Penates, both public and private, seem to have consisted of certain sacred relics connected with indefinite divinities, and hence Varro says that the number and names of the Penates were indefinite. Most ancient writers believe that the Penates of the state were brought by Aeneas from Troy into Italy, and were preserved first at Lavinium, afterwards at Alba Longa, and finally at Rome. At Rome they had a chapel near the centre of the city, in a place called sub Velia. As the public Lares were worshipped in the central part of the city, and at the public hearth, so the private Penates had their place at the hearth of every house; and the table also was sacred to them. On the hearth a perpetual fire was kept up in their honour, and the table always contained the salt-cellar and the firstlings of fruit for these divinities. Every meal that was taken in the house thus resembled a sacrifice offered to the Penates, beginning with a purification and ending with a libation which was poured either on the table or upon the hearth. After every absence from the hearth, the Penates were saluted like the living inhabitants of the house; and whoever went abroad prayed to the Penates and Lares for a happy return, and when he came back to his house, he hung up his armour, staff, and the like by the side of their images.

Pēnēis, that is, Daphne, daughter of the river-god Peneus.

Pēnĕlĕōs (Πηνέλεως), son of Hippalcmus and Asterope, and one of the Argonauts. He was the father of Opheltes, and is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. He was one of the leaders of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, where he slew Ilioneus and Lycon, and was wounded by Polydamas. He is said to have been slain by Eurypylus, the son of Telephus.

Pēnĕlŏpē (Πηνελόπη, Πενελόπη, Πηνελόπεια), daughter of Icarius and Periboea of Sparta, married Ulysses, king of Ithaca. [Respecting her marriage, see Icarius, No. 2.] By Ulysses she had an only child, Telemachus, who was an infant when her husband sailed against Troy. During the long absence of Ulysses she was beleaguered by numerous and importunate suitors, whom she deceived by declaring that she must finish a large robe which she was making for Laërtes, her aged father-in-law, before she could make up her mind. During the daytime she accordingly worked at the robe, and in the night she undid the work of the day. By this means she succeeded in putting off the suitors. But at length her stratagem was betrayed by her servants; and when, in consequence, the faithful Penelope was pressed more and more by the impatient suitors, Ulysses at length arrived in Ithaca, after an absence of 20 years. Having recognised her husband by several signs, she heartily welcomed him, and the days of her grief and sorrow were at an end. [Ulysses.] While Homer describes Penelope as a most chaste and faithful wife, some later writers charge her with the very opposite vice, and relate that by Hermes or by all the suitors together she became the mother of Pan. They add that Ulysses on his return repudiated her, whereupon she went to Sparta, and thence to Mantinea, where her tomb was shown in after-times. According to another tradition, she married Telegonus, after he had killed his father Ulysses.

Pēnēus (Πηνειός). 1. (Salambria or Salamria), the chief river of Thessaly, and one of the most important in all Greece, rises near Alalcomenae in Mt. Lacmon, a branch of Mt. Pindus, flows first S.E. and then N.E., and after receiving many affluents, of which the most important were the Enipeus, the Lethaeus, and the Titaresius, forces its way through the vale of Tempe between Mts.

Ossa and Olympus into the sea. [TEMPE.] As a god Peneus was called a son of Oceanus and Tethys. By the Naiad Creusa he became the father of Hypseus, Stilbe, and Daphne. Cyrene also is called by some his wife, and by others his daughter; and hence Peneus is described as the genitor of Aristaeus. — 2. (Gastuni), a river in Elis, which rises on the frontiers of Arcadia, flows by the town of Elis, and falls into the sea between the promontory Chelonatas and Ichthys.

Pēnīus, a little river of Pontus falling into the Euxine. (Ovid, Ex Ponto, iv. 10.)

Pennīnae Alpes. [ALPES.]

Pentăpŏlis (Πεντάπολις), the name for any association of 5 cities, was applied specifically to — 1. The 5 chief cities of Cyrenaïca in N. Africa, Cyrene, Berenice, Arsinoë, Ptolemaïs, and Apollonia, from which, under the Ptolemies, Cyrenaica received the name of Pentapolis, or Pentapolis Libyae, or, in the Roman writers, Pentapolitana Regio. When the name occurs alone, this is its usual meaning; the other applications of it are but rare. — 2. The 5 cities of the Philistines in the S. W. of Palestine, namely, Gaza, Ashdod (Azotus), Askalon, Gath, and Ekron. — 3. In the apocryphal Book of the Wisdom of Solomon (x. 6.) the name is applied to the 5 "cities of the plain" of the southern Jordan, Sodom, Gomorrha, Adama, Zeboïm, and Zoar, all of which (except the last, which was spared at the intercession of Lot) were overthrown by fire from heaven, and the valley in which they stood was buried beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

Pentelēum (Πεντέλειον), a fortified place in the N. of Arcadia near Pheneus.

Pentĕlĭcus Mons (τὸ Πεντελικὸν ὄρος: Penteli), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble, which derived its name from the demus of Pentĕle (Πεντέλη), lying on its S. slope. It is a branch of Mt. Parnes, from which it runs in a S.E.-ly direction between Athens and Marathon to the coast. It is probably the same as the mountain called Brilessus (Βριλησσός) by Thucydides and others.

Penthĕsĭlēa (Πενθεσίλεια), daughter of Ares and Otrera, and queen of the Amazons. After the death of Hector, she came to the assistance of the Trojans, but was slain by Achilles, who mourned over the dying queen on account of her beauty, youth and valour. Thersites ridiculed the grief of Achilles, and was in consequence killed by the hero. Thereupon Diomedes, a relative of Thersites, threw the body of Penthesilea into the river Scamander; but, according to others, Achilles himself buried it on the banks of the Xanthus.

Pentheus (Πενθεύς), son of Echīon and Agāve, the daughter of Cadmus. He succeeded Cadmus as king of Thebes; and having resisted the introduction of the worship of Dionysus into his kingdom, he was driven mad by the god, his palace was hurled to the ground, and he himself was torn to pieces by his own mother and her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, who in their Bacchic frenzy believed him to be a wild beast. The place where Pentheus suffered death, is said to have been Mt. Cithaeron or Mt. Parnassus. It is related that Pentheus got upon a tree, for the purpose of witnessing in secret the revelry of the Bacchic women, but on being discovered by them was torn to pieces. According to a Corinthian tradition, the women were afterwards commanded by an oracle to discover that tree, and to worship it like the god Dionysus; and accordingly out of the tree two carved images of the god were made. The tragic fate of Pentheus forms the subject of the Bacchae of Euripides.

Penthĭlus (Πένθιλος), son of Orestes and Erigone, is said to have led a colony of Aeolians to Thrace. He was the father of Echelatus and Damasias.

Pentri, one of the most important of the tribes in Samnium, were conquered by the Romans along with the other Samnites, and were the only one of the Samnite tribes who remained faithful to the Romans when the rest of the nation revolted to Hannibal in the 2nd Punic war. Their chief town was BOVIANUM.

Peor, a mountain of Palestine, in the land of Moab, only mentioned in the Pentateuch. It was probably one of the summits of the mountains called Abarim, which ran N. and S. through Moabitis, along the E. side of the valley of the southern Jordan and the Dead Sea.

Pĕos Artĕmĭdos (Πέος, probably corrupted from Σπέος, cave, Ἀρτεμίδος: Beni Hassan, Ru.), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on the E. bank of the Nile, nearly opposite to Hermopolis the Great on the W. bank. It is remarkable as the site of the most extensive rock-hewn catacombs in all Egypt, the walls of which are covered with sculptures and paintings of the greatest importance for elucidating Egyptian antiquities.

Peparēthus (Πεπάρηθος: Πεπαρήθιος: Piperi), a small island in the Aegaean sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and E. of Halonesus, with a town of the same name upon it and 2 other small places. It produced a considerable quantity of wine. It is mentioned in connection with Halonesus in the war between Philip and the Athenians. [HALONESUS.]

Pephrēdo (Πεφρηδώ). [GRAEAE.]

Pepūza (Πέπουζα: Ru. near Besh-Shehr), a city in the W. of Phrygia, of some note in ecclesiastical history.

Pĕraea (ἡ Περαία, sc. γῆ or χώρα, the country on the opposite side), a general name for any district belonging to or closely connected with a country, from the main part of which it was separated by a sea or river, was used specifically for — 1. The part of Palestine E. of the Jordan in general, but usually, in a more restricted sense, for a part of that region, namely, the district between the rivers Hieromax on the N., and Arnon on the S. Respecting its political connections with the rest of the country, see PALAESTINA. — 2. Peraea Rhodiorum (ἡ περαία τῶν Ῥοδίων), also called the Rhodian Chersonese, a district in the S. of Caria, opposite to the island of Rhodes, from Mt. Phoenix on the W. to the frontier of Lycia on the E. This strip of coast, which was reckoned 1500 stadia in length (by sea), and was regarded as one of the finest spots on the earth, was colonised by the Rhodians at an early period, and was always in close political connection with Rhodes even under the successive rulers of Caria; and, after the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190, it was assigned, with the whole of Carian Doris, to the independent republic of the Rhodians. [RHODUS.]—3. P. Tenediōrum (περαία Τενεδίων), a strip of the W. coast of Mysia, opposite to the island of Tenedos, between C. Sigeum on the N., and Alexandria Troas on the S. — 4. A city on the W. coast of Mysia, near Adramyttium, one of the colonies of the Mytilenaeans, and not improbably preserving in its name that of a district once called Peraea Mytilenaeorum; for the people of Mytilene are known to have had many settlements on this coast.

Percōtē (Περκώτη, formerly Περκώπη, according to Strabo: Borgas or Burgus, Turk., and Percate, Grk.), a very ancient city of Mysia, between Abydos and Lampsacus, near the Hellespont, on a river called Percates, in a beautiful situation. It is mentioned by Homer.

Perdiccas (Περδίκκας) 1. I. The founder of the Macedonian monarchy, according to Herodotus, though later writers represent Caranus as the 1st king of Macedonia, and make Perdiccas only the 4th. [CARANUS.] According to Herodotus, Perdiccas and his two brothers, Gauanes and Aëropus, were Argives of the race of Temenus, who settled near Mt. Bermius, from whence they subdued the rest of Macedonia (Herod. viii. 137, 138). It is clear, however, that the dominions of Perdiccas and his immediate successors, comprised but a very small part of the country subsequently known under that name. Perdiccas was succeeded by his son Argaeus. — 2. II. King of Macedonia, from about B. C. 454 to 413, was the son and successor of Alexander I. Shortly before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war Perdiccas was at war with the Athenians, who sent a force to support his brother Philip, and Derdas, a Macedonian chieftain, against the king, while the latter espoused the cause of Potidaea, which had shaken off the Athenian yoke, B. C. 432. In the following year peace was concluded between Perdiccas and the Athenians, but it did not last long, and he was during the greater part of his reign on hostile terms with the Athenians. In 429 his dominions were invaded by Sitalces, king of the powerful Thracian tribe of the Odrysians, but the enemy was compelled, by want of provisions, to return home. It was in great part at his instigation that Brasidas in 424 set out on his celebrated expedition to Macedonia and Thrace. In the following year (423) however a misunderstanding arose between him and Brasidas; in consequence of which he abandoned the Spartan alliance, and concluded peace with Athens. Subsequently we find him at one time in alliance with the Spartans, and at another time with the Athenians; and it is evident that he joined one or other of the belligerent parties according to the dictates of his own interest at the moment. — 3. III. King of Macedonia, B. C. 364—359, was the second son of Amyntas II., by his wife Eurydice. On the assassination of his brother Alexander II., by Ptolemy of Alorus, 367, the crown of Macedonia devolved upon him by hereditary right, but Ptolemy virtually enjoyed the sovereign power as guardian of Perdiccas till 364, when the latter caused Ptolemy to be put to death, and took the government into his own hands. Of the reign of Perdiccas we have very little information. We learn only that he was at one time engaged in hostilities with Athens on account of Amphipolis, and that he was distinguished for his patronage of men of letters. He fell in battle against the Illyrians, 359. — 4. Son of Orontes, a Macedonian of the province of Orestis, was one of the most distinguished of the generals of Alexander the Great. He accompanied Alexander throughout his campaigns in Asia; and the king on his death-bed is said to have taken the royal signet ring from his finger and given it to Perdiccas. After the death of the king (323), Perdiccas had the chief authority entrusted to him under the command of the new king Arrhidaeus, who was a mere puppet in his hands, and he still further strengthened his power by the assassination of his rival Meleager. [MELEAGER.] The other generals of Alexander regarded him with fear and suspicion; and at length his ambitious schemes induced Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, to unite in a league and declare open war against Perdiccas. Thus assailed on all sides, Perdiccas determined to leave Eumenes in Asia Minor, to make head against their common enemies in that quarter, while he himself marched into Egypt against Ptolemy. He advanced without opposition as far as Pelusium, but found the banks of the Nile strongly fortified and guarded by Ptolemy, and was repulsed in repeated attempts to force the passage of the river; in the last of which, near Memphis, he lost great numbers of men. Thereupon his troops, who had long been discontented with Perdiccas, rose in mutiny and put him to death in his own tent.

Perdix (Πέρδιξ), the sister of Daedalus, and mother of Talos, or according to others, the sister's son of Daedalus, figures in the mythological period of Greek art, as the inventor of various implements, chiefly for working in wood. Perdix is sometimes confounded with Talos or Calos, and it is best to regard the various legends respecting Perdix, Talos, and Calos, as referring to one and the same person, namely, according to the mythographers, a nephew of Daedalus. The inventions ascribed to him are: the saw, the idea of which is said to have been suggested to him by the back-bone of a fish, or the teeth of a serpent; the chisel; the compasses; the potter's wheel. His skill excited the jealousy of Daedalus, who threw him headlong from the temple of Athena on the Acropolis, but the goddess caught him in his fall, and changed him into the bird which was named after him, perdix, the partridge.

Peregrīnus Proteus, a cynic philosopher, born at Parium, on the Hellespont, flourished in the reign of the Antonines. After a youth spent in debauchery and crimes, he visited Palestine, where he turned Christian, and by dint of hypocrisy attained to some authority in the Church. He next assumed the cynic garb, and returned to his native town, where, to obliterate the memory of his crimes, he divided his inheritance among the populace. He again set out on his travels, and after visiting many places, and adopting every method to make himself conspicuous, he at length resolved on publicly burning himself at the Olympic games; and carried his resolution into effect in the 236th Olympiad, A. D. 165. Lucian, who knew Peregrinus, and who was present at his strange self-immolation, has left us an account of his life.

Pĕrenna, Anna. [ANNA.]

Perennis, succeeded Paternus in A. D. 183, as sole praefect of the praetorians, and Commodus being completely sunk in debauchery and sloth, virtually ruled the empire. Having, however, rendered himself obnoxious to the soldiery, he was put to death by them in 186 or 187. Dion Cassius represents Perennis as a man of a pure and upright life; but the other historians charge him with having encouraged the emperor in all his excesses, and urged him on in his career of profligacy.

Perga (Πέργη: Περγαῖος: Murtana, Ru.), an ancient and important city of Pamphylia, lay a little inland, N. E. of Attalia, between the rivers Catarrhactes and Cestrus, 60 stadia (6 geog. miles) from the mouth of the former. It was a celebrated seat of the worship of Artemis. On an eminence near the city stood a very ancient and renowned temple of the goddess, at which a yearly festival was celebrated; and the coins of Perga bear images of the goddess and her temple. Under the later Roman empire, it was the capital of Pamphylia Secunda. It was the first place in Asia Minor visited by the apostle Paul on his first missionary journey (Acts, xiii. 13.; see also xiv. 25). Splendid ruins of the city are still visible about 16 miles N. E. of Adalia.

Pergăma and Pergămĭa [Pergamon, No. 1].

Pergămon or -um, Pergămos or -us (τὸ Πέργαμον, ἡ Πέργαμος: the former by far the most usual form in the classical writers, though the latter is more common in English, probably on account of its use in our version of the Bible, Rev. ii. 13.; in Latin it seldom occurs in the nominative, but, when used, the form is Pergamum: Περγαμηνός, Pergamēnus. The word is significant, connected with πύργος, a tower; it is used in the plural form, πέργαμα, as a common noun by Aeschylus, Prom. 956; Euripides, Phoen. 1098, 1176). — 1. The citadel of Troy, and used poetically for Troy itself: the poets also use the forms Pergăma (τὰ Πέργαμα) and Pergamia (ἡ Περγαμία, sc. πόλις): the king of Troy, Laomedon, is called Περγαμίδης, and the Romans are spoken of by Silius Italicus as "sanguis Pergameus." — 2. (Bergama or Pergamo, Ru.), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Pergamus, and afterwards of the Roman province of Asia, was situated in the district of S. Mysia called Teuthrania, in one of the most beautiful and fertile vallies in the world. It stood on the N. bank of the river Caïcus, at a spot where that river receives the united waters of 2 small tributaries, the Selinus, which flowed through the city, and the Cetius, which washed its walls. The navigable river Caïcus connected it with the sea, at the Elaïtic Gulf, from which its distance was somewhat less than 20 miles. It was built at the foot, and on the lowest slopes, of 2 steep hills, on one of which the ruins of the acropolis are still visible, and in the plain below are the remains of the Asclepieum and other temples, of the stadium, the theatre, and the amphitheatre, and of other buildings. The origin of the city is lost in mythical traditions, which ascribed its foundation to a colony from Arcadia under the Heracleid Telephus, and its name to Pergamus, a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache, who made himself king of Teuthrania by killing the king Arius in single combat. There is also a tradition, that a colony of Epidaurians settled here under Asclepius. At all events, it was already, in the time of Xenophon, a very ancient city, with a mixed population of Teuthranians and Greeks; but it was not a place of much importance until the time of the successors of Alexander. After the defeat of Antigonus at Ipsus, in 301, the N.W. part of Asia Minor was united to the Thracian kingdom of Lysimachus, who enlarged and beautified the city of Pergamus, and used it as a treasury on account of its strength as a fortress. The command of the fortress was entrusted to Philetaerus, who, towards the end of the reign of Lysimachus, revolted to Seleucus, king of Syria, retaining, however, the fortress of Pergamus in his own hands; and upon the death of Seleucus, in 280, Philetaerus established himself as an independent ruler. This is the date of the commencement of the kingdom of Pergamus, though the royal title was only assumed by the second successor of Philetaerus, Attalus I., after his great victory over the Gauls. The successive kings of Pergamus were: Philetaerus, 280—263; Eumenes I., 263—241; Attalus I., 241—197; Eumenes II., 197—159; Attalus II. Philadelphus, 159—138; Attalus III. Philometor, 138—133. For the outline of their history, see the articles. The kingdom reached its greatest extent after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans, in B.C. 190, when the Romans bestowed upon Eumenes II. the whole of Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygias, Lycaonia, Pisidia and Pamphylia. It was under the same king that Pergamus reached the height of its splendour, and that the celebrated library was founded, which for a long time rivalled that of Alexandria, and the formation of which occasioned the invention of parchment, charta Pergamena. This library was afterwards united to that of Alexandria, having been presented by Antony to Cleopatra. During its existence at Pergamus, it formed the centre of a great school of literature, which rivalled that of Alexandria. On the death of Attalus III. in B. C. 133, the kingdom, by a bequest in his will, passed to the Romans, who took possession of it in 130 after a contest with the usurper Aristonicus, and erected it into the province of Asia, with the city of Pergamus for its capital, which continued in such prosperity, that Pliny calls it "longe clarissimum Asiae." The city was an early seat of Christianity, and is one of the Seven Churches of Asia, to whom the apocalyptic epistles are addressed. St. John describes it as the scene of a persecution of Christianity, and the seat of gross idolatry, which had even infected the Church. The expression "where Satan's seat is" is thought by some to refer to the worship of the serpent, as the symbol of Asclepius, the patron god of the city. Under the Byzantine emperors, the capital of the province of Asia was transferred to Ephesus, and Pergamus lost much of its importance. Among the celebrated natives of the city were the rhetorician Apollodorus and the physician Galen. — 2. A very ancient city of Crete, the foundation of which was ascribed to the Trojans who survived their city. The legislator Lycurgus was said to have died here, and his grave was shown. The site of the city is doubtful. Some place it at Perama, others at Platania.

Pĕriander (Περίανδρος). 1. Son of Cypselus, whom he succeeded as tyrant of Corinth, B. C. 625, and reigned 40 years, to B. C. 585. His rule was mild and beneficent at first, but afterwards became oppressive. According to the common story this change was owing to the advice of Thrasybulus, tyrant of Miletus, whom Periander had consulted on the best mode of maintaining his power, and who is said to have taken the messenger through a corn-field, cutting off, as he went, the tallest ears, and then to have dismissed him without committing himself to a verbal answer. The action, however, was rightly interpreted by Periander, who proceeded to rid himself of the most powerful nobles in the state. He made his power respected abroad as well as at home; and besides his conquest of Epidaurus, mentioned below, he kept Corcyra in subjection. He was, like many of the other Greek tyrants, a patron of literature and philosophy; and Arion and Anacharsis were in favour at his court. He was very commonly reckoned among the Seven Sages, though by some he was excluded from their number, and Myson of Chenae in Laconia was substituted in his room. The private life of Periander was marked by misfortune and cruelty. He married Melissa, daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus. She bore him two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and was passionately beloved by him; but he is said to have killed her by a blow during her pregnancy, having been roused to a fit of anger by a false accusation brought against her. His wife's death embittered the remainder of his days, partly through the remorse which he felt for the deed, partly through the alienation of his younger son Lycophron, inexorably exasperated by his mother's fate. The young man's anger had been chiefly excited by Procles, and Periander in revenge attacked Epidaurus, and, having reduced it, took his father-in-law prisoner. Periander sent Lycophron to Corcyra; but when he was himself advanced in years, he summoned Lycophron back to Corinth to succeed to the tyranny, seeing that Cypselus, his elder son, was unfit to hold it, from deficiency of understanding. Lycophron refused to return to Corinth, as long as his father was there. Thereupon Periander offered to withdraw to Corcyra, if Lycophron would come home and take the government. To this he assented; but the Corcyraeans, not wishing to have Periander among them, put Lycophron to death. Periander shortly afterwards died of despondency, at the age of 80, and after a reign of 40 years, according to Diogenes Laërtius. He was succeeded by a relative, Psammetichus, son of Gordias. — 2. Tyrant of Ambracia, was contemporary with his more famous namesake of Corinth, to whom he was also related, being the son of Gorgus, who was son or brother to Cypselus. Periander was deposed by the people, probably after the death of the Corinthian tyrant (585).

Pĕrĭboea (Περίβοια). 1. Wife of Icarius, and mother of Penelope. [Icarius, No. 2.] — 2. Daughter of Alcathous, and wife of Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Ajax and Teucer. Some writers call her Eriboea. — 3. Daughter of Hipponous, and wife of Oeneus, by whom she became the mother of Tydeus. [Oeneus.] — 4. Wife of king Polybus of Corinth.

Pĕrĭcles (Περικλῆς). 1. The greatest of Athenian statesmen, was the son of Xanthippus, and Agariste, both of whom belonged to the noblest families of Athens. The fortune of his parents procured for him a careful education, which his extraordinary abilities and diligence turned to the best account. He received instruction from Damon, Zeno of Elea, and Anaxagoras. With Anaxagoras he lived on terms of the most intimate friendship, till the philosopher was compelled to retire from Athens. From this great and original thinker Pericles was believed to have derived not only the cast of his mind, but the character of his eloquence, which, in the elevation of its sentiments, and the purity and loftiness of its style, was the fitting expression of the force and dignity of his character and the grandeur of his conceptions. Of the oratory of Pericles no specimens remain to us, but it is described by ancient writers as characterised by singular force and energy. He was described as thundering and lightning when he spoke, and as carrying the weapons of Zeus upon his tongue. — In B.C. 469, Pericles began to take part in public affairs, 40 years before his death, and was soon regarded as the head of the more democratical part in the state, in opposition to Cimon. He gained the favour of the people by the laws which he got passed for their benefit. Thus it was enacted through his means that the citizens should receive from the public treasury the price of their admittance to the theatre, amounting to 2 oboli apiece; that those who served in the courts of the Heliaea should be paid for their attendance; and that those citizens who served as soldiers should likewise be paid. It was at his instigation that his friend Ephialtes proposed in 461 the measure by which the Areopagus was deprived of those functions which rendered it formidable as an antagonist to the democratical party. This success was followed by the ostracism of Cimon, who was charged with Laconism; and Pericles was thus placed at the head of public affairs at Athens. Pericles was distinguished as a general as well as a statesman, and frequently commanded the Athenian armies in their wars with the neighbouring states. In 454 he commanded the Athenians in their campaigns against the Sicyonians and Acarnanians; in 448 he led the army which assisted the Phocians in the Sacred War; and in 445 he rendered the most signal service to the state by recovering the island of Euboea, which had revolted from Athens. Cimon had been previously recalled from exile, without any opposition from Pericles, but had died in 449. On his death the aristocratical party was headed by Thucydides, the son of Melesias, but on the ostracism of the latter in 444, the organized opposition of the aristocratical party was broken up, and Pericles was left without a rival. Throughout the remainder of his political course no one appeared to contest his supremacy; but the boundless influence which he possessed was never perverted by him to sinister or unworthy purposes. So far from being a mere selfish demagogue, he neither indulged nor courted the multitude. The next important event in which Pericles was engaged was the war against Samos, which had revolted from Athens, and which he subdued after an arduous campaign, 440. The poet Sophocles was one of the generals who fought with Pericles against Samos. For the next 10 years till the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians were not engaged in any considerable military operations. During this period Pericles devoted especial attention to the Athenian navy, as her supremacy rested on her maritime superiority, and he adopted various judicious means for consolidating and strengthening her empire over the islands of the Aegaean. The funds derived from the tribute of the allies and from other sources were to a large extent devoted by him to the erection of those magnificent temples and public buildings which rendered Athens the wonder and admiration of Greece. Under his administration the Propylaea, and the Parthenon, and the Odeum were erected, as well as numerous other temples and public buildings. With the stimulus afforded by these works architecture and sculpture reached their highest perfection, and some of the greatest artists of antiquity were employed in erecting or adorning the buildings. The chief direction and oversight of the public edifices was entrusted to Phidias. [PHIDIAS.] These works calling into activity almost every branch of industry and commerce at Athens, diffused universal prosperity while they proceeded, and thus contributed in this, as well as in other ways, to maintain the popularity and influence of Pericles. But he still had many enemies, who were not slow to impute to him base and unworthy motives. From the comic poets Pericles had to sustain numerous attacks. They exaggerated his power, spoke of his party as Pisistratids, and called upon him to swear that he was not about to assume the tyranny. His high character and strict probity, however, rendered all these attacks harmless. But as his enemies were unable to ruin his reputation by these means, they attacked him through his friends. His friends Phidias and Anaxagoras, and his mistress Aspasia were all accused before the people. Phidias was condemned and cast into prison [PHIDIAS]; Anaxagoras was also sentenced to pay a fine and quit Athens [ANAXAGORAS]; and Aspasia was only acquitted through the entreaties and tears of Pericles. — The Peloponnesian war has been falsely ascribed to the ambitious schemes of Pericles. It is true that he counselled the Athenians not to yield to the demands of the Lacedaemonians, and he pointed out the immense advantages which the Athenians possessed in carrying on the war; but he did this because he saw that war was inevitable; and that as long as Athens retained the great power which she then possessed, Sparta would never rest contented. On the outbreak of the war in 431 a Peloponnesian army under Archidamus invaded Attica; and upon his advice the Athenians conveyed their moveable property into the city, and their cattle and beasts of burden to Euboea, and allowed the Peloponnesians to desolate Attica without opposition. Next year (430), when the Peloponnesians again invaded Attica, Pericles pursued the same policy as before. In this summer the plague made its appearance in Athens. The Athenians, being exposed to the devastation of the war and the plague at the same time, began to turn their thoughts to peace, and looked upon Pericles as the author of all their distresses, inasmuch as he had persuaded them to go to war. Pericles attempted to calm the public ferment; but such was the irritation against him, that he was sentenced to pay a fine. The ill feeling of the people having found this vent, Pericles soon resumed his accustomed sway, and was again elected one of the generals for the ensuing year (429). Meantime Pericles had suffered in common with his fellow-citizens. The plague carried off most of his near connections. His son Xanthippus, a profligate and undutiful youth, his sister, and most of his intimate friends died of it. Still he maintained unmoved his calm bearing and philosophic composure. At last his only surviving legitimate son, Paralus, a youth of greater promise than his brother, fell a victim. The firmness of Pericles then at last gave way; as he placed the funeral garland on the head of the lifeless youth he burst into tears and sobbed aloud. He had one son remaining, his child by Aspasia; and he was allowed to enrol this son in his own tribe and give him his own name. In the autumn of 429 Pericles himself died of a lingering sickness. When at the point of death, as his friends were gathered round his bed, recalling his virtues and enumerating his triumphs, Pericles overhearing their remarks, said that they had forgotten his greatest praise: that no Athenian through his means had been made to put on mourning. He survived the commencement of the war 2 years and 6 months. The name of the wife of Pericles is not mentioned. She had been the wife of Hipponicus, by whom she was the mother of Callias. She bore two sons to Pericles, Xanthippus and Paralus. She lived unhappily with Pericles, and a divorce took place by mutual consent, when Pericles connected himself with Aspasia. Of his strict probity he left the decisive proof in the fact that at his death he was found not to have added a single drachma to his hereditary property. — 2. Son of the preceding, by Aspasia, was one of the generals at the battle of Arginusae, and was put to death by the Athenians with the other generals, 406.

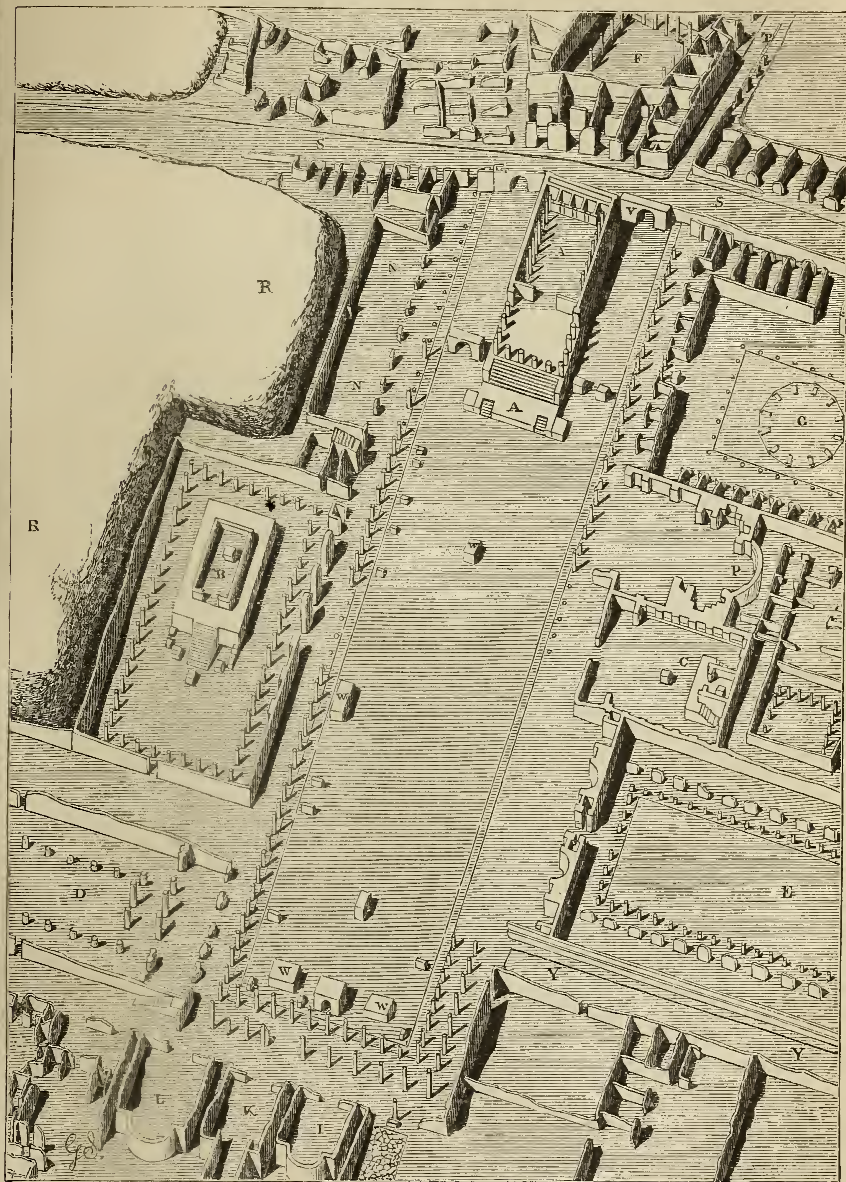
Pĕrĭclymĕnus (Περικλύμενος). 1. One of the Argonauts, was son of Neleus and Chloris, and brother of Nestor. Poseidon gave him the power of changing himself into different forms, and conferred upon him great strength, but he was nevertheless slain by Hercules at the capture of Pylos. — 2. Son of Poseidon and Chloris, the daughter of Tiresias, of Thebes. In the war of the Seven against Thebes he was believed to have killed Parthenopaeus; and when he pursued Amphiaraus, the latter by the command of Zeus was swallowed up by the earth.



Pĕrĭēres (Περιήρης), son of Aeolus and Enarete, king of Messene, was the father of Aphareus and Leucippus by Gorgophone. In some traditions Perieres was called a son of Cynortas, and besides the sons above mentioned he is said to have been the father of Tyndareos and Icarius.

Pĕrĭlāus (Περίλαος), son of Icarius and Periboea, and a brother of Penelope.

Pĕrillus (Πέριλλος), a statuary, was the maker of the bronze bull of the tyrant Phalaris, respecting which see further under PHALARIS. Like the makers of other instruments of death, Perillus is said to have become one of the victims of his own handiwork.

Pĕrinthus (Πέρινθος: Περίνθιος: Eski Eregli), an important town in Thrace on the Propontis, was founded by the Samians about B. C. 559. It was situated 22 miles W. of Selymbria on a small peninsula, and was built on the slope of a hill with rows of houses rising above each other like seats in an amphitheatre. It is celebrated for the obstinate resistance which it offered to Philip of Macedon, at which time it was a more powerful place than Byzantium. Under the Romans it still continued to be a flourishing town, being the point at which most of the roads met leading to Byzantium. The commercial importance of the town is attested by its numerous coins which are still extant. At a later time, but not earlier than the 4th century of the Christian aera, we find it called Heraclea, which occurs sometimes alone without any addition and sometimes in the form of Heraclea Thraciae or Heraclea Perinthus.

Pĕrĭphas (Περίφας), an Attic autochthon, previous to the time of Cecrops, was a priest of Apollo, and on account of his virtues was made king of the country. In consequence of the honours paid to him, Zeus wished to destroy him; but at the request of Apollo he was metamorphosed by Zeus into an eagle, and his wife into a bird.

Pĕrĭphētes (Περιφήτης), son of Hephaestus and Anticlēa, surnamed Corynetes, that is, Club-bearer, was a robber at Epidaurus, who slew travellers with an iron club. Theseus at last killed him and took his club for his own use.

Permessus (Περμησσός: Kefalari), a river in Boeotia, which descends from Mt. Helicon, unites with the Olmius, and falls into the lake Copais near Haliartus.

Pernē (Πέρνη), a little island off the coast of Ionia, opposite to the territory of Miletus, to which an earthquake united it.

Pēro (Πηρώ), daughter of Neleus and Chloris, was married to Bias, and celebrated for her beauty.

Perperēna (Περπερήνα, and other forms), a small town of Mysia, S. of Adramyttium, in the neighbourhood of which there were copper-mines and celebrated vineyards. It was said to be the place at which Thucydides died.

Perperna or Perpenna (the former is the preferable form). 1. M., praetor B.C. 135, when he carried on war against the slaves in Sicily; and consul 130, when he defeated Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died near Pergamum on his return to Rome in 129. — 2. M., son of the last, consul 92, and censor 86. He is mentioned by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of longevity. He attained the age of 98 years, and died in 49, the year in which the civil war broke out between Caesar and Pompey. He took no prominent part in the agitated times in which he lived. — 3. M. Perperna Vento, son of the last, joined the Marian party in the civil war, and was raised to the praetorship. After the conquest of Italy by Sulla, in 82, Perperna fled to Sicily, which he quitted however upon the arrival of Pompey shortly afterwards. On the death of Sulla, in 78, Perperna joined the consul M. Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the new aristocratical constitution, and retired with him to Sardinia on the failure of this attempt. Lepidus died in Sardinia in the following year, 77, and Perperna with the remains of his army crossed over to Spain and joined Sertorius. Perperna was jealous of the ascendancy of Sertorius, and after serving under him some years he and his friends assassinated Sertorius at a banquet in 72. His death soon brought the war to a close. Perperna was defeated by Pompey, was taken prisoner, and was put to death.

Perrhaebi (Περῤῥαιβοί or Περαιβοί), a powerful and warlike Pelasgic people, who, according to Strabo, migrated from Euboea to the mainland, and settled in the districts of Hestiaeotis and Pelasgiotis in Thessaly. Hence the northern part of this country is frequently called Perrhaebia (Περῤῥαιβία, Περαιβία), though it never formed one of the regular Thessalian provinces. Homer places the Perrhaebi in the neighbourhood of the Thessalian Dodona and the river Titaresius; and at a later time the name of Perrhaebia was applied to the district bounded by Macedonia and the Cambunian mountains on the N., by Pindus on the W., by the Peneus on the S. and S.E., and by the Peneus and Ossa on the E. The Perrhaebi were members of the Amphictyonic league. At an early period they were subdued by the Lapithae; at the time of the Peloponnesian war they were subject to the Thessalians, and subsequently to Philip of Macedon; but at the time of the Roman wars in Greece they appear independent of Macedonia.

Perrhĭdae (Περῤῥίδαι), an Attic demus near Aphidna, belonging to the tribe Antiochis.

Persae. [PERSIS.]

Persaeus (Περσαῖος), a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Cittium in Crete, and a disciple of Zeno. He lived for some years at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, with whom he seems to have been in high favour. Antigonus appointed him to the chief command in Corinth, where he was slain, when the city was taken by Aratus, B.C. 243.

Persē (Πέρση), daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Helios (the Sun), by whom she became the mother of Aeëtes and Circe. She is further called the mother of Pasiphaë and Perses. Homer and Apollonius Rhodius call her Perse, while others call her Perseis or Persea.

Persēis, a name given to Hecate, as the daughter of Perses by Asteria.

Persĕphŏnē (Περσεφόνη), called Proserpĭna by the Romans, the daughter of Zeus and Demeter. In Homer she is called Persephonīa (Περσεφόνεια); the form Persephone first occurs in Hesiod. But besides these forms of the name, we also find Persephassa, Phersephassa, Persephatta, Phersephatta, Pherrephassa, Pherephatta, and Phersephonīa, for which various etymologies have been proposed. The Latin Proserpina is probably only a corruption of the Greek. In Attica she was worshipped under the name of Cora (Κόρη, Ion. Κούρη), that is, the Daughter, namely, of Demeter; and the two were frequently called The Mother and the Daughter (ἡ Μήτηρ καὶ ἡ Κόρη). Being the infernal goddess of death, she is also called a daughter of Zeus and Styx. In Arcadia she was worshipped under the name of Despoena, and was called a daughter of Poseidon Hippius and Demeter, and said to have been brought up by the Titan Anytus. Homer describes her as the wife of Hades, and the formidable, venerable, and majestic queen of the Shades, who rules over the souls of the dead, along with her husband. Hence she is called by later writers Juno Inferna, Averna, and Stygia; and the Erinnyes are said to have been her daughters by Pluto. Groves sacred to her are placed by Homer in the western extremity of the earth, on the frontiers of the lower world, which is itself called the house of Persephone. The story of her being carried off by Hades or Pluto against her will is not mentioned by Homer, who simply describes her as the wife and queen of Hades. Her abduction is first mentioned by Hesiod. The account of her abduction, which is the most celebrated part of her story, and the wanderings of her mother in search of her, and the worship of the 2 goddesses in Attica at the festival of the Eleusinia, are related under DEMETER. In the mystical theories of the Orphics, Persephone is described as the all-pervading goddess of nature, who both produces and destroys every thing; and she is therefore mentioned along, or identified with, other mystic divinities, such as Isis, Rhea, Ge, Hestia, Pandora, Artemis, Hecate. This mystic Persephone is further said to have become by Zeus the mother of Dionysus, Iacchus, Zagreus or Sabazius. — Persephone frequently appears in works of art. She is represented either with the grave and severe character of an infernal Juno, or as a mystical divinity with a sceptre and a little box, in the act of being carried off by Pluto.

Persĕpŏlĭs (Περσέπολις, Περσαίπολις: in the middle ages, Istakhar: now Takhti-Jemshid, i. e. Throne of Jemshid, or Chil-Minar, i. e. Forty Pillars: large Ru.) is the Greek name, probably translated from the Persian name, which is not recorded, of the great city which succeeded Pasargada as the capital of Persis and of the Persian empire. From the circumstance, however, of the conquest of the Babylonian empire taking place about the time when Persepolis attained this dignity, it appears to have been seldom used as the royal residence. Neither Herodotus, Xenophon, Ctesias, nor the sacred writers during the Persian period, mention it at all; though they often speak of Babylon, Susa, and Ecbatana, as the capitals of the empire. It is only from the Greek writers after the Macedonian conquest that we learn its rank in the empire, which appears to have consisted chiefly in its being one of the 2 burial places of the kings (the other being Pasargada), and also a royal treasury; for Alexander found in the palace immense riches, which were said to have accumulated from the time of Cyrus. Its foundation is sometimes ascribed to Cyrus the Great, but more generally to his son Cambyses. It was greatly enlarged and adorned by Darius I. and Xerxes, and preserved its splendour till after the Macedonian conquest, when it was burnt; Alexander, as the story goes, setting fire to the palace with his own hand, at the end of a revel, by the instigation of the courtezan Thaïs, B.C. 331. It was not, however, so entirely destroyed as some historians represent. It appears frequently in subsequent history, both ancient and medieval. It is now deserted, but its ruins are considerable, though too dilapidated to give any good notion of Persian architecture, and they are rich in cuneiform inscriptions. It was situated in the heart of Persis, in the part called Hollow Persis (κοίλη Πέρσις), not far from the border of the Carmanian Desert, in a beautiful and healthy valley, watered by the river Araxes (Bend-Emir), and its tributaries the Medus and the Cyrus. The city stood on the N. side of the Araxes, and had a citadel (the ruins of which are still seen) built on the levelled surface of a rock, and enclosed by triple walls rising one above the other to the heights of 16, 48, and 60 cubits, within which was the palace, with its royal sepulchres and treasuries.

Perses (Πέρσης). 1. Son of the Titan Crius and Eurybia, and husband of Asteria, by whom he became the father of Hecate. — 2. Son of Perseus and Andromeda, described by the Greeks as the founder of the Persian nation. — 3. Son of Helios (the Sun) and Perse, and brother of Aeëtes and Circe.

Perseus (Περσεύς), the famous Argive hero, was a son of Zeus and Danaë, and a grandson of Acrisius. An oracle had told Acrisius that he was doomed to perish by the hands of Danaë's son; and he therefore shut up his daughter in an apartment made of brass or stone. But Zeus having metamorphosed himself into a shower of gold, came down through the roof of the prison, and became by her the father of Perseus. From this circumstance Perseus is sometimes called aurigena. As soon as Acrisius discovered that Danaë had given birth to a son, he put both mother and son into a chest, and threw them into the sea; but Zeus caused the chest to land in the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where Dictys, a fisherman, found them, and carried them to Polydectes, the king of the country. They were treated with kindness by Polydectes; but the latter having afterwards fallen in love with Danaë, and finding it impossible to gratify his desires in consequence of the presence of Perseus, who had meantime grown up to manhood, he sent Perseus away to fetch the head of Medusa, one of the Gorgons. Guided by Hermes and Athena, Perseus first went to the Graeae, the sisters of the Gorgons, took from them their one tooth and their one eye, and would not restore them until they showed him the way to the nymphs, who possessed the winged sandals, the magic wallet, and the helmet of Hades, which rendered the wearer invisible. Having received from the Nymphs these invaluable presents, from Hermes a sickle, and from Athena a mirror, he mounted into the air, and arrived at the Gorgons, who dwelt near Tartessus on the coast of the Ocean, whose heads were covered, like those of serpents, with scales, and who had large tusks like boars, brazen hands, and golden wings. He found them asleep, and cut off the head of Medusa, looking at her figure through the mirror, for a sight of the monster herself would have changed him into stone. Perseus put her head into the wallet which he carried on his back, and as he went away he was pursued by 2 other Gorgons; but his helmet, which rendered him invisible, enabled him to escape in safety. Perseus then proceeded to Aethiopia, where he saved and married Andromeda. [ANDROMEDA.] Perseus is also said to have come to the Hyperboreans, by whom he was hospitably received, and to Atlas, whom he changed into the mountain of the same name by the Gorgon's head. On his return to Seriphos, he found his mother with Dictys in a temple, whither they had fled from the violence of Polydectes. Perseus then went to the palace of Polydectes, and metamorphosed him and all his guests, and, some say, the whole island, into stone. He then presented the kingdom to Dictys. He gave the winged sandals and the helmet to Hermes, who restored them to the nymphs and to Hades, and the head of Gorgon to Athena, who placed it in the middle of her shield or breastplate. Perseus then went to Argos, accompanied by Danaë and Andromeda. Acrisius, remembering the oracle, escaped to Larissa, in the country of the Pelasgians; but Perseus followed him, in order to persuade him to return. Some writers state that Perseus, on his return to Argos, found Proetus, who had expelled his brother Acrisius, in possession of the kingdom; and that Perseus slew Proetus, and was afterwards killed by Megapenthes, the son of Proetus. The more common tradition, however, relates that when Teutamidas, king of Larissa, celebrated games in honour of his guest Acrisius, Perseus, who took part in them, accidentally hit the foot of Acrisius with the discus, and thus killed him. Acrisius was buried outside the city of Larissa, and Perseus, leaving the kingdom of Argos to Megapenthes, the son of Proetus, received from him in exchange the government of Tiryns. According to others, Perseus remained in Argos, and successfully opposed the introduction of the Bacchic orgies. Perseus is said to have founded the towns of Midea and Mycenae. By Andromeda he became the father of Perses, Alcaeus, Sthenelus, Heleus, Mestor, Electryon, Gorgophone, and Autochthe. Perseus was worshipped as a hero in several places.

Perseus or Perses (Περσεύς), the last king of Macedonia, was the eldest son of Philip V., and reigned 11 years from B. C. 178 to 168. Before his accession he persuaded his father to put to death his younger brother Demetrius, whom he suspected that the Roman senate intended to set up as a competitor for the throne on the death of Philip. Immediately after his accession he began to make preparations for war with the Romans, which he knew to be inevitable, though 7 years elapsed before actual hostilities commenced. The war broke out in 171. The 1st year of the war was marked by no striking action. The consul P. Licinius Crassus first suffered a defeat in Thessaly in an engagement between the cavalry of the 2 armies, but subsequently gained a slight advantage over the king's troops.—The 2nd year of the war (170), in which the consul A. Hostilius Mancinus commanded, also passed over without any important battle, but was on the whole favourable to Perseus.—The 3rd year (169), in which the consul Q. Marcius Philippus commanded, again produced no important results. The length to which the war had been unexpectedly protracted, and the ill success of the Roman arms, had by this time excited a general feeling in favour of the Macedonian monarch; but the ill-timed avarice of Perseus, who refused to advance the sum of money which Eumenes, king of Pergamus, demanded, deprived him of this valuable ally; and the same unseasonable niggardliness likewise deprived him of the services of 20,000 Gaulish mercenaries, who had actually advanced into Macedonia to his support, but retired on failing to obtain their stipulated pay. He was thus led to carry on the contest against Rome single-handed.—The 4th year of the war (168) was also the last. The new consul, L. Aemilius Paulus, defeated Perseus with great loss in a decisive battle fought near Pydna on June 22, 168. Perseus took refuge in the island of Samothrace, where he shortly afterwards surrendered with his children to the praetor Cn. Octavius. When brought before Aemilius, he is said to have degraded himself by the most abject supplications: but he was treated with kindness by the Roman general. The following year he was carried to Italy, where he was compelled to adorn the splendid triumph of his conqueror (Nov. 30, 167), and afterwards cast into a dungeon, from whence, however, the intercession of Aemilius procured his release, and he was permitted to end his days in an honourable captivity at Alba. He survived his removal thither a few years, and died, according to some accounts, by voluntary starvation, while others—fortunately with less probability—represent him as falling a victim to the cruelty of his guards, who deprived him of sleep. Perseus had been twice married; the name of his first wife, whom he is said to have killed with his own hand in a fit of passion, is not recorded; his second, Laodice, was the daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator. He left two children; a son, Alexander, and a daughter, both apparently by his second marriage, as they were mere children when carried to Rome. Besides these, he had adopted his younger brother Philip, who appears to have been regarded by him as the heir to his throne, and became the partner of his captivity.

Persĭa. [PERSIS.]

Persĭci Montes. [PARSICI MONTES.]

Persĭcus Sinus, Persĭcum Mare (ὁ Περσικὸς κόλπος, ἡ Περσικὴ θάλασσα, and other forms: the Persian Gulf), is the name given by the later geographers to the great gulf of the Mare Erythraeum (Indian Ocean), extending in a S.E. direction from the mouths of the Tigris, between the N.E. coast of Arabia and the opposite coast of Susiana, Persis, and Karmania, to the narrow strait formed by the long tongue of land which projects from the N. side of Oman in Arabia, by which strait it is connected with the more open gulf of the Indian Ocean called Paragon Sinus (Gulf of Oman). The earlier Greek writers know nothing of it. Herodotus does not distinguish it from the Erythraean Sea. The voyage of Alexander's admiral Nearchus from the Indus to the Tigris made it better known, but still the ancient geographers in general give very inaccurate statements of its size and form.

Persĭdes (Περσείδης, Περσηϊάδης), a patronymic given to the descendants of Perses.

Persis, and very rarely Persia (ἡ Πέρσις, and ἡ Περσική, sc. γῆ, the fem. adjectives, the masc. being Περσικός, from the ethnic noun Πέρσης, pl. Πέρσαι, fem. Πέρσις, Latin Persa and Perses, pl. Persae: in modern Persian and Arabic, Fars or Farsistan, i. e. stan, land of, Fars = old Persian pars, horse or horseman: Eng. Persia), originally a small mountainous district of W. Asia, lying on the N.E. side of the Persian Gulf, and surrounded on the other sides by mountains and deserts. On the N.W. and N. it was separated from Susiana, Media, and Parthia, by the little river Oroatis or Orosis, and by M. Parachoathras; and on the E. from Carmania by no definite boundaries in the Desert. The only level part of the country was the strip of sea-coast called Persis Paralia: the rest was intersected with branches of M. Parachoathras, the valleys between which were watered by several rivers, the chief of which were the ARAXES, CYRUS, and MEDUS: in this part of the country, which was called Koile Persis, stood the capital cities PASARGADA and PERSEPOLIS. The country has a remarkable variety of climate and of products; the N. mountainous regions being comparatively cold, but with good pastures, especially for camels; the middle slopes having a temperate climate and producing abundance of fruit and wine; and the S. strip of coast being intensely hot, and sandy, with little vegetation except the palm-tree. The inhabitants were a collection of nomad peoples of the Indo-European stock, who called themselves by a name which is given in Greek as Artaei (Ἀρταῖοι), and which, like the kindred Median name of Arii (Ἄριοι), signifies noble or honourable, and is applied especially to the true worshippers of Ormuzd and followers of Zoroaster: it was in fact rather a title of honour than a proper name; the true collective name of the people seems to have been Pâraca. According to Herodotus, they were divided into 3 classes or castes: 1st, the nobles or warriors, containing the 3 tribes of the PASARGADAE, who were the most noble, and to whom the royal family of the Achaemenidae belonged, the Maraphii and the Maspii; 2ndly, the agricultural and other settled tribes, namely, the Panthialaei, Derusiaei, and Germanii; 3rdly, the tribes which remained nomadic, namely, the Daae, Mardi, Dropici, and Sagartii, names common to other parts of W. and Central Asia. The Persians had a close ethnical affinity to the Medes, and followed the same customs and religion [Magi; Zoroaster]. The simple and warlike habits, which they cultivated in their native mountains, preserved them from the corrupting influences which enervated their Median brethren; so that from being, as we find them at the beginning of their recorded history, the subject member of the Medo-Persian kingdom, they obtained the supremacy under Cyrus, the founder of the great Persian Empire, B.C. 559. Of the Persian history before this date, we know but little: the native poetical annalists of a later period are perfectly untrustworthy: the additional light lately obtained from the Persian inscriptions is, so far as it goes, confirmatory of the Greek writers, from whom, and from some small portions of Scripture, all our knowledge of ancient Persian history is derived. According to these accounts, the Persians were first subjected by the Medes under Phraortes, about B.C. 688, at the time of the formation of the Great Median Empire; but they continued to be governed by their own princes, the Achaemenidae. An account of the revolution, by which the supremacy was transferred to the Persians, is given under Cyrus. At this time there existed in W. Asia two other great kingdoms, the Lydian, which comprised nearly the whole of Asia Minor, W. of the river Halys, which separated it from the Medo-Persian territories; and the Babylonian, which, besides the Tigris and Euphrates valley, embraced Syria and Palestine. By the successive conquest of these kingdoms, the dominions of Cyrus were extended on the W. as far as the coasts of the Euxine, the Aegean, and the Mediterranean, and to the frontier of Egypt. Turning his arms in the opposite direction, he subdued Bactria, and effected some conquests beyond the Oxus, but fell in battle with the Massagetae. [Cyrus.] His son Cambyses added Egypt to the empire. [Cambyses.] Upon his death the Magian priesthood made an effort to restore the supremacy to the Medes [Magi; Smerdis], which was defeated by the conspiracy of the 7 Persian chieftains, whose success conferred the crown upon Darius, the son of Hystaspes. This king was at first occupied with crushing rebellions in every part of the empire, and with the two expeditions against Scythia and Cyrenaïca, of which the former entirely failed, and the latter was only partially successful. He conquered Thrace; and on the E. he added the valley of the Indus to the kingdom; but in this quarter the power of Persia seems never to have been much more than nominal. The Persian Empire had now reached its greatest extent, from Thrace and Cyrenaïca on the W. to the Indus on the E., and from the Euxine, the Caucasus (or rather a little below it), the Caspian, and the Oxus and Jaxartes on the N. to Aethiopia, Arabia, and the Erythraean Sea on the S., and it embraced, in Europe, Thrace and some of the Greek cities N. of the Euxine; in Africa, Egypt and Cyrenaïca; in Asia, on the W., Palestine, Phoenicia, Syria, the several districts of Asia Minor, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, Susiana, Atropatene, Great Media; on the N., Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, and Sogdiana; on the E., the Paropamisus, Arachosia, and India (i. e. part of the Punjab and Scinde); on the S. Persis, Carmania and Gedrosia; and in the centre of the E. part, Parthia, Aria, and Drangiana. The capital cities of the empire were Babylon, Susa, Ecbatana in Media, and, though these were seldom, if ever, used as residences, Pasargada and Persepolis in Persis. (See the several articles.) Of this vast empire Darius undertook the organisation, and divided it into 20 satrapies, of which a full account is given by Herodotus. For the other details of his reign, and especially the commencement of the wars with Greece, see Darius. Of the remaining period of the ancient Persian history, till the Macedonian conquest, a sufficient abstract will be found under the names of the several kings, a list of whom is now subjoined:—(1) Cyrus, B.C. 559—529: (2) Cambyses, 529—522: (3) Usurpation of the pseudo-Smerdis, 7 months, 522—521: (4) Darius I., son of Hystaspes, 521—485: (5) Xerxes I. 485—465: (6) Usurpation of Artabanus, 7 months, 465—464: (7) Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, 464—425: (8) Xerxes II., 2 months: (9) Sogdianus, 7 months, 425—424: (10) Ochus, or Darius II. Nothus, 424—405: (11) Artaxerxes II. Mnemon, 405—359: (12) Ochus, or Artaxerxes III., 359—338: (13) Arses, 338—336: (14) Darius III. Codomannus, 336—331 [Alexander]. Here the ancient history of Persia ends, as a kingdom; but, as a people, the Persians proper, under the influence especially of their religion, preserved their existence, and at length regained their independence on the downfall of the Parthian Empire [Sassanidae].—In reading the Roman poets it must be remembered that they constantly use Persae, as well as Medi, as a general term for the peoples E. of the Euphrates and Tigris, and especially for the Parthians.

A. Persĭus Flaccus, the poet, was a Roman knight connected by blood and marriage with persons of the highest rank, and was born at Volaterrae in Etruria on the 4th of December, A.D. 34. He received the first rudiments of education in his native town, remaining there until the age of 12, and then removed to Rome, where he studied grammar under the celebrated Remmius Palaemon, and rhetoric under Verginius Flavius. He was afterwards the pupil of Cornutus the Stoic, who became the guide, philosopher, and friend of his future life, and to whom he attached himself so closely that he never quitted his side. While yet a youth he was on familiar terms with Lucan, with Caesius Bassus the lyric poet, and with several other persons of literary eminence. He was tenderly beloved by the high-minded Paetus Thrasea, and seems to have been well worthy of such affection, for he is described as a virtuous and pleasing youth. He died of a disease of the stomach, on the 24th of November, A.D. 62, before he had completed his 28th year. The extant works of Persius, who, we are told, wrote seldom and slowly, consist of 6 short satires, extending in all to 650 hexameter lines, and were left in an unfinished state. They were slightly corrected after his death by Cornutus, while Caesius Bassus was permitted, at his own earnest request, to be the editor. In boyhood Persius had written some other poems, which were destroyed by the advice of Cornutus. Few productions have ever enjoyed more popularity than the Satires; but it would seem that Persius owes not a little of his fame to a cause which naturally might have produced an effect directly the reverse, we mean the multitude of strange terms, proverbial phrases, far-fetched metaphors, and abrupt transitions which every where embarrass our progress. The difficulty experienced in removing these impediments necessarily impresses both the words and the ideas upon every one who has carefully studied his pages, and hence no author clings more closely to our memory. The first satire is superior both in plan and execution to the rest; and those passages in the 5th, where Persius describes the process by which his own moral and intellectual faculties were expanded, are remarkable for their grace and beauty. The best editions are by Jahn, Lips. 1843, and by Heinrich, Lips. 1844.

Pertĭnax, Helvĭus, Roman emperor from January 1st to March 28th, A. D. 193, was of humble origin, and rose from the post of centurion both to the highest military and civil commands in the reigns of M. Aurelius and Commodus. On the murder of Commodus on the last day of December, 192, Pertinax, who was then 66 years of age, was reluctantly persuaded to accept the empire. He commenced his reign by introducing extensive reforms into the civil and military administration of the empire; but the troops, who had been accustomed both to ease and license under Commodus, were disgusted with the discipline which he attempted to enforce upon them, and murdered their new sovereign after a reign of 2 months and 27 days. On his death the praetorian troops put up the empire to sale, which was purchased by M. Didius Salvius Julianus. [See p. 219, b.]

Pĕrŭsĭa (Perusīnus: Perugia), an ancient city in the E. part of Etruria between the lake Trasimenus and the Tiber, and one of the 12 cities of the Etruscan confederacy. It was situated on a hill, and was strongly fortified by nature and by art. In conjunction with the other cities of Etruria, it long resisted the power of the Romans, and at a later period it was made a Roman colony. It is memorable in the civil wars as the place in which L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir took refuge, when he was no longer able to oppose Octavianus in the field, and where he was kept closely blockaded by Octavianus for some months, from the end of B. C. 41 to the spring of 40. Famine compelled it to surrender; but one of its citizens having set fire to his own house, the flames spread, and the whole city was burnt to the ground. The war between L. Antonius and Octavianus is known from the long siege of this town by the name of the Bellum Perusinum. It was rebuilt and colonised anew by Augustus, from whom it received the surname of Augusta. In the later time of the empire it was the most important city in all Etruria, and long resisted the Goths. Part of the walls and some of the gates of Perusia still remain. The best preserved of the gates is now called Arco d'Augusta, from the inscription AVGVSTA PERVVSIA over the arch: the whole structure is at least 60 or 70 feet high. Several interesting tombs with valuable remains of Etruscan art have been discovered in the neighbourhood of the city.

Pescennĭus Niger. [NIGER.]

Pessĭnūs or Pĕsĭnūs (Πεσσινοῦς, Πεσινοῦς: Πεσσινούντιος, fem. Πεσσινουντίς: Bala-Hisar Ru.), a city of Asia Minor, in the S.W. corner of Galatia, on the S. slope of M. Dindymus or Agdistis, was celebrated as a chief seat of the worship of Cybele, under the surname of Agdistis, whose temple, crowded with riches, stood on a hill outside the city. In this temple was a wooden (Livy says stone) image of the goddess, which was removed to Rome, to satisfy an oracle in the Sibylline books. Under Constantine the city was made the capital of the province of Galatia Salutaris, but it gradually declined until the 6th century, after which it is no more mentioned.

Petālĭa or Petālĭae (Petalius), an uninhabited and rocky island off the S.W. coast of Euboea at the entrance into the Euripus.

Petēlĭa or Petīlĭa (Πετηλία: Petelīnus: Strongoli), an ancient Greek town on the E. coast of Bruttium, founded, according to tradition, by Philoctetes. (Virg. Aen. iii. 402.) It was situated N. of Croton, to whose territory it originally belonged, but it was afterwards conquered by the Lucanians. It remained faithful to the Romans, when the other cities of Bruttium revolted to Hannibal, and it was not till after a long and desperate resistance that it was taken by one of Hannibal's generals. It was repeopled by Hannibal with Bruttians; but the Romans subsequently collected the remains of the former population, and put them again in possession of the town.

Pĕtĕōn (Πετεών: Πετεώνιος), a small town in Boeotia, of uncertain site, dependent upon Haliartus, according to some, and upon Thebes, according to others.

Pĕtĕōs (Πετεώς), son of Orneus, and father of Menestheus, was expelled from Athens by Aegeus, and went to Phocis, where he founded Stiris.

Pĕtīlĭus or Petillĭus. 1. Capitolīnus. [CAPITOLINUS.]—2. Cereālis. [CEREALIS.]—3. Spurīnus. [SPURINUS.]

Petosīris (Πετόσιρις), an Egyptian priest and astrologer, generally named along with Nechepsos, an Egyptian king. The two are said to be the founders of astrology. Some works on astrology were extant under his name. Like our own Lilly, Petosiris became the common name for an astrologer. (Juv. vi. 580.)

Petovĭo or Poetovio (Peltau), a town in Pannonia Superior, on the frontiers of Noricum, and on the Dravus (Drave), was a Roman colony with the surname Ulpia, having been probably enlarged and made a colony by Trajan or Hadrian. It was one of the chief towns of Pannonia, had an imperial palace, and was the head-quarters of a Roman legion. The ancient town was probably on the right bank of the Drave, opposite the modern Pettau, as it is only on the former spot that inscriptions, coins, and other antiquities have been found.

Petra (ἡ Πέτρα: Πετραῖος, Petraeus, later Petrensis), the name of several cities built on rocks, or in rocky places.—1. A small place in the Corinthian territory, probably on the coast, near the borders of Argolis.—2. A place in Elis, not far from the city of Elis, of which some suppose it to have been the Acropolis. The sepulchral monument of the philosopher Pyrrho was shown here.—3. (Casa della Pietra), also called Petraea and Petrīne (the people Πετρῖνοι and Petrīni), an inland town of Sicily, on the road from Agrigentum to Panormus.—4. A town on the coast of Illyricum, with a bad harbour.—5. A city of Pieria in Macedonia.—6. A fortress of the Maedi, in Thrace.—7. (Pl. neut.), a place in Dacia, on one of the 3 great roads which crossed the Danube.—8. In Pontus, a fortress built by Justinian, on a precipice on the sea-coast, between the rivers Bathys and Acinasis.—9. In Sogdiana, near the Oxus (Q. Curt. vii. 11).—10. By far the most celebrated of all the places of this name was Petra or Petrae (Wady-Musa), in Arabia Petraea, the capital, first of the Idumaeans, and afterwards of the Nabathaeans. It is probably the same place which is called Selah (which means, like πέτρα, a rock) and Joktheel, in the O. T. It lies in the midst of the mountains of Seir, at the foot of Mt. Hor, just half-way between the Dead Sea and the head of the Aelanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, in a valley, or rather ravine, surrounded by almost inaccessible precipices, which is entered by a narrow gorge on the E., the rocky walls of which approach so closely as sometimes hardly to permit 2 horsemen to ride abreast. On the banks of the river which runs through this ravine stood the city itself, a mile in length, and half-a-mile in breadth between the sides of the valley, and some fine ruins of its public buildings still remain. But this is not all: the rocks which surround, not only the main valley, but all its lateral ravines, are completely honeycombed with excavations, some of which were tombs, some temples, and some private houses, at the entrances to which the surface of the rock is sculptured into magnificent architectural façades, and other figures, whose details are often so well preserved as to appear but just chiselled, while the effect is wonderfully heightened by the brilliant variegated colours of the rock, where red, purple, yellow, sky-blue, black, and white, are seen in distinct layers. These ruins are chiefly of the Roman period, when Petra had become an important city as a centre of the caravan traffic of the Nabathaeans. At the time of Augustus, as Strabo learnt from a friend who had resided there, it contained many Romans and other foreigners, and was governed by a native prince. It had maintained its independence against the Greek kings of Syria, and retained it under the Romans, till the time of Trajan, by whom it was taken. It was the chief city of the whole country of Arabia Petraea, which probably derived its name from Petra; and under the later empire, it was the capital of Palaestina Tertia.

M. Petrēius, a man of great military experience, is first mentioned in B. C. 62, when he served as legatus to the proconsul C. Antonius, and commanded the army in the battle in which Catiline perished. He belonged to the aristocratical party; and in 55 he was sent into Spain along with L. Afranius as legatus of Pompey, to whom the provinces of the two Spains had been granted. Soon after the commencement of the civil war in 49, Caesar defeated Afranius and Petreius in Spain, whereupon the latter joined Pompey in Greece. After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48) Petreius crossed over to Africa, and took an active part in the campaign in 46, which was brought to an end by the decisive defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus. Petreius then fled with Juba, and despairing of safety they fell by each other's hands.

Petrŏcŏrii, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, in the modern Perigord. Their country contained iron-mines, and their chief town was Vesunna (Perigueux).

Petrōnius, C., or T., an accomplished voluptuary at the court of Nero. He was one of the chosen companions of Nero, and was regarded as director-in-chief of the imperial pleasures, the judge whose decision upon the merits of any proposed scheme of enjoyment was held as final (Elegantiae arbiter). The influence thus acquired excited the jealous suspicions of Tigellinus: he was accused of treason; and believing that destruction was inevitable, he resolved to die as he had lived, and to excite admiration by the frivolous eccentricity of his end. Having caused his veins to be opened, he from time to time arrested the flow of blood by the application of bandages. During the intervals he conversed with his friends, and even showed himself in the public streets of Cumae, where these events took place; so that at last, when he sunk from exhaustion, his death (A. D. 66), although compulsory, appeared to be the result of natural and gradual decay. He is said to have despatched in his last moments a sealed document to the prince, taunting him with his brutal excesses.—A work has come down to us bearing the title Petronii Arbitri Satyricon, which, as it now exists, is composed of a series of fragments, chiefly in prose, but interspersed with numerous pieces of poetry. It is a sort of comic romance, in which the adventures of a certain Encolpius and his companions in the S. of Italy, chiefly in Naples or its environs, are made a vehicle for exposing the false taste and vices of the age. Unfortunately the vices of the personages introduced are depicted with such fidelity that we are perpetually disgusted by the obscenity of the descriptions. The longest section is generally known as the Supper of Trimalchio, presenting us with a detailed account of a fantastic banquet, such as the gourmands of the empire were wont to exhibit on their tables. Next in interest is the well-known tale of the Ephesian Matron.—A great number of conflicting opinions have been formed by scholars with regard to the author of the Satyricon. Many suppose that he is the same person as the C. or T. Petronius mentioned above; and though there are no proofs in favour of this hypothesis, yet there is good reason to believe that the work belongs to the first century, or, at all events, is not later than the reign of Hadrian. The best edition is by P. Burmannus, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen. 1709, and again Amst. 1743.

Peucē (Πεύκη: Piczina), an island in Moesia Inferior formed by the 2 southern mouths of the Danube, of which the most southernly was also called Peuce, but more commonly the Sacred Mouth. This island is of a triangular form, and is said by the ancients to be as large as Rhodes. It was inhabited by the Peucīni, who were a tribe of the Bastarnae, and took their name from the island.

Peucĕla, Peucelaōtis (Πευκέλα, Πευκελαῶτις: Pekheli or Pakholi), a city and district in the N.W. of India intra Gangem, between the rivers Indus and Suastus.

Peucestas (Πευκέστας), a Macedonian, and a distinguished officer of Alexander the Great. He had the chief share in saving the life of Alexander in the assault on the city of the Malli in India, and was afterwards appointed by the king to the satrapy of Persia. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander (B. C. 323) he obtained the renewal of his government of Persia. He fought on the side of Eumenes against Antigonus (317—316), but displayed both arrogance and insubordination in these campaigns. Upon the surrender of Eumenes by the Argyraspids, Peucestas fell into the hands of Antigonus, who deprived him of his satrapy.

Peucĕtĭa. [APULIA.]

Peucīni. [PEUCE.]

Phacĭum (Φάκιον: Φακιεύς: Alifaka), a mountain fortress of Thessaly in the district Hestiaeotis on the right bank of the Peneus, N.E. of Limnaea.

Phacussa (Φακοῦσσα: Fecussa), an island in the Aegaean sea, one of the Sporades.

Phaea (Φαιά), the name of the sow of Crommyon in Megaris, which ravaged the neighbourhood, and was slain by Theseus.

Phaeāces (Φαίακες, Φαίηκες), a fabulous people immortalised by the Odyssey, who inhabited the island Scheria (Σχερία), situated at the extreme western part of the earth, and who were governed by king Alcinous. [ALCINOUS.] They are described by Homer as a people fond of the feast, the lyre, and the dance, and hence their name passed into a proverb to indicate persons of luxurious and sensual habits. Thus a glutton is called Phaeax by Horace (Ep. i. 15. 24).—The ancients identified the Homeric Scheria with Corcyra, whence the latter is called by the poets Phaeacia tellus; but there is no sound argument in favour of the identity of the 2 islands, and it is better to regard Scheria as altogether fabulous.

Phaeax (Φαίαξ), an Athenian orator and statesman, and a contemporary of Nicias and Alcibiades. Some critics maintain that the extant speech against Alcibiades, commonly attributed to Andocides was written by Phaeax.

Phaedon (Φαίδων), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Elis, and of high birth, but was taken prisoner, probably about B.C. 400, and was brought to Athens. It is said that he ran away from his master to Socrates, and was ransomed by one of the friends of the latter. Phaedon was present at the death of Socrates, while he was still quite a youth. He appears to have lived in Athens some time after the death of Socrates, and then returned to Elis, where he became the founder of a school of philosophy. He was succeeded by Plistanus, after whom the Elean school was merged in the Eretrian. The dialogue of Plato, which contains an account of the death of Socrates, bears the name of Phaedon.

Phaedra (Φαίδρα), daughter of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and the wife of Theseus. She was the stepmother of Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, with whom she fell in love; but having been repulsed by Hippolytus, she accused him to Theseus of having attempted her dishonour. After the death of Hippolytus, his innocence became known to his father, and Phaedra made away with herself. For details see HIPPOLYTUS.

Phaedriădes. [PARNASSUS.]

Phaedrĭas (Φαιδρίας), a town in the S. of Arcadia, S.W. of Megalopolis, 15 stadia from the Messenian frontier.

Phaedrus (Φαῖδρος.) 1. An Epicurean philosopher, and the president of the Epicurean school during Cicero's residence in Athens, B.C. 80. He died in 70, and was succeeded by Patron. He was the author of a work on the gods (Περὶ θεῶν), of which an interesting fragment was discovered at Herculaneum in 1806, and published, by Petersen, Hamb. 1833. Cicero was largely indebted to this work for the materials of the first book of the De Natura Deorum.—2. The Latin Fabulist, of whom we know nothing but what is collected or inferred from his fables. He was originally a slave, and was brought from Thrace or Macedonia to Rome, where he learned the Latin language. As the title of his work is Phaedri Aug. Liberti Fabulae Aesopiae, we must conclude that he had belonged to Augustus, who manumitted him. Under Tiberius he appears to have undergone some persecution from Sejanus. The fables extant under the name of Phaedrus are 97 in number, written in iambic verse, and distributed into 5 books. Most of the fables are transfusions of the Aesopian fables, or those which pass as such, into Latin verse. The expression is generally clear and concise, and the language, with some few exceptions, as pure and correct as we should expect from a Roman writer of the Augustan age. But Phaedrus has not escaped censure, when he has deviated from his Greek model, and much of the censure is just. The best fables are those in which he has kept the closest to his original. Many of the fables, however, are not Aesopian, as the matter clearly shows, for they refer to historical events of a much later period (v. 1, 8, iii. 10); and Phaedrus himself, in the prologue to the 5th book, intimates that he had often used the name of Aesop only to recommend his verses.—There is also another collection of 32 fables, attributed to Aesop, and entitled Epitome Fabularum, which was first published at Naples, in 1809, by Cassitti. Opinions are much divided as to the genuineness of this collection. The probability is, that the Epitome is founded on genuine Roman fables, which, in the process of transcription during many centuries, have undergone considerable changes.—The last and only critical edition of Phaedrus is by Orelli, Zürich, 1831.

Phaenarĕtē. [SOCRATES.]

Phaenĭas. [PHANIAS.]

Phaestus (Φαιστός: Φαίστιος). 1. A town in the S. of Crete near Gortyna, 20 stadia from the sea, with a port-town Matala or Matalia, said to have been built by the Heraclid Phaestus, who came from Sicyon to Crete. The town is mentioned by Homer, but was destroyed at an early period by Gortyna. It was the birth-place of Epimenides, and its inhabitants were celebrated for their wit and sarcasm.—2. A town of Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis.

Phăĕthon (Φαέθων), that is, "the shining," occurs in Homer as an epithet or surname of Helios (the Sun), and is used by later writers as a proper name for Helios; but it is more commonly known as the name of a son of Helios by the Oceanid Clymene, the wife of Merops. The genealogy of Phaethon, however, is not the same in all writers, for some call him a son of Clymenus, the son of Helios, by Merope, or a son of Helios by Prote, or, lastly, a son of Helios by the nymph Rhode or Rhodos. He received the significant name of Phaethon from his father, and was afterwards presumptuous and ambitious enough to request his father to allow him for one day to drive the chariot of the sun across the heavens. Helios was induced by the entreaties of his son and of Clymene to yield, but the youth being too weak to check the horses, they rushed out of their usual track, and came so near the earth, as almost to set it on fire. Thereupon Zeus killed him with a flash of lightning, and hurled him down into the river Eridanus. His sisters, the Heliadae or Phaethontiades, who had yoked the horses to the chariot, were metamorphosed into poplars, and their tears into amber. [HELIADAE.]

Phaethontĭădes. [HELIADAE.]

Phaethūsa. [HELIADAE.]

Phagres (Φάγρης: Orfan or Orfana), an ancient and fortified town of the Pierians in Macedonia at the foot of Mt. Pangaeon.

Phălaecus (Φάλαικος). 1. Son of Onomarchus, succeeded his uncle Phayllus as leader of the Phocians in the Sacred War, B. C. 351. In order to secure his own safety, he concluded a treaty with Philip, by which he was allowed to withdraw into the Peloponnesus with a body of 8000 mercenaries, leaving the unhappy Phocians to their fate, 346. Phalaecus now assumed the part of a mere leader of mercenary troops, in which character we find him engaging in various enterprises. He was slain at the siege of Cydonia in Crete. — 2. A lyric and epigrammatic poet, from whom the metre called Phalaecian took its name. Five of his epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. His date is uncertain; but he was probably one of the principal Alexandrian poets.

Phalaesĭae (Φαλαισίαι), a town in Arcadia, S. of Megalopolis on the road to Sparta, 20 stadia from the Laconian frontier.

Phalanna (Φάλαννα: Φαλανναῖος: Karadjoli), a town of the Perrhaebi in the Thessalian district of Hestiaeotis on the left bank of the Peneus, not far from Tempe.

Phălanthus (Φάλανθος), son of Aracus, was one of the Lacedaemonian Partheniae, or the offspring of some marriages of disparagement, which the necessity of the first Messenian war had induced the Spartans to permit. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Partheniae.) As the Partheniae were looked down upon by their fellow-citizens, they formed a conspiracy under Phalanthus, against the government. Their design having been detected, they went to Italy under the guidance of Phalanthus, and founded the city of Tarentum, about B.C. 708. Phalanthus was afterwards driven out from Tarentum by a sedition, and ended his days at Brundisium.

Phalăra (τὰ Φάλαρα: Φαλαρεύς), a town in the Thessalian district of Phthiotis on the Sinus Maliacus, served as the harbour of Lamia.

Phălăris (Φάλαρις), ruler of Agrigentum in Sicily, has obtained a proverbial celebrity as a cruel and inhuman tyrant; but we have scarcely any real knowledge of his life and history. His reign probably commenced about B. C. 570, and is said to have lasted 16 years. He was a native of Agrigentum, and appears to have been raised by his fellow-citizens to some high office in the state, of which he afterwards availed himself to assume a despotic authority. He was engaged in frequent wars with his neighbours, and extended his power and dominion on all sides, though more frequently by stratagem than open force. He perished by a sudden outbreak of the popular fury, in which it appears that Telemachus, the ancestor of Theron, must have borne a conspicuous part. No circumstance connected with Phalaris is more celebrated than the brazen bull in which he is said to have burnt alive the victims of his cruelty, and of which we are told that he made the first experiment upon its inventor Perillus. This latter story has much the air of an invention of later times; but the fame of this celebrated engine of torture was inseparably associated with the name of Phalaris as early as the time of Pindar. (Pind. Pyth. i. 185.) That poet also speaks of Phalaris himself in terms which clearly prove that his reputation as a barbarous tyrant was then already fully established, and all subsequent writers, until a very late period, allude to him in terms of similar import. But in the later ages of Greek literature, there appears to have existed or arisen a totally different tradition concerning Phalaris, which represented him as a man of a naturally mild and humane disposition, and only forced into acts of severity or occasional cruelty, by the pressure of circumstances and the machinations of his enemies. Still more strange is it that he appears at the same time as an admirer of literature and philosophy, and the patron of men of letters. Such is the aspect under which his character is presented to us in 2 declamations commonly ascribed to Lucian, and still more strikingly in the well-known epistles which bear the name of Phalaris himself. These epistles are now remembered chiefly on account of the literary controversy to which they gave rise, and the masterly dissertation in which Bentley exposed their spuriousness. They are evidently the composition of some sophist; though the period at which this forgery was composed cannot now be determined. The first author who refers to them is Stobaeus. The best edition is by Schaefer, Lips. 1823.

Phalarĭum (Φαλάριον), a fortress named after Phalaris near the S. coast of Sicily, situated on a hill 40 stadia E. of the river Himera.

Phalasarna (τὰ Φαλάσαρνα), a town on the N.W. coast of Crete.

Phalērum (Φάληρον: Φαληρεύς), the most E.-ly of the harbours of Athens, and the one chiefly used by the Athenians before the time of the Persian wars. Phalerum is usually described as the most E.-ly of the 3 harbours in the peninsula of Piraeus; but this appears to be incorrect. The names of the 3 harbours in the peninsula were Piraeus, Zea, and Munychia; while Phalerum lay S.E. of these 3, nearer the city at Hagios Georgios. After the establishment by Themistocles of the 3 harbours in the peninsula of Piraeus, Phalerum was not much used; but it was connected with the city by means of a wall called the Phalerian Wall (Φαληρικὸν τεῖχος). Paleron or Phalerus was also an Attic demus, containing temples of Zeus, Demeter, and other deities.

Phalōrĭa (Φαλωρία), a fortified town of Thessaly in Hestiaeotis, N. of Tricca on the left bank of the Peneus.

Phănae (Φάναι, ἡ Φαναία ἄκρα: C. Mastico), the S. point of the island of Chios, celebrated for its temple of Apollo, and for its excellent wine Phanagorĭa (Φαναγόρεια, and other forms: Phanagori, Ru., near Taman, on the E. side of the Straits of Kaffa), a Greek city, founded by a colony of Teians under Phanagoras, on the Asiatic coast of the Cimmerian Bosporus. It became the great emporium for all the traffic between the coasts of the Palus Maeotis and the countries on the S. side of the Caucasus, and was chosen by the kings of Bosporus as their capital in Asia. It had a temple of Aphrodite Apaturos, and its neighbourhood was rich in olive yards. In the 6th century of our era, it was destroyed by the surrounding barbarians.

Phanaroea (Φανάροια), a great plain of Pontus in Asia Minor, enclosed by the mountain chains of Paryadres on the E., and Lithrus and Ophlimus on the W., was the most fertile part of Pontus.

Phanĭas or Phaenĭas (Φανίας, Φαινίας), of Eresos in Lesbos, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, the immediate disciple of Aristotle, and the contemporary, fellow-citizen, and friend of Theophrastus. He flourished about B. C. 336. Phanias does not seem to have founded a distinct school of his own, but he was a most diligent writer upon every department of philosophy, as it was studied by the Peripatetics, especially logic, physics, history, and literature. His works, all of which are lost, are frequently quoted by later writers. One of his works most frequently cited was a sort of chronicle of his native city, bearing the title of Πρυτάνεις Ἐρέσιοι.

Phanŏcles (Φανοκλῆς), one of the best of the later Greek elegiac poets, probably lived in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He seems only to have written one poem, which was entitled Ἔρωτες ἢ Καλοί. The work was upon paederasteia; but the subject was so treated as to exhibit the retribution which fell upon those who addicted themselves to the practice. We still possess a considerable fragment from the opening of the poem, which describes the love of Orpheus for Calaïs, and the vengeance taken upon him by the Thracian women. The fragments of Phanocles are edited by Bach, Philetae, Hermesianactis, atque Phanoclis Reliquiae ; and by Schneidewin, Delectus Poes. Graec. p. 158.

Phanodēmus (Φανόδημος), the author of one of those works on the legends and antiquities of Attica, known under the name of Atthides. His age and birthplace are uncertain, but we know that he lived before the time of Augustus, as he is cited by Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

Phanote (Gardhiki), a fortified town of Epirus in Chaonia near the Illyrian frontier.

Phantasĭa (Φαντασία), one of those numerous mythical personages, to whom Homer is said to have been indebted for his poems. She is said to have been an Egyptian, the daughter of Nicarchus, an inhabitant of Memphis, and to have written an account of the Trojan war, and the wanderings of Ulysses.

Phāōn (Φάων), a boatman at Mytilene, is said to have been originally an ugly old man; but in consequence of his carrying Aphrodite across the sea without accepting payment, the goddess gave him youth and beauty. After this Sappho is said to have fallen in love with him, and to have leapt from the Leucadion rock, when he slighted her; but this well-known story vanishes at the first approach of criticism. [SAPPHO.]

Phārae (Φαραί or Φῆραι). 1. (Φαραιεύς or Φαρεύς), an ancient town in the W. part of Achaea, and one of the 12 Achaean cities, was situated on the river Pierus, 70 stadia from the sea, and 150 from Patrae. It was one of the states which took an active part in reviving the Achaean League in B. C. 281. Augustus included it in the territory of Patrae. — 2. (Φαραίτης, Φαραιάτης, Φαράτης : Kalamata), an ancient town in Messenia mentioned by Homer, on the river Nedon, near the frontiers of Laconia, and about 6 miles from the sea. In B. C. 180 Pharae joined the Achaean League together with the neighbouring towns of Thuria and Abia. It was annexed by Augustus to Laconia. — 3. Originally Pharis (Φάρις: Φαρίτης, Φαριάτης), a town in Laconia in the valley of the Eurotas, S. of Sparta. — 4. A town in Crete, founded by the Messenian Pharae.

Pharbaethus (Φάρβαιθος : Horbeyt ? Ru.), the capital of the Nomos Pharbaethites in Lower Egypt, lay S. of Tanis, on the W. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile.

Phāris. [PHARAE, No. 3.]

Pharmacussae (Φαρμακοῦσσαι). 1. Two small islands off the coast of Attica, near Salamis, in the bay of Eleusis, now called Kyradhes or Megali and Mikri Kyra : on one of them was shown the tomb of Circe — 2. Pharmacusa (Φαρμακοῦσα), an island off the coast of Asia Minor, 120 stadia from Miletus, where king Attalus died, and where Julius Caesar was taken prisoner by pirates, when a very young man. The whole adventure is related by Plutarch (Caes. 1, 2).

Pharnabāzus (Φαρνάβαζος), son of Pharnaces, succeeded his father as satrap of the Persian provinces near the Hellespont. In B. C. 411 and the following years, he rendered active assistance to the Lacedaemonians in their war against the Athenians. When Dercyllidas, and subsequently Agesilaus, passed over into Asia, to protect the Asiatic Greeks against the Persian power, we find Pharnabazus connecting himself with Conon to resist the Lacedaemonians. In 374 Pharnabazus invaded Egypt in conjunction with Iphicrates, but the expedition failed, chiefly through the dilatory proceedings and the excessive caution of Pharnabazus. The character of Pharnabazus is eminently distinguished by generosity and openness. He has been charged, it is true, with the murder of Alcibiades ; but the latter probably fell by the hands of others. [ALCIBIADES.]

Pharnăces (Φαρνάκης). 1. King of Pontus, was the son of Mithridates IV., whom he succeeded on the throne, about B. C. 190. He carried on war for some years with Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, but was obliged to conclude with them a disadvantageous peace in 179. The year of his death is uncertain ; it is placed by conjecture in 156. — 2. King of Pontus, or more properly of the Bosporus, was the son of Mithridates, the Great, whom he compelled to put an end to his life in 63. [MITHRIDATES VI.] After the death of his father, Pharnaces hastened to make his submission to Pompey, who granted him the kingdom of the Bosporus with the titles of friend and ally of the Roman people. In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Pharnaces seized the opportunity to reinstate himself in his father's dominions, and made himself master of the whole of Colchis and the lesser Armenia. He defeated Domitius Calvinus, the lieutenant of Caesar in Asia, but was shortly afterwards defeated by Caesar himself in a decisive action near Zela (47). The battle was gained with such ease by Caesar, that he informed the senate of his victory by the words, Veni, vidi, vici. In the course of the same year, Pharnaces was again defeated and was slain by Asander, one of his generals, who hoped to obtain his master's kingdom. [ASANDER.]

Pharnacĭa (Φαρνακία : Kheresoun or Kerasunda), a flourishing city of Asia Minor, on the coast of Pontus Polemoniacus, was built near (some think on) the site of Cerasus, probably by Pharnaces, the grandfather of Mithridates the Great, and peopled by the transference to it of the inhabitants of Cotyora. It had a large commerce and extensive fisheries ; and in its neighbourhood were the iron mines of the Chalybes. It was strongly fortified and was used by Mithridates, in the war with Rome, for the place of refuge of his harem.

Pharsālus (Φάρσαλος, Ion. Φάρσηλος: Φαρσάλιος: Pharsa or Fersala), a town in Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis, not far from the frontiers of Phthiotis, W. of the river Enipeus, and on the N. slope of Mt. Narthacius. It was divided into an old and new city, and contained a strongly fortified acropolis. In its neighbourhood, N.E. of the town and on the other side of the Enipeus was a celebrated temple of Thetis, called Thetidium. Near Pharsalus was fought the decisive battle between Caesar and Pompey, B.C. 48, which made Caesar master of the Roman world. It is frequently called the battle of Pharsālĭa, which was the name of the territory of the town.

Phărus (Φάρος). 1. (Pharos or Raudhat-el-tin, i. e. Fig-garden), a small island off the Mediterranean coast of Egypt, mentioned by Homer, who describes it as a whole day's sail distant from Aegyptus, meaning probably, not Egypt itself, but the river Nile. When Alexander the Great planned the city of Alexandria, on the coast opposite to Pharos, he caused the island to be united to the coast by a mole 7 stadia in length, thus forming the 2 harbours of the city. [ALEXANDRIA.] The island was chiefly famous for the lofty tower built upon it by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, for a light-house, whence the name of pharus was applied to all similar structures. It was in this island too that, according to the common story, the 70 translators of the Greek version of the Old Testament, hence called the Septuagint, were confined till their work was finished. The island was well peopled, according to Julius Caesar, but soon afterwards Strabo tells us that it was inhabited only by a few fishermen. — 2. (Lesina or Hvar), an island of the Adriatic, off the coast of Dalmatia, E. of Issa, with a Greek city of the same name (Civita Vecchia, Ru.), which was taken and destroyed by the Romans under Aemilius Paulus, but probably rebuilt, as it is mentioned by Ptolemy under the name of Pharia.

Pharūsii (Φαρούσιοι), a people in the interior (prob. nr. the W. coast) of N. Africa, who carried on a considerable traffic with Mauritania.

Phasaëlis (Φασαηλίς: prob. Ain-el-Fusail), a city of Palestine, in the valley of the Jordan, N. of Jericho, built by Herod the Great.

Phasēlis (Φασηλίς, Φασηλίτης: Tekrova, Ru.), an important sea-port town of Lycia, near the borders of Pamphylia, stood on the gulf of Pamphylia, at the foot of Mt. Solyma, in a narrow pass between the mountains and the sea. It was founded by Dorian colonists, and from its position, and its command of 3 fine harbours, it soon gained an extensive commerce. It did not belong to the Lycian confederacy, but had an independent government of its own. It became afterwards the head-quarters of the pirates who infested the S. coasts of Asia Minor, and was therefore destroyed by P. Servilius Isauricus; and though the city was restored, it never recovered its importance. Phaselis is said to have been the place at which the light quick vessels called φάσηλοι were first built, and the figure of such a ship appears on its coins.

Phăsis (Φᾶσις). 1. (Faz or Rioni), a renowned river of the ancient world, rose in the Moschici M. (or according to others in the Caucasus, where, in fact, its chief tributaries rise), and flowed W.-ward through the plain of Colchis into the E. end of the Pontus Euxinus (Black Sea), after receiving several affluents, the chief of which were the Glaucus and the Rion: the name of the latter was sometimes transferred, as it now is, to the main river. It was navigable about 38 miles above its mouth for large vessels, and for small ones further up, as far as Sarapana (Sharapan), whence goods were conveyed in 4 days across the Moschici M. to the river Cyrus, and so to the Caspian. It was spanned by 120 bridges, and had many towns upon its banks. Its waters were celebrated for their purity and for various other supposed qualities, some of a very marvellous nature; but it was most famous in connection with the story of the Argonautic expedition. [ARGONAUTAE.] Some of the early geographers made it the boundary between Europe and Asia; it was afterwards the N.E. limit of the kingdom of Pontus, and, under the Romans, it was regarded as the N. frontier of their empire in W. Asia. Another notable circumstance connected with it, is that it has given name to the pheasant (phasianus, φασιανός, φασιανικὸς ὄρνις), which is said to have been first brought to Greece from its banks, where the bird is still found in great numbers. — When the geography of these regions was comparatively unknown, it was natural that there should be a doubt as to the identification of certain celebrated names; and thus the name Phasis, like Araxes, is applied to different rivers. The most important of these variations is Xenophon's application of the name Phasis to the river Araxes in Armenia. (Anab. iv. 6.) — 2. Near the mouth of the river, on its S. side, was a town of the same name, founded and fortified by the Milesians as an emporium for their commerce, and used under the Kings of Pontus, and under the Romans, as a frontier fort, and now a Russian fortified station, under the name of Pati. Some identify it with Sebastopolis, but most likely incorrectly. — 3. There was a river of the same name in the island of Taprobane (Ceylon).

Phavorīnus. [FAVORINUS.]

Phayllus (Φάϋλλος). 1. A celebrated athlete of Crotona, who had thrice gained the victory at the Pythian games. He fought at the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480, in a ship fitted out at his own expense. — 2. A Phocian, brother of Onomarchus, whom he succeeded as general of the Phocians in the Sacred War, 352. He died in the following year after a long and painful illness. Phayllus made use of the sacred treasures of Delphi with a far more lavish hand than either of his brothers, and he is accused of bestowing the consecrated ornaments upon his wife and mistresses.

Phazania (Fezzan), a district of Libya Interior. [GARAMANTES.]

Phazēmon (Φαζημών: prob. Marsiwan), a city of Pontus in Asia Minor, N.W. of Amasia, and the capital of the W. district of Pontus, called Phazemonītis (Παζημονῖτις), which lay on the E. side of the Halys, S. of Gazelonitis, and was celebrated for its warm mineral springs. Pompey changed the name of the city to Neapolis, and the district was called Neapolītis; but these names seem to have been soon dropt.

Phea (Φειά, Φεά, Φεαί: Φεαῖος), a town on the frontiers of Elis and Pisatis with a harbour situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the river Iardanus. In front of the harbour was a small island called Phēas (Φείας.)

Pheca or Phecadum, a fortress in Thessaly in the district Hestiaeotis.

Phēgeus (Φηγεύς), king of Psophis in Arcadia, father of Alphesiboea or Arsinoe, of Pronous and Agenor, or of Temenus and Axion. He purified Alcmaeon after he had killed his mother, and gave him his daughter Alphesiboea in marriage. Alcmaeon presented Alphesiboea with the celebrated necklace and peplus of Harmonia; but when Alcmaeon afterwards wished to obtain them again for his new wife Callirrhoë, he was murdered by the sons of Phegeus, by their father's command. Phegeus was himself subsequently put to death by the sons of Alcmaeon. For details see Alcmaeon.

Phellus (Φελλος or Φελλός: Φελλίτης: Ru. near Saaret), an inland city of Lycia, on a mountain between Xanthus and Antiphellus; the latter having been at first the port of Phellus, but afterwards eclipsing it.

Phellūsa, a small island near Lesbos.

Phēmĭus (Φήμιος), a celebrated minstrel, son of Terpius, who entertained with his song the suitors in the palace of Ulysses in Ithaca.

Phēmŏnŏē (Φημονόη), a mythical Greek poetess of the ante-Homeric period, was said to have been the daughter of Apollo, and his first priestess at Delphi, and the inventor of the hexameter verse. There were poems which went under the name of Phemonoë, like the old religious poems which were ascribed to Orpheus, Musaeus, and the other mythological bards.

Phĕnĕus (Φένεος or Φενεός: Φενεάτης: Fonia), a town in the N.E. of Arcadia, at the foot of Mt. Cyllene, and on the river Aroanius. Its territory was called Pheneātis (Φενεᾶτις). There were extensive marshes in the neighbourhood, the waters of which were partly carried off by a subterraneous emissary, which was supposed to have been made by Hercules. The town was of great antiquity. It is mentioned by Homer, and was said to have been built by an autochthon Pheneus. It contained a strongly fortified acropolis with a temple of Athena Tritonia; and in the town itself were the tombs of Iphicles and Myrtilus, and temples of Hermes and Demeter.

Phĕrae (Φεραί: Φεραῖος: Valestino), an ancient town of Thessaly in the S.E. of the Pelasgian plain, W. of Mt. Pelion, S.W. of the lake Boebēis, and 90 stadia from its port-town Pagasae on the Pagasaean gulf. Pherae is celebrated in mythology as the residence of Admetus, and in history on account of its tyrants who extended their power over nearly the whole of Thessaly. Of these the most powerful was Jason, who was made Tagus or generalissimo of Thessaly about B.C. 374. Jason was succeeded in 370 by his 2 brothers Polydorus and Polyphron. The former was soon after assassinated by Polyphron. The latter was murdered in his turn in 369 by his nephew Alexander, who was notorious for his cruelty, and who was put to death in 367 by his wife Thebe and her 3 brothers. At a later period we read that Pherae was surrounded by a number of gardens and country houses.

Phĕrae. [Pharae.]

Phĕrĕcrătes (Φερεκράτης), of Athens, one of the best poets of the Old Comedy, was contemporary with the comic poets Cratinus, Crates, Eupolis, Plato, and Aristophanes, being somewhat younger than the first two, and somewhat older than the others. He gained his first victory B.C. 438, and he imitated the style of Crates, whose actor he had been. Crates and Pherecrates very much modified the coarse satire and vituperation of which this sort of poetry had previously been the vehicle, and constructed their comedies on the basis of a regular plot, and with more dramatic action. Pherecrates did not, however, abstain altogether from personal satire, for we see by the fragments of his plays that he attacked Alcibiades, the tragic poet Melanthius, and others. He invented a new metre, which was named, after him, the Pherecratean. The system of the verse is –́ – –̋ ⏑ ⏑ –́ – which may be best explained as a choriambus, with a spondee for its base, and a long syllable for its termination. The metre is very frequent in the choruses of the Greek tragedians, and in Horace, as, for example—Grato Pyrrha sub antro. The extant titles of the plays of Pherecrates are 18.

Phĕrĕcȳdes (Φερεκύδης). 1. Of Syros, an island in the Aegean, an early Greek philosopher or rather theologian. He flourished about B.C. 544. He is said to have obtained his knowledge from the secret books of the Phoenicians, and to have travelled in Egypt. Almost all the ancient writers who speak of him state that he was the teacher of Pythagoras. According to a common tradition he died of the lousy disease or Morbus Pediculosus; though others give different accounts of his death. The most important subject which he is said to have taught was the doctrine of the Metempsychosis, or, as it is put by other writers, the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. He gave an account of his views in a work, which was extant in the Alexandrian period. It was written in prose, which he is said to have been the first to employ in the explanation of philosophical questions.—2. Of Athens, one of the most celebrated of the early Greek logographers. He lived in the former half of the 5th century B.C., and was a contemporary of Hellanicus and Herodotus. His principal work was a mythological history in 10 books. It began with a theogony, and then proceeded to give an account of the heroic age and of the great families of that time. His fragments have been collected by Sturtz, Pherecydis Fragmenta, Lips. 1824, 2nd ed.; and by C. and T. Müller in Fragmenta Historicum Graecorum, vol. i.

Phĕres (Φέρης). 1. Son of Cretheus and Tyro, and brother of Aeson and Amythaon; he was married to Periclymene, by whom he became the father of Admetus, Lycurgus, Idomene, and Periapis. He was believed to have founded the town of Pherae in Thessaly.—2. Son of Jason and Medea.

Pheretiădes (Φερητιαδης), i. e. a son of Pheres, is especially used as the name of Admetus.

Pheretīma (Φερετίμα), wife of Battus III., and mother of Arcesilaus III., successive kings of Cyrene. After the murder of her son by the Barcaeans [Battiadae, No. 6], Pheretima fled into Egypt to Aryandes, the viceroy of Darius Hystaspis, and representing that the death of Arcesilaus had been the consequence of his submission to the Persians, she induced him to avenge it. On the capture of Barca by the Persian army, she caused those who had the principal share in her son's murder to be impaled, and ordered the breasts of their wives to be cut off. Pheretima then returned to Egypt, where she soon after died of a painful and loathsome disease.

Phĕron or Phĕros (Φέρων, Φερῶς), king of Egypt. and son of Sesostris. He was visited with blindness, an hereditary complaint, though, according to the legend preserved in Herodotus, it was a punishment for his presumptuous impiety in throwing a spear into the waters of the Nile when it had overflowed the fields. By attending to the directions of an oracle he was cured; and he dedicated an obelisk at Heliopolis in gratitude for his recovery. Pliny tells us that this obelisk, together with another also made by him but broken in its removal, was to be seen at Rome in the Circus of Caligula and Nero at the foot of the Vatican hill. Pliny calls the Pheron of Herodotus Nuncoreus, or Nencoreus, a name corrupted, perhaps, from Menophtheus. Diodorus gives him his father's name, Sesoosis. Pheron is of course the same word as Pharaoh.

Phīdīas (Φειδίας), the greatest sculptor and statuary of Greece. Of his personal history we possess but few details. He was a native of Athens, and the son of Charmides, and was born about the time of the battle of Marathon, B. C. 490. He began to work as a statuary about 464, and one of his first great works was the statue of Athena Promachus, which may be assigned to about 460. This work must have established his reputation; but it was surpassed by the splendid productions of his own hand, and of others working under his direction, during the administration of Pericles. That statesman not only chose Phidias to execute the principal statues which were to be set up, but gave him the oversight of all the works of art which were to be erected. Of these works the chief were the Propylaea of the Acropolis, and, above all, the temple of Athena on the Acropolis, called the Parthenon, on which, as the central point of the Athenian polity and religion, the highest efforts of the best of artists were employed. There can be no doubt that the sculptured ornaments of this temple, the remains of which form the glory of the British Museum, were executed under the immediate superintendence of Phidias; but the colossal statue of the divinity made of ivory and gold, which was enclosed within that magnificent shrine, was the work of the artist's own hand. The statue was dedicated in 438. Having finished his great work at Athens, he went to Elis and Olympia, which he was now invited to adorn. He was there engaged for about 4 or 5 years from 437 to 434 or 433, during which time he finished his statue of the Olympian Zeus, the greatest of all his works. On his return to Athens, he fell a victim to the jealousy against his great patron, Pericles, which was then at its height. The party opposed to Pericles, thinking him too powerful to be overthrown by a direct attack, aimed at him in the persons of his most cherished friends, Phidias, Anaxagoras, and Aspasia. [PERICLES.] Phidias was first accused of peculation, but this charge was at once refuted, as, by the advice of Pericles, the gold had been affixed to the statue of Athena, in such a manner that it could be removed and the weight of it examined. The accusers then charged Phidias with impiety, in having introduced into the battle of the Amazons, on the shield of the goddess, his own likeness and that of Pericles. On this latter charge Phidias was thrown into prison, where he died from disease, in 432.—Of the numerous works executed by Phidias for the Athenians the most celebrated was the statue of Athena in the Parthenon, to which reference has already been made. This statue was of that kind of work which the Greeks called chryselephantine, that is, the statue was formed of plates of ivory laid upon a core of wood or stone, for the flesh parts, while the drapery and other ornaments were of solid gold. The statue stood in the foremost and larger chamber of the temple (prodomus). It represented the goddess standing, clothed with a tunic reaching to the ancles, with her spear in her left hand and an image of Victory 4 cubits high in her right: she was girded with the aegis, and had a helmet on her head, and her shield rested on the ground by her side. The height of the statue was 26 cubits, or nearly 40 feet, including the base. The eyes were of a kind of marble, nearly resembling ivory, perhaps painted to imitate the iris and pupil; there is no sufficient authority for the statement which is frequently made, that they were of precious stones. The weight of the gold upon the statue, which, as above stated, was removable at pleasure, is said by Thucydides to have been 40 talents (ii. 13). — Still more celebrated than his statue of Athena was the colossal ivory and gold statue of Zeus, which Phidias made for the great temple of this god, in the Altis or sacred grove at Olympia. This statue was regarded as the masterpiece, not only of Phidias, but of the whole range of Grecian art; and was looked upon not so much as a statue, but rather as if it were the actual manifestation of the present deity. It was placed in the prodomus or front chamber of the temple, directly facing the entrance. It was only visible, however, on great festivals, at other times it was concealed by a magnificent curtain. The god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, stones, and colours, crowned with a wreath of olive, holding in his right hand an ivory and gold statue of Victory, and in his left hand supporting a sceptre, which was ornamented with all sorts of metals, and surmounted by an eagle. The throne was brilliant both with gold and stones, and with ebony and ivory, and was ornamented with figures both painted and sculptured. The statue almost reached to the roof, which was about 60 feet in height. The idea which Phidias essayed to embody in this, his greatest work, was that of the supreme deity of the Hellenic nation, no longer engaged in conflicts with the Titans and the Giants, but having laid aside his thunderbolt, and enthroned as a conqueror, in perfect majesty and repose, ruling with a nod the subject world. It is related that when Phidias was asked what model he meant to follow in making his statue, he replied that of Homer (Il. i. 528—530). The imitation of this passage by Milton gives no small aid to the comprehension of the idea (Paradise Lost, iii. 135—137):

> ' Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd
> All heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect > Sense of new joy ineffable diffused."

The statue was removed by the emperor Theodosius I. to Constantinople, where it was destroyed by a fire in A. D. 475.—The distinguishing character of the art of Phidias was ideal beauty, and that of the sublimest order, especially in the representation of divinities. and of subjects connected with their worship. While on the one hand he set himself free from the stiff and unnatural forms which, by a sort of religious precedent, had fettered his predecessors of the archaic or hieratic school, he never, on the other hand, descended to the exact imitation of any human model, however beautiful; nor did he ever approach to that almost meretricious grace, by which some of his greatest followers, if they did not corrupt the art themselves, gave the occasion for its corruption in the hands of their less gifted and spiritual imitators.

Phīdippĭdēs or Phīlippĭdēs (Φειδιππίδης, Φιλιππίδης), a courier, was sent by the Athenians to Sparta in B. C. 490, to ask for aid against the Persians, and arrived there on the 2nd day from his leaving Athens. On his return to Athens, he related that on his way to Sparta he had fallen in with Pan on Mt. Parthenium, near Tegea, and that the god had bid him ask the Athenians why they paid him no worship, though he had been hitherto their friend, and ever would be so. In consequence of this revelation, they dedicated a temple to Pan after the battle of Marathon, and honoured him thenceforth with annual sacrifices and a torch-race.

Phīdon (Φείδων). 1. Son of Aristodamidas, and king of Argos, restored the supremacy of Argos over Cleonae, Phlius, Sicyon, Epidaurus, Troezen, and Aegina, and aimed at extending his dominions over the greater part of the Peloponnesus. The Pisans invited him, in the 8th Olympiad (B. C. 748), to aid them in excluding the Eleans from their usurped presidency at the Olympic games, and to celebrate them jointly with themselves. The invitation quite fell in with the ambitious pretensions of Phidon, who succeeded in dispossessing the Eleans and celebrating the games along with the Pisans; but the Eleans not long after defeated him, with the aid of Sparta, and recovered their privilege. Thus apparently fell the power of Phidon; but as to the details of the struggle we have no information. The most memorable act of Phidon was his introduction of copper and silver coinage, and a new scale of weights and measures, which, through his influence, became prevalent in the Peloponnesus, and ultimately throughout the greater portion of Greece. The coinage of Phidon is said to have been struck in Aegina.—2. An ancient Corinthian legislator of uncertain date.

Phigalia (Φιγαλία, Φιγάλεια, Φιγαλέα: Φιγαλεύς: Paolitza), at a later time called Phialia, a town in the SW. corner of Arcadia on the frontiers of Messenia and Elis, and upon the river Lymax. It was taken by the Spartans B. C. 559, but was afterwards recovered by the Phigalians with the help of the Oresthasians. It is frequently mentioned in the later wars of the Achaean and Aetolian Leagues.—Phigalia however owes its celebrity in modern times to the remains of a splendid temple in its territory, situated about 6 miles NE. of the town at Bassae on Mt. Cotylum. This temple was built by Ictinus, the contemporary of Pericles and Phidias, and the architect, along with Callicrates, of the Parthenon at Athens. It was dedicated to Apollo Epicurius, or the Deliverer, because the god had delivered the country from the pestilence during the Peloponnesian war. Pausanias describes this temple as the most beautiful one in all Peloponnesus after the temple of Athena at Tegea. Most of the columns are still standing. In 1812 the frieze round the interior of the inner cella was discovered, containing a series of sculptures in alto-relievo, representing the combat of the Centaurs and the Lapithae, and of the Greeks and the Amazons. Their height is a little more than 2 feet, and their total length is 100 feet. They were found on the ground under the spot which they originally occupied, and were much injured by their fall, and by the weight of the ruins lying upon them. They were purchased for the British Museum in 1814, where they are still preserved, and are usually known by the name of the Phigalian Marbles. They are some of the most interesting and beautiful remains of ancient art in this country.

Phila (Φίλα), daughter of Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, was married to Craterus in B. C. 322, and after the death of Craterus, who survived his marriage with her scarcely a year, she was again married to the young Demetrius, the son of Antigonus. When Demetrius was expelled from Macedonia in 287, she put an end to her own life at Cassandrea. She left 2 children by Demetrius; Antigonus, surnamed Gonatas, and a daughter, Stratonice, married first to Seleucus, and afterwards to his son Antiochus.

Phila (Φίλα: Φιλαῖος, Φιλάτης). 1. A town of Macedonia in the province Pieria, situated on a steep hill on the Peneus between Dium and Tempe and at the entrance into Thessaly, built by Demetrius II. and named after his mother Phila.—2. An island off the S. coast of Gaul, one of the Stoechades.

Phĭlădelphia (Φιλαδελφεία: Φιλαδελφεύς.) 1. (Allah Shehr, Ru.), a city of Lydia, at the foot of M. Tmolus, on the little river Cogamus, S.E. of Sardis. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. It suffered greatly from earthquakes; so that in Strabo's time (under Augustus) it had greatly declined. In the reign of Tiberius, it was almost destroyed by one of these visitations. It was an early seat of Christianity, and its church is one of the 7 to which the Apocalypse is addressed. (Rev. iii. 7.)—2. A city of Cilicia Aspera, on the Calycadnus, above Aphrodisias.—3. In Palestine. [RABBATAMANA.]

Phĭlădelphus (Φιλάδελφος), a surname of Ptolemaeus II. king of Egypt [PTOLEMAEUS] and of Attalus II. king of Pergamum [ATTALUS].

Phĭlae (Φιλαί: Jesiret-el-Birbeh, i. e. the Island of Temples), an island in the Nile, just below the First Cataract, on the S. boundary of the country towards Aethiopia. It was inhabited by Egyptians and Ethiopians jointly, and was covered with magnificent temples, whose splendid ruins still remain. It was celebrated in Egyptian mythology as the burial-place of Osiris and Isis.

Phĭlaeni (Φίλαινοι), 2 brothers, citizens of Carthage, of whom the following story is told. A dispute having arisen between the Carthaginians and Cyrenaeans about their boundaries, it was agreed that deputies should start at a fixed time from each of the cities, and that the place of their meeting, wherever it might be, should thenceforth form the limit of the 2 territories. The Philaeni were appointed for this service on the part of the Carthaginians, and advanced much further than the Cyrenaean party. The Cyrenaeans accused them of having set forth before the time agreed upon, but at length consented to accept the spot which they had reached as a boundary-line, if the Philaeni would submit to be buried alive there in the sand. Should they decline the offer, they were willing, they said, on their side, if permitted to advance as far as they pleased, to purchase for Cyrene an extension of territory by a similar death. The Philaeni accordingly then and there devoted themselves for their country, in the way proposed. The Carthaginians paid high honours to their memory, and erected altars to them where they had died; and from these, even long after all traces of them had vanished, the place still continued to be called "The Altars of the Philaeni." Our main authority for this story is Sallust, who probably derived his information from African traditions during the time that he was proconsul of Numidia, and at least 300 years after the event. We cannot, therefore, accept it unreservedly. The Greek name by which the heroic brothers have become known to us — Φίλαινοι, or lovers of praise — seems clearly to have been framed to suit the tale.

Philagrĭus (Φιλάγριος), a Greek medical writer, born in Epirus, lived after Galen and before Oribasius, and therefore probably in the 3rd century after Christ. He wrote several works, of which, however, only a few fragments remain.

Phĭlammon (Φιλάμμων), a mythical poet and musician of the ante-Homeric period, was said to have been the son of Apollo and the nymph Chione, or Philonis, or Leuconoë. By the nymph Agriope, who dwelt on Parnassus, he became the father of Thamyris and Eumolpus. He is closely associated with the worship of Apollo at Delphi, and with the music of the cithara. He is said to have established the choruses of girls, who, in the Delphian worship of Apollo, sang hymns in which they celebrated the births of Latona, Artemis, and Apollo. Pausanias relates that in the most ancient musical contests at Delphi, the first who conquered was Chrysothemis of Crete, the second was Philammon, and the next after him his son Thamyris.

Philargyrĭus Junĭus, or Philargyrus, or Junilius Flagrius, an early commentator upon Virgil, who wrote upon the Bucolics and Georgics. His observations are less elaborate than those of Servius, and have descended to us in a mutilated condition. The period when he flourished is altogether uncertain. They are printed in the edition of Virgil by Burmann.

Phile or Philes, Manuel (Μανουὴλ ὁ Φιλῆς), a Byzantine poet, and a native of Ephesus, was born about A. D. 1275, and died about 1340. His poem, De Animalium Proprietate, chiefly extracted from Aelian, is edited by De Paw, Traj. Rhen. 1739; and his other poems on various subjects are edited by Wernsdorf, Lips. 1768.

Philĕas (Φιλέας), a Greek geographer of Athens, whose time cannot be determined with certainty, but who probably belonged to the older period of Athenian literature. He was the author of a Periplus, which was divided into 2 parts, one on Asia, and the other on Europe.

Phĭlēmon (Φιλήμων). 1. An aged Phrygian and husband of Baucis. Once upon a time, Zeus and Hermes, assuming the appearance of ordinary mortals, visited Phrygia; but no one was willing to receive the strangers, until the hospitable hut of Philemon and Baucis was opened to them, where the two gods were kindly treated. Zeus rewarded the good old couple by taking them to an eminence, while all the neighbouring district was visited with a sudden inundation. On that eminence Zeus appointed them the guardians of his temple, and allowed them both to die at the same moment, and then metamorphosed them into trees. — 2. An Athenian poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Damon, and a native of Soli in Cilicia, but at an early age went to Athens, and there received the citizenship. He flourished in the reign of Alexander, a little earlier than Menander, whom, however, he long survived. He began to exhibit about B. C. 330. He was the first poet of the New Comedy in order of time, and the second in celebrity; and he shares with Menander the honour of its invention, or rather of reducing it to a regular form. Philemon lived nearly 100 years. The manner of his death is differently related; some ascribing it to excessive laughter at a ludicrous incident; others to joy at obtaining a victory in a dramatic contest; while another story represents him as quietly called away by the goddesses whom he served, in the midst of the composition or representation of his last and best work. Although there can be no doubt that Philemon was inferior to Menander as a poet, yet he was a greater favourite with the Athenians, and often conquered his rival in the dramatic contests. [Menander.] The extant fragments of Philemon display much liveliness, wit, elegance, and practical knowledge of life. His favourite subjects seem to have been love intrigues, and his characters were the standing ones of the New Comedy, with which Plautus and Terence have made us familiar. The number of his plays was 97; the number of extant titles, after the doubtful and spurious ones are rejected, amounts to about 53; but it is very probable that some of these should be assigned to the younger Philemon. The fragments of Philemon are printed with those of Menander by Meineke, in his Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, Berol. 1841. — 3. The younger Philemon, also a poet of the New Comedy, was a son of the former, in whose fame nearly all that belongs to him has been absorbed; so that, although he was the author of 54 dramas, there are only 2 short fragments, and not one title, quoted expressly under his name. — 4. The author of a Λεξικὸν τεχνολογικόν, the extant portion of which was first edited by Burney, Lond. 1812, and afterwards by Osann, Berlin, 1821. The author informs us that his work was intended to take the place of a similar Lexicon by the Grammarian Hyperechius. The work of Hyperechius was arranged in 8 books, according to the 8 different parts of speech. Philemon's lexicon was a meagre epitome of this work; and the part of it which is extant consists of the 1st book and the beginning of the 2nd. Hyperechius lived about the middle of the 5th century of our era, and Philemon may probably be placed in the 7th.

Phĭlĕtaerus (Φιλέταιρος). 1. Founder of the kingdom of Pergamus, was a native of Tieium in Paphlagonia, and an eunuch. He is first mentioned in the service of Docimus, the general of Antigonus, from which he passed into that of Lysimachus, who entrusted him with the charge of the treasures which he had deposited in the strong fortress of Pergamus. Towards the end of the reign of Lysimachus he declared in favour of Seleucus; and, after the death of the latter (B. C. 280), he took advantage of the disorders in Asia to establish himself in virtual independence. At his death he transmitted the government of Pergamus, as an independent state, to his nephew Eumenes. He lived to the age of 80, and died apparently in 263. — 2. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy. Some said he was the third son of Aristophanes, but others maintained that it was Nicostratus. He wrote 21 plays.

Philētas (Φιλητᾶς), of Cos, the son of Telephus, a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, flourished during the reign of the first Ptolemy, who appointed him tutor of his son, Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. His death may be placed about B. C. 280. Philetas seems to have been naturally of a very weak constitution, which at last broke down under excessive study. He was so remarkably thin as to become an object for the ridicule of the comic poets, who represented him as wearing leaden soles to his shoes, to prevent his being blown away by a strong wind. His poetry was chiefly elegiac. Of all the writers in that department he was esteemed the best after Callimachus; to whom a taste less pedantic than that of the Alexandrian critics would probably have preferred him; for, to judge by his fragments, he escaped the snare of cumbrous learned affectation. These 2 poets formed the chief models for the Roman elegy: nay, Propertius expressly states, in one passage, that he imitated Philetas in preference to Callimachus. The elegies of Philetas were chiefly amatory, and a large portion of them was devoted to the praises of his mistress Bittis, or, as the Latin poets give the name, Battis. Besides his poems, Philetas wrote in prose on grammar and criticism. His most important grammatical work was entitled Ἄτακτα. The fragments of Philetas have been collected by Bach, with those of Hermesianax and Phanocles, Halis Sax. 1829.

Phīleus, an eminent Ionian architect, built the Mausoleum, in conjunction with SATYRUS, and the temple of Athena Polias, at Priene. The date of the erection of the Mausoleum was soon after B. C. 353, the year in which Mausolus died; that of the temple at Priene must have been about 20 years later.

Philīnus (Φιλῖνος). 1. A Greek of Agrigentum, accompanied Hannibal in his campaigns against Rome, and wrote a history of the Punic wars, in which he exhibited much partiality towards Carthage. — 2. An Attic orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes and Lycurgus. He is mentioned by Demosthenes in his oration against Midias, who calls him the son of Nicostratus, and says that he was trierarch with him. Three orations of Philinus are mentioned by the grammarians. — 3. A Greek physician, born in the island of Cos, and the reputed founder of the sect of the Empirici, probably lived in the 3rd century B. C. He wrote a work on part of the Hippocratic collection, and also one on botany.

Phĭlippi (Φίλιπποι: Φιλιππεύς, Φιλιππήσιος, Φιλιππηνός: Filibah or Felibejik), a celebrated city in Macedonia adjecta [see p. 404, a], was situated on a steep height of Mt. Pangaeus, and on the river Gangas or Gangites, between the rivers Nestus and Strymon. It was founded by Philip on the site of an ancient town Crenides (Κρηνίδες), a colony of the Thasians, who settled here on account of the valuable gold mines in the neighbourhood. Philippi is celebrated in history in consequence of the victory gained here by Octavianus and Antony over Brutus and Cassius, B. C. 42, and as the place where the Apostle Paul first preached the gospel in Europe, A.D. 53. The church at Philippi soon became one of the most important of the early Christian churches: one of St. Paul's Epistles is addressed to it. It was made a Roman colony by Octavianus after the victory over Brutus and Cassius, under the name of Col. Augusta Julia Philippensis; and it continued to be under the empire a flourishing and important city. Its seaport was Datum or Datus on the Strymonic gulf.

Phĭlippĭdes (Φιλιππίδης). 1. See PHIDIPPIDES. — 2. Of Athens, the son of Philocles, is mentioned as one of the 6 principal comic poets of the New Comedy by the grammarians. He flourished about B. C. 323. Philippides seems to have deserved the rank assigned to him, as one of the best poets of the New Comedy. He attacked the luxury and corruptions of his age, defended the privileges of his art, and made use of personal satire with a spirit approaching to that of the Old Comedy. His death is said to have been caused by excessive joy at an unexpected victory: similar tales are told of the deaths of other poets, as for example, Sophocles, Alexis, and Philemon. The number of his dramas is stated at 45. There are 15 titles extant.

Philippŏpŏlis (Φιλιππόπολις: Philippopoli), an important town in Thrace founded by Philip of Macedon on the site of a place previously called Eumolpias or Poneropolis. It was situated in a large plain S.E. of the Hebrus on a hill with 3 summits, whence it was sometimes called Trimontium. Under the Roman empire it was the capital of the province of Thracia in its narrower sense, and one of the most important towns in the country.

Phĭlippus (Φίλιππος). I. Minor historical persons. 1. Son of Alexander I. of Macedonia, and brother of Perdiccas II., against whom he rebelled in conjunction with Derdas. The rebels were aided by the Athenians, B. C. 432. — 2. Son of Herod the Great, king of Judea, by his wife Cleopatra, was appointed by his father's will tetrarch of Ituraea and Trachonitis, the sovereignty of which was confirmed to him by the decision of Augustus. He continued to reign over the dominions thus entrusted to his charge for 37 years (B. C. 4 — A. D. 34). He founded the city of Caesarea, surnamed Paneas, but more commonly known as Caesarea Philippi, near the sources of the Jordan, which he named in honour of Augustus. [CAESAREA, No. 2.] — 3. Son of Herod the Great, by Mariamne, whose proper name was Herodes Philippus. He must not be confounded with the preceding Philip. He was the first husband of Herodias, who afterwards divorced him, contrary to the Jewish law, and married his half-brother, Herod Antipas. It is Herod Philip, and not the preceding, who is meant by the Evangelists (Matt. xiv. 3; Mark, vi. 17; Luke, iii. 19), when they speak of Philip, the brother of Herod.

II. Kings of Macedonia.

I. Son of Argaeus, was the 3rd king, according to Herodotus and Thucydides, who, not reckoning CARANUS and his two immediate successors (Coenus and Thurimas or Turimmas), look upon Perdiccas I. as the founder of the monarchy. Philip left a son, named Aëropus, who succeeded him. — II. Youngest son of Amyntas II. and Eurydice, reigned B. C. 359—336. He was born in 382, and was brought up at Thebes, whither he had been carried as a hostage by Pelopidas, and where he received a most careful education. Upon the death of his brother Perdiccas III., who was slain in battle against the Illyrians, Philip obtained the government of Macedonia, at first merely as regent and guardian to his infant nephew Amyntas ; but at the end of a few months he was enabled to set aside the claims of the young prince, and to assume for himself the title of king. Macedonia was beset by dangers on every side. Its territory was ravaged by the Illyrians on the W., and the Paeonians on the N., while Pausanias and Argaeus took advantage of the crisis to put forward their pretensions to the throne. Philip was fully equal to the emergency. By his tact and eloquence he sustained the failing spirits of the Macedonians, while at the same time he introduced among them a stricter military discipline, and organised their army on the plan of the phalanx. He first turned his arms against Argaeus, the most formidable of the pretenders, since he was supported by the Athenians. He defeated Argaeus in battle, and then concluded a peace with the Athenians. He next attacked the Paeonians, whom he reduced to subjection, and immediately afterwards defeated the Illyrians in a decisive battle, and compelled them to accept a peace, by which they lost a portion of their territory. Thus in the short period of one year, and at the age of 24, had Philip delivered himself from his dangerous position, and provided for the security of his kingdom. But energy and talents such as his were not satisfied with mere security, and henceforth his views were directed, not to defence, but to aggrandisement. His first efforts were directed to obtain possession of the various Greek cities upon the Macedonian coast. Soon after his accession he had withdrawn his garrison from Amphipolis, and had declared it a free city, because the Athenians had supported Argaeus with the hope of recovering Amphipolis, and his continuing to hold the place would have interposed difficulties in the way of a peace with Athens, which was at that time an object of great importance to him. But he had never meant seriously to abandon this important town ; and accordingly having obtained pretexts for war with the Amphipolitans, he laid siege to the town and gained possession of it in 358. The Athenians had sent no assistance to Amphipolis, because Philip in a secret negotiation with the Athenians, led them to believe that he was willing to restore the city to them when he had taken it, and would do so on condition of their making him master of Pydna. After the capture of Amphipolis, he proceeded at once to Pydna, which seems to have yielded to him without a struggle, and the acquisition of which, by his own arms, and not through the Athenians, gave him a pretext for declining to stand by his secret engagement with them. The hostile feeling which such conduct necessarily excited against him at Athens, made it most important for him to secure the good will of the powerful town of Olynthus, and to detach the Olynthians from the Athenians. Accordingly he gave to the Olynthians the town of Potidaea, which he took from the Athenians in 356. Soon after this, he attacked and took a settlement of the Thasians, called Crenides, and, having introduced into the place a number of new colonists, he named it Philippi after himself. One great advantage of this acquisition was, that it put him in possession of the gold mines of the district. From this point there is for some time a pause in the active operations of Philip. In 352 he took Methone after a lengthened siege, in the course of which he himself lost an eye. The capture of this place was a necessary preliminary in any movement towards the S., lying as it did between him and the Thessalian border. He now marched into Thessaly to aid the Aleuadae against Lycophron, the tyrant of Pherae. The Phocians sent a force to support Lycophron, but they were defeated by Philip, and their general Onomarchus slain. This victory gave Philip the ascendancy in Thessaly. He established at Pherae what he wished the Greeks to consider a free government, and then advanced S.-ward to Thermopylae. The pass, however, he found guarded by a strong Athenian force, and he was compelled, or at least thought it expedient to retire. He now turned his arms against Thrace, and succeeded in establishing his ascendancy in that country also. Meanwhile Philip's movements in Thessaly had opened the eyes of Demosthenes to the real danger of Athens and Greece, and his first Philippic (delivered in 352) was his earliest attempt to rouse his countrymen to energetic efforts against their enemy; but he did not produce much effect upon the Athenians. In 349 Philip commenced his attacks on the Chalcidian cities. Olynthus, in alarm, applied to Athens for aid, and Demosthenes, in his 3 Olynthiac orations, roused the people to efforts against the common enemy, not very vigorous at first and fruitless in the end. In the course of 3 years Philip gained possession of all the Chalcidian cities, and the war was brought to a conclusion by the capture of Olynthus itself in 347. In the following year (346) he concluded peace with the Athenians, and straightway marched into Phocis, and brought the Phocian war to an end. The Phocian cities were destroyed, and their place in the Amphictyonic council was made over to the king of Macedonia, who was appointed also, jointly with the Thebans and Thessalians, to the presidency of the Pythian games. Ruling as he did over a barbaric nation, such a recognition of his Hellenic character was of the greatest value to him, especially as he looked forward to an invasion of the Persian empire in the name of Greece, united under him in a great national confederacy. During the next few years Philip steadily pursued his ambitious projects. From 342 to 340 he was engaged in an expedition in Thrace, and attempted to bring under his power all the Greek cities in that country. In the last of these years he laid siege to Perinthus and Byzantium; but the Athenians, who had long viewed Philip's aggrandisement with fear and alarm, now resolved to send assistance to these cities. Phocion was appointed to the command of the armament destined for this service, and succeeded in compelling Philip to raise the siege of both the cities (339). Philip now proceeded to carry on war against his northern neighbours, and seemed to give himself no further concern about the affairs of Greece. But meanwhile his hirelings were treacherously promoting his designs against the liberties of Greece. In 339 the Amphictyons declared war against the Locrians of Amphissa for having taken possession of a district of the sacred land ; but as the general they had appointed to the command of the Amphictyonic army was unable to effect any thing against the enemy, the Amphictyons at their next meeting in 338 conferred upon Philip the command of their army. Philip straightway marched through Thermopylae and seized Elatea. The Athenians heard of his approach with alarm; they succeeded, mainly through the influence of Demosthenes in forming an alliance with the Thebans; but their united army was defeated by Philip in the month of August, 338, in the decisive battle of Chaeronea, which put an end to the independence of Greece. Thebes paid dear for her resistance, but Athens was treated with more favour than she could have expected. Philip now seemed to have within his reach the accomplishment of the great object of his ambition, the invasion and conquest of the Persian empire. In a congress held at Corinth, which was attended by deputies from every Grecian state with the exception of Sparta, war with Persia was determined on, and the king of Macedonia was appointed to command the forces of the national confederacy. In 337 Philip's marriage with Cleopatra, the daughter of Attalus, one of his generals, led to the most serious disturbances in his family. Olympias and Alexander withdrew in great indignation from Macedonia; and though they returned home soon afterwards, they continued to be on hostile terms with Philip. Meanwhile, his preparations for his Asiatic expedition were not neglected, and early in 336 he sent forces into Asia, under Parmenion, to draw over the Greek cities to his cause. But in the summer of this year he was murdered at a grand festival which he held at Aegae, to solemnise the nuptials of his daughter with Alexander of Epirus. His murderer was a youth of noble blood, named Pausanias, who stabbed him as he was walking in the procession. The assassin was immediately pursued and slain by some of the royal guards. His motive for the deed is stated by Aristotle to have been private resentment against Philip, to whom he had complained in vain of a gross outrage offered to him by Attalus. Olympias and Alexander, however, were suspected of being implicated in the plot. [OLYMPIAS.] Philip died in the 47th year of his age and the 24th of his reign, and was succeeded by Alexander the Great. Philip had a great number of wives and concubines. Besides Olympias and Cleopatra, we may mention, 1. his first wife Audata, an Illyrian princess, and the mother of Cynane; 2. Phila, sister of Derdas and Machatas, a princess of Elymiotis; 3. Nicesipolis of Pherae, the mother of Thessalonica; 4. Philinna of Larissa, the mother of Arrhidaeus; 5. Meda, daughter of Cithelas, king of Thrace; 6. Arsinoë, the mother of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, with whom she was pregnant when she married Lagus. To these numerous connections temperament as well as policy seems to have inclined him. He was strongly addicted, indeed, to sensual enjoyment of every kind; but his passions, however strong, were always kept in subjection to his interests and ambitious views. He was fond of science and literature, in the patronage of which he appears to have been liberal; and his appreciation of great minds is shown by his connection with Aristotle. In the pursuit of his political objects he was, as we have seen, unscrupulous, and ever ready to resort to duplicity and corruption; but when we consider his humanity and generous clemency, we may admit that he does not appear to disadvantage, even morally speaking, by the side of his fellow-conquerors of mankind. — III. The name of Philip was bestowed by the Macedonian army upon Arrhidaeus, the bastard son of Philip II., when he was raised to the throne after the death of Alexander the Great. He accordingly appears in the list of Macedonian kings as Philip III. For his life and reign see ARRHIDAEUS. — IV. Eldest son of Cassander, whom he succeeded on the throne, B. C. 296. He reigned only a few months, and was carried off by a consumptive disorder. — V. Son of Demetrius II., reigned B. C. 220—178. He was only 8 years old at the death of his father Demetrius (229); and the sovereign power was consequently assumed by his uncle Antigonus Doson, who, though he certainly ruled as king rather than merely as guardian of his nephew, was faithful to the interests of Philip, to whom he transferred the sovereignty at his death in 220, to the exclusion of his own children. Philip was only 17 years old at the time of his accession, but he soon showed that he possessed ability and wisdom superior to his years. In consequence of the defeat of the Achaeans and Aratus by the Aetolians, the former applied for aid to Philip. This was granted; and for the next 3 years Philip conducted with distinguished success the war against the Aetolians. This war, usually called the Social war, was brought to a conclusion in 217, and at once gained for Philip a distinguished reputation throughout Greece, while his clemency and moderation secured him an equal measure of popularity. But a change came over his character soon after the close of the Social war. He became suspicious and cruel; and having become jealous of his former friend and counsellor Aratus, he caused him to be removed by a slow and secret poison in 213. Meantime he had become engaged in war with the Romans. In 215 he concluded an alliance with Hannibal; but he did not prosecute the war with any activity against the Romans, who on their part were too much engaged with their formidable adversary in Italy to send any powerful armament against the Macedonian king. In 211 the war assumed a new character in consequence of the alliance entered into by the Romans with the Aetolians. It was now carried on with greater vigour and alternate success; but as Philip gained several advantages over the Aetolians, the latter people made peace with Philip in 205. In the course of the same year the Romans likewise concluded a peace with Philip, as they were desirous to give their undivided attention to the war in Africa. It is probable that both parties looked upon this peace as little more than a suspension of hostilities. Such was clearly the view with which the Romans had accepted it; and Philip not only proceeded to carry out his views for his own aggrandisement in Greece, without any regard to the Roman alliances in that country, but he even sent a body of auxiliaries to the Carthaginians in Africa, who fought at Zama under Hannibal. As soon as the Romans had brought the 2nd Punic war to an end, they again declared war against Philip, 200. This war lasted between 3 and 4 years, and was brought to an end by the defeat of Philip by the consul Flamininus at the battle of Cynoscephalae in the autumn of 197. [FLAMININUS.] By the peace finally granted to Philip (196), the king was compelled to abandon all his conquests, both in Europe and Asia, surrender his whole fleet to the Romans, and limit his standing army to 5000 men, besides paying a sum of 1000 talents. Philip was now effectually humbled, and endeavoured to cultivate the friendship of the all-powerful republic. But towards the end of his reign he determined to try once more the fortune of war, and began to make active preparations for this purpose. His declining years were embittered by the disputes between his sons Perseus and Demetrius; and the former by forged letters at length persuaded the king that Demetrius was plotting against his life, and induced him to consent to the execution of the unhappy prince. Philip was struck with the deepest grief and remorse, when he afterwards discovered the deceit that had been practised upon him. He believed himself to be haunted by the avenging spirit of Demetrius, and died shortly after, imprecating curses upon Perseus. His death took place in 179, in the 59th year of his age, after a reign of nearly 42 years.

III. Family of the Marcii Philippi.

1. Q. Marcius Philippus, praetor 188, with Sicily as his province, and consul 186, when he carried on war in Liguria with his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus. He was defeated by the enemy in the country of the Apuani, and the recollection of his defeat was preserved by the name of the saltus Marcius. In 169 Philippus was consul a 2nd time, and carried on the war in Macedonia against Perseus, but accomplished nothing of importance. [PERSEUS.] In 164, Philippus was censor with L. Aemilius Paulus, and in his censorship he set up in the city a new sun-dial. — 2. L. Marcius Philippus, was a tribune of the plebs, 104, when he brought forward an agrarian law, and was consul in 91 with Sex. Julius Caesar. In this year Philippus, who belonged to the popular party, opposed with the greatest vigour the measures of the tribune Drusus, who at first enjoyed the full confidence of the senate. But his opposition was all in vain; the laws of the tribune were carried. Soon afterwards Drusus began to be regarded with mistrust and suspicion; Philippus became reconciled to the senate, and on his proposition a senatus consultum was passed, declaring all the laws of Drusus to be null and void, as having been carried against the auspices [DRUSUS.] In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Philippus took no part. He survived the death of Sulla; and he is mentioned afterwards as one of those who advocated sending Pompey to conduct the war in Spain against Sertorius. Philippus was one of the most distinguished orators of his time (Hor. Epist. i. 7. 46). As an orator he was reckoned only inferior to Crassus and Antonius. He was a man of luxurious habits, which his wealth enabled him to gratify: his fish-ponds were particularly celebrated for their magnificence and extent, and are mentioned by the ancients along with those of Lucullus and Hortensius. Besides his son, L. Philippus, who is spoken of below, he had a step-son Gellius Publicola [PUBLICOLA]. — 3. L. Marcius Philippus, son of the preceding, was consul in 56. Upon the death of C. Octavius, the father of Augustus, Philippus married his widow Atia, and thus became the step-father of Augustus. Philippus was a timid man. Notwithstanding his close connection with Caesar's family, he remained neutral in the civil wars; and after the assassination of Caesar, he endeavoured to dissuade his step-son, the young Octavius, from accepting the inheritance which the dictator had left him. He lived till his step-son had acquired the supremacy of the Roman world. He restored the temple of Hercules and the Muses, and surrounded it with a colonnade, which is frequently mentioned under the name of Porticus Philippi. (Clari monimenta Philippi, Ov. Fast. vi. 801.)

IV. Emperors of Rome.

1. M. Julius Philippus I., Roman emperor A. D. 244—249, was an Arabian by birth, and entered the Roman army, in which he rose to high rank. He accompanied Gordianus III. in his expedition against the Persians; and upon the death of the excellent Misitheus [MISITHEUS] he was promoted to the vacant office of praetorian praefect. He availed himself of the influence of his high office to excite discontent among the soldiers, who at length assassinated Gordian, and proclaimed Philippus emperor, 244. Philippus proclaimed his son Caesar, concluded a disgraceful peace with Sapor, founded the city of Philippopolis, and then returned to Rome. In 245 he was engaged in prosecuting a successful war against the Carpi, on the Danube. In 248, rebellions, headed by Iotapinus and Marinus, broke out simultaneously in the East and in Moesia. Both pretenders speedily perished, but Decius having been despatched to recall the legions on the Danube to their duty, was himself forcibly invested with the purple by the troops, and compelled by them to march upon Italy. Philippus having gone forth to encounter his rival, was slain near Verona either in battle or by his own soldiers. The great domestic event of the reign of Philippus was the exhibition of the secular games, which were celebrated with even more than the ordinary degree of splendour, since Rome had now, according to the received tradition, attained the thousandth year of her existence (A. D. 248). — 2. M. Julius Philippus II., son of the foregoing, was a boy of 7 at the accession (244) of his father, by whom he was proclaimed Caesar, and 3 years afterwards (247) received the title of Augustus. In 249 he was slain, according to Zosimus, at the battle of Verona, or murdered, according to Victor, at Rome by the praetorians, when intelligence arrived of the defeat and death of the emperor.

V. Literary.

1. Of Medma, in the S. of Italy, a Greek astronomer, and a disciple of Plato. His observations, which were made in the Peloponnesus and in Locris, were used by the astronomers Hipparchus, Geminus the Rhodian, and Ptolemy. — 2. Of Thessalonica, an epigrammatic poet, who, besides composing a large number of epigrams himself, compiled one of the ancient Greek Anthologies. The whole number of epigrams ascribed to him in the Greek Anthology is nearly 90; but of these, 6 (Nos. 36—41) ought to be ascribed to Lucillius, and a few others are manifestly borrowed from earlier poets, while others are mere imitations. The Anthology (Ἀνθολογία) of Philip, in imitation of that of Meleager, and as a sort of supplement to it, contains chiefly the epigrams of poets who lived in, or shortly before, the time of Philip. The earliest of these poets seems to be Philodemus, the contemporary of Cicero, and the latest Automedon, who probably flourished under Nerva. Hence it is inferred that Philip flourished under Trajan.

Philiscus (Φιλίσκος). 1. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, of whom little is known. He must have flourished about B. C. 400, or a little later, as his portrait was painted by Parrhasius. — 2. Of Miletus, an orator or rhetorician, and the disciple of Isocrates, wrote a life of the orator Lycurgus, and an epitaph on Lysias.—3. Of Aegina, a cynic philosopher, was the disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, and the teacher of Alexander in grammar.—4. Of Corcyra, a distinguished tragic poet, and one of the 7 who formed the Tragic Pleiad at Alexandria, was also a priest of Dionysus, and in that character he was present at the coronation procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus in B. C. 284. He wrote 42 dramas.—5. Of Rhodes, a sculptor, several of whose works were placed in the temple of Apollo, adjoining the portico of Octavia at Rome. One of these statues was that of the god himself: the others were Latona and Diana, the 9 Muses, and another statue of Apollo, without drapery. He probably lived about B. C. 146. The group of Muses, found in the villa of Cassius at Tivoli, is supposed by some to be a copy of that of Philiscus. Others take the beautiful statue at Florence, known as the Apollino, for the naked Apollo of Philiscus.

Philistīnae Fossae. [PADUS.]

Philistĭon (Φιλιστίων). 1. Of Nicaea or Magnesia, a mimographer, who flourished in the time of Augustus, about A. D. 7. He was an actor, as well as a writer of mimes, and is said to have died of excessive laughter.—2. A physician, born either at one of the Greek towns in Sicily, or at Locri Epizephyrii in Italy, was tutor to the physician Chrysippus of Cnidos and the astronomer and physician Eudoxus, and therefore must have lived in the 4th century B. C.

Philistus (Φίλιστος), a Syracusan, son of Archonides or Archomenides, was born probably about B. C. 435. He assisted Dionysius in obtaining the supreme power, and stood so high in the favour of the tyrant, that the latter entrusted him with the charge of the citadel of Syracuse. But at a later period he excited the jealousy of the tyrant by marrying, without his consent, one of the daughters of his brother Leptines, and was in consequence banished from Sicily. He at first retired to Thurii, but afterwards established himself at Adria, where he composed the historical work which has given celebrity to his name. He was recalled from exile by the younger Dionysius soon after his accession, and quickly succeeded in establishing his influence over the mind of the latter. He exerted all his efforts to alienate Dionysius from his former friends, and not only caused Plato to be sent back to Athens, but ultimately succeeded in effecting the banishment of Dion also. Philistus was unfortunately absent from Sicily, when Dion first landed in the island, and made himself master of Syracuse, B. C. 356. He afterwards raised a powerful fleet, with which he gave battle to the Syracusans, but having been defeated, and finding himself cut off from all hopes of escape, he put an end to his own life to avoid falling into the hands of his enraged countrymen. Philistus wrote a history of Sicily, which was one of the most celebrated historical works of antiquity, though unfortunately only a few fragments of it have come down to us. It consisted of 2 portions, which might be regarded either as 2 separate works, or as parts of one great whole, a circumstance which explains the discrepancies in the statements of the number of books of which it was composed. The first 7 books comprised the general history of Sicily, commencing from the earliest times, and ending with the capture of Agrigentum by the Carthaginians, B. C. 406. The 2nd part, which formed a sequel to the 1st, contained the history of the elder Dionysius in 4 books, and that of the younger in 2: the latter was necessarily imperfect. In point of style Philistus is represented by the concurrent testimony of antiquity as imitating and even closely resembling Thucydides, though still falling far short of his great model. The fragments of Philistus have been collected by Goeller in an appendix to his work, De Situ et Origine Syracusarum, Lips. 1818, and by C. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historicorum Graecorum, Paris, 1841.

Phĭlo (Φίλων). 1. An Academic philosopher, was a native of Larissa and a disciple of Clitomachus. After the conquest of Athens by Mithridates he removed to Rome, where he settled as a teacher of philosophy and rhetoric, and had Cicero as one of his hearers.—2. Byblius, also called HERENNIUS BYBLIUS, a Roman grammarian, and a native of Byblus in Phoenicia, as his patronymic indicates, was born about the time of Nero, and lived to a good old age, having written of the reign of Hadrian. He wrote many works, which are cited by Suidas and others; but his name is chiefly memorable by his translation of the writings of the Phoenician Sanchuniathon, of which considerable fragments have been preserved by Eusebius. [SANCHUNIATHON.]—3. Of Byzantium, a celebrated mechanician, and a contemporary of Ctesibius, flourished about B. C. 146. He wrote a work on military engineering, of which the 4th and 5th books have come down to us, and are printed in the Veterum Mathematicorum Opera, of Thevenot, Paris, 1693. There is also attributed to this Philo a work On the Seven Wonders of the World; but this work must have been written at a later time. The 7 wonders are the Hanging Gardens, the Pyramids, the statue of Jupiter Olympius, the Walls of Babylon, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and, we may presume, from the prooemium, the Mausoleum; but the last is entirely wanting, and we have only a fragment of the Ephesian temple. Edited by Orelli, Lips. 1816.—4. Judaeus, the Jew, was born at Alexandria, and was descended from a priestly family of distinction. He had already reached an advanced age, when he went to Rome (A. D. 40) on an embassy to the emperor Caligula, in order to procure the revocation of the decree which exacted from the Jews divine homage to the statue of the emperor. We have no other particulars of the life of Philo worthy of record. His most important works treat of the books of Moses, and are generally cited under different titles. His great object was to reconcile the Sacred Scriptures with the doctrines of the Greek philosophy, and to point out the conformity between the two. He maintained that the fundamental truths of Greek philosophy were derived from the Mosaic revelation; and in order to make the latter agree more perfectly with the former, he had recourse to an allegorical interpretation of the books of Moses. Philo may therefore be regarded as a precursor of the Neo-Platonic philosophy. The best edition of his works is by Mangey, Lond. 1742, 2 vols. fo.—5. A Megarian philosopher, was a disciple of Diodorus Cronus, and a friend of Zeno.—6. Of Tarsus in Cilicia, a celebrated physician, frequently quoted by Galen and others.—7. Artists. (1). Son of Antipater, a statuary who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and made the statue of Hephaestion, and also the statue of Zeus Ourios, which stood on the shore of the Black Sea, at the entrance of the Bosporus, near Chalcedon, and formed an important landmark for sailors. It was still perfect in the time of Cicero (in Verr. iv. 58), and the base has been preserved to modern times, bearing an inscription of 8 elegiac verses. — (2.) A very eminent architect at Athens in the time of the immediate successors of Alexander. He built for Demetrius Phalereus, about B.C. 318, the portico of 12 Doric columns to the great temple at Eleusis. He also constructed for the Athenians, under the administration of Lycurgus, a basin (armamentarium) in the Piraeus, in which 1000 ships could lie. This work, which excited the greatest admiration, was destroyed in the taking of Athens by Sulla.

Phĭlo, Q. Publilĭus, a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, and the auther of one of the great reforms in the Roman constitution. He was consul B.C. 339, with Ti. Aemilius Mamercinus, and defeated the Latins, over whom he triumphed. In the same year he was appointed dictator by his colleague Aemilius Mamercinus, and, as such, proposed the celebrated Publiliae Leges, which abolished the power of the patrician assembly of the curiae, and elevated the plebeians to an equality with the patricians for all practical purposes. (Dict. of Antiq. art. Publiliae Leges.) In 337 Philo was the 1st plebeian praetor, and in 332 he was censor with Sp. Postumius Albinus. In 327 he was consul a 2nd time, and carried on war in the S. of Italy. He was continued in the command for the following year with the title of proconsul, the 1st instance in Roman history in which a person was invested with proconsular power. He took Palaepolis in 326. In 320 he was consul a 3rd time, with L. Papirius Cursor, and carried on the war with success against the Samnites.

Phĭlo, L. Veturĭus. 1. L., consul B.C. 220, with C. Lutatius Catulus; dictator 217 for the purpose of holding the comitia; and censor 210 with P. Licinius Crassus Dives, and died while holding this office. — 2. L., praetor 209 with Cisalpine Gaul as his province. In 207 he served under Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator in the campaign against Hasdrubal. In 206 he was consul with Q. Caecilius Metellus, and in conjunction with his colleague carried on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium. He accompanied Scipio to Africa, and after the battle of Zama, 202, was sent to Rome to announce the news of Hannibal's defeat.

Phĭlŏchāres (Φιλοχάρης), a distinguished painter, mentioned by Pliny, is supposed by the modern writers on art to be the same person as the brother of Aeschines, of whose artistic performances Demosthenes speaks contemptuously, but whom Ulpian ranks with the most distinguished painters.

Philŏchŏrus (Φιλόχορος), a celebrated Athenian writer, chiefly known by his Atthis, or work on the legends, antiquities, and history of Attica. He was a person of considerable importance in his native city, and was put to death by Antigonus Gonatas when the latter obtained possession of Athens, about B.C. 260. His Atthis consisted of 17 books, and related the history of Attica, from the earliest times to the reign of Antiochus Theos, B.C. 261. The work is frequently quoted by the scholiasts, lexicographers, as well as other later authors. He also wrote many other works, the titles of which are preserved by Suidas and the grammarians. The fragments of Philochorus have been published by Siebelis, Lips. 1811, and by Müller, Paris, 1841.

Phĭlŏcles (Φιλοκλῆς), an Athenian tragic poet, the sister's son of Aeschylus; his father's name was Philopithes. He is said to have composed 100 tragedies. In the general character of his plays he was an imitator of Aeschylus; and that he was not unworthy of his great master, may be inferred from the fact that he gained a victory over Sophocles, when the latter exhibited his Oedipus Tyrannus, B.C. 429. Philocles was frequently ridiculed by the comic poets.

Phĭlŏcrătes (Φιλοκράτης), an Athenian orator, was one of the venal supporters of Philip in opposition to Demosthenes.

Phĭloctētes (Φιλοκτήτης), a son of Poeas (whence he is called Poeantiades, Ov. Met. xiii. 313) and Demonassa, the most celebrated archer in the Trojan war. He led the warriors from Methone, Thaumacia, Meliboea, and Olizon, against Troy, in 7 ships. But on his voyage thither he was left behind by his men in the island of Lemnos, because he was ill of a wound which he had received from the bite of a snake; and Medon, the son of Oïleus and Rhene, undertook the command of his troops. This is all that the Homeric poems relate of Philoctetes, with the addition that he returned home in safety; but the cyclic and tragic poets have added numerous details to the story. Thus they relate that he was the friend and armour-bearer of Hercules, who instructed him in the use of the bow, and who bequeathed to him his bow, with the poisoned arrows. These presents were a reward for his having erected and set fire to the pile on Mt. Oeta, where Hercules burnt himself. Philoctetes was also one of the suitors of Helen, and thus took part in the Trojan war. On his voyage to Troy, while staying in the island of Chryse, he was bitten by a snake. This misfortune happened to him when he was showing to the Greeks the altar of Athena Chryse, or while he was looking at the tomb of Troilus in the temple of Apollo Thymbraeus, or as he was pointing out to his companions the altar of Hercules. According to some accounts, the wound in his foot was not inflicted by a serpent, but by his own poisoned arrows. The wound is said to have become ulcerated, and to have produced such an intolerable stench that the Greeks, on the advice of Ulysses, abandoned Philoctetes and left him alone on the solitary coast of Lemnos. He remained in this island till the 10th year of the Trojan war, when Ulysses and Diomedes came to fetch him to Troy, as an oracle had declared that the city could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules. He accompanied these heroes to Troy, and on his arrival Apollo sent him into a deep sleep, during which Machaon (or Podalirius, or both, or Aesculapius himself) cut out the wound, washed it with wine, and applied healing herbs to it. Philoctetes was thus cured, and soon after slew Paris, whereupon Troy fell into the hands of the Greeks. On his return from Troy he is said to have been cast upon the coast of Italy, where he settled, and built Petelia and Crimissa. In the latter place he founded a sanctuary of Apollo Alaeus, to whom he dedicated his bow.

Phĭlŏdēmus (Φιλόδημος) of Gadara, in Palestine, an Epicurean philosopher and epigrammatic poet, contemporary with Cicero. The Greek Anthology contains 34 of his Epigrams, which are chiefly of a light and amatory character, and which quite bear out Cicero's statements concerning the licentiousness of his matter and the elegance of his manner. (Cic. in Pis. 28, 29.) Philodemus is also mentioned by Horace (Sat. i. 2. 121.)

Phĭlŏlāus (Φιλόλαος), a distinguished Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of Croton or Tarentum. He was a contemporary of Socrates, and the instructor of Simmias and Cebes at Thebes, where he appears to have lived many years. Pythagoras and his earliest successors did not commit any of their doctrines to writing; and the first publication of the Pythagorean doctrines is pretty uniformly attributed to Philolaus. He composed a work on the Pythagorean philosophy in 3 books, which Plato is said to have procured at the cost of 100 minae through Dion of Syracuse, who purchased it from Philolaus, who was at the time in deep poverty. Other versions of the story represent Plato as purchasing it himself from Philolaus or his relatives when in Sicily. Plato is said to have derived from this work the greater part of his Timaeus.

Phĭlŏmēla (Φιλομήλα), daughter of king Pandion in Attica, who, being dishonoured by her brother-in-law Tereus, was metamorphosed into a nightingale. The story is given under Tereus.

Phĭlŏmēlĭum or Philomēlum (Φιλομήλιον, or in the Pisidian dialect Φιλομηδή: Φιλομηλεύς, Philomelensis or Philomeliensis: prob. Ak-Shehr, Ru.), a city of Phrygia Parorios, on the borders of Lycaonia and Pisidia, said to have been named from the numbers of nightingales in its neighbourhood. It is mentioned several times by Cicero. According to the division of the provinces under Constantine, it belonged to Pisidia. It is still found mentioned at the time of the Crusades, by the name of Philomene.

Phĭlŏmēlus (Φιλόμηλος), a general of the Phocians in the Phocian or Sacred war, was the person who persuaded his countrymen to seize the temple of Delphi, and to apply the riches of the temple to the purpose of defending themselves against the Amphictyonic forces, B. C. 357. He commanded the Phocians during the early years of the war, but was slain in battle in 353. He was succeeded in the command by his brother Onomarchus.

Phĭlōnĭdes (Φιλωνίδης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, who is, however, better known on account of his connection with the literary history of Aristophanes. It is generally stated that Philonides was an actor of Aristophanes, who is said to have committed to him and to Callistratus his chief characters; but the best modern critics have shown that this is an erroneous statement, and that the true state of the case is, that several of the plays of Aristophanes were brought out in the names of Callistratus and Philonides. We learn from Aristophanes himself, not only the fact that he brought out his early plays in the names of other poets, but also his reasons for so doing. In the Parabasis of the Knights (v. 514), he states that he had pursued this course, not from want of thought, but from a sense of the difficulty of his profession, and from a fear that he might suffer from that fickleness of taste which the Athenians had shown towards other poets, as Magnes, Crates, and Cratinus. It appears that Aristophanes used the name of Philonides, probably, for the Clouds, and certainly for the Wasps, the Proagon, the Amphiaraus, and the Frogs. The Daetaleis, the Babylonians, the Acharnians, the Birds, and the Lysistrata, were brought out in the name of Callistratus. Of the extant plays of Aristophanes, the only ones which he is known to have brought out in his own name are the Knights, the Peace, and the Plutus.

Phĭlŏnŏmē. [Tenes.]

Phĭlŏpoemen (Φιλοποίμην), of Megalopolis in Arcadia, one of the few great men that Greece produced in the decline of her political independence. The great object of his life was to infuse among the Achaeans a military spirit, and thereby to establish their independence on a firm and lasting basis. He was the son of Craugis, a distinguished man at Megalopolis, and was born about B. C. 252. He lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by Cleander, an illustrious citizen of Mantinēa, who had been obliged to leave his native city, and had taken refuge at Megalopolis. He received instruction from Ecdemus and Demophanes, both of whom had studied the Academic philosophy under Arcesilaus. At an early age he became distinguished by his love of arms and his bravery in war. His name, however, first occurs in history in B. C. 222, when Megalopolis was taken by Cleomenes, and in the following year (221) he fought with conspicuous valour at the battle of Sellasia, in which Cleomenes was completely defeated. In order to gain additional military experience, he soon afterwards sailed to Crete, and served for some years in the wars between the cities of that island. On his return to his native country, in 210, he was appointed commander of the Achaean cavalry; and in 208 he was elected strategus, or general of the Achaean league. In this year he defeated Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedaemon, and slew him in battle with his own hand. In 201 he was again elected general of the league, when he defeated Nabis, who had succeeded Machanidas as tyrant of Lacedaemon. Soon afterwards Philopoemen took another voyage to Crete, and assumed the command of the forces of Gortyna. He did not return to Peloponnesus till 194. He was made general of the league in 192, when he again defeated Nabis, who was slain in the course of the year by some Aetolian mercenaries. Philopoemen was reelected general of the league several times afterwards; but the state of Greece did not afford him much further opportunity for the display of his military abilities. The Romans were now in fact the masters of Greece, and Philopoemen clearly saw that it would be an act of madness to offer open resistance to their authority. At the same time as the Romans still recognised in words the independence of the league, Philopoemen offered a resolute resistance to all their encroachments upon the liberties of his country, whenever he could do so without affording them any pretext for war. In 188, when he was general of the league, he took Sparta, and treated it with the greatest severity. He razed the walls and fortifications of the city, abolished the institutions of Lycurgus, and compelled the citizens to adopt the Achaean laws in their stead. In 183 the Messenians revolted from the Achaean league. Philopoemen, who was general of the league for the 8th time, hastily collected a body of cavalry, and pressed forward to Messene. He fell in with a large body of Messenian troops, by whom he was taken prisoner, and carried to Messene. Here he was thrown into a dungeon, and was compelled by Dinocrates to drink poison. The news of his death filled the whole of Peloponnesus with grief and rage. An assembly was immediately held at Megalopolis; Lycortas was chosen general; and in the following year, he invaded Messenia, which was laid waste far and wide; Dinocrates and the chiefs of his party were obliged to put an end to their lives. The remains of Philopoemen were conveyed to Megalopolis in solemn procession; and the urn which contained the ashes was carried by the historian Polybius. His remains were then interred at Megalopolis with heroic honours; and soon afterwards statues of him were erected in most of the towns belonging to the Achaean league.

Phĭlostĕphănus (Φιλοστέφανος), of Cyrene, an Alexandrian writer of history and geography, the friend or disciple of Callimachus, flourished under Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, about B. C. 249.

Phĭlostorgĭus (Φιλοστόργιος), a native of Borissus in Cappadocia, was born about A. D. 358. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, from the heresy of Arius in 300, down to 425. Philostorgius was an Arian, which is probably the reason why his work has not come down to us. It was originally in 12 books; and we still possess an abstract of it, made by Photius.

Phĭlostrătus (Φιλόστρατος), the name of a distinguished family of Lemnos, of which there are mentioned 3 persons in the history of Greek literature. 1. Son of Verus, taught at Athens; but we know nothing about him, with the exception of the titles of his works, given by Suidas. He could not however have lived in the reign of Nero, according to the statement of Suidas, since his son was not born till the latter part of the 2nd century. —2. Flavius Philostratus, son of the preceding, and the most eminent of the 3, was born about A. D. 182. He studied and taught at Athens, and is usually called the Athenian to distinguish him from the younger Philostratus [No. 3], who more usually bears the surname of the Lemnian. Flavius afterwards removed to Rome, where we find him a member of the circle of literary men, whom the philosophic Julia Domna, the wife of Severus, had drawn around her. It was at her desire that he wrote the life of Apollonius. He was alive in the reign of the emperor Philippus (244—249). The following works of Philostratus have come down to us: — 1. The Life of Apollonius of Tyana (τὰ ἐς τὸν Τυανέα Ἀπολλώνιον), in 8 books. [See Apollonius, No. 7.] — 2. Lives of the Sophists (Βίοι Σοφιστῶν), in 2 books, contains the history of philosophers who had the character of being sophists, and of those who were in reality sophists. It begins with the life of Gorgias, and comes down to the contemporaries of Philostratus in the reign of Philippus. 3. Heroïca or Heroïcus (Ἡρωικὰ, Ἡρωικὸς), is in the form of a dialogue, and gives an account of the heroes engaged in the Trojan war. 4. Imagines (Εἰκόνες), in 2 books, contains an account of various paintings. This is the author's most pleasing work, exhibiting great richness of fancy, power and variety of delineation, and a rich exuberance of style. 5. Epistolae (Ἐπιστολαί), 73 in number, chiefly amatory. The best editions of the collected works of Philostratus are by Olearius, Lips. 1709, and by Kayser, Turic. 1844. — 3. Philostratus, the younger, usually called the Lemnian, as mentioned above, was a son of Nervianus and of a daughter of Flavius Philostratus, but is erroneously called by Suidas a son-in-law of the latter. He enjoyed the instructions of his grandfather and of the sophist Hippodromus, and had obtained sufficient distinction at the early age of 24 to receive exemption from taxes. He visited Rome, but he taught at Athens, and died in Lemnos. He wrote several works, and among others one entitled Imagines, in imitation of his grandfather's work with the same title, of which a portion is still extant.

Phĭlōtas (Φιλώτας), son of Parmenion, enjoyed a high place in the friendship of Alexander, and in the invasion of Asia obtained the chief command of the ἑταῖροι, or native Macedonian cavalry. He served with distinction in the battles of the Granicus and Arbela, and also on other occasions; but in B. C. 330, while the army was in Drangiana, he was accused of being privy to a plot which had been formed by a Macedonian, named Dimnus, against the king's life. There was no proof of his guilt; but a confession was wrung from him by the torture, and he was stoned to death by the troops after the Macedonian custom. [Parmenion.]

Phĭlōtīmus (Φιλότιμος), an eminent Greek physician, pupil of Praxagoras, and fellow-pupil of Herophilus, lived in the 4th and 3rd centuries B. C.

Phĭloxĕnus (Φιλόξενος). 1. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, received the government of Cilicia from Perdiccas in 321. — 2. Of Cythera, one of the most distinguished dithyrambic poets of Greece, was born B. C. 435 and died 380, at the age of 55. He was reduced to slavery in his youth, and was bought by the lyric poet Melanippides, by whom he was educated in dithyrambic poetry. After residing some years at Athens, he went to Syracuse, where he speedily obtained the favour of Dionysius, and took up his abode at his court. But soon afterwards he offended Dionysius, and was cast into prison; an act of oppression which most writers ascribe to the wounded vanity of the tyrant, whose poems Philoxenus not only refused to praise, but, on being asked to revise one of them, said that the best way of correcting it would be to draw a black line through the whole paper. Another account ascribes his disgrace to too close an intimacy with the tyrant's mistress Galatea; but this looks like a fiction, arising out of a misunderstanding of the object of his poem entitled Cyclops or Galatea. After some time he was released from prison, and restored outwardly to the favour of Dionysius; but he finally left his court, and is said to have spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus. — Of the dithyrambs of Philoxenus by far the most important was his Cyclops or Galatea, the loss of which is greatly to be lamented. Philoxenus also wrote another poem, entitled Deipnon (Δεῖπνον) or the Banquet, which appears to have been the most popular of his works, and of which we have more fragments than of any other. This poem was a most minute and satirical description of a banquet, and the subject of it was furnished by the luxury of the court of Dionysius. Philoxenus was included in the attacks which the comic poets made on all the musicians of the day, for their corruptions of the simplicity of the ancient music; but we have abundant testimony to the high esteem in which he was held both during his life and after his death. — 3. The Leucadian, lived at Athens about the same time as Philoxenus of Cythera, with whom he is frequently confounded by the grammarians. Like his more celebrated namesake, the Leucadian was ridiculed by the poets of the Old Comedy, and seems to have spent a part of his life in Sicily. The Leucadian was a most notorious parasite, glutton, and effeminate debauchee; but he seems also to have had great wit and good-humour, which made him a favourite at the tables which he frequented. — 4. A celebrated Alexandrian grammarian, who taught at Rome, and wrote on Homer, on the Ionic and Laconian dialects, and several other grammatical works, among which was a Glossary, which was edited by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1573. — 5. An Aegyptian surgeon, who wrote several valuable volumes on surgery. He must have lived in or before the first century after Christ. — 6. A painter of Eretria, the disciple of Nicomachus, who painted for Cassander a battle of Alexander with Darius.

Philus, Furĭus. 1. P., was consul B.C. 223 with C. Flaminius, and accompanied his colleague in his campaign against the Gauls in the N. of Italy. He was praetor 216, when he commanded the fleet, with which he proceeded to Africa. In 214 he was censor with M. Atilius Regulus, but died at the beginning of the following year. — 2. L., consul 136, received Spain as his province, and was commissioned by the senate to deliver up to the Numantines C. Hostilius Mancinus, the consul of the preceding year. Philus, like his contemporaries Scipio Africanus the younger and Laelius, was fond of Greek literature and refinement. He is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Republica.

Philyllĭus (Φιλύλλιος), an Athenian comic poet, belongs to the latter part of the Old Comedy, and the beginning of the Middle.

Philȳrēis (Φιλυρηΐς: prob. the little island off C. Zefreh, E. of Kerasunt-Ada), an island off the N. coast of Asia Minor (Pontus), E. of the country of the Mosynoeci, and near the promontory of Zephyrium (Zefreh), where CHIRON was nurtured by his mother Philyra.

Philȳres (Φίλυρες), a people on the coast of Pontus, in the neighbourhood of the island PHILYREIS.

Phīneus (Φινεύς). 1. Son of Belus and Anchinoe, and brother of Cepheus. He was slain by Perseus. For details see ANDROMEDA and PERSEUS. — 2. Son of Agenor, and king of Salmydessus in Thrace. He was first married to Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, by whom he had 2 children, Oryithus (Oarthus) and Crambis; but their names are different in the different legends: Ovid calls them Polydectus and Polydorus. Afterwards he was married to Idaea (some call her Dia, Eurytia, or Idothea), by whom he again had 2 sons, Thynus and Mariandynus. —Phineus was a blind soothsayer, who had received his prophetic powers from Apollo; but the cause of his blindness is not the same in all accounts. He is most celebrated on account of his being tormented by the Harpies, who were sent by the gods to punish him on account of his cruelty towards his sons by the first marriage. His second wife falsely accused them of having made an attempt upon her virtue, whereupon Phineus put out their eyes, or, according to others, exposed them to be devoured by wild beasts, or ordered them to be half buried in the earth, and then to be scourged. Whenever a meal was placed before Phineus, the Harpies darted down from the air and carried it off; later writers add that they either devoured the food themselves, or rendered it unfit to be eaten. When the Argonauts visited Thrace, Phineus promised to instruct them respecting their voyage, if they would deliver him from the monsters. This was done by Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, and brothers of Cleopatra. [See p. 76, a.] Phineus now explained to the Argonauts the further course they had to take, and especially cautioned them against the Symplegades. According to another story the Argonauts, on their arrival at Thrace, found the sons of Phineus half buried, and demanded their liberation, which Phineus refused. A battle thereupon ensued, in which Phineus was slain by Hercules. The latter also delivered Cleopatra from her confinement, and restored the kingdom to the sons of Phineus; and on their advice he also sent the second wife of Phineus back to her father, who ordered her to be put to death. Some traditions, lastly, state that Phineus was killed by Boreas, or that he was carried off by the Harpies into the country of the Bistones or Milchessians. Those accounts in which Phineus is stated to have put out the eyes of his sons, add that they had their sight restored to them by the sons of Boreas, or by Aesculapius.

Phinŏpŏlis (Φινόπολις), a town in Thrace on the Pontus Euxinus near the entrance to the Bosporus.

Phintĭas (Φιντίας). 1. A Pythagorean, the friend of Damon, who was condemned to die by Dionysius the elder. For details see DAMON. — 2. Tyrant of Agrigentum, who established his power over that city during the period of confusion which followed the death of Agathocles (B.C. 289.) He founded a new city on the S. coast of Sicily, to which he gave his own name, and whither he removed all the inhabitants from Gela, which he razed to the ground.

Phintōnis Insŭla (Isola di Figo), an island between Sardinia and Corsica.

Phlĕgĕthon (Φλεγέθων), i.e. the flaming, a river in the lower world, in whose channel flowed flames instead of water.

Phlĕgon (Φλέγων), a native of Tralles in Lydia, was a freedman of the emperor Hadrian, whom he survived. The only 2 works of Phlegon which have come down to us, are a small treatise on wonderful events (Περὶ θαυμασίων), and another short treatise on long-lived persons (Περὶ μακροβίων), which gives a list of persons in Italy who had attained the age of a hundred years and upwards. Besides these 2 works Phlegon wrote many others, of which the most important was an account of the Olympiads in 17 books, from Ol. 1 to Ol. 229 (A.D. 137). The best edition of Phlegon is by Westermann in his Paradoxographi, Brunsvig. 1839.

Phlegra. [PALLENE.]

Phlegraei Campi (τὰ Φλεγραῖα πεδία, or ἡ Φλέγρα: Solfatara), the name of the volcanic plain extending along the coast of Campania from Cumae to Capua, so called because it was believed to have been once on fire. It was also named Laboriae or Laborinus Campus, either on account of its great fertility, which occasioned its constant cultivation, or on account of the frequent earthquakes and internal convulsions to which it was exposed.

Phlĕgȳas (Φλεγύας), son of Ares and Chryse, the daughter of Halmus, succeeded Eteocles in the government of Orchomenos in Boeotia, which he called after himself Phlegyantis. He was the father of Ixion and Coronis, the latter of whom became by Apollo the mother of Aesculapius. Enraged at this, Phlegyas set fire to the temple of the God, who killed him with his arrows, and condemned him to severe punishment in the lower world. Phlegyas is represented as the mythical ancestor of the race of the Phlegyae, a branch of the Minyae, who emigrated from Orchomenos in Boeotia and settled in Phocis.

Phlĭāsĭa. [PHLIUS.]

Phlīus (Φλιοῦς, -οῦντος: Φλιάσιος), the chief town of a small province in the N.E. of Peloponnesus, whose territory Phliasĭa (Φλιασία), was bounded on the N. by Sicyonia, on the W. by Arcadia, on the E. by the territory of Cleonae, and on the S. by that of Argos. The greater part of this country was occupied by mountains, called Coelossa, Carneates, Arantinus and Tricaranon. According to Strabo the most ancient town in the country was Araethyrēa, which the inhabitants deserted, and afterwards founded Phlius; while Pausanias says nothing about a migration, but relates that the town was first called Arantia from its founder Aras, an autochthon, afterwards Araethyrea from the daughter of Aras, and finally Phlius, from Phlius, a grandson of Temenus. Phlius was originally inhabited by Argives. It afterwards passed into the hands of the Dorians, with whom part of the Argive population intermingled, while part migrated to Samos and Clazomenae. During the greater part of its history it remained faithful to Sparta.

Phlygŏnĭum (Φλυγόνιον), a small town in Phocis, destroyed in the Phocian war.

Phōcaea (Φώκαια: Φωκαεύς, Phocaeënsis: the Ru. called Karaja-Fokia, i. e. Old Fokia, S.W. of Fouges or New Fokia), the N.-most of the Ionian cities on the W. coast of Asia Minor, stood at the W. extremity of the tongue of land which divides the Sinus Elaiticus (G. of Fouges), on the N. from the Sinus Hermaeus (G. of Smyrna), on the S. It was said to have been founded by Phocian colonists under Philogenes and Damon. It was originally within the limits of Aeolis, in the territory of Cyme; but the Cymaeans voluntarily gave up the site for the new city, which was soon admitted into the Ionian confederacy on the condition of adopting oecists of the race of Codrus. Admirably situated, and possessing 2 excellent harbours, Naustathmus and Lampter, Phocaea became celebrated as a great maritime state, and especially as the founder of the most distant Greek colonies towards the W., namely MASSILIA in Gaul, and the still more distant, though far less celebrated, city of Maenaca in Hispania Baetica. After the Persian conquest of Ionia, Phocaea had so declined, that she could only furnish 3 ships to support the great Ionian revolt; but the spirit of her people had not been extinguished; when the common cause was hopeless, and their city was besieged by Harpagus, they embarked, to seek new abodes in the distant W., and bent their course to their colony of Aleria in Corsica. During the voyage, however, a portion of the emigrants resolved to return to their native city, which they restored, and which recovered much of its prosperity, as is proved by the rich booty gained by the Romans, when they plundered it under the praetor Aemilius, after which it does not appear as a place of any consequence in history.—Care must be taken not to confound Phocaea with Phocis, or the ethnic adjectives of the former Φωκαεύς and Phocaeënsis, with those of the latter, Φωκεύς and Phocensis: some of the ancient writers themselves have fallen into such mistakes. It should be observed also that the name of Phocaean is often used with reference to Massilia; and, by an amusing affectation, the people of Marseille still call themselves Phocaeans.

Phōcĭon (Φωκίων), the Athenian general and statesman, son of Phocus, was a man of humble origin, and appears to have been born in B. C. 402. He studied under Plato and Xenocrates. He distinguished himself for the first time under his friend Chabrias, in 376, at the battle of Naxos; but he was not employed prominently in any capacity for many years afterwards. In 354 (according to others in 350) he was sent into Euboea in the command of a small force, in consequence of an application from Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria; and he was subsequently employed on several occasions in the war between the Athenians and Philip of Macedon. He frequently opposed the measures of Demosthenes, and recommended peace with Philip; but he must not be regarded as one of the mercenary supporters of the Macedonian monarch. His virtue is above suspicion, and his public conduct was always influenced by upright motives. When Alexander was marching upon Thebes, in 335, Phocion rebuked Demosthenes for his invectives against the king; and after the destruction of Thebes he advised the Athenians to comply with Alexander's demand for the surrender of Demosthenes and other chief orators of the anti-Macedonian party. This proposal was indignantly rejected by the people, and an embassy was sent to Alexander, which succeeded in deprecating his resentment. According to Plutarch, there were two embassies, the first of which Alexander refused to receive, but to the second he gave a gracious audience, and granted its prayer, chiefly from regard to Phocion, who was at the head of it. Alexander ever continued to treat Phocion with the utmost consideration, and to cultivate his friendship. He also pressed upon him valuable presents; but Phocion persisted in refusing his presents, begging the king to leave him no less honest than he found him, and only so far availed himself of the royal favour as to request the liberty of certain prisoners at Sardis, which was immediately granted to him. After Alexander's death, Phocion opposed vehemently, and with all the caustic bitterness which characterised him, the proposal for war with Antipater. Thus, to Hyperides, who asked him tauntingly when he would advise the Athenians to go to war, he answered, "When I see the young willing to keep their ranks, the rich to contribute of their wealth, and the orators to abstain from pilfering the public money." When the Piraeus was seized by Alexander, the son of Polysperchon in 318, Phocion was suspected of having advised Alexander to take this step; whereupon, being accused of treason by Agnonides, he fled, with several of his friends, to Alexander, who sent them with letters of recommendation to his father Polysperchon. The latter, willing to sacrifice them as a peace-offering to the Athenians, sent them back to Athens for the people to deal with them as they would. Here Phocion was sentenced to death. To the last, he maintained his calm, and dignified, and somewhat contemptuous bearing. When some wretched man spat upon him as he passed to the prison, "Will no one," said he, "check this fellow's indecency?" To one who asked him whether he had any message to leave for his son Phocus, he answered, "Only that he bear no grudge against the Athenians." And when the hemlock which had been prepared was found insufficient for all the condemned, and the jailer would not furnish more until he was paid for it, "Give the man his money," said Phocion to one of his friends, "since at Athens one cannot even die for nothing." He perished in 317, at the age of 85. The Athenians are said to have repented of their conduct. A brazen statue was raised to the memory of Phocion, and Agnonides was condemned to death. Phocion was twice married, and his 2nd wife appears to have been as simple and frugal in her habits as himself; but he was less fortunate in his son Phocus, who, in spite of his father's lessons and example, was a thorough profligate. As for Phocion himself, our commendation of him must be almost wholly confined to his private qualities. His fellow-citizens may have been degenerate, but he made no effort to elevate them.

Phōcis (ἡ Φωκίς: Φωκῆες Hom., Φωκέες Herod., Φωκεῖς Attic, Phocenses by the Romans), a country in Northern Greece, was bounded on the N. by the Locri Epicnemidii and Opuntii, on the E. by Boeotia, on the W. by the Locri Ozolae and Doris, and on the S. by the Corinthian gulf. At one time it possessed a narrow strip of country on the Euboean sea with the seaport Daphnus, between the territory of the Locri Ozolae and Locri Opuntii. It was a mountainous and unproductive country, and owes its chief importance in history to the fact of its possessing the Delphic oracle. Its chief mountain was PARNASSUS, situated in the interior of the country, to which however CNEMIS on its N. frontier, CIRPHIS S. of Delphi, and HELICON on the S.E. frontier all belonged. The principal river in Phocis was the CEPHISSUS, the valley of which contained almost the only fertile land in the country, with the exception of the celebrated Crissaean plain in the S.E. on the borders of the Locri Ozolae.—Among the earliest inhabitants of Phocis we find mentioned Leleges, Thracians, Abantes and Hyantes. Subsequently, but still in the antihistorical period, the Phlegyae, an Achaean race, a branch of the Minyae at Orchomenos, took possession of the country; and from this time the main bulk of the population continued to be Achaean, although there were Dorian settlements at Delphi and Bulis. The Phocians are said to have derived their name from an eponymous ancestor Phocus [PHOCUS], and they are mentioned under this name in the Iliad. The Phocians played no conspicuous part in Greek history till the time of Philip of Macedon; but at this period they became involved in a war, called the Phocian or Sacred War, in which the principal states of Greece took part. The Thebans had long been inveterate enemies of the Phocians; and as the latter people had cultivated a portion of the Crissaean plain, which the Amphictyons had declared in B.C. 585 should lie waste for ever, the Thebans availed themselves of this pretext to persuade the Amphictyons to impose a fine upon the Phocians, and upon their refusal to pay it, the Thebans further induced the council to declare the Phocian land forfeited to the god at Delphi. Thus threatened by the Amphictyonic council, backed by the whole power of Thebes, the Phocians were persuaded by Philomelus, one of their citizens, to seize Delphi, and to make use of the treasures of the temple for the purpose of carrying on the war. They obtained possession of the temple in B.C. 357. The war which ensued lasted 10 years, and was carried on with various success on each side. The Phocians were commanded first by PHILOMELUS, B.C. 357—353, afterwards by his brother ONOMARCHUS, 353—352, then by PHAYLLUS, the brother of the 2 preceding, 352—351, and finally by PHALAECUS, the son of Onomarchus, 351—346. The Phocians received some support from Athens, but their chief dependence was upon their mercenary troops, which the treasures of the Delphic temple enabled them to hire. The Amphictyons and the Thebans, finding at length that they were unable with their own resources to subdue the Phocians, called in the assistance of Philip of Macedon, who brought the war to a close in 346. The conquerors inflicted the most signal punishment upon the Phocians, who were regarded as guilty of sacrilege. All their towns were razed to the ground with the exception of Abae; and the inhabitants distributed in villages, containing not more than 50 inhabitants. The 2 votes which they had in the Amphictyonic council were taken away and given to Philip.

Phocra (Φόκρα), a mountain of N. Africa, in Mauretania Tingitana, apparently on the W. bank of the Mulucha, between the chains of the Great and Little Atlas.

Phōcus (Φῶκος). 1. Son of Ornytion of Corinth, or according to others of Poseidon, is said to have been the leader of a colony from Corinth into the territory of Tithorea and Mt. Parnassus, which derived from him the name of Phocis.—2. Son of Aeacus and the Nereid Psamathe, husband of Asteria or Asterodia, and father of Panopeus and Crissus. He was murdered by his half-brothers Telamon and Peleus. [PELEUS.] According to some accounts the country of Phocis derived its name from him.—3. Son of Phocion. [PHOCION.]

Phocylīdes (Φωκυλίδης), of Miletus, an Ionian poet, contemporary with Theognis, was born B.C. 560. His poetry was chiefly gnomic; and the few fragments of it which we possess display that contempt for birth and station, and that love for substantial enjoyment, which always marked the Ionian character. These fragments, which are 18 in number, are included in all the chief collections of the lyric and gnomic poets. Some of these collections contain a didactic poem, in 217 hexameters, entitled ποίημα νουθετικόν, to which the name of Phocylides is attached, but which is undoubtedly a forgery, made since the Christian era.

Phoebē (Φοίβη). 1. Daughter of Uranus and Ge, became by Coeus the mother of Asteria and Leto (Latona).—2. A surname of Artemis (Diana) in her capacity as the goddess of the moon (Luna), the moon being regarded as the female Phoebus or sun.—3. Daughter of Tyndareos and Leda, and a sister of Clytaemnestra.—4. Daughter of Leucippus, and sister of Hilaira, a priestess of Athena, was carried off with her sister by the Dioscuri, and became by Pollux the mother of Mnesileos.

Phoebĭdas (Φοιβίδας), a Lacedaemonian, who, in B. C. 382, was appointed to the command of the troops destined to reinforce his brother Eudamidas, who had been sent against Olynthus. On his way Phoebidas halted at Thebes, and treacherously made himself master of the Cadmea. The Lacedaemonians fined Phoebidas 100,000 drachmas, but nevertheless kept possession of the Cadmea. In 378 he was left by Agesilaus as harmost at Thespiae, and was slain in battle by the Thebans.

Phoebus (Φοῖβος), the Bright or Pure, occurs in Homer as an epithet of Apollo, and is used to signify the brightness and purity of youth. At a later time when Apollo became connected with the Sun, the epithet Phoebus was also applied to him as the Sun-god.

Phoenīcē (Φοινίκη: Phoenīcia is only found in a doubtful passage of Cicero: Φοίνιξ, pl. Φοίνῖκες, fem. Φοίνισσα, Phoenix, Phoenīces: also, the adj. Punīcus, though used specifically in connection with Carthago, is etymologically equivalent to Φοίνιξ, by the well-known interchange of οι and ῡ: parts of the Pashalicks of Acre and Aleppo), a country of Asia, on the coast of Syria, extending from the river Eleutherus (Nahr-el-Kebir) on the N. to below Mt. Carmel on the S., and bounded on the E. by Coelesyria and Palestine. (Sometimes, though rarely, the name is extended to the whole W. coast of Syria and Palestine). It was a mountainous strip of coast land, not more than 10 or 12 miles broad, hemmed in between the Mediterranean and the chain of Lebanon, whose lateral branches, running out into the sea in bold promontories, divided the country into valleys, which are well watered by rivers flowing down from Lebanon, and are extremely fertile. Of these rivers, the most important are, to one going from N. to S., the Eleutherus (Nahr-el-Kebir); the Sabbaticus (Arka); the river of Tripolis (Kadisha); the Adonis (Nahr-Ibrahim), S. of Byblus; the Lycus (Nahr-el-Kelb) N. of Berytus; the Magoras (Nahr-Beirut), by Berytus; the Tamyras (Nahr-el-Damur), between Berytus and Sidon; the Leo, or Bostrenus (Nahr-el-Auly), N. of Sidon; the great river (Litany and Kasimiyeh) which flows from Heliopolis S.S.W. through Coele-Syria, and then, turning W.wards, falls into the sea N. of Tyre, and which some call, but without sufficient authority, the Leontes; the Belus, or Pagida (Numan or Rahwin) by Ptolemaïs, and the Kishon (Kishon), N. of Mt. Carmel. Of the promontories referred to, omitting a number of less important ones, the chief were, Theu-prosōpon (Rasesh-Shukah), between Tripolis and Byblus, Pr. Album (Ras-el-Abiad, i. e. White Cape), S. of Tyre, and Mt. Carmel, besides those occupied by the cities of Tripolis, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyrus, and Ptolemaïs. This conformation of the coast and the position of the country rendered it admirably suited for the home of great maritime states; and accordingly we find the cities of Phoenicia at the head, both in time and importance, of all the naval enterprise of the ancient world. For the history of those great cities, see SIDON, TYRUS, and the other articles upon them. As to the country in general, there is some difficulty about the origin of the inhabitants and of their name. In the O. T. the name does not occur; the people seem to be included under the general designation of Canaanites, and they are also named specifically after their several cities, as the Sidonians, Giblites (from Gebal, i. e. Byblus), Sinites, Arkites, Arvadites, &c. The name Φοινίκη is first found in Greek writers, as early as Homer, and is derived by some from the abundance of palm trees in the country (φοίνιξ, the date-palm), and by others from the purple-red (φοίνιξ), which was obtained from a fish on the coasts, and was a celebrated article of Phoenician commerce; besides the mythical derivation from Phoenix, the brother of Cadmus. The people were of the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) race, and closely allied to the Hebrews; and they are said to have dwelt originally on the shores of the Erythraean sea. Their language was a dialect of the Aramaic, closely related to the Hebrew and Syriac. Their written characters were the same as the Samaritan or Old Hebrew; and from them the Greek alphabet, and through it most of the alphabets of Europe, were undoubtedly derived; hence they were regarded by the Greeks as the inventors of letters. Other inventions in the sciences and arts are ascribed to them; such as arithmetic, astronomy, navigation, the manufacture of glass, and the coining of money. That, at a very early time, they excelled in the fine arts, is clear from the aid which Solomon received from Hiram, king of Tyre, in the building and the sculptured decorations of the temple at Jerusalem, and from the references in Homer to Sidonian artists. Respecting Phoenician literature, we know of little beyond the celebrated work of SANCHUNIATHON. In the sacred history of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, in that of the Hebrew monarchy, and in the earliest Greek poetry, we find the Phoenicians already a great maritime people. Early formed into settled states, supplied with abundance of timber from Lebanon, and placed where the caravans from Arabia and the E. came upon the Mediterranean, they carried over to the coasts of this sea the products of those countries, as well as of their own, which was rich in metals, and on the shores of which furnished the materials of glass and the purple-fish already mentioned. Their voyages and their settlements extended beyond the Pillars of Hercules, to the W. coasts of Africa and Spain, and even as far as our own islands. [BRITANNIA, p. 126, a.] Within the Mediterranean they planted numerous colonies, on its islands, on the coast of Spain, and especially on the N. coast of Africa, the chief of which was CARTHAGO; they had also settlements on the Euxine and in Asia Minor. In the E. seas, we have records of their voyages to OPHIR, in connection with the navy of Solomon, and to the coasts of Africa under the kings of Egypt. [AFRICA, p. 22, b.] They were successively subdued by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, and Romans; but neither these conquests, nor the rivalry of Carthage, entirely ruined their commerce, which was still considerable at the Christian era; on the contrary, their ships formed the fleet of Persia and the Syrian kings, and partly of the Romans. [SIDON, TYRUS, &c.] Under the Romans, Phoenice formed a part of the province of Syria; and, under the E. empire, it was erected, with the addition of Coele-Syria, into the province of Phoenice Libanesia or Libanensis.

Phoenīce (Φοινίκη). 1. (Finiki), an important commercial town on the coast of the Epirus in the district Chaonia, 56 miles N.W. of Buthrotum, in the midst of a marshy country. It was strongly fortified by Justinian.—2. A small island off Gallia Narbonensis, belonging to the Stoechades.

Phoenicium Mare (τὸ Φοινίκιον πέλαγος: Σιδονίη θάλασσα), the part of the Mediterranean which washes the coast of Phoenice.

Phoenicus (Φοινικοῦς: Φοινικούντιος, Φοινικούσσιος). 1. Also Phoenix (Φοίνιξ), a harbour on the S. of Crete, visited by St. Paul during his voyage to Rome. (Acts, xxvii. 12.) — 2. The harbour of the city of Colone, in Messenia. — 3. A sea-port of the island of Cythera. — 4. (Chesmeh or Egri Liman?), a harbour of Ionia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of Mt. Mimas. — 5. (Deliktash, Ru.), a flourishing city in the S. of Lycia, on Mt. Olympus, with a harbour below it. It is often called Olympus. Having become, under the Romans, one of the head-quarters of the pirates, who celebrated here the festival and mysteries of Mithras, it was destroyed by Servilius Isauricus.

Phoenicusa. [Aeoliae Insulae.]

Phoenix (Φοίνιξ). 1. Son of Agenor by Agriope or Telephassa, and brother of Europa, but Homer makes him the father of Europa. Being sent by his father in search of his sister, who was carried off by Zeus, he settled in the country, which was called after him Phoenicia. — 2. Son of Amyntor by Cleobule or Hippodamia, and king of the Dolopes, took part in the Calydonian hunt. His father Amyntor neglected his legitimate wife, and attached himself to a mistress; whereupon Cleobule persuaded her son to seduce her rival. When Amyntor discovered the crime, he cursed Phoenix, who shortly afterwards fled to Peleus. Peleus received him kindly, made him the ruler of the country of the Dolopes, on the frontiers of Phthia, and entrusted to him his son Achilles, whom he was to educate. He afterwards accompanied Achilles on his expedition against Troy. According to another tradition, Phoenix did not dishonour his father's mistress, but she merely accused him of having made improper overtures to her, in consequence of which his father put out his eyes. But Peleus took him to Chiron, who restored to him his sight. Phoenix moreover is said to have called the son of Achilles Neoptolemus, after Lycomedes had called him Pyrrhus. Neoptolemus was believed to have buried Phoenix at Eïon in Macedonia or at Trachis in Thessaly. — 3. A fabulous bird Phoenix, which, according to a tale related to Herodotus (ii. 73) at Heliopolis in Egypt, visited that place once in every 500 years, on his father's death, and buried him in the sanctuary of Helios. For this purpose the Phoenix was believed to come from Arabia, and to make an egg of myrrh as large as possible; this egg he then hollowed out and put into it his father, closing it up carefully, and the egg was believed then to be of exactly the same weight as before. This bird was represented as resembling an eagle, with feathers partly red and partly golden. It is further related, that when his life drew to a close, he built a nest for himself in Arabia, to which he imparted the power of generation, so that after his death a new phoenix rose out of it. As soon as the latter was grown up, he, like his predecessor, proceeded to Heliopolis in Egypt, and burned and buried his father in the temple of Helios. — According to a story which has gained more currency in modern times, the Phoenix, when he arrived at a very old age (some say 500 and others 1461 years), committed himself to the flames. — Others, again, state that only one Phoenix lived at a time, and that when he died a worm crept forth from his body, and was developed into a new Phoenix by the heat of the sun. His death, further, took place in Egypt after a life of 7006 years. — Another modification of the same story relates, that when the Phoenix arrived at the age of 500 years, he built for himself a funeral pile, consisting of spices, settled upon it, and died. Out of the decomposing body he then rose again, and having grown up, he wrapped the remains of his old body up in myrrh, carried them to Heliopolis, and burnt them there. Similar stories of marvellous birds occur in many parts of the East, as in Persia, the legend of the bird Simorg, and in India that of the bird Semendar.

Phoenix (Φοίνιξ), a small river in the S.E. of Thessaly, flowing into the Asopus near Thermopylae.

Phoenix. [Phoenicus, No. 1.]

Phoetiae or Phytia (Φοιτεῖαι, Φοιτίαι, Φυτία, Thuc.), a town in Acarnania on a hill, W. of Stratus.

Pholegandros (Φολέγανδρος: Polykandro), an island in the Aegaean sea, one of the smaller Cyclades, situated between Melos and Sicinos.

Phŏlŏē (Φολόη: Olono), a mountain forming the boundary between Arcadia and Elis; being a S. continuation of Mt. Erymanthus, in which the rivers Sellēis and Ladon took their origin. It is mentioned as one of the seats of the Centaurs. [Pholus.]

Phŏlus (Φόλος), a Centaur, a son of Lilenus and the nymph Melia. He was accidentally slain by one of the poisoned arrows of Hercules. The mountain, between Arcadia and Elis, where he was buried, was called Pholoe after him. The details of his story are given on p. 309, a.

Phorbantĭa. [Aegates.]

Phorbas (Φόρβας). 1. Son of Lapithes and Orsinome, and brother of Periphas. The Rhodians, in pursuance of an oracle, are said to have invited him into their island to deliver it from snakes, and afterwards to have honoured him with heroic worship. From this circumstance he was called Ophiuchus, and is said by some to have been placed among the stars. According to another tradition, Phorbas went from Thessaly to Olenos, where Alector, king of Elis, made use of his assistance against Pelops, and shared his kingdom with him. Phorbas then gave his daughter Diogenia in marriage to Alector, and he himself married Hyrmine, a sister of Alector, by whom be became the father of Augeas and Actor. He is also described as a bold boxer, and is said to have plundered the temple of Delphi along with the Phlegyae, but to have been defeated by Apollo.

Phorcĭdes, Phorcȳdes, or Phorcynĭdes, that is, the daughters of Phorcus and Ceto, or the Gorgons and Graeae. [Gorgones and Graeae.]

Phorcus, Phorcys, or Phorcyn (Φόρκος, Φόρκυς, Φόρκυν). 1. A sea-deity, is described by Homer as "the old man of the sea," to whom a harbour in Ithaca was dedicated, and is called the father of the nymph Thoosa. Later writers call him a son of Pontus and Ge, and a brother of Thaumas, Nereus, Eurybia, and Ceto. By his sister Ceto he became the father of the Graeae and Gorgones, the Hesperian dragon, and the Hesperides; and by Hecate or Cratais, he was the father of Scylla. — 2. Son of Phaenops, commander of the Phrygians of Ascania, assisted Priam in the Trojan war, but was slain by Ajax.

Phormĭōn (Φορμίων). 1. A celebrated Athenian general, the son of Asopius. He distinguished himself particularly in the command of an Athenian fleet in the Corinthian gulf, where with far inferior forces he gained some brilliant victories over the Peloponnesian fleet in B.C. 429. In the ensuing winter he landed on the coast of Acarnania, and advanced into the interior, where he also gained some successes. He was a man of remarkably temperate habits, and a strict disciplinarian.— 2. A peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, of whom is told the story that he discoursed for several hours before Hannibal on the military art and the duties of a general. When his admiring auditory asked Hannibal what he thought of him, the latter replied, that of all the old blockheads whom he had seen, none could match Phormion.

Phormis or Phormus (Φόρμις, Φόρμος), a native of Maenalus in Arcadia, removed to Sicily, where he became intimate with Gelon, whose children he educated. He distinguished himself as a soldier, both under Gelon and Hieron his brother. In gratitude for his martial successes, he dedicated gifts to Zeus at Olympia, and to Apollo at Delphi. He is associated by Aristotle with Epicharmus, as one of the originators of comedy, or of a particular form of it.

Phŏrōneus (Φορωνεύς), son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Aegialeus and the ruler of Argos. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Apis, and Car. According to other writers his sons were Pelasgus, Iasus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death, divided the kingdom of Argos among themselves. Phoroneus is said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to Hera at Argos, and to have united the people, who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city which was called after him ἄστυ Φορωνικόν. The patronymic Phoronides is sometimes used for Argives in general, and especially to designate Amphiaraus and Adrastus.

Phŏrōnĭs (Φορωνίς), a surname of Io, being according to some a descendant, and according to others a sister of Phoroneus.

Phōtĭus (Φώτιος), patriarch of Constantinople in the 9th century, played a distinguished part in the political and religious history of his age. After holding various high offices in the Byzantine court, he was, although previously a layman, elected patriarch of Constantinople in A.D. 858, in place of Ignatius, who had been deposed by Bardas, who was all-powerful at the court of his nephew Michael III., then a minor. The patriarchate of Photius was a stormy one, and full of vicissitudes. The cause of Ignatius was espoused by the Romish church; and Photius thus became one of the great promoters of the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches. In 867 Photius was himself deposed by the emperor Basil I., and Ignatius was restored; but on the death of Ignatius in 877, Photius, who had meantime gained the favour of Basil, was again elevated to the patriarchate. On the death of Basil in 886, Photius was accused of a conspiracy against the life of the new emperor Leo VI., and was banished to a monastery in Armenia, where he seems to have remained till his death. Photius was one of the most learned men of his time, and in the midst of a busy life found time for the composition of numerous works, several of which have come down to us. Of these the most important is entitled Myriobiblion seu Bibliotheca (Μυριόβιβλον ἢ Βιβλιοθήκη). It may be described as an extensive review of ancient Greek literature by a scholar of immense erudition and sound judgment. It is an extraordinary monument of literary energy, for it was written while the author was engaged in an embassy to Assyria, at the request of Photius' brother Tarasius, who desired an account of the books which Photius had read in his absence. It contains the analyses of or extracts from 280 volumes; and many valuable works are only known to us from the account which Photius has given of them. The best edition of this work is by Bekker, Berlin, 1824—1825. Photius was also the author of a Nomocanon, and of a Lexicon or Glossary, which has reached us in a very imperfect state. It was first published by Hermann, Lips. 1808, and subsequently at London, 1822, from the papers of Porson. Photius likewise wrote many theological works, some of which have been published, and others still remain in MS.

Phraāta (τὰ Φράατα, and other forms), a great city of Media Atropatene, the winter residence of the Parthian kings, especially as a refuge in time of war, lay S.E. of Gaza, near the river Amardus. The mountain fortress of Vera (Οὐέρα), which was besieged by Antony, was probably the same place.

Phraatăces, king of Parthia. [ARSACES XVI.]

Phraātes, the name of 4 kings of Parthia. [ARSACES, V. VII. XII. XV.]

Phranza or Phranzes (Φραντζῆ or Φραντζῆς), the last and one of the most important Byzantine historians, was frequently employed on important public business by Constantine XIII., the last emperor of Constantinople. On the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, in 1453, Phranza was reduced to slavery, but succeeded in making his escape. He subsequently retired to a monastery, where he wrote his Chronicon. This work extends from 1259 to 1477, and is the most valuable authority for the history of the author's time, especially for the capture of Constantinople. It is edited by Alter, Vienna, 1796, and by Bekker, Bonn, 1838.

Phraortes (Φραόρτης), 2nd king of Media, and son of Deioces, whom he succeeded, reigned from B.C. 656 to 634. He first conquered the Persians, and then subdued the greater part of Asia, but was at length defeated and killed while laying siege to Ninus (Nineveh), the capital of the Assyrian empire. He was succeeded by his son Cyaxares.

Phrĭcĭum (Φρίκιον), a mountain in the E. of Locris near Thermopylae.

Phricōnis. [CYME: LARISSA, II. 2.]

Phrixa (Φρίξα, Φρίξαι, Θρίξαι: Paleofanaro), a town of Elis in Triphylia on the borders of Pisatis, was situated upon a steep hill on the river Alpheus, and was 30 stadia from Olympia. It was founded by the Minyae, and is said to have derived its name from Phrixus.

Phrixus (Φρίξος), son of Athamas and Nephele, and brother of Helle. In consequence of the intrigues of his stepmother, Ino, he was to be sacrificed to Zeus; but Nephele rescued her 2 children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Hermes. Between Sigeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea which was called after her the Hellespont; but Phrixus arrived in safety in Colchis, the kingdom of Aeetes, who gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. Phrixus sacrificed the ram which had carried him, to Zeus Phyxius or Laphystius, and gave its fleece to Aeetes, who fastened it to an oak tree in the grove of Ares. This fleece was afterwards carried away by Jason and the Argonauts. [JASON.] By Chalciope Phrixus became the father of Argus, Melas, Phrontis, Cytiscrus, and Presbon. Phrixus either died of old age in the kingdom of Aeetes, or was killed by Aeetes in consequence of an oracle, or returned to Orchomenus, in the country of the Minyans.

Phrixus (Φρίξος), a river in Argolis, which flows into the Argolic gulf between Temenium and Lerna.

Phrygĭa Mater, a name frequently given to Cybele, because she was especially worshipped in Phrygia.

Phrȳgĭa (Φρυγία: Φρύξ, pl. Φρύγες, Phryx, Phrȳges), a country of Asia Minor, which was of very different extent at different periods. According to the division of the provinces under the Roman empire, Phrygia formed the E. part of the province of Asia, and was bounded on the W. by Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, on the S. by Lycia and Pisidia, on the E. by Lycaonia (which is often reckoned as a part of Phrygia) and Galatia (which formerly belonged to Phrygia), and on the N. by Bithynia. With reference to its physical geography, it formed the W. part (as Cappadocia did the E.) of the great central table-land of Asia Minor, supported by the chains of Olympus on the N. and Taurus on the S., and breaking on the W. into the ridges which separate the great valleys of the HERMUS, the MAEANDER, &c., and which form the headlands of the W. coast. This table-land itself was intersected by mountain-chains, and watered by the upper courses and tributaries of the rivers just mentioned in its W. part, and in its N. part by those of the RHYNDACUS and SANGARIUS. These parts of the country were very fertile, especially in the valley of the Sangarius, but in the S. and E. the streams which descend from Taurus lose themselves in extensive salt marshes and salt lakes, some of which are still famous, as in ancient times, for their manufactures of salt. The Phrygians were a distinct and remarkable people, whose origin is one of the most difficult problems of antiquity. They claimed a very high antiquity; and according to the amusing account given by Herodotus of the absurd experiment of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, on the first spontaneous speech of children, they were thought to have been proved the most ancient of people. Elsewhere, Herodotus mentions a Macedonian tradition, that the Phryges formerly dwelt in Macedonia, under the name of Briges; and later writers add, that they passed over into Asia Minor 100 years after the Trojan war. They are, however, mentioned by Homer as already settled on the banks of the Sangarius, where later writers tell us of the powerful Phrygian kingdom of GORDIUS and MIDAS. Although any near approach to certainty is hopeless, it would seem that they were a branch of the great Thracian family, settled, in times of unknown antiquity, in the N.W. of Asia Minor, as far as the shores of the Hellespont and Propontis, and perhaps of the Euxine, and that the successive migrations of other Thracian peoples, as the Thyni, Bithyni, Mysians, and Teucrians, drove them further inland, till, from this cause, and perhaps too by the conquests of the Phrygian kings in the opposite direction, they reached the Halys on the E. and the Taurus on the S. They were not, however, entirely displaced by the Mysians and Teucrians from the country between the shores of the Hellespont and Propontis and Mts. Ida and Olympus, where they continued side by side with the Greek colonies, and where their name was preserved in that of the district under all subsequent changes, namely Phrygia Minor or Phrygia Hellespontus. The kingdom of Phrygia was conquered by Croesus, and formed part of the Persian, Macedonian, and Syro-Grecian empires; but, under the last, the N.E. part, adjacent to Paphlagonia and the Halys, was conquered by the Gauls, and formed the W. part of GALATIA; and a part W. of this, containing the richest portion of the country, about the Sangarius, was subjected by the kings of Bithynia: this last portion was the object of a contest between the kings of Bithynia and Pergamus, but at last, by the decision of the Romans, it was added, under the name of Phrygia Epictetus (Φ. ἐπίκτητος, i. e. the acquired Phrygia), to the kingdom of Pergamus, to which the whole of Phrygia was assigned by the Romans, after the overthrow of Antiochus the Great in B.C. 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamus, Phrygia passed to the Romans by the testament of Attalus III., and thus became a part of the province of Asia, B.C. 130. As to the distinctive names: the inland district usually understood by the name of Phrygia, when it occurs alone, was also called Great Phrygia or Phrygia Proper, in contradistinction to the Lesser Phrygia or Phrygia on the Hellespont; and of this Great or Proper Phrygia, the N. part was called, as just stated, Phrygia Epictetus, and the S. part, adjacent to the Taurus, was called, from its position, Phrygia Parorios (Φ. παρόριος). At the division of the provinces in the 4th century, the last mentioned part, also called Phrygia Pisidicus, was assigned to Pisidia; and the S.W. portion, about the Maeander, to Caria: and the remainder was divided into Phrygia Salutaris, on the E., with Synnada for its capital, and Phrygia Pacatiana on the W., extending N. and S. from Bithynia to Pamphylia. — Phrygia was rich in products of every kind. Its mountains furnished gold and marble; its valleys oil and wine; the less fertile hills in the W. afforded pasture for sheep, whose wool was highly celebrated; and even the marshes of the S.E. furnished abundance of salt. — In connection with the early intellectual culture of Greece, Phrygia is highly important. The earliest Greek music, especially that of the flute, was borrowed in part, through the Asiatic colonies, from Phrygia, and one of the three musical modes was called the Phrygian. With this country also were closely associated the orgies of Dionysus, and of Cybele, the Mother of the Gods, the Phrygia Mater of the Roman poets. After the Persian conquest, however, the Phrygians seem to have lost all intellectual activity, and they became proverbial among the Greeks and Romans for submissiveness and stupidity. — It should be observed that the Roman poets constantly use the epithet Phrygian as equivalent to Trojan.

Phrȳnē (Φρύνη), one of the most celebrated Athenian hetairae, was a native of Thespiae in Boeotia. Her beauty procured for her so much wealth that she is said to have offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes, after they had been destroyed by Alexander, if she might be allowed to put up this inscription on the walls: — "Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne, the hetaira, rebuilt them." She had among her admirers many of the most celebrated men of the age of Philip and Alexander, and the beauty of her form gave rise to some of the greatest works of art. The most celebrated picture of Apelles, his "Venus Anadyomene" [APELLES], is said to have been a representation of Phryne, who, at a public festival at Eleusis, entered the sea with dishevelled hair. The celebrated Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles, who was one of her lovers, was taken from her.

Phrynĭchus (Φρύνιχος). 1. An Athenian, and one of the early tragic poets, is said to have been the disciple of Thespis. He gained his first tragic victory in B.C. 511, 24 years after Thespis (535), 12 years after Choerilus (523), and 12 years before Aeschylus (499); and his last in 476, on which occasion Themistocles was his choragus, and recorded the event by an inscription. Phrynichus probably went, like other poets of the age, to the court of Hiero, and there died. In all the accounts of the rise and development of tragedy, the chief place after Thespis is assigned to Phrynichus; and the improvements which he introduced in the internal poetical character of the drama, entitle him to be considered as the real inventor of tragedy. For the light, ludicrous, Bacchanalian stories of Thespis, he substituted regular and serious subjects, taken either from the heroic age, or the heroic deeds which illustrated the history of his own time. In these he aimed, not so much to amuse the audience as to move their passions; and so powerful was the effect of his tragedy on the capture of Miletus, that the audience burst into tears, and fined the poet 1000 drachmae, because he had exhibited the sufferings of a kindred people, and even passed a law that no one should ever again make use of that drama. To the light mimetic chorus of Thespis he added the sublime music of dithyrambic choruses. Aristophanes more than once contrasts these ancient and beautiful melodies with the involved refinements of later poets. Phrynichus was the first poet who introduced masks, representing female persons in the drama. He also paid particular attention to the dances of the chorus. In the drama of Phrynichus, however, the chorus still retained the principal place, and it was reserved for Aeschylus and Sophocles to bring the dialogue and action into their due position. — 2. A distinguished comic poet of the Old Comedy, was a contemporary of Eupolis, and flourished B.C. 429. — 3. A Greek sophist and grammarian, described by some as an Arabian, and by others as a Bithynian, lived under M. Aurelius and Commodus. His great work was entitled Σοφιστικὴ Παρασκευή in 37 books, of which we still possess a fragment, published by Bekker, in his Anecdota Graeca, Berol. 1814, vol. i. He also wrote a Lexicon of Attic words (Ἐκλογὴ ῥημάτων καὶ ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν), which is extant: the best edition is by Lobeck, Lips. 1830.

Phrynnis (Φρύννις), or Phrynis (Φρῦνις), a celebrated dithyrambic poet, of the time of the Peloponnesian war, was a native of Mytilene, but flourished at Athens. His innovations, effeminacies, and frigidness, are repeatedly attacked by the comic poets. Among the innovations which he is said to have made, was the addition of 2 strings to the heptachord. He was the first who gained the victory in the musical contests established by Pericles, in connection with the Panathenaic festival, probably in B.C. 445.

Phthīa. [PHTHIOTIS.]

Phthīōtis (Φθιῶτις: Φθιώτης), a district in the S.E. of Thessaly, bounded on the S. by the Maliac gulf, and on the E. by the Pagasaean gulf, and inhabited by Achaeans. [THESSALIA.] Homer calls it Phthīa (Φθίη), and mentions a city of the same name, which was celebrated as the residence of Achilles. Hence the poets call Achilles Phthius hero, and his father Peleus Phthius rex.

Phthīra (τὰ Φθίρα, Φθειρῶν ὄρος), a mountain of Caria, forming a part or a branch of Latmus, inhabited by a people called Φθίρες.

Phthīrŏphăgi (Φθειρόφαγοι, i. e. eaters of lice), a Scythian people near the Caucasus, or, according to some, beyond the river Rha, in Sarmatia Asiatica.

Phya. [PISISTRATUS.]

Phȳcūs (Φυκοῦς: Ras-Sem or Ras-el-Kazat), a promontory on the coast of Cyrenaica, a little W. of Apollonia and N.W. of Cyrene. It is the N.-most headland of Libya E. of the Lesser Syrtis, and the nearest point of this coast to that of Europe, the distance from Phycus to Taenarum, the S. promontory of Peloponnesus, being 208 miles. There was a small town of the same name on the headland.

Phȳlăcē (Φυλάκη). 1. A small town of Thessaly in Phthiotis, S.E. of Eretria, and E. of Enipeus, on the N. slope of Mt. Othrys. It was the birthplace of Protesilaus. — 2. A town of Epirus in Molossia. — 3. A town in Arcadia near the sources of the Alpheus, on the frontiers of Tegea and Laconia.

Phylăcus (Φύλακος), son of Deion and Diomede, and husband of Periclymene or Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, by whom he became the father of Iphiclus and Alcimede. He was believed to be the founder of the town of Phylace, in Thessaly. Either from his name or that of the town, his descendants, Phylacus, Iphiclus, and Protesilaus, are called Phylacidae.

Phylarchus (Φύλαρχος), a Greek historical writer, and a contemporary of Aratus, was probably a native of Naucratis in Egypt, but spent the greater part of his life at Athens. His great work was a history in 28 books, which embraced a period of 52 years, from the expedition of Pyrrhus into Peloponnesus, B.C. 272, to the death of Cleomenes, 220. Phylarchus is vehemently attacked by Polybius, who charges him with falsifying history through his partiality to Cleomenes, and his hatred against Aratus and the Achaeans. The accusation is probably not unfounded, but it might be retorted with equal justice upon Polybius, who has fallen into the opposite error of exaggerating the merits of Aratus and his party, and depreciating Cleomenes. The style of Phylarchus appears to have been too oratorical and declamatory; but it was at the same time lively and attractive. The fragments of Phylarchus have been collected by Lucht, Lips. 1836; by Brückner, Vratisl. 1838; and by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Graec. Paris, 1840.

Phylas (Φύλας). 1. King of the Dryopes, was attacked and slain by Hercules, because he had violated the sanctuary of Delphi. By his daughter Midea, Hercules became the father of Antiochus. — 2. Son of Antiochus, and grandson of Hercules and Midea, was married to Deiphile, by whom he had 2 sons, Hippotas and Thero. — 3. King of Ephyra in Thesprotia, and the father of Polymele and Astyoche, by the latter of whom Hercules was the father of Tlepolemus.

Phȳlē (Φυλή: Φυλάσιος: Fili), a demus in Attica, and a strongly fortified place, belonging to the tribe Oeneis, was situated on the confines of Boeotia, and on the S.W. slope of Mt. Parnes. It is memorable as the place which Thrasybulus and the Athenian patriots seized, soon after the end of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 404, and from which they directed their operations against the 30 Tyrants at Athens.

Phyleus (Φυλεύς), son of Augeas, was expelled by his father from Ephyra, because he gave evidence in favour of Hercules. [See p. 309, a.] He then emigrated to Dulichium. By Ctimene or Timandra he became the father of Meges, who is hence called Phylīdes.

Phyllis. [DEMOPHON, No. 2.]

Phyllis (Φύλλις), a district in Thrace S. of the Strymon, near Mt. Pangaeus.

Phyllus (Φύλλος: Petrino), a town of Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis, N. of Metropolis.

Physca (Φύσκα), a town of Macedonia in the district Eordaea.

Physcon. [PTOLEMAEUS.]

Physcus (Φύσκος). 1. A city of the Ozolian Locrians in N. Greece. — 2. (Paitchshin), a town on the S. coast of Caria, in the Rhodian territory, with an excellent harbour, which was used as the port of Mylasa, and was the landing-place for travellers coming from Rhodes. — 3. (Odorneh), an E. tributary of the Tigris in Lower Assyria. The town of Opis stood at its junction with the Tigris.

Phytaeum (Φύταιον: Φυταῖος), a town in Aetolia, S.E. of Thermum, on the lake Trichonis.

Picēni. [PICENUM.]

Pīcentes. [PICENUM.]

Picentĭa (Picentinus: Vicenza), a town in the S. of Campania at the head of the Sinus Paestanus, and between Salernum and the frontiers of Lucania, the inhabitants of which were compelled by the Romans, in consequence of their revolt to Hannibal, to abandon their town and live in the neighbouring villages. Between the town and the frontiers of Lucania, there was an ancient temple of the Argive Juno, said to have been founded by Jason, the Argonaut.—The name of Picentini was not confined to the inhabitants of Picentia, but was given to the inhabitants of the whole coast of the Sinus Paestanus, from the promontory of Minerva to the river Silarus. They were a portion of the Sabine Picentes, who were transplanted by the Romans to this part of Campania after the conquest of Picenum, B. C. 268, at which time they founded the town of Picentia.

Picentīni. [PICENTIA.]

Picēnum (Picentes sing. Picens, more rarely Picentini and Piceni), a country in central Italy, was a narrow strip of land along the N. coast of the Adriatic, and was bounded on the N. by Umbria, from which it was separated by the river Aesis, on the W. by Umbria and the territory of the Sabines, and on the S. by the territory of the Marsi and Vestini, from which it was separated by a range of hills and by the river Matrinus. It is said to have derived its name from the bird picus, which directed the Sabine immigrants into the land, or from a mythical leader Picus: some modern writers connect the name with the Greek πεύκη, a pine-tree, on account of the pine-trees growing in the country on the slopes of the Apennines; but none of these etymologies can be received. Picenum formed the 5th region in the division of Italy made by Augustus. The country was traversed by a number of hills of moderate height, eastern offshoots of the Apennines, and was drained by several small rivers flowing into the Adriatic through the valleys between these hills. The country was upon the whole fertile, and was especially celebrated for its apples; but the chief employment of the inhabitants was the feeding of cattle and swine. — The Picentes, as already remarked, were Sabine immigrants; but the population of the country appears to have been of a mixed nature. The Umbrians were in possession of the land, when it was conquered by the Sabine Picentes, and some of the Umbrian population became intermingled with their Sabine conquerors. In addition to this the S. part of the country was for a time in possession of the Liburnians, and Ancona was occupied by Greeks from Syracuse. In B. C. 299 the Picentes made a treaty with the Romans; but having revolted in 269, they were defeated by the consul Sempronius Sophus in the following year, and were obliged to submit to the Roman supremacy. A portion of the people was transplanted to the coast of the Sinus Paestanus, where they founded the town Picentia. [PICENTIA.] Two or three years afterwards the Romans sent colonies to Firmum and Castrum Novum in Picenum, in order to secure their newly conquered possession. The Picentes fought with the other Socii against Rome in the Social or Marsic war (90—89), and received the Roman franchise at the close of it.

Picti, a people inhabiting the northern part of Britain, appear to have been either a tribe of the Caledonians, or the same people as the Caledonians, though under another name. They were called Picti by the Romans from their practice of painting their bodies. They are first mentioned by the rhetorician Eumenius in an oration addressed to Constantius Chlorus, A. D. 296; and after this time their name frequently occurs in the Roman writers, and often in connection with that of the Scoti. In the next century we find them divided into 2 tribes, the Dicaledonae or Dicaledones, and the Vecturiones or Vecturones. At a still later period their principal seat was in the N.E. of Scotland.

Pictŏnes, subsequently Pictāvi, a powerful people on the coast of Gallia Aquitanica, whose territory extended N. as far as the Liger (Loire), and E. probably as far as the river Creuse. Their chief town was Limonum, subsequently Pictavi (Poitiers).

Pictor, Fabĭus. 1. C., painted the temple of Salus, which the dictator C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus contracted for in his censorship, B. C. 307, and dedicated in his dictatorship, 302. This painting, which must have been on the walls of the temple, was probably a representation of the battle which Bubulus had gained against the Samnites. This is the earliest Roman painting of which we have any record. It was preserved till the reign of Claudius, when the temple was destroyed by fire. In consequence of this painting C. Fabius received the surname of Pictor, which was borne by his descendants. — 2. C., son of No. 1, consul 269. — 3. N., (i. e. Numerius), also son of No. 1, consul, 266. — 4. Q., son of No. 2, was the most ancient writer of Roman history in prose. He served in the Gallic war, 225, and also in the 2nd Punic war. His history, which was written in Greek, began with the arrival of Aeneas in Italy, and came down to his own time. Hence, Polybius speaks of him as one of the historians of the 2nd Punic war. — 5. Q., praetor 189, and flamen Quirinalis. — 6. Ser., is said by Cicero to have been well skilled in law, literature, and antiquity. He lived about B. C. 150. He appears to be the same as the Fabius Pictor who wrote a work De Jure Pontificio, in several books. He probably wrote Annals likewise in the Latin language, since Cicero (de Orat. ii. 12) speaks of a Latin annalist, Pictor, whom he places after Cato, but before Piso; which corresponds with the time at which Ser. Pictor lived, but could not apply to Q. Pictor, who lived in the time of the 2nd Punic war.

Pīcumnus and Pīlumnus, 2 Roman divinities, were regarded as 2 brothers, and as the beneficent gods of matrimony in the rustic religion of the ancient Romans. A couch was prepared for them in the house in which there was a newly-born child. Pilumnus was believed to ward off all sufferings from the infant with his pilum, with which he taught to pound the grain; and Picumnus, who, under the name of Sterquilinius, was believed to have discovered the use of manure for the fields, conferred upon the infant strength and prosperity. Hence both were also looked upon as the gods of good deeds, and were identified with Castor and Pollux. When Danaë landed in Italy, Picumnus is said to have built with her the town of Ardea, and to have become by her the father of Daunus.

Pīcus (Πῖκος), a Latin prophetic divinity, is described as a son of Saturnus or Sterculus, as the husband of Canens, and the father of Faunus. In some traditions he was called the first king of Italy. He was a famous soothsayer and augur, and as he made use in his prophetic art of a picus (a wood-pecker), he himself was also called Picus. He was represented in a rude and primitive manner as a wooden pillar with a wood-pecker on the top of it, but afterwards as a young man with a wood-pecker on his head. The whole legend of Picus is founded on the notion that the wood-pecker is a prophetic bird, sacred to Mars. Pomona, it is said, was beloved by him, and when Circe's love for him was not requited, she changed him into a wood-pecker, who, however, retained the prophetic powers which he had formerly possessed as a man.

Pĭĕrĭa (Πιερία: Πίερες). 1. A narrow slip of country on the S.E. coast of Macedonia, extending from the mouth of the Peneus in Thessaly to the Haliacmon, and bounded on the W. by Mt. Olympus and its offshoots. A portion of these mountains was called by the ancient writers Pierus, or the Pierian mountain. The inhabitants of this country, the Pieres, were a Thracian people, and are celebrated in the early history of Greek poetry and music, since their country was one of the earliest seats of the worship of the Muses, and Orpheus is said to have been buried there. After the establishment of the Macedonian kingdom in Emathia in the 7th century B. C. Pieria was conquered by the Macedonians, and the inhabitants were driven out of the country. — 2. A district in Macedonia E. of the Strymon near Mt. Pangaeum, where the Pierians settled, who had been driven out of their original abodes by the Macedonians, as already related. They possessed in this district the fortified towns of Phagres and Pergamus. — 3. A district on the N. coast of Syria, so called from the mountain Pieria, a branch of the Amanus, a name given to it by the Macedonians after their conquest of the East. In this district was the city of Seleucia, which is distinguished from other cities of the same name, as Seleucia in Pieria.

Pĭĕrĭdes (Πιερίδες). 1. A surname of the Muses, which they derived from Pieria, near Mt. Olympus, where they were first worshipped among the Thracians. Some derived the name from an ancient king Pierus, who is said to have emigrated from Thrace into Boeotia, and to have established their worship at Thespiae. Pieris also occurs in the singular. — 2. The nine daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia (Macedonia), whom he begot by Euippe or Antiope, and to whom he gave the names of the 9 Muses. They afterwards entered into a contest with the Muses, and, being conquered, they were metamorphosed into birds called Colymbas, Iyngx, Cenchris, Cissa, Chloris, Acalanthis, Nessa, Pipo, and Dracontis.

Pĭĕrus (Πίερος). 1. Mythological. [PIERIDES.] — 2. A mountain. [PIERIA, No. 1.]

Pietas, a personification of faithful attachment, love, and veneration among the Romans. At first she had only a small sanctuary at Rome, but in B. C. 191 a larger one was built. She is represented on Roman coins, as a matron throwing incense upon an altar, and her attributes are a stork and children. She is sometimes represented as a female figure offering her breast to an aged parent.

Pĭĕtas Julĭa. [POLA.]

Pigres (Πίγρης), of Halicarnassus, either the brother or the son of the celebrated Artemisia, queen of Caria. He is said to have been the author of the Margites, and the Batrachomyomachia.

Pilĭa, the wife of T. Pomponius Atticus, to whom she was married on the 12th of February, B. C. 56. In the summer of the following year, she bore her husband a daughter, who subsequently married Vipsanius Agrippa.

Pilōrus (Πίλωρος), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Singitic gulf.

Pīlumnus. [PICUMNUS.]

Pimplēa (Πίμπλεια), a town in the Macedonian province of Pieria, sacred to the Muses, who were hence called Pimplēides. Horace (Carm. i. 26. 9) uses the form Pimplēa in the singular, and not Pimplēis.

Pinăra (τὰ Πίναρα: Πιναρεύς: Pinara or Minara, Ru.), an inland city of Lycia, some distance W. of the river Xanthus, at the foot of Mt. Cragus. Here Pandarus was worshipped as a hero.

Pīnārĭa Gens, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, traced its origin to a time long previous to the foundation of the city. The legend related that when Hercules came into Italy he was hospitably received on the spot, where Rome was afterwards built, by the Potitii and the Pinarii, two of the most distinguished families in the country. The hero, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped; but as the Pinarii were not at hand when the sacrificial banquet was ready, and did not come till the entrails of the victim were eaten, Hercules, in anger, determined that the Pinarii should in all future time be excluded from partaking of the entrails of the victims, and that in all matters relating to his worship they should be inferior to the Potitii. These two families continued to be the hereditary priests of Hercules till the censorship of App. Claudius (B. C. 312), who purchased from the Potitii the knowledge of the sacred rites, and entrusted them to public slaves; whereat the god was so angry, that the whole Potitia gens, containing 12 families and 30 grown up men, perished within a year, or according to other accounts within 30 days, and Appius himself became blind. The Pinarii did not share in the guilt of communicating the sacred knowledge, and therefore did not receive the same punishment as the Potitii, but continued in existence to the latest times. It appears that the worship of Hercules by the Potitii and Pinarii was a sacrum gentilitium belonging to these gentes, and that in the time of App. Claudius these sacra privata were made sacra publica. The Pinarii were divided into the families of Mamercinus, Natta, Posca, Rusca, and Scarpus, but none of them obtained sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

Pīnārius, L., the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Caesar, being the grandson of Julia, Caesar's eldest sister. In the will of the dictator, Pinarius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and L. Pinarius, Octavius obtaining three-fourths of the property, and the remaining fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pedius.

Pīnărus (Πίναρος), a river of Cilicia, rising in M. Amanus, and falling into the gulf of Issus near Issus, between the mouth of the Pyramus and the Syrian frontier.

Pindărus (Πίνδαρος), the greatest lyric poet of Greece, was born either at Thebes or at Cynoscephalae, a village in the territory of Thebes, about B. C. 522. His family was one of the noblest in Thebes, and seems also to have been celebrated for its skill in music. The father or uncle of Pindar was a flute-player, and Pindar at an early age received instruction in the art from the flute-player Scopelinus. But the youth soon gave indications of a genius for poetry, which induced his father to send him to Athens to receive more perfect instruction in the art. Later writers tell us that his future glory as a poet was miraculously foreshadowed by a swarm of bees which rested upon his lips while he was asleep, and that this miracle first led him to compose poetry. At Athens Pindar became the pupil of Lasus of Hermione, the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry. He returned to Thebes before he completed his 20th year, and is said to have received instruction there from Myrtis and Corinna of Tanagra, two poetesses, who then enjoyed great celebrity in Boeotia. With both these poetesses Pindar contended for the prize in the musical contests at Thebes; and he is said to have been defeated five times by Corinna. Pindar commenced his professional career as a poet at an early age, and was soon employed by different states and princes in all parts of the Hellenic world to compose for them choral songs for special occasions. He received money and presents for his works; but he never degenerated into a common mercenary poet, and he continued to preserve to his latest days the respect of all parts of Greece. He composed poems for Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse, Alexander, son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, Arcesilaus, king of Cyrene, as well as for many free states and private persons. He was courted especially by Alexander, king of Macedonia, and Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse; and the praises which he bestowed upon the former are said to have been the chief reason which led his descendant, Alexander, the son of Philip, to spare the house of the poet, when he destroyed the rest of Thebes. Pindar's stated residence was at Thebes, though he frequently left home in order to witness the great public games, and to visit the states and distinguished men who courted his friendship and employed his services. Thus about B. C. 473 he visited the court of Hieron at Syracuse, where he remained 4 years. He probably died in his 80th year in 442.—The only poems of Pindar which have come down to us entire are his Epinicia, or triumphal odes. But these were but a small portion of his works. Besides his triumphal odes he wrote hymns to the gods, paeans, dithyrambs, odes for processions (προσόδια), songs of maidens (παρθένεια), mimic dancing songs (ὑπορχήματα), drinking-songs (σκόλια), dirges (θρῆνοι), and encomia (ἐγκώμια), or panegyrics on princes. Of these we have numerous fragments. Most of them are mentioned in the well-known lines of Horace (Carm. iv. 2):

> "Seu per audaces nova dithyrambos
> Verba devolvit, numerisque fertur
> Lege solutis:
> Seu deos (hymns and paeans) regesve (encomia) canit, deorum > Sanguinem: . . .
> Sive quos Elea domum reducit
> Palma caelestes (the Epinicia): . . .
> Flebili sponsae juvenemve raptum
> Plorat" (the dirges).

In all of these varieties Pindar equally excelled, as we see from the numerous quotations made from them by the ancient writers, though they are generally of too fragmentary a kind to allow us to form a judgment respecting them. Our estimate of Pindar as a poet must be formed almost exclusively from his Epinicia, which were composed in commemoration of some victory in the public games. The Epinicia are divided into 4 books, celebrating respectively the victories gained in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. In order to understand them properly we must bear in mind the nature of the occasion for which they were composed, and the object which the poet had in view. A victory gained in one of the 4 great national festivals conferred honour not only upon the conqueror and his family, but also upon the city to which he belonged. It was accordingly celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. Such a celebration began with a procession to a temple, where a sacrifice was offered, and it ended with a banquet and the joyous revelry, called by the Greeks comus (κῶμος). For this celebration a poem was expressly composed, which was sung by a chorus. The poems were sung either during the procession to the temple or at the comus at the close of the banquet. Those of Pindar's Epinician odes which consist of strophes without epodes were sung during the procession, but the majority of them appear to have been sung at the comus. In these odes Pindar rarely describes the victory itself, as the scene was familiar to all the spectators, but he dwells upon the glory of the victor, and celebrates chiefly either his wealth (ὄλβος) or his skill (ἀρετή),—his wealth, if he had gained the victory in the chariot-race, since it was only the wealthy that could contend for the prize in this contest; his skill, if he had been exposed to peril in the contest.—The metres of Pindar are too extensive and difficult a subject to admit of explanation in the present work. No two odes possess the same metrical structure. The Doric rhythm chiefly prevails, but he also makes frequent use of the Aeolian and Lydian as well. The best editions of Pindar are by Böckh, Lips. 1811—1821, 2 vols. 4to., and by Dissen, of which there is a 2nd edition by Schneidewin, Gotha, 1843, seq.

Pindăsus (Πίνδασος), a S. branch of M. Temnus in Mysia, extending to the Elaïtic Gulf, and containing the sources of the river Cetius.

Pindus (Πίνδος). 1. A lofty range of mountains in northern Greece, a portion of the great back bone, which runs through the centre of Greece from N. to S. The name of Pindus was confined to that part of the chain which separates Thessaly and Epirus; and its most N.-ly and also highest part was called LACMON. — 2. One of the 4 towns in Doris, near the sources of a small river of the same name which flowed through Locris into the Cephissus.

Pinna (Pinnensis: Cività di Penna), the chief town of the Vestini at the foot of the Apennines, surrounded by beautiful meadows.

Pinnes, Pinneus, or Pineus, was the son of Agron, king of Illyria, by his first wife, Triteuta. At the death of Agron (B. C. 231), Pinnes, who was then a child, was left in the guardianship of his step-mother Teuta, whom Agron had married after divorcing Triteuta. When Teuta was defeated by the Romans, the care of Pinnes devolved upon Demetrius of Pharos; but when Demetrius in his turn made war against the Romans and was defeated, Pinnes was placed upon the throne by the Romans, but was compelled to pay tribute.

Pintuaria (Πιντουαρία: Teneriffe), one of the INSULAE FORTUNATAE (Canary Is.) off the W. coast of Africa, also called Convallis, and, from the perpetual snow on its peak, Nivaria.

Pīraeeus or Pīraeus (Πειραιεύς: Porto Leone or Porto Dracone), the most important of the harbours of Athens, was situated in the peninsula about 5 miles S.W. of Athens. This peninsula, which is sometimes called by the general name of Piraeeus, contained 3 harbours, Piraeeus proper on the W. side, by far the largest of the 3, Zea on the E. side separated from Piraeeus by a narrow isthmus, and Munychia (Pharnari) still further to the E. The position of Piraeeus and of the Athenian harbours has been usually misunderstood. In consequence of a statement in an ancient Scholiast, it was generally supposed that the great harbour of Piraeeus was divided into 3 smaller harbours, Zea for corn-vessels, Aphrodisium for merchant-ships in general, and Cantharus for ships of war; but this division of the Piraeeus is now rejected by the best topographers. Zea was a harbour totally distinct from the Piraeeus, as is stated above; the N. portion of the Piraeeus seems to have been used by the merchant vessels, and the Cantharus, where the ships of war were stationed, was on the S. side of the harbour near the entrance. It was through the suggestion of Themistocles that the Athenians were induced to make use of the harbour of Piraeeus. Before the Persian wars their principal harbour was Phalerum, which was not situated in the Piraean peninsula at all, but lay to the E. of Munychia. [PHALERUM.] At the entrance of the harbour of Piraeeus there were 2 promontories, the one on the right-hand called Alcimus (Ἄλκιμος), on which was the tomb of Themistocles, and the other on the left called Eëtionēa (Ἠετιώνεια), on which the Four Hundred erected a fortress. The entrance of the harbour, which was narrow by nature, was rendered still narrower by two mole-heads, to which a chain was attached to prevent the ingress of hostile ships. The town or demus of Piraeeus was surrounded with strong fortifications by Themistocles, and was connected with Athens by means of the celebrated Long Walls under the administration of Pericles. [See p. 102, b.] The town possessed a considerable population, and many public and private buildings. The most important of its public buildings were: the Agora Hippodamia, a temple of Zeus Soter, a large stoa, a theatre, the Phreattys or tribunal for the admirals, the arsenal, the docks, &c.

Pīrēnē (Πειρήνη), a celebrated fountain at Corinth, which, according to tradition, took its origin from Pirene, a daughter of Oebalus, who here melted away into tears through grief for the loss of her son Cenchrias. At this fountain Bellerophon is said to have caught the horse Pegasus. It gushed forth from the rock in the Acrocorinthus, was conveyed down the hill by subterraneous conduits, and fell into a marble basin, from which the greater part of the town was supplied with water. The fountain was celebrated for the purity and salubrity of its water, and was so highly valued that the poets frequently employed its name as equivalent to that of Corinth itself.

Pīrēsiae (Πειρεσιαί), probably the same as the Iresiae of Livy, a town of Thessaly in the district Thessaliotis, on the left bank of the Peneus.

Pīrithŏus (Πειρίθοος), son of Ixion or Zeus by Dia, was king of the Lapithae in Thessaly, and married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Polypoetes. When Pirithoüs was celebrating his marriage with Hippodamia, the intoxicated Centaur Eurytion or Eurytus carried her off, and this act occasioned the celebrated fight between the Centaurs and Lapithae, in which the Centaurs were defeated. Pirithoüs once invaded Attica, but when Theseus came forth to oppose him, he conceived a warm admiration for the Athenian king; and from this time a most intimate friendship sprung up between the 2 heroes. Theseus was present at the wedding of Pirithoüs, and assisted him in his battle against the Centaurs. Hippodamia afterwards died, and each of the two friends resolved to wed a daughter of Zeus. With the assistance of Pirithoüs, Theseus carried off Helen from Sparta, and placed her at Aethra under the care of Phaedra. Pirithoüs was still more ambitious, and resolved to carry off Persephone (Proserpina), the wife of the king of the lower world. Theseus would not desert his friend in the enterprise, though he knew the risk which they ran. The 2 friends accordingly descended to the lower world, but they were seized by Pluto and fastened to a rock, where they both remained till Hercules visited the lower world. Hercules delivered Theseus, who had made the daring attempt only to please his friend, but Pirithoüs remained for ever in torment (amatorem trecentae Pirithoum cohibent catenae, Hor. Carm, iii. 4. 80). Pirithoüs was worshipped at Athens, along with Theseus, as a hero.

Pīrus (Πεῖρος), Pierus (Πίερος), or Achelous, the chief river of Achaia, which falls into the gulf of Patrae, near Olenus.

Pirustae, a people in Illyria, exempted from taxes by the Romans, because they deserted Gentius and passed over to the Romans.

Pīsa (Πῖσα: Πισάτης), the capital of Pisatis (Πισᾶτις), the middle portion of the province of Elis in Peloponnesus. [Elis.] In the most ancient times Pisatis formed an union of 8 states, of which, in addition to Pisa, we find mention of Salmone, Heraclea, Harpinna, Cycesium and Dyspontium. Pisa itself was situated N. of the Alpheus, at a very short distance E. of Olympia, and, in consequence of its proximity to the latter place, was frequently identified by the poets with it. The history of the Pisatae consists of their struggle with the Eleans, with whom they contended for the presidency of the Olympic games. The Pisatae obtained this honour in the 8th Olympiad (B. C. 748) with the assistance of Phidon, tyrant of Argos, and also a 2nd time in the 34th Olympiad (644) by means of their own king Pantaleon. In the 52nd Olympiad (572) the struggle between the 2 peoples was brought to a close by the conquest and destruction of Pisa by the Eleans. So complete was the destruction of the city, that not a trace of it was left in later times; and some persons, as we learn from Strabo, even questioned whether it had ever existed, supposing that by the name of Pisa, the kingdom of the Pisatae was alone intended. The existence, however, of the city does not admit of dispute. Even after the destruction of the city, the Pisatae did not relinquish their claims; and in the 104th Olympiad (364), they had the presidency of the Olympic games along with the Arcadians, when the latter people were making war with the Eleans.

Pīsae, more rarely Pisa (Pisanus: Pisa), one of the most ancient and important of the cities of Etruria, was situated at the confluence of the Arnus and Ausar (Serchio), about 6 miles from the sea; but the latter river altered its course in the 12th century, and now flows into the sea by a separate channel. According to some traditions, Pisae was founded by the companions of Nestor, the inhabitants of Pisa in Elis, who were driven upon the coast of Italy on their return from Troy; whence the Roman poets give the Etruscan town the surname of Alphea. This legend, however, like many others, probably arose from the accidental similarity of the names of the 2 cities. It would seem that Pisa was originally a Pelasgic town, that it afterwards passed into the hands of the Ligyae, and from them into those of the Etruscans. It then became one of the 12 cities of Etruria, and was down to the time of Augustus the most N.-ly city in the country. Pisa is frequently mentioned in the Ligurian wars as the head-quarters of the Roman legions. In B. C. 180 it was made a Latin colony, and appears to have been colonised again in the time of Augustus, since we find it called in inscriptions Colonia Julia Pisana. Its harbour, called Portus Pisanus, at the mouth of the Arnus, was much used by the Romans; and in the time of Strabo the town of Pisa was still a place of considerable importance on account of the marble-quarries in its neighbourhood, and the quantity of timber which it yielded for ship-building. About 3 miles N. of the town were mineral springs, called Aquae Pisanae, which were less celebrated in antiquity than they are at the present day. There is scarcely a vestige of the ancient city in the modern Pisa.

Pīsander (Πείσανδρος). 1. Son of Polyctor, and one of the suitors of Penelope. — 2. An Athenian, of the demus of Acharnae, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was attacked by the comic poets for his rapacity and cowardice. In 412 he comes before us as the chief ostensible agent in effecting the revolution of the Four Hundred. In all the measures of the new government, of which he was a member, he took an active part; and when Theramenes and others withdrew from it, he sided with the more violent aristocrats, and was one of those who, on the counter-revolution, took refuge with Agis at Decelea. His property was confiscated, and it does not appear that he ever returned to Athens. — 3. A Spartan, brother-in-law of Agesilaus II., who made him admiral of the fleet in 395. In the following year he was defeated and slain in the sea-fight off Cnidus, against Conon and Pharnabazus. — 4. A poet of Camirus in Rhodes, flourished about B. C. 648—645. He was the author of a poem in 2 books on the exploits of Hercules, called Heraclēa (Ἡράκλεια). The Alexandrian grammarians thought so highly of the poem that they received Pisander, as well as Antimachus and Panyasis, into the epic canon together with Homer and Hesiod. Only a few lines of it have been preserved. In the Greek Anthology we find an epigram attributed to Pisander of Rhodes, perhaps the poet of Camirus. — 5. A poet of Laranda, in Lycia or Lycaonia, was the son of Nestor, and flourished in the reign of Alexander Severus (A. D. 222—235). He wrote a poem, called Ἡρωικαὶ θεογαμίαι, which probably treated of the marriages of gods and goddesses with mortals, and of the heroic progeny thus produced.

Pisatis. [Pisa.]

Pisaurum (Pisaurensis: Pesaro), an ancient town of Umbria, near the mouth of the river Pisaurus (Foglia), on the road to Ariminum. It was colonised by the Romans in B. C. 186, and probably colonised a 2nd time by Augustus, since it is called in inscriptions Colonia Julia Felix

Pisaurus. [Pisaurum.]

Pisgah. [Nebo.]

Pĭsĭdĭa (ἡ Πισιδική: Πισίδης, pl. Πισίδαι, also Πεισίδαι, Πισεῖδαι and Πισιδικοί, Pĭsĭda pl. Pisidae, anc. Peisidae), an inland district of Asia Minor, bounded by Lycia and Pamphylia on the S.; Cilicia on the S.E.; Lycaonia and Isauria (the latter often reckoned a part of Pisidia) on the E. and N.E.; Phrygia Parorios on the N., where the boundary varied at different times, and was never very definite; and Caria on the W. It was a mountainous region, formed by that part of the main chain of Mt. Taurus which sweeps round in a semicircle parallel to the shore of the Pamphylian gulf; the strip of shore itself, at the foot of the mountains, constituting the district of Pamphylia. The inhabitants of the mountains were a warlike aboriginal people, related apparently to the Isaurians and Cilicians. They maintained their independence, under petty chieftains, against all the successive rulers of Asia Minor. The Romans never subdued the Pisidians in their mountain fortresses, though they took some of the towns on the outskirts of their country; for example, Antiochia, which was made a colony with the Jus Italicum. In fact the N. part, in which Antiochia stood, had originally belonged to Phrygia, and was more accessible and more civilised than the mountains which formed the proper country of the Pisidians. Nominally, the country was considered a part of Pamphylia, till the new sub-division of the empire under Constantine, when Pisidia was made a separate province. The country is still inhabited by wild tribes, among whom travelling is dangerous; and it is therefore little known. Ancient writers say that it contained, amidst its rugged mountains, some fertile valleys, where the olive flourished; and it also produced the gum storax, some medicinal plants, and salt. On the S. slope of the Taurus, several rivers flowed through Pisidia and Pamphylia, into the Pamphylian gulf, the chief of which were the Cestrus and the Catarrhactes; and on the N. the mountain streams form some large salt lakes, namely, Ascania (Hoiran and Egerdir) S. of Antiochia, Caralius or Pusgusa (Bei Shehr or Kereli) S. E. of the former, and Trogitis (Soghla) further to the S. E., in Isauria. Special names were given to certain districts, which are sometimes spoken of as parts of Pisidia, sometimes as distinct countries; namely, Cibyrătis, in the S. W. along the N. of Lycia, and Cabalia, the S. W. corner of Cibyratis itself; Milyas, the district E. of Cibyratis, N. E. of Lycia, and N. W. of Pamphylia, and Isauria, in the E. of Pisidia, on the borders of Lycaonia.

Pīsistrătĭdae (Πεισιστρατίδαι), the legitimate sons of Pisistratus. The name is used sometimes to indicate only Hippias and Hipparchus, and sometimes in a wider application, embracing the grandchildren and near connections of Pisistratus (as by Herod. viii. 52. referring to a time when both Hippias and Hipparchus were dead).

Pīsistrătus (Πεισίστρατος), the youngest son of Nestor and Anaxibia, was a friend of Telemachus, and accompanied him on his journey from Pylos to Menelaus at Sparta.

Pīsistrătus (Πεισίστρατος), an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, was so named after Pisistratus, the youngest son of Nestor, since the family of Hippocrates was of Pylian origin, and traced their descent to Neleus, the father of Nestor. The mother of Pisistratus (whose name we do not know) was cousin-german to the mother of Solon. Pisistratus grew up equally distinguished for personal beauty and for mental endowments. The relationship between him and Solon naturally drew them together, and a close friendship sprang up between them. He assisted Solon by his eloquence in persuading the Athenians to renew their struggle with the Megarians for the possession of Salamis, and he afterwards fought with bravery in the expedition which Solon led against the island. When Solon, after the establishment of his constitution, retired for a time from Athens, the old rivalry between the parties of the Plain, the Highlands and the Coast broke out into open feud. The party of the Plain, comprising chiefly the landed proprietors, was headed by Lycurgus; that of the Coast, consisting of the wealthier classes not belonging to the nobles, by Megacles, the son of Alcmaeon; the party of the Highlands, which aimed at more of political freedom and equality than either of the two others, was the one at the head of which Pisistratus placed himself, because they seemed the most likely to be useful in the furtherance of his ambitious designs. His liberality, as well as his military and oratorical abilities, gained him the support of a large body of citizens. Solon, on his return, quickly saw through the designs of Pisistratus, who listened with respect to his advice, though he prosecuted his schemes none the less diligently. When Pisistratus found his plans sufficiently ripe for execution, he one day made his appearance in the agora with his mules and his own person exhibiting recent wounds, pretending that he had been nearly assassinated by his enemies as he was riding into the country. An assembly of the people was forthwith called, in which one of his partisans proposed that a body-guard of 50 citizens, armed with clubs, should be granted to him. It was in vain that Solon opposed this; the guard was given him. Through the neglect or connivance of the people Pisistratus took this opportunity of raising a much larger force, with which he seized the citadel, B. C. 560, thus becoming, what the Greeks called Tyrant of Athens. Having secured to himself the substance of power, he made no further change in the constitution, or in the laws, which he administered ably and well. His first usurpation lasted but a short time. Before his power was firmly rooted, the factions headed by Megacles and Lycurgus combined, and Pisistratus was compelled to evacuate Athens. He remained in banishment 6 years. Meantime the factions of Megacles and Lycurgus revived their old feuds, and Megacles made overtures to Pisistratus, offering to reinstate him in the tyranny if he would connect himself with him by receiving his daughter in marriage. The proposal was accepted by Pisistratus, and the following stratagem was devised for accomplishing his restoration, according to the account of Herodotus. A damsel named Phya, of remarkable stature and beauty, was dressed up as Athena in a full suit of armour, and placed in a chariot, with Pisistratus by her side. The chariot was then driven towards the city, heralds being sent on before to announce that Athena in person was bringing back Pisistratus to her Acropolis. The report spread rapidly, and those in the city believing that the woman was really their tutelary goddess, worshipped her, and admitted Pisistratus. Pisistratus nominally performed his part of the contract with Megacles; but in consequence of the insulting manner in which he treated his wife, Megacles again made common cause with Lycurgus, and Pisistratus was a second time compelled to evacuate Athens. He retired to Eretria in Euboea, and employed the next 10 years in making preparations to regain his power. At the end of that time he invaded Attica, with the forces he had raised, and also supported by Lygdamis of Naxos with a considerable body of troops. He defeated his opponents near the temple of Athena at Pallene, and then entered Athens without opposition. Lygdamis was rewarded by being established as tyrant of Naxos, which island Pisistratus conquered. [LYGDAMIS.] Having now become tyrant of Athens for the third time, Pisistratus adopted measures to secure the undisturbed possession of his supremacy. He took a body of foreign mercenaries into his pay, and seized as hostages the children of several of the principal citizens, placing them in the custody of Lygdamis, in Naxos. He maintained at the same time the form of Solon's institutions, only taking care, as his sons did after him, that the highest offices should always be held by some member of the family. He not only exacted obedience to the laws from his subjects and friends, but himself set the example of submitting to them. On one occasion he even appeared before the Areopagus to answer a charge of murder, which however was not prosecuted. Athens was indebted to him for many stately and useful buildings. Among these may be mentioned a temple to the Pythian Apollo, and a magnificent temple to the Olympian Zeus, which remained unfinished for several centuries, and was at length completed by the emperor Hadrian. Besides these, the Lyceum, a garden with stately buildings a short distance from the city, was the work of Pisistratus, as also the fountain of the Nine Springs. Pisistratus also encouraged literature in various ways. It was apparently under his auspices that Thespis introduced at Athens his rude form of tragedy (B. C. 535), and that dramatic contests were made a regular part of the Attic Dionysia. It is to Pisistratus that we owe the first written text of the whole of the poems of Homer, which, without his care, would most likely now exist only in a few disjointed fragments. [HOMERUS.] Pisistratus is also said to have been the first person in Greece who collected a library, to which he generously allowed the public access. By his first wife Pisistratus had 2 sons, Hippias and Hipparchus. By his 2nd wife, Timonassa, he had also 2 sons, Iophon and Thessalus, who are rarely mentioned. He had also a bastard son, Hegesistratus, whom he made tyrant of Sigeum, after taking that town from the Mytilenaeans. Pisistratus died at an advanced age in 527, and was succeeded in the tyranny by his eldest son Hippias: but Hippias and his brother Hipparchus appear to have administered the affairs of the state with so little outward distinction, that they are frequently spoken of as though they had been joint tyrants. They continued the government on the same principles as their father. Thucydides (vi. 54) speaks in terms of high commendation of the virtue and intelligence with which their rule was exercised till the death of Hipparchus. Hipparchus inherited his father's literary tastes. Several distinguished poets lived at Athens under the patronage of Hipparchus, as, for example, Simonides of Ceos, Anacreon of Teos, Lasus of Hermione, and Onomacritus. After the murder of Hipparchus in 514, an account of which is given under HARMODIUS, a great change ensued in the character of the government. Under the influence of revengeful feelings and fears for his own safety Hippias now became a morose and suspicious tyrant. He put to death great numbers of the citizens, and raised money by extraordinary imposts. His old enemies the Alcmaeonidae, to whom Megacles belonged, availed themselves of the growing discontent of the citizens; and after one or two unsuccessful attempts they at length succeeded, supported by a large force under Cleomenes, in expelling the Pisistratidae from Attica. Hippias and his connections retired to Sigeum, 510. The family of the tyrants was condemned to perpetual banishment, a sentence which was maintained even in after-times, when decrees of amnesty were passed. Hippias afterwards repaired to the court of Darius, and looked forward to a restoration to his country by the aid of the Persians. He accompanied the expedition sent under Datis and Artaphernes, and pointed out to the Persians the plain of Marathon, as the most suitable place for their landing. He was now (490) of great age. According to some accounts he fell in the battle of Marathon; according to others he died at Lemnos on his return. Hippias was the only one of the legitimate sons of Pisistratus who had children; but none of them attained distinction.

Pīso, Calpurnĭus, the name of a distinguished plebeian family. The name of Piso, like many other Roman cognomens, is connected with agriculture, the noblest and most honourable pursuit of the ancient Romans: it comes from the verb pisere or pinsere, and refers to the pounding or grinding of corn. — 1. Was taken prisoner at the battle of Cannae, B. C. 216; was praetor urbanus 211, and afterwards commanded as propraetor in Etruria, 210. Piso in his praetorship proposed to the senate, that the Ludi Apollinares, which had been exhibited for the first time in the preceding year (212), should be repeated, and should be celebrated in future annually. The senate passed a decree to this effect. The establishment of these games by their ancestor was commemorated on coins by the Pisones in later times. — 2. C., son of No. 1, was praetor 186, and received Further Spain as his province. He returned to Rome in 184, and obtained a triumph for a victory he had gained over the Lusitani and Celtiberi. He was consul in 180, and died during his consulship.

Pisones with the agnomen Caesoninus.

3. L., received the agnomen Caesoninus, because he originally belonged to the Caesonia gens. He was praetor in 154, and obtained the province of Further Spain, but was defeated by the Lusitani. He was consul in 148, and was sent to conduct the war against Carthage; he was succeeded in the command in the following year by Scipio. — 4. L., son of No. 3, consul 112 with M. Livius Drusus. In 107 he served as legatus to the consul, L. Cassius Longinus, who was sent into Gaul to oppose the Cimbri and their allies, and he fell together with the consul in the battle, in which the Roman army was utterly defeated by the Tigurini in the territory of the Allobroges. This Piso was the grandfather of Caesar's father-in-law, a circumstance to which Caesar himself alludes in recording his own victory over the Tigurini at a later time. (Caes. B. G. i. 7, 12.) — 5. L., son of No. 4, never rose to any of the offices of state, and is only known from the account given of him by Cicero in his violent invective against his son. He married the daughter of Calventius, a native of Cisalpine Gaul, who came from Placentia and settled at Rome; and hence Cicero calls his son in contempt a semi-Placentian. — 6. L., son of No. 5, was an unprincipled debauchee and a cruel and corrupt magistrate. He is first mentioned in 59, when he was brought to trial by P. Clodius for plundering a province, of which he had the administration after his praetorship, and he was only acquitted by throwing himself at the feet of the judges. In the same year Caesar married his daughter Calpurnia; and through his influence Piso obtained the consulship for 58, having for his colleague A. Gabinius, who was indebted for the honour to Pompey. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, which resulted in the banishment of the orator. The conduct of Piso in support of Clodius produced that extreme resentment in the mind of Cicero, which he displayed against Piso on many subsequent occasions. At the expiration of his consulship Piso went to his province of Macedonia, where he remained during 2 years (57 and 56), plundering the province in the most shameless manner. In the latter of these years the senate resolved that a successor should be appointed; and in the debate in the senate which led to his recall, Cicero attacked him in the most unmeasured terms in an oration which has come down to us (De Provinciis Consularibus). Piso on his return (55) complained in the senate of the attack of Cicero, and justified the administration of his province, whereupon Cicero reiterated his charges in a speech which is likewise extant (In Pisonem). Cicero, however, did not venture to bring to trial the father-in-law of Caesar. In 50 Piso was censor with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. On the breaking out of the civil war (49) Piso accompanied Pompey in his flight from the city; and although he did not go with him across the sea, he still kept aloof from Caesar. He subsequently returned to Rome, and remained neutral during the remainder of the civil war. After Caesar's death (44) Piso at first opposed Antony, but is afterwards mentioned as one of his partisans. — 7. L., son of No. 6, was consul 15, and afterwards obtained the province of Pamphylia; from thence he was recalled by Augustus in 11, in order to make war upon the Thracians, who had attacked the province of Macedonia. He was appointed by Tiberius praefectus urbi. While retaining the favour of the emperor, without condescending to servility, he at the same time earned the good-will of his fellow-citizens by the integrity and justice with which he governed the city. He died in A. D. 32, at the age of 80, and was honoured by a decree of the senate, with a public funeral. It was to this Piso and his 2 sons that Horace addressed his epistle on the Art of Poetry.

Pisones with the agnomen Frugi.

8. L., received from his integrity and conscientiousness the surname of Frugi, which is perhaps nearly equivalent to our "man of honour." He was tribune of the plebs, 149, in which year he proposed the first law for the punishment of extortion in the provinces. He was consul in 133, and carried on war against the slaves in Sicily. He was a staunch supporter of the aristocratical party, and offered a strong opposition to the measures of C. Gracchus. Piso was censor, but it is uncertain in what year. He wrote Annals, which contained the history of Rome from the earliest period to the age in which Piso himself lived. — 9. L., son of No. 8, served with distinction under his father in Sicily in 133, and died in Spain about 111, whither he had gone as propraetor. — 10. L., son of No. 9, was a colleague of Verres in the praetorship, 74, when he thwarted many of the unrighteous schemes of the latter. — 11. C., son of No. 10, married Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, in 63, but was betrothed to her as early as 67. He was quaestor in 58, when ha used every exertion to obtain the recall of his father-in-law from banishment; but he died in 57 before Cicero's return to Rome. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero in terms of gratitude on account of the zeal which he had manifested in his behalf during his banishment.

Pisones without an agnomen.

12. C., consul 67, belonged to the high aristocratical party; and in his consulship opposed with the utmost vehemence the law of the tribune Gabinius, for giving Pompey the command of the war against the pirates. In 66 and 65, Piso administered the province of Narbonese Gaul as proconsul, and while there suppressed an insurrection of the Allobroges. In 63 he was accused of plundering the province, and was defended by Cicero. The latter charge was brought against Piso at the instigation of Caesar; and Piso, in revenge, implored Cicero, but without success, to accuse Caesar as one of the conspirators of Catiline. — 13. M., usually called M. Pupius Piso, because he was adopted by M. Pupius, when the latter was an old man. He retained, however, his family-name Piso, just as Scipio, after his adoption by Metellus, was called Metellus Scipio. [Metellus, No. 15.] On the death of L. Cinna, in 84, Piso married his wife Annia. In 83 he was appointed quaestor to the consul L. Scipio; but he quickly deserted this party, and went over to Sulla, who compelled him to divorce his wife on account of her previous connection with Cinna. After his praetorship, the year of which is uncertain, he received the province of Spain with the title of proconsul, and on his return to Rome in 69, enjoyed the honour of a triumph. He served in the Mithridatic war as a legatus of Pompey. He was elected consul for 61 through the influence of Pompey. In his consulship Piso gave great offence to Cicero, by not asking the orator first in the senate for his opinion, and by taking P. Clodius under his protection after his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Cicero revenged himself on Piso, by preventing him from obtaining the province of Syria, which had been promised him. Piso, in his younger days, had so high a reputation as an orator, that Cicero was taken to him by his father, in order to receive instruction from him. He belonged to the Peripatetic school in philosophy, in which he received instructions from Staseas. — 14. Cn., a young noble who had dissipated his fortune by his extravagance and profligacy, and therefore joined Catiline in what is usually called his first conspiracy (66). [For details see p. 155, b.] The senate anxious to get rid of Piso sent him into Nearer Spain as quaestor, but with the rank and title of propraetor. His exactions in the province soon made him so hateful to the inhabitants, that he was murdered by them. It was, however, supposed by some that he was murdered at the instigation of Pompey or of Crassus. — 15. Cn., fought against Caesar in Africa (46), and after the death of the dictator, joined Brutus and Cassius. He was subsequently pardoned, and retured to Rome; but he disdained to ask Augustus for any of the honours of the state, and was, without solicitation, raised to the consulship in 23. — 16. Cn., son of No. 15, inherited all the pride and haughtiness of his father. He was consul B. C. 7, and was sent by Augustus as legate into Spain, where he made himself hated by his cruelty and avarice. Tiberius after his accession was chiefly jealous of Germanicus, his brother's son; and accordingly, when the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus in A. D. 18, Tiberius conferred upon Piso the command of Syria, in order that the latter might do every thing in his power to thwart and oppose Germanicus. Plancina, the wife of Piso, was also urged on by Livia, the mother of the emperor, to vie with and annoy Agrippina. Germanicus and Agrippina were thus exposed to every species of insult and opposition from Piso and Plancina; and when Germanicus fell ill in the autumn of 19, he believed that he had been poisoned by them. Piso on his return to Rome

(20) was accused of murdering Germanicus; the matter was investigated by the senate; but before the investigation came to an end, Piso was found one morning in his room with his throat cut, and his sword lying by his side. It was generally supposed that, despairing of the emperor's protection, he had put an end to his own life; but others believed that Tiberius dreaded his revealing his secrets, and accordingly caused him to be put to death. The powerful influence of Livia secured the acquittal of Plancina. — 17. C., the leader of the well-known conspiracy against Nero in A. D. 65. Piso himself did not form the plot; but as soon as he had joined it, his great popularity gained him many partizans. He possessed most of the qualities which the Romans prized, high birth, an eloquent address, liberality and affability; and he also displayed a sufficient love of magnificence and luxury to suit the taste of the day, which would not have tolerated austerity of manner or character. The conspiracy was discovered by Milichus, a freedman of Flavius Scevinus, one of the conspirators. Piso thereupon opened his veins, and thus died. There is extant a poem in 261 lines, containing a panegyric on a certain Calpurnius Piso, who is probably the same person as the leader of the conspiracy against Nero. — 18. L., surnamed Licinianus, was the son of M. Licinius Crassus Frugi, and was adopted by one of the Pisones. On the accession of Galba to the throne, he adopted as his son and successor Piso Licinianus; but the latter only enjoyed the distinction 4 days, for Otho, who had hoped to receive this honour, induced the praetorians to rise against the emperor. Piso fled for refuge into the temple of Vesta, but was dragged out by the soldiers, and despatched at the threshold of the temple, A. D. 69.

Pistor, that is, the baker, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, which is said to have arisen in the following manner. When the Gauls were besieging Rome, the god suggested to the besieged the idea of throwing loaves of bread among the enemies, to make them believe that the Romans had plenty of provisions, and thus caused them to give up the siege.

Pistōrĭa or Pistōrium (Pistoriensis: Pistoia), a small place in Etruria, on the road from Luca to Florentia, rendered memorable by the defeat of Catiline in its neighbourhood.

Pităna. [Sparta.]

Pitănē (Πιτάνη: Sanderli), a seaport town of Mysia, on the coast of the Elaitic gulf, at the mouth of the Evenus or, according to some, of the Caïcus; almost destroyed by an earthquake under Titus. It was the birthplace of the Academic philosopher Arcesilaus.

Pithēcūsa. [Aenaria.]

Pītho (Πειθώ), called Suada or Suadēla by the Romans, the personification of Persuasion. She was worshipped as a divinity at Sicyon, where she was honoured with a temple in the agora. Pitho also occurs as a surname of Aphrodite, whose worship was said to have been introduced at Athens by Theseus, when he united the country communities into towns. At Athens the statues of Pitho and Aphrodite Pandemos stood close together; and at Megara the statue of Pitho stood in the temple of Aphrodite; so that the 2 divinities must be conceived as closely connected, or the one, perhaps, merely as an attribute of the other.

Pithon (Πίθων also Πείθων and Πύθων). 1. Son of Agenor, a Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great. He received from Alexander the government of part of the Indian provinces, in which he was confirmed after the king's death. In B. C. 316, he received from Antigonus the satrapy of Babylon. He afterwards fought with Demetrius against Ptolemy, and was slain at the battle of Gaza, 312. — 2. Son of Crateuas or Crateas, a Macedonian officer of Alexander, who is frequently confounded with the preceding. After Alexander's death he received from Perdiccas the satrapy of Media. He accompanied Perdiccas on his expedition to Egypt, (321), but he took part in the mutiny against Perdiccas, which terminated in the death of the latter. Pithon rendered important service to Antigonus in his war against Eumenes; but after the death of Eumenes, he began to form schemes for his own aggrandisement, and was accordingly put to death by Antigonus, 316.

Pitīnum (Pitinas, -ātis). 1. (Pitino), a municipium in the interior of Umbria on the river Pisaurus, whence its inhabitants are called in inscriptions Pitinates Pisaurenses. The town also bore the surname Mergens. — 2. A town in Picenum, on the road from Castrum Novum to Prifernum.

Pittăcus (Πιττακός), one of those early cultivators of letters, who were designated as "the Seven Wise Men of Greece," was a native of Mytilene in Lesbos, and was born about B. C. 652. He was highly celebrated as a warrior, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He is first mentioned, in public life, as an opponent of the tyrants of Mytilene. In conjunction with the brothers of Alcaeus, he overthrew and killed the tyrant Melanchrus, B. C. 612. In 606, he commanded the Mytilenaeans, in their war with the Athenians for the possession of Sigeum, on the coast of the Troad, and signalized himself by killing in single combat Phrynon, the commander of the Athenians. This feat Pittacus performed by entangling his adversary in a net, and then despatching him with a trident and a dagger, exactly after the fashion in which the gladiators called retiarii long afterwards fought at Rome. This war was terminated by the mediation of Periander, who assigned the disputed territory to the Athenians; but the internal troubles of Mytilene still continued. The supreme power was fiercely disputed between a succession of tyrants, and the aristocratic party, headed by Alcaeus and his brother Antimenidas; and the latter were driven into exile. As the exiles tried to effect their return by force of arms, the popular party chose Pittacus as their ruler, with absolute power, under the title of Aesymnetes (αἰσυμνήτης). He held this office for 10 years (589—579) and then voluntarily resigned it, having by his administration restored order to the state, and prepared it for the safe enjoyment of a republican form of government. He lived in great honour at Mytilene for 10 years after the resignation of his government; and died in 569, at an advanced age. Of the proverbial maxims of practical wisdom, which were current under the names of the seven wise men of Greece, two were ascribed to Pittacus, namely, Χαλεπὸν ἐσθλὸν ἔμμεναι, and Καιρὸν γνῶθι.

Pittheus (Πιτθεύς), king of Troezene, was son of Pelops and Dia, father of Aethra, and grandfather and instructor of Theseus. When Theseus married Phaedra, Pittheus took Hippolytus into his house. His tomb and the chair on which he had sat in judgment were shown at Troezene down to a late time. He is said to have taught the art of speaking, and even to have written a book upon it. Aethra as his daughter is called Pittheïs.

Pĭtȳīa (Πιτύεια: prob. Shamelik), a town mentioned by Homer, in the N. of Mysia, between Parium and Priapus, evidently named from the pine forests in its neighbourhood.

Pityonēsus (Πιτυόνησος: Anghistri), an island off the coast of Argolis.

Pĭtȳūs (Πιτυοῦς: prob. Pitzunda), a Greek city, in Sarmatia Asiatica, on the N. E. coast of the Euxine, 360 stadia N. W. of Dioscurias. In the time of Strabo, it was a considerable city and port. It was afterwards destroyed by the neighbouring tribe of the Heniochi, but it was restored, and long served as an important frontier fortress of the Roman Empire.

Pityūsa, Pityussa (Πιτυοῦσα, Πιτυοῦσσα, contracted from πιτυόεσσα fem. of πιτυόεις), i. e. abounding in pine-trees. 1. The ancient name of Lampsacus, Salamis, and Chios. — 2. A small island in the Argolic gulf. — 3. The name of 2 islands off the S. coast of Spain, W. of the Baleares. The larger of them was called Ebusus (Iviza), the smaller Ophiussa (Formentera): the latter was uninhabited.

Pixōdărus (Πιξώδαρος), prince or king of Caria, was the youngest of the 3 sons of Hecatomnus, all of whom successively held the sovereignty of Caria. Pixodarus obtained possession of the throne by the expulsion of his sister Ada, the widow and successor of her brother Idrieus, and held it without opposition for 5 years, B. C. 340—335. He was succeeded by his son-in-law Orontobates.

Placentĭa (Placentinus: Piacenza), a Roman colony in Cisalpine Gaul, founded at the same time as Cremona, B. C. 219. It was situated in the territory of the Anamares, on the right bank of the Po, not far from the mouth of the Trebia, and on the road from Mediolanum to Parma. It was taken and destroyed by the Gauls in 200, but was soon rebuilt by the Romans, and became an important place. It continued to be a flourishing town down to the time of the Goths.

Plăcĭa (Πλακίη, Ion.: Πλακιηνός), an ancient Pelasgian settlement, in Mysia, E. of Cyzicus, at the foot of Mt. Olympus, seems to have been early destroyed.

Placĭdĭa, Galla. [Galla.]

Placĭtus, Sex., the author of a short Latin work, entitled De Medicina (or Medicamentis) ex Animalibus, consisting of 34 chapters, each of which treats of some animal whose body was supposed to possess certain medical properties. As might be expected, it contains numerous absurdities, and is of little or no value or interest. The date of the author is uncertain, but he is supposed to have lived in the 4th century after Christ. The work is printed by Stephanus in the Medicae Artis Principes, Paris, fol. 1567, and elsewhere.

Plăcus (Πλάκος), a mountain of Mysia, above the city of Thebe: not in the neighbourhood of Placia, as the resemblance of the names had led some to suppose.

Planārĭa (prob. Canaria, Canary), one of the islands in the Atlantic, called Fortunatae.

Planasĭa. 1. (Pianosa), an island between Corsica and the coast of Etruria, to which Augustus banished his grandson Agrippa Postumus. — 2. An island off the S. coast of Gaul, E. of the Stoechades.

Planciădes, Fulgentĭus. [Fulgentius.]

Plancīna, Munātĭa, the wife of Cn. Piso, who was appointed governor of Syria in A. D. 18. While her husband used every effort to thwart Germanicus, she exerted herself equally to annoy and insult Agrippina. She was encouraged in this conduct by Livia, the mother of the emperor, who saved her from condemnation by the senate when she was accused along with her husband in 20. [Piso, No. 16.] She was brought to trial again in 33, a few years after the death of Livia; and having no longer any hope of escape, she put an end to her own life.

Plancĭus, Cn., first served in Africa under the propraetor A. Torquatus, subsequently in B. C. 68 under the proconsul Q. Metellus in Crete, and next in 62 as military tribune in the army of C. Antonius in Macedonia. In 58 he was quaestor in Macedonia under the propraetor L. Appuleius, and here he showed great kindness to Cicero, when the latter came to this province during his banishment. He was tribune of the plebs in 56; and was elected curule aedile with A. Plotius in 54. But before Plancius and Plotius entered upon their office they were accused by Juventius Laterensis, and L. Cassius Longinus, of the crime of sodalitium, or the bribery of the tribes by means of illegal associations, in accordance with the Lex Licinia, which had been proposed by the consul Licinius Crassus in the preceding year. Cicero defended Plancius in an oration still extant, and obtained his acquittal. Plancius espoused the Pompeian party in the civil wars, and after Caesar had gained the supremacy lived in exile in Corcyra.

Plancus, Munātĭus, the name of a distinguished plebeian family. The surname Plancus signified a person having flat splay feet without any bend in them. 1. L., was a friend of Julius Caesar, and served under him both in the Gallic and the civil wars. Caesar shortly before his death nominated him to the government of Transalpine Gaul for B. C. 44, with the exception of the Narbonese and Belgic portions of the province, and also to the consulship for 42, with D. Brutus as his colleague. After Caesar's death Plancus hastened into Gaul, and took possession of his province. Here he prepared at first to support the senate against Antony; but when Lepidus joined Antony, and their united forces threatened to overwhelm Plancus, the latter was persuaded by Asinius Pollio to follow his example, and to unite with Antony and Lepidus. Plancus during his government of Gaul founded the colonies of Lugdunum and Raurica. He was consul in 42 according to the arrangement made by Caesar, and he subsequently followed Antony to Asia, where he remained for some years, and governed in succession the provinces of Asia and Syria. He deserted Antony in 32 shortly before the breaking out of the civil war between the latter and Octavian. He was favourably received by Octavian, and continued to reside at Rome during the remainder of his life. It was on his proposal that Octavian received the title of Augustus in 27; and the emperor conferred upon him the censorship in 22 with Paulus Aemilius Lepidus. Both the public and private life of Plancus was stained by numerous vices. One of Horace's odes (Carm. i. 7) is addressed to him. — 2. T., surnamed Bursa, brother of the former, was tribune of the plebs

B. C. 52, when he supported the views of Pompey, who was anxious to obtain the dictatorship. With this object he did every thing in his power to increase the confusion which followed upon the death of Clodius. At the close of the year, as soon as his tribunate had expired, Plancus was accused by Cicero of Vis and was condemned. After his condemnation Plancus went to Ravenna in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was kindly received by Caesar. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he was restored to his civic rights by Caesar; but he appears to have taken no part in the civil war. After Caesar's death Plancus fought on Antony's side in the campaign of Mutina. He was driven out of Pollentia by Pontius Aquila, the legate of D. Brutus, and in his flight broke his leg. — 3. Cn., brother of the two preceding, praetor elect 44, was charged by Caesar in that year with the assignment to his soldiers of lands at Buthrotum in Epirus. As Atticus possessed property in the neighbourhood, Cicero commended to Plancus with much earnestness the interests of his friend. He was praetor in 43 and was allowed by the senate to join his brother Lucius [No. 1] in Transalpine Gaul. — 4. L. Plautius Plancus, brother of the 3 preceding, was adopted by a L. Plautius, and therefore took his praenomen as well as nomen, but retained his original cognomen, as was the case with Metellus Scipio [METELLUS, No. 15], and Pupius Piso. [PISO, No. 13.] Before his adoption his praenomen was Caius. He was included in the proscription of the triumvirs, 43, with the consent of his brother Lucius, and was put to death.

Planūdes Maxĭmus, was one of the most learned of the Constantinopolitan monks of the last age of the Greek empire, and was greatly distinguished as a theologian, grammarian, and rhetorician; but his name is now chiefly interesting as that of the compiler of the latest of those collections of minor Greek poems, which were known by the names of Garlands or Anthologies (Στέφανοι, Ἀνθολογίαι). Planudes flourished at Constantinople in the first half of the 14th century, under the emperors Andronicus II. and III. Palaeologi. In A. D. 1327 he was sent by Andronicus II. as ambassador to Venice. As the Anthology of Planudes was not only the latest compiled, but was also that which was recognised as The Greek Anthology, until the discovery of the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, this is chosen as the fittest place for an account of the Literary History of the Greek Anthology. 1. Materials. The various collections, to which their compilers gave the name of Garlands and Anthologies, were made up of short poems, chiefly of an epigrammatic character, and in the elegiac metre. The earliest examples of such poetry were furnished by the inscriptions on monuments, such as those erected to commemorate heroic deeds, the statues of distinguished men, especially victors in the public games, sepulchral monuments, and dedicatory offerings in temples (ἀναθήματα); to which may be added oracles and proverbial sayings. At an early period in the history of Greek literature, poets of the highest fame cultivated this species of composition, which received its most perfect development from the hand of Simonides. Thenceforth, as a set form of poetry, it became a fit vehicle for the brief expression of thoughts and sentiments on any subject; until at last the form came to be cultivated for its own sake, and the literati of Alexandria and Byzantium deemed the ability to make epigrams an essential part of the character of a scholar. Hence the mere trifling, the stupid jokes, and the wretched personalities, which form so large a part of the epigrammatic poetry contained in the Greek Anthology. — 2. The Garland of Meleager. At a comparatively early period in the history of Greek literature, various persons collected epigrams of particular classes, and with reference to their use as historical authorities; but the first person who made such a collection solely for its own sake, and to preserve epigrams of all kinds, was MELEAGER, a cynic philosopher of Gadara, in Palestine, about B. C. 60. His collection contained epigrams by 46 poets, of all ages of Greek poetry, up to the most ancient lyric period. He entitled it The Garland (Στέφανος), with reference to the common comparison of small beautiful poems to flowers. The same idea is kept up in the word Anthology (ἀνθολογία), which was adopted by the next compiler as the title of his work. The Garland of Meleager was arranged in alphabetical order, according to the initial letters of the first line of each epigram. — 3. The Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica, was compiled in the time of Trajan, avowedly in imitation of the Garland of Meleager, and chiefly with the view of adding to that collection the epigrams of more recent writers. — 4. Diogenianus, Straton, and Diogenes Laërtius. Shortly after Philip, in the reign of Hadrian, the learned grammarian, Diogenianus of Heraclea, compiled an Anthology, which is entirely lost. It might have been well if the same fate had befallen the very polluted collection of his contemporary, Straton of Sardis. About the same time Diogenes Laërtius collected the epigrams which are interspersed in his lives of the philosophers, into a separate book. — 5. Agathias Scholasticus, who lived in the time of Justinian, made a collection entitled Κύκλος ἐπιγραμμάτων. It was divided into 7 books, according to subjects. The poems included in it were those of recent writers, and chiefly those of Agathias himself and of his contemporaries, such as Paulus Silentiarius and Macedonius. — 6. The Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, or the Palatine Anthology. Constantinus Cephalas appears to have lived about 4 centuries after Agathias, and to have flourished in the 10th century, under the emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. The labours of preceding compilers may be viewed as merely supplementary to the Garland of Meleager; but the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas was an entirely new collection from the preceding Anthologies and from original sources. Nothing is known of Constantine himself. The MS. of the Anthology was discovered by Salmasius in 1606, in the library of the Electors Palatine at Heidelberg. It was afterwards removed to the Vatican, with the rest of the Palatine library (1623), and has become celebrated under the names of the Palatine Anthology and the Vatican Codex of the Greek Anthology. This MS. was restored to its old home at Heidelberg after the peace of 1815. — 7. The Anthology of Planudes is arranged in 7 books, each of which, except the 5th and 7th, is divided into chapters according to subjects, and these chapters are arranged in alphabetical order. The contents of the books are as follows: — 1. Chiefly ἐπιδεικτικά, that is, displays of skill in this species of poetry, in 91 chapters. 2. Jocular or satiric (σκωπτικά), chaps. 53. 3. Sepulchral (ἐπιτύμβια), chaps. 32. 4. Inscriptions on statues of athletes and other works of art, descriptions of places, &c. chaps. 33. 5. The Ecphrasis of Christodorus, and epigrams on statues of charioteers in the Hippodrome at Constantinople. 6. Dedicatory (ἀναθηματικά), chaps. 27. 7. Amatory (ἐρωτικά). Planudes did little more than abridge and rearrange the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas. Only a few epigrams are found in the Planudean Anthology, which are not in the Palatine.— The best editions of the Greek Anthology are by Brunck and Jacobs. Brunck's edition, which appeared under the title of Analecta Veterum Poetarum Graecorum, Argentorati, 1772—1776, 3 vols. 8vo, contains the whole of the Greek Anthology, besides some poems which are not properly included under that title. Brunck adopted a new arrangement: he discarded the books and chapters of the early Anthology, placed together all the epigrams of each poet, and arranged the poets themselves in chronological order, placing those epigrams, the authors of which were unknown, under the separate head of ἀδέσποτα. Jacobs' edition is founded upon Brunck's, but is much superior, and ranks as the standard edition of the Greek Anthology. It is in 13 vols. 8vo, namely, 4 vols. of the Text, one of Indices, and 3 of Commentaries, divided into 8 parts, Lips. 1795—1814. After the restoration of the MS. of the Palatine Anthology to the University of Heidelberg, Jacobs published a separate edition of the Palatine Anthology, Lips. 1813—1817, 3 vols.

Plătaea, more commonly Plataeae (Πλάταια, Πλαταιαί: Πλαταιεύς), an ancient city of Boeotia, on the N. slope of Mt. Cithaeron, not far from the sources of the Asopus, and on the frontiers of Attica. It was said to have been founded by Thebes; and its name was commonly derived from Plataea, a daughter of Asopus. The town, though not large, played an important part in Greek history, and experienced many striking vicissitudes of fortune. At an early period the Plataeans deserted the Boeotian confederacy and placed themselves under the protection of Athens; and when the Persians invaded Attica, in B.C. 490, they sent 1000 men to the assistance of the Athenians, and had the honour of fighting on their side at the battle of Marathon. Ten years afterwards (480) their city was destroyed by the Persian army under Xerxes at the instigation of the Thebans; and the place was still in ruins in the following year (479), when the memorable battle was fought in their territory, in which Mardonius was defeated, and the independence of Greece secured. In consequence of this victory, the territory of Plataea was declared inviolable, and Pausanias and the other Greeks swore to guarantee its independence. The sanctity of the city was still further secured by its being selected as the place in which the great festival of the Eleutheria was to be celebrated in honour of those Greeks who had fallen in the war. (See Dict. of Antiq. art. Eleutheria.) The Plataeans further received from the Greeks the large sum of 80 talents. Plataea now enjoyed a prosperity of 50 years; but in the 3rd year of the Peloponnesian war (429) the Thebans persuaded the Spartans to attack the town, and after a siege of 2 years at length succeeded in obtaining possession of the place (427). Plataea was now razed to the ground, but was again rebuilt after the peace of Antalcidas (387). It was destroyed the 3rd time by its inveterate enemies the Thebans in 374. It was once more restored under the Macedonian supremacy, and continued in existence till a very late period. Its walls were rebuilt by Justinian.

Platamōdes (Πλαταμώδης: Aja Kyriaki), a promontory in the W. of Messenia.

Plătāna, -um, -us (Πλατάνη, Πλάτανον, Πλάτανος), a fortress in Phoenicia, in a narrow pass between Lebanon and the sea, near the river Damuras or Tamyras (Damur).

Plătēa (Πλατέα, also -εῖα, -ειαί, -αία), an island on the coast of Cyrenaica, in N. Africa, the first place taken possession of by the Greek colonists under Battus. [CYRENAICA.]
